Turning now to the book of the Acts, the first chapter, we are told the Lord "showed himself alive to them after His Passion" (verse 3) to the Apostles whom He had chosen 'by many infallible proofs, being seen of them forty days and speaking of the things pertaining to the Kingdom of God'. So here is the Lord instructing them from the Scriptures for quite a long time; it is over a month, forty days, on and off. What a favoured position they were in! They had been given understanding by Him and they heard Him expound His own Word. What wonderful Bible expositions those must have been! Now after forty days of such unique Bible teaching, what would you think would be the first thing they would ask Him? We realize what most people might think they ought to have said, but let us read what they actually did say. Verse 6 commences with "therefore", linking back to the forty days instruction, because of what they had heard in the Lord's exposition of the O.T. Scriptures. Therefore they ask Him, "Lord, wilt thou at this time restore again the kingdom to Israel?"

Now some say they should not have been asking that. They should have known that God had cast off Israel at the Cross and they ought to have been asking Him about the Church. But the folk who talk like this have evidently not got the divine understanding the apostles had! They think they are in a better position to know than these divinely instructed disciples!

This is nothing less than spiritual pride and there is no sin more likely to blind our minds. May the Lord keep us humble and emptied of human opinion, and may we make the Word of God alone the basis for our belief's at all times.

No.7. pp. 131 - 136

We saw in our last study that, after the resurrection, the Lord Jesus Christ expounded the O.T. Scriptures and we have the record in Luke xxiv. 45 "Then opened He their understanding that they might understand the Scriptures". He gave them divine understanding. And then, in the opening verses of the Acts of the Apostles, written by the same writer, Luke, He shows Himself for forty days and gives them further instruction from the Scriptures. He shows and speaks of things pertaining to the Kingdom of God and, because of that, which is the meaning of the word "therefore" of verse 6, they ask Him a question. As a result of all this teaching they say to Him "When will you restore this Kingdom?" So the Lord must have been talking about the Kingdom and its restoration, which naturally led to this question. He did not say that such a question was wrong, or that the restoration of the earthly Kingdom and its realization was impossible at that time. What He did say was, "It is not for you to know the times or the seasons which the Father hath put in His own power". There was a very good reason why the Lord could not tell them when it was going to take place. It was because God's longsuffering was yet going to be lengthened out towards the people of Israel for something like 35 years; and they were going to be once more commanded, through the lips of Peter speaking for God, to repent and turn again. This was not an offer of the Kingdom, but a definite command to repent and turn again, with wonderful consequences, but we find them disobedient once more and they remain so right until the end of the book.

The next thing we find in this opening chapter of the Acts of the Apostles is that the eleven are concerned to make up their number to twelve because Judas the betrayer had fallen out. Christ had chosen twelve men and now there were only eleven. One may ask, is this important? The answer is "yes", because the Lord Jesus had said: "When the Son of Man shall sit in the throne of His glory, ye also shall sit upon twelve thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel" (Matt. xix. 28). That is one reason at least why the Lord picked twelve apostles, because they were going to be the judges of the twelve tribes, but the falling out of Judas would have made the realization of this promise impossible. So it was important whether there were twelve apostles or not, and this is why, at the beginning of the Acts they are so concerned about it, so they ask the Lord for guidance so that the right one may be chosen.

There is another reason, too, which we must not pass by; there was the question of witness. The Lord had said to them that they should be witnesses unto Him, "eye-witnesses", that is, they had to have seen the things that happened. Let us see this in Acts i. 21. Peter is saying to those assembled: "Wherefore of these men which have companied with us all the time that the Lord Jesus went in and out among us, beginning from the baptism of John", that is, the beginning of the Lord's public ministry, "unto that same day that He was taken up from us" (the Ascension), "must one be ordained to be a witness with us of His resurrection". It must be someone who was with them at the start and went right through to the end and saw it for themselves, an 'eye-witness' in other words. There are people who apparently think they know better than these early disciples who had the enlightenment of the Holy Spirit and the understanding given them by the Lord Jesus. They say "these made a big mistake, they should never have done this. If only they had waited just a little longer, Paul would have been the choice to fill the place of Judas". But Paul could not have been the choice, because he never saw Christ in the flesh. He could not have been a witness 'from the baptism of John until the time that He was taken up'. Paul was a witness for the ascended Christ, a most wonderful witness, but not of the earthly Christ, and His earthly ministry, for that is the point here. Let us see what the Lord Himself says. Turn to John xv. 27; He is speaking to these same men, "And ye also shall bear witness, because you have been with Me from the beginning". In other words they had seen everything all the way through and were in a position to be true witnesses. So was Peter right or wrong when he said "beginning at the baptism of John until the time that He was taken up"? He was right and obviously along the lines of the Lord's will. That rules out the Apostle Paul! So next time you hear anyone talking of the mistakes of the early disciples, just remind them of that, will you? They had received their instruction from the Lord; they had been given an 'opened understanding' by Him; they had the enduement of the Holy Spirit; and yet these critics of today, without such and living Divine qualifications, nearly 2,000 years after these events, have the temerity to say they were wrong!

Again, there are those who say that the disciples should not have used anything so carnal as the 'lot' to ascertain the will of the Lord. But we read in the Word that "the lot is cast into the lap but the whole disposing thereof is of the Lord" (Prov. xvi. 33). That was the way God made known His will in O.T. days, and these were people who had only the O.T., mark you; the N.T. was not yet written. There was no indication that God had changed His command in this respect, so there are no grounds for complaining in that way. God made His will known by this method and the man He chose was Matthias.

But there is still another point while we are considering whether the eleven made mistakes or not. "When the day of Pentecost was fully come" (ii. 3), "there appeared unto them cloven tongues like as of fire and it sat upon each of them and they were all filled with the Holy Ghost", and Matthias was one of them! The cloven tongues sat upon each of them; Matthias was not excepted. He was filled with the Holy Ghost equally with the other apostles. Now did the Holy Spirit make a mistake? That is what the critic should face up to. In making this charge against the eleven, these critics actually include God Himself! There is surely no need to say any more. Where the error lies is obvious. Now on this great day of Pentecost we find Peter stands up and speaks publicly. Not the impetuous Peter now; not the one who was afraid of criticism and denied his Lord. Here is the restored Peter, filled with the Holy Ghost. He could speak now with all the authority of God behind him and he says in effect: "Do not think these men are undergoing this experience because they have been drinking too much wine—not so", verse 16: "But this is that which was spoken by the prophet Joel" and he quotes the second chapter of Joel. Now I wonder how many who seek to study Acts ii. and want to know what its real teaching is, ever go back to the prophecy of Joel and consider the passage that Peter quotes? Should we not honour the Word of God and do this? Let us therefore turn back to Joel ii. and we shall find that its setting is very much like the Acts passage. The disciples had been asking about restoration: "Lord, wilt Thou at this time restore again the kingdom to Israel?" and in the prophecy of Joel their ancestors come under judgment in chapter i.; then there is the wonderful reversal for them in chapter ii. God says in verse 25: "I will RESTORE to you the years that the locust hath eaten, the cankerworm, and the caterpillar, and the palmerworm", descriptive of a plague of locusts, "My great army which I sent among you. And ye shall eat in plenty and be satisfied, and praise the name of the Lord your God, that hath dealt wondrously with you: and My people", that is the people of Israel, of course, "shall never be ashamed". They at last come into their own. Note the "never"; they are not going to respond now and then fall away again at some later date. "They shall never be ashamed"; they shall be completely restored. "And you shall know" (verse 27), "that I am in the midst of Israel". God is there in their midst, He is with them; "I am Jehovah your God and none else". The Lord repeats once again "My people shall never be ashamed". Obviously, if we look at the Jewish race, this has not yet taken place. Israel has not been in a position where they never will be ashamed. This will not be experienced until there is a direct relationship with them and God and when God says "I am in the midst of her". This nation will then be once more in the centre of His purpose for the earth. But it is in this setting of restoration we get this reference to Pentecost (which Peter quotes under the guidance of the Spirit) "And it shall come to pass afterwards" (verse 28), "that I will pour out My Spirit upon all flesh: and your sons and your daughters shall prophesy, your old men shall dream dreams, your young men shall see visions. And also upon the servants and upon the handmaids in those days will I pour out my Spirit".

And not only that, there are going to be physical signs in the earth and heaven (verse 30), "And I will show wonders in the heavens and in the earth, blood and fire and pillars of smoke. The sun shall be turned into darkness and the moon into blood, before the great terrible day of the Lord". The whole passage is quoted by Peter. So unless we get the conception that Pentecost has to do with the restoration of Israel, we have lost the key! And this is a fact we must constantly keep in mind.

Not only that, but Pentecost itself is one of the feasts of Jehovah, not merely a feast of the Jews. In Lev. xxiii., God Himself institutes this feast, among others; and in the feasts of Jehovah that are recorded in that chapter there is a wonderful sketch, drawn by God, of His purpose for the earth. It starts off with the Sabbath, because that is where God starts, in His purpose, with perfection and rest. That is also where He is going to finish, with the Sabbath age, when everything is brought back to perfection—rest again. "There is a Sabbath-keeping for the people of God" (Heb. iv. 9)—the reality. Man cannot start here in experience; you and I have to commence in experience with the next feast, which is Passover. "Christ our Passover is sacrificed for us"; so wrote Apostle Paul centuries later (I Cor. v. 7). We know that has been fulfilled at Calvary, where the Lord Jesus Christ died in the stead of His sinful people—"Christ our Passover". Unleavened bread follows, directly connected with Passover and not to be separated from it, and this pictures the Christ-like life which should follow. The Apostle Paul describes it as 'purging out the old leaven', that is discarding the old sinful life and its ways. After Unleavened bread, comes Firstfruits, and the N.T. tells us that this typifies the resurrection of Christ (I Cor. xv. 20, 32). "Christ the firstfruits, afterwards they that are Christ's at His coming."

Then there comes a gap of forty-nine days and after this, Pentecost. Now Pentecost is just the Greek word for fifty. Fifty days are numbered from Passover to Pentecost. Again you will notice it is linked with firstfruits (Lev. xxiii. 17): "Ye shall bring out of your habitations two wave loaves of two tenth deals." God was dealing with Israel and Judah. "They shall be baken with leaven", for these were certainly not sinless like the Saviour and leaven is always a type of sin in the Bible. Now note: "they are the firstfruits unto the Lord" (xxiii. 17), and this gives us another clue as to the true purpose of Pentecost in the N.T. It was the gathering out of a "firstfruits", a firstfruits of this great earthly kingdom. Had the whole nation of Israel repented and turned back to God under Peter's ministry, a harvest would have followed! The Kingdom could have been realized then. Those who were saved on the day of Pentecost were a firstfruits, an earnest of the kingdom that could have come at that time had the whole nation responded. But, alas, they were not ready. What a commentary on their hardness of heart and their disobedience!

Going further, we read Acts ii. 5 "And there were dwelling at Jerusalem, Jews, devout men out of every nation under heaven"; they were called the Jews of the Dispersion. They lived outside the boundaries of the promised Land. These faithful Jews came up to Jerusalem to keep the feasts. They came up to keep this feast, the feast of Pentecost, and no Gentile, even if he had wanted to, would ever have been allowed there. The reader probably knows that no Gentile was ever permitted inside the Temple, under pain of death! There was the Court of the Gentiles outside and beyond that they could not go. There was therefore no Gentile at the feast of Pentecost; the people of Israel only are at this feast. It was not until the Ethiopian eunuch and the response of Cornelius that we find the purpose widening and the Gentile comes into blessing. And even then that was obviously out of the reckoning of the Apostle Peter, and certainly out of the reckoning of the early church.

Let us turn on to chapter x. Peter here gives an explanation as to why he went to Cornelius and, remember, he had to have a very special vision to go there. He had to have a very definite "thus saith the Lord" to disobey the command of Leviticus concerning eating and having direct contact with the outside Gentile world. But God now showed him that His plan was widening. He had said to Abraham "In thy seed shall all families of the earth be blessed". God never intended that the Jew should be first and last; that he should be the first, to be the channel, yes, but not the last. We have the explanation in the N.T. as to why He did it; it was to provoke this nation to jealousy, to wake them up spiritually (Rom. x. 19; xi. 11).

So after Peter had gone to Cornelius, and he had responded, we read—(verse 45): "They of the circumcision which believed were astonished, as many as came with Peter". What made them astonished? "Because that on the Gentiles was poured out the gift of the Holy Ghost." This was something new; showing that it did not happen to any Gentile on the Day of Pentecost. And not only that, but Peter had to go to the mother church at Jerusalem and go over the whole matter again and then they were astonished and upset too! "And when the apostles and brethren that were in Judaea heard that the Gentiles had also received the word of God. And when Peter was come up to Jerusalem, they that were of the circumcision contended with him, saying, Thou wentest in to men uncircumcised"—(i.e. Gentiles)—"and did eat with them" (xi. 2, 3). God had willed in the past that they were to be separated from the Gentile nations around. And so Peter had to go over it all again to explain to them why, at this point, the Gentile had been brought into blessing and the sharing of Israel's spiritual things (Rom. xv. 27).

This assembly most evidently knew nothing of the Church, the Body of Christ, where the Jew ceases to be a person with covenant privilege with God, and the Gentile an equal sharer of spiritual blessings in heavenly places in Christ (Eph. iii. 6; i. 3).

No.8. pp. 152 - 156

We have seen that the opening chapters of the Acts of the Apostles continue the earthly Kingdom purpose of God. The eleven disciples are instructed for 40 days by the Lord Himself from the O.T. Scriptures, and this leads them to be concerned with the restoration of Israel. Then Pentecost follows with the Divine explanation taken from Joel's prophecy, which likewise is connected with the same restoration. We noted that there could not have been any Gentile present or saved on the day of Pentecost, and that Peter had to receive a special vision from the Lord to go to the Gentiles at all. Not only this, but the mother church at Jerusalem knew nothing of Gentile salvation and Peter had to give an account to them of his action in so doing. In other words, these early believers knew nothing of a redeemed company where neither Jew or Gentile existed and all were one in Christ both doctrinally and dispensationally, and this in spite of the opened understanding that the Lord had given them and the filling of the Holy Spirit they had received.

Now we must pause and consider the Scriptural usage of the word 'church', because, if we get wrong ideas here, we shall not be in a position to understand the fullness of God's great plan revealed in the N.T. This word is used in various ways. It can mean a place of worship; it can also mean a denomination or a sect. It can mean professing Christendom as a whole (and this is the way it is usually used in Christian circles); or, Scripturally, it can designate a called-out company of the redeemed, quite irrespective of what earthly label they may have. Now the N.T. never uses this word in those first three ways. There were no buildings called churches in N.T. days. Believers met together in the home, and that is why the home and its conditions was so important; it was the meeting place for the local church. There were no ecclesiastical meeting places in the early Christian centuries. Either it meant a local assembly of believers, or a group of believers designated as the church of God or the Body of Christ. We must thus be careful that we are getting a Scriptural idea of this word.

The word ‘church’, although it occurs often in the N.T., really has its roots in the O.T. and occurs frequently there, though not in our English translation. Over and over again we have the word ‘congregation’ in the O.T.; “the congregation of the people of Israel” are words of quite frequent occurrence. Now in the Greek Bible (and, after all, that was the Bible which was current in the Lord’s day; it was the O.T. translated into Greek, for Greek-speaking Jews, which the Lord and the Apostles used) this word ‘congregation’ is the word ‘church’, and it occurs at least 70 times. So when you read in our English Bible “the congregation of the people of Israel”, the Greek version reads ‘the church of the people of Israel’. The nation of Israel, in the Scriptural sense, was a church; and this is how it is first used in the Bible, and not in the sense of the Gentile church of the N.T.

So we can quite understand why Stephen, in his speech recorded in Acts vii. refers to the nation of the Israel as ‘the church in the wilderness’.

The Greek word ekklesia, Church, means a called-out company of people, and that is just what Israel was, a nation separate from all others.

God has, therefore, an earthly church, that is His earthly people—the people of Israel.

God also has a heavenly church, the Body of Christ, whose calling, status, and destiny have no lasting link with the earth. It is entirely heavenly in character and destiny. So it is Scripturally true to say that there is more than one church in the Bible. There is of course only one Body of Christ, but that is another matter.

In the period covered by the Acts, we have a saved Jewish remnant to which later on, Gentile believers were added. God was, in effect, reaching out to the Gentile in advance of His plan revealed in the O.T., where Israel was to be the channel of blessing to all families of the earth. The N.T. has told us why. Rom. x. 19, xi. 11, 14 teaches that these Gentiles were saved to provoke Israel to jealousy, to stir up this nation that was dying spiritually and becoming so hardened in their heart, and so rebellious still against the Lord and His offer of mercy and grace. When they saw the blessings being received by Gentiles whom they despised, they would possibly be stirred up, and provoked to emulation and salvation. This is the reason that the N.T. gives as to why Gentiles were being saved in the Acts period, very different from the usual teaching that they were being redeemed to form part of the Church which is Christ’s Body.

We will now consider the third chapter of the Acts. This chapter is exceedingly important, the appreciation of which is one of the keys to the understanding of the N.T. First of all we notice that Peter heals a cripple. “And certain man lame from his mother’s womb was carried, whom they laid daily at the gate of the temple which is called Beautiful, to ask alms of them that entered into the temple” (Acts iii. 2). This is just a picture of what God was waiting to do for the nation of Israel, crippled with their unbelief. They had just committed the climax sin, of sending their great Priest-King to the Cross. After centuries of preparation and instruction by God, what was the result? They would rather have a murderer than their Saviour and King! They would rather have Barabbas than Christ! And in spite of this God was waiting to heal them! They were lame and impotent, like the cripple, and utterly useless to be that great channel of blessing to the world. So Peter demonstrates before their eyes what God is willing to do for them if they would only repent and turn back to Him, and he brings the message home to them in verses 19-26, "Repent ye, therefore, and be converted". The word 'repent' just means a change of attitude, a change of mind; not to be confused with the similar sounding word 'penitence'. It may include that, (that is sorrow for sin) but its primary meaning is a change of mind. It was the clarion call of John the Baptist to this people—"Repent". It was the call of the Lord Jesus in the days of His flesh, to them likewise: "Repent for the kingdom of heaven is at hand" (has drawn near). Now Peter, under the guidance of the Holy Spirit, gives them this same command—"Repent ye, therefore"—change your attitude of mind. It is important that we should realize that this is a command of God to Israel. God is not so much offering them anything as commanding them to repent and to turn.

In the O.T. this was a key-word in God's dealings with them. When they left the Lord and slipped back into idolatry and sin, as they did very often, this was the call of the prophets: "Turn ye unto me, saith the Lord of hosts, and I will turn unto you" (Zech. i. 3). Not only Zechariah, but you will find the same command in Nehemiah, and also in the Books of Deuteronomy and Chronicles, the word 'convert' which Peter uses is the very word used in the Greek Bible in each of these cases. So God is saying just the same words through Peter's lips that the O.T. prophets had brought to this people, and the result of their repentance would be, that their sins would be blotted out. This means nothing less than redemption, the blotting-out of sin. God cannot use this people until they are redeemed. He was prepared to do this for them if they obeyed His command, and the result would be that "the times of refreshing shall come from the presence of the Lord. And He shall send Jesus Christ which before was preached unto you" or, as the R.V. puts it "hath been appointed for you" (Acts iii. 19, 20). The Lord Jesus was appointed in the days of His flesh for the people of Israel. He said so, "I am only sent to the lost sheep of the house of Israel". And He would only allow the twelve, in the conditions that He gave them, to go to the people of Israel and not to the Gentile world. He was certainly appointed for this earthly people, and here is a tremendous promise, that if they will turn and repent, Jesus Christ will be sent back to them. This is nothing less than the promise of His Second Coming! Yet how few seem to see this. We must get this quite clear in our minds because without it we shall never properly understand the N.T., especially the Epistles which were written during the time covered by the Acts. As we look at these Epistles, we shall find that all of them, practically without exception, stress the Lord's Second Advent as being imminent or near. The modern critic, not understanding this passage (Acts iii. 19-26) says that the early apostles, although they looked for the Lord's return, were over-zealous; they made a mistake and later give it up. Is this the truth? No indeed! The Second Advent was a possibility at this time, depending upon the response of Israel. If anyone objects to this, we would remind them that God is not dealing with automatons, but moral beings with the power of obeying and disobeying, and He is willing to make allowance for this in His purpose. Think of how this worked out in Jonah's day. Within 40 days Nineveh was to be overthrown according to God's warning, but this did not happen for at least a century! Why? Because of the repentance of the Ninevites!

So here, momentous events hung upon the response of this key people and we only blind ourselves if we ignore this. Coming to verse 21 we read, "Whom the heaven must receive until the times of restitution of all things", but if you read the R.V.—"restoration". Here again is this important word "restore". Now restoration is not the commencement of something new; it is the bringing-in of something old, to bring it back again. So this is what we find Peter emphasizing to his own nation "the restoration of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all His Holy prophets since the world began". This is the testimony, Peter said, of all the O.T. Prophets. So we miss much of the meaning of the O.T. prophecies unless we get this clearly. He quotes Moses: "Moses truly said unto the fathers, A Prophet shall the Lord your God raise up unto you of your brethren, like unto me; Him shall ye hear in all things whatsoever He shall say unto you. And it shall come to pass, that every soul which will not hear that Prophet, shall be destroyed". Thus he gives a very solemn warning to this nation, that if they would not be obedient, there will be destruction. "Yea, and all the prophets from Samuel and those that follow after, as many as have spoken, have likewise foretold of these days." They are prophetic of this very time. "Ye", he says, "are the children (the sons) of the prophets", and now we are going back to Gen. xii. again, "and of the covenant which God made with our fathers, saying unto Abraham, and in they seed shall all the kindreds (families) of the earth be blessed". So God has not forgotten His plan which He announced to Abraham—it is still in the fore front at this point! And it is still possible of being carried out if Israel will heed this divine command to repent and turn back to God. "Unto you first", continues Peter (if they are the appointed channel they must have the message first), "Unto you first God, having raised up his Son Jesus, sent him to bless you, in turning away every one of you from his iniquities (or sins)". God was waiting to save them. So you see that this was very crucial indeed. We shall have to come back to this chapter from time to time.

In our next study, we must look at the epistles that were written during the Acts period and see whether the Lord's coming was indeed imminent, and when we have done this we shall realize that their combined testimony is overwhelming.

The complication and slowness of working of God's great purposes are because of the devil and the powers of darkness antagonizing the purpose of God, and also because of the sin and frailty of the human instruments that God graciously uses. We have no stones to throw at the people of Israel. Of ourselves, all of us are sinful and failing, and if God demanded perfection for service He would not use anyone. The fact that He does only shows His great longsuffering and patience. We trust that, all who have followed so far, will realize their great need, and if they have not already done so, take this great and necessary first step in receiving the Lord Jesus Christ as their own personal Saviour and Sinbearer so that, with all sins forgiven and God's righteousness reckoned theirs, they may have a glorious place in the perfect creation and kingdom to which God is slowly but surely working.

We have seen that there was the possibility of the Lord's early return to the earth, depending upon the repentance of Israel (Acts iii. 19-26). We wish now to show that this is reflected in all the earlier epistles. Let us open the Book at I Thess. i. Here the Apostle Paul is commending the believers at Thessalonica; he says in verse 9: "For they themselves shew of us what manner of entering in we had unto you, and how ye turned to God from idols to serve the living and true God, and to wait for His Son from heaven." They could wait for an event that is yet future even to us today, nearly 2,000 years later. It must have been a possibility then. In the fourth chapter we are told that some had lost loved ones and the Apostle wrote to comfort them: "For if we believe that Jesus died and rose again, even so them also which sleep in Jesus will God bring with Him." So the Lord is coming back! Yes! "For this we say unto you by the word of the Lord, that we which are alive and remain unto the coming of the Lord . . . . ." So even he was expecting, at this time that there was a possibility of his being alive, and the Thessalonian believers at the Lord's Coming, "shall not prevent (shall not get before) them which are asleep".

II Thess. i. 7: Some were going through persecution and tremendous difficulty and this was also written to comfort and sustain them. "And to you who are troubled, rest with us, when the Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven with his mighty angels." The second advent of Christ with the angels from heaven was something which these persecuted saints were directed to hold fast to, because, when that happened, they would experience rest from persecution. So the Lord's Coming was a possibility then, in their lifetime, otherwise it would not have been a comfort to them under trial. Chapter ii. 1: "Now we beseech you, brethren, by (or concerning or touching) the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, and by our gathering together unto him." Their 'gathering together unto Him' is connected with His coming.

In I Cor. i. 7 the Apostle here refers to the spiritual gifts that had been given to the Corinthian church, "So that ye come behind in no gift; waiting for the coming (or the revelation) of our Lord Jesus Christ". Now on to chapter vii. Certain problems had arisen concerning marriage, but note what the Apostle says in verse 29: "But this I say, brethren, the time is short: it remaineth, that both they that have wives be as though they had none." He is saying, in effect, the time is so short that marriage need not be considered. And yet we find that, after the Acts period, the Apostle Paul urges the widows to marry! But at this time, the time was short because the Lord's return was near, and I Cor. xvi. 22 emphasizes this: "If any man love not the Lord Jesus Christ, let him be Anathema. Maran-atha." These are two Aramaic words: "Let him be accursed", Maran-atha = "The Lord cometh". So here again the Apostle stresses the early return of the Lord Jesus.

Let us go back to Rom. xiii. 11, 12: "And that, knowing the time, that now it is high time to awake out of sleep: for now is our salvation nearer than when we believed. The night is far spent, the day is at hand". And in xvi. 20 he writes this: "And the God of peace shall bruise Satan under your feet shortly." The Greek word is 'quickly'. Now the bruising of Satan under the redeemed's feet could not be by any action of theirs. Neither they, nor you or I, can ever vanquish this great foe of the Lord, but the Lord Jesus will, at His Second Advent. So again this great event was brought before them as being nearer.

Now let us turn to Heb. x. 36. These Hebrew believers were undergoing trial and affliction, as the context makes clear. And then in verse 36 we read, "For ye have need of patience, that, after ye have done the will of God, ye might receive the promise. For yet a little while, and He that shall come, will come and will not tarry", only a little while. Friends, He hasn't come yet! Was God playing with them, was He tantalizing them through this writer? No—He meant what He said. The possibility was that the Lord would return in 'a little while'; His coming then was near. It would have been pointless to have held out as an encouragement to these believers under persecution the Second Advent, yet future to us, nearly 2,000 years later!

We turn now to the next epistles, James v. 8: "Be ye also patient; stablish your hearts, for the coming of the Lord draws near." Again the nearness of this Coming! "Grudge not one another brethren, lest ye be condemned: behold, the Judge standeth at the door." Next to I Pet. iv. 7: "But the end of all things is at hand" (the end of everything is near). "Be ye, therefore, sober, and watch unto prayers." Was he exaggerating, do you think?

Turning now to I John ii. 18: "Little children, it is the last time"; but the Greek says "It is the last hour". "And as you have heard that antichrist shall come, even now (the time when John wrote) there are many antichrists, whereby we know it is the last hour." So John adds a similar testimony to the other N.T. writers.

Let us go back to the first epistle to the Corinthians and this time to the tenth chapter. The first part is a warning dealing with the people of Israel and the way they provoked the Lord in the wilderness journey to Canaan and how God judged them. The Corinthians are warned not to murmur as their fathers did (verse 10): "Neither murmur ye, as some of them also murmured, and were destroyed of the destroyer. Now all these things happened to them for ensamples (or types); and they are written for our admonition, upon whom the ends of the world are come". But a more literal rendering would be "the consummation of the ages has arrived", an astounding statement, showing how near to the end things were. Do we want any more testimony that all these N.T. writers looked on the coming of the Lord as being imminent, or possible, in their lifetime? There can be no doubt about this whatsoever—or were they mistaken? Some do not hesitate to say they were. They assert that the early church did believe that the Second Advent was near but, of course, they were too enthusiastic, and, of course, they were wrong, for the Lord did not come as expected. But they were not wrong if only such people would read and ponder Acts iii., they would have the key to the problem. The Lord's early Coming was linked with the repentance and conversion of Israel (Acts iii. 19, 20). Because the nation of Israel did not obey the command to repent and turn, the Lord did not come back then. We shall find that the Epistles which are written after Acts no longer refer to the imminent return of the Lord because the necessary conditions were gone. The nation of Israel was laid aside in unbelief; that is how they have been for nearly 2,000 years, and that aspect of the Lord's Coming and of God's kingdom upon earth, of which they were to be the channel and the centre, has been postponed because they were blind, deaf and hardened in heart and so completely unusable.

Let us go on, to the fourth chapter of the Acts and read together verse 32: "And the multitude of them that believed were of one heart and of one soul: neither said any of them ought of the things which he possessed was his own; but they had all things common"—all things shared. This is true communism. Communism is sharing; but what we know as communism today is Satan's travesty of the real thing; it is sharing, with the Lord Jesus Christ left out. The sharing of Acts iv. 32 is with the Lord Jesus Christ in the centre, and it makes all the difference in the world. The Lord Jesus was the Redeemer, the Saviour, the Centre of this group of His people and as far as earthly possessions went, they shared, they had all things in common. This is called "the Apostles' doctrine" which we will look at more closely later on.

As we read chapter v., we find there were two believers, Ananias and Sapphira, who did not conform to this. They had a possession which they sold, and then kept back part of the price, and they told a lie about it. One may think that this was not a very bad sin, but it was a serious thing, because this lie cost them their lives. Peter said to them (verse 3) "Why hath Satan filled thy heart to lie to the Holy Ghost, and to keep back part of the price?" And at the end of verse 4 Peter speaks of lying to God: "You have not lied unto men but unto God." Again, one may find this difficult to understand. Christians, alas, may tell lies, but God does not judge them in this way for sin amongst His children for telling lies? It would indeed be a terrible thing, and someone has said that the undertakers would not be able to cope with the problem. That might be true. But here, in the Acts of the Apostles, God is still dealing directly and judging for sin. The age of grace, as we know it, had not yet started. When God brings in this earthly kingdom sin will not be allowed to spread like a festering sore. God will deal with it directly every day "Morning by morning will I uproot all the lawless ones of the land, that I may cut off out of the city of Yahweh, all the workers of iniquity" (Psa. ci. 8, Rotherham).

Let us be thankful that today we live in an age of abounding grace and longsuffering of God. Grace reigns (Rom. v. 21) and if we are found "in Christ", then we cannot come into condemnation (Rom. viii. 1). We trust this is the happy experience of all who read these lines.

In our last study of the Acts of the Apostles we went through all the epistles written during this time, and found that every single one without exception stressed the near coming of the Lord Jesus Christ. God was not mocking His people when He promised this; He meant it. The Second Advent could have taken place during the Acts period, but it did not do so. Not because God was unwilling but because Israel were not obedient; they did not repent or turn back to Him. At the point we have reached (chapters iv. & v.) they are still being tested. What was the first reaction then, of this people, the leaders especially, to this wonderful promise? They just kicked all the harder against God; they imprisoned the apostles thus attempting to muzzle them and their message of salvation and restoration. And then God delivers His servants from prison and they stand before the leaders again. There is an important passage to which we must now refer in the fifth chapter. "Peter answered them, we ought to obey God rather than men" (verse 29). This is the fearless Peter, not the vacillating man who, before the crucifixion, denied his Lord. Now he stands, enabled by the grace of God and by the enduement of the Holy Spirit, and he says quite frankly to the leaders of Israel, "The God of our fathers raised up Jesus, whom you slew and hanged on a tree. Him hath God exalted at His right hand to be a Prince and a Saviour", for there can be no ruling as a prince or king without the question of sin being dealt with by redemption. Now note: "for (in order) to give repentance to Israel; and forgiveness of sins." God was prepared to forgive Israel's sins and to give them repentance and so fulfil His promise of restoration and the return of Christ to them.

It is difficult to overstress the importance of the resurrection of Christ because this is the great foundation stone of Christianity. The Apostle Paul makes that clear in his first letter to the Corinthian church. "If Christ be not risen" he said "your faith is vain . . . . . Ye are yet in your sins" (I Cor. xv. 14-17). And when he writes later to the Romans he deals with One who "was delivered for our offences, and raised again for our justification" (Rom. iv. 25). We wonder if all who are reading this have entered into the joy of this glorious fact? We have now a living Christ, One who ever lives to make intercession, to aid, to assist all His redeemed people. But in Acts v. we have an aspect of the resurrection of Christ which is little stressed or understood today. When did we last hear any Christian speaker or writer point out that Christ's resurrection was "to give repentance to Israel"? So concerned are evangelicals with the idea that the Body of Christ commenced at Pentecost and Israel were rejected at the Cross, that Israel's repentance at this point and its consequences means nothing to them. A change of heart for the nation of Israel was still a possibility. We must keep that well in our minds, otherwise how can we understand God's great plan revealed in the N.T.? How can we get an accurate knowledge of God's will for us today? Later on we are going to see that the Apostle Paul is going to say something similar. He is going to confirm that the people of Israel are still there, an important factor in this great plan concerning world blessing, with Gen. xii. in mind, the promise to Abraham that 'in thee shall all families of the earth be blessed'. We shall see that he constantly ministers "to the Jew first".

Now going on in fairly large steps, we come to the witness of Stephen. He was well-named, because his name means "a crown"—Stephanos. He was the first martyr in the N.T. who gave his life for the truth. His speech was part of God's witness to the leaders of the people of Israel, and how they hated it! It might have been used to their repentance. Doubtless many believers prayed that would happen, but the leaders became all the harder in their opposition, and it ended with Stephen giving his life for his Saviour. And yet, how wonderfully God works! That offering-up of life was not in vain, for surely it was one of the factors, at least, in the conversion of Saul of Tarsus. He stood there; he held the clothes of the people who were battering out the life of that saint of God; he saw that face "like the face of an angel" (Acts vi. 15). What a testimony, for a man to die like that! It must have been something that Saul never forgot. How could a man go through all that, give such testimony and look so radiant? It was one of the things, evidently, that Saul of Tarsus tried to stifle, but in the end, of course, it contributed to his conversion, his right about turn to the Lord, on the road to Damascus.

Passing over now to chapters x. and xi., we come to the conversion of the Gentile Cornelius. We note the reluctance of the Apostle Peter to go to a Gentile; and we must not put that down to the fact that Peter was a bigoted Jew. No! he was a faithful man, and was only doing what God's regulation in the O.T enjoined as regards his relationship to the Gentile world. That was the only light that existed up to that point, but now God begins to show him that His purpose is widening and that the blessing is going out to the Gentile. That was abnormal, because God's plan was that His truth should go out to the Gentile through the redeemed nation of Israel, and they were anything but saved at this point—opposing, rejecting, blinding their eyes, deafening their ears and hardening their hearts. But here God, as it were, acts before the time, and saves a remnant of Gentiles; and the N.T. gives us the reason. It was, humanly speaking, to stir Israel up and to "provoke them to jealousy" (Rom. x. 19; xi. 11). This should have roused them to realize their great privileges were fast slipping from them through their blindness and hardness of heart. Peter had to have a special revelation from God to go to a Gentile outsider and then he obeys. The next thing to notice is the astonishment of the Jewish believers when they saw a Gentile receiving blessing, which shows us quite clearly that with the exception of the Ethiopian eunuch, there had been no Gentile saved up to this time, otherwise they would not have been astonished if this had been a regular occurrence. Chapter x. 44: "While Peter spake these words the Holy Ghost fell on all them who heard the word, and they of the circumcision which believed were astonished as many as came with Peter because that on the Gentiles also was poured out the gift of the Holy Ghost."

And that was not the end for Peter, because he had to go to the mother church at Jerusalem and go over the whole matter again and explain how it was that he had dared to go and minister to one outside the fold of Israel, an uncircumcised Gentile! Now is it not obvious that these early Christians knew nothing about a church where there is no Jew or Greek? They cannot have known anything about the Body of Christ, for that was a secret still hid in God till revealed to the Apostle Paul and made known through his later prison ministry (Eph. iii. 1-11; Col. i. 24-27). And so Peter goes over and rehearses the whole matter again from the beginning (chapter xi. 4) and explains how God had made this new Gentile ministry clear to him.

Now we come on to chapter xii. where is recorded the miraculous deliverance of Peter from prison. This particular type of miracle goes right through this book. If it is ever our lot to be thrown into prison for our faith, and no-one can say that will never happen to us, can we expect an angel to come and open the door and let us out? Hardly! Which only shows that some of the conditions of the Acts period are not true today. The local church had been praying for Peter's release, but they forgot to watch for the answer! Fancy praying to God for the release of their leader, and when God answered the prayer they were astonished; they would not believe it when at last he knocked at the door! But then you and I have no stones to throw, because doubtless that has been true of us as well. We have prayed but have not watched, and when the answer came we have been surprised. May God keep us, not only praying along the lines of His will, but watching as well. The Lord has enjoined us to "watch and pray".

Now you will notice at the end of chapter xii., the record of what happened to Herod sitting upon his throne; and it makes one wonder why this is inserted. "And upon a set day Herod, arrayed in royal apparel, sat upon his throne, and made an oration unto them. And the people gave a shout saying, It is the voice of a god (or, it is the voice of God) and not of a man. And immediately an angel of the Lord smote him, and he gave up the ghost" (xii. 21-23). So here is another direct judgment, like we have seen occurred to Ananias and Sapphira. God is still judging directly for sin in the Acts. But there is another reason for this insertion about Herod taking divine honours. If we know the Word of God we shall remember that the Apostle Paul told the Thessalonian believers there would arise someone called 'the man of sin' who would sit in the temple of God, showing himself and claiming that he is God (II Thess. ii. 3, 4). And so the stage, as it were, was already being set for this to happen and had the people of Israel repented, the wonderful prophecies of the Book of the Revelation concerning the end time could have run their course. A time that could produce a Herod, who could take divine honours; a time that could produce a monster like Nero, could certainly produce those represented by the wild beasts of the Book of the Revelation (chapter xiii.). And while Herod and Nero did not fulfil the prophecy, there it was, all shadowed forth at the time, only waiting for Israel to repent and turn to God and His prophetic Word would have been fulfilled to the letter. That is why Peter did not hesitate in Acts ii. to link Pentecost with the great time of judgment at the end, the Day of the Lord (Acts ii. 19-21).

We come now to the second section of the Acts of the Apostles which deals with the commission and ministry of the Apostle Paul. Chapter xiii. records his first public speech at Antioch. First we have Saul and Barnabas being separated by the Holy Spirit for service (verse 2 and onwards) and then comes the record of Paul commencing his ministry with a miracle, just as Peter did, but with a difference! Peter heals a Jew; Paul does the opposite and blinds a Jew. "And when they had gone through the isle unto Paphos, they found a certain sorcerer, a false prophet, a Jew" (xiii. 6). In the Acts we have pictorially two sides of God's truth for Israel. He was willing to heal them if they repented and forgive their sins, and send Christ back to them. But if they were disobedient still and would not repent, there was nothing but spiritual blindness for them. You will notice that this type is true to the letter; they are not blinded for ever. Verse 11: "And now, behold, the hand of the Lord is upon thee, and thou shalt be blind, not seeing the sun for a season". "Blindness in part is happened to Israel until . . . . ." Is not that what the Apostle Paul wrote later on in the Epistle to the Romans (xi. 25-29)? This blindness upon this nation is a terrible reality, but it is not going to last for ever. So Israel has the two sides: blessing and warning of judgment rehearsed in front of them in miracle form.

Next the Apostle goes back over their history very much like Stephen did, and later on he deals with the resurrection. In verse 33 we read, "God hath fulfilled the same", the promise of the resurrection of Christ, "in that He hath raised up Jesus again; as it is also written in the second psalm, Thou art my son, this day have I begotten thee". Now we have already seen that the Lord was raised to give repentance to Israel. The Apostle goes on to say (verse 34), "And as concerning that He raised Him up from the dead, now no more to return to corruption, He said on this wise, I will give you the sure mercies of David". What is the meaning of the "sure mercies of David"? Would this have any meaning to the pagan world? No, because it did not concern them. The "sure mercies of David" are referring to the covenant mercies that God made with David. The covenant that God made with Abraham and the one that He made with David are two more important factors in the out-working of His redemptive plan for the world through the people of Israel. We want to get a clear understanding of this. Let us go back for a moment to the prophecy of Isa. lv. 3: "Incline your ear and come unto me; hear and your soul shall live: and I will make an everlasting covenant with you (Israel) even the sure mercies of David."

Now, God willing, in our next study, we will consider what were these covenant mercies that were promised to David and his seed, the people of Israel. We have had the resurrection of Christ to give Israel repentance, and now the same mighty event is brought before us in chapter xiii. to fulfil God's covenant mercies to the same people. Again we say, here are two extremely important aspects of the resurrection of Christ which are largely ignored by evangelical Christendom today.

May the Lord give us that continued interest and understanding of the whole of His revelation, so that we may realize just what our place is in the great purpose of the ages which is in Christ Jesus our Lord (Eph. iii. 11).

In our last study, we came to Paul's first public speech in chapter xiii. of the Acts and there we found he brought forward the truth of the resurrection in a special way, as Peter had done, bearing upon the people of Israel and not upon the world generally. He says (xiii. 32), "We declare unto you glad tidings how that the promise which was made unto the fathers". The promise that God made to Abraham, to Isaac, and to Jacob, was it real—did God mean it? Yes, Paul said, He did mean it and He has fulfilled it by raising Christ from the dead. "He hath fulfilled the same unto us their children in that He hath raised up Jesus again", and he quotes the second Psalm to prove that: "Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee." And as concerning that he raised him up from the dead. "Now no more to return to corruption, he said on this wise, I will give you the sure mercies of David." So here is the resurrection of Christ with the purpose of giving these 'sure mercies of David' to the people of Israel. What does that mean? It was a quotation, first of all, from Isa. cv. 3, but to understand it properly we must look back at Psa. lxxxix. This is the psalm of God's faithfulness, seven times mentioned. Verse 3: "I have made a covenant with my chosen, I have sworn unto David my servant", concerning his posterity (his seed) and his throne—he was a king—"to all generations" (verse 4). Now these are the sure mercies of David, concerning his seed, the people of Israel, and his throne. The promises that God makes are so definite and so clear, that surely, nobody should fail to understand them! Let us come to the middle of the psalm, verse 29: "He seed also will I make to endure for ever and his throne as the days of heaven." So here is a promise that God will not allow the seed of David ever to become annihilated, nor will He allow his throne to perish, although the psalmist warns this people that if they do not walk in God's ways there will be Divine chastisement (verse 31): "If they break My statutes and keep not My commandments, then will I visit their transgression with the rod."

But in contrast He says (verse 33) "Nevertheless (although I have to chasten), my loving kindness will I not utterly take from him nor suffer (nor allow) my faithfulness to fail". He is the God of faithfulness, the God of truth. Again in verse 34: "My covenant will I not break, nor alter the thing that is gone out of my lips." In view of this we cannot accept any scheme of Biblical interpretation that makes God change His plan for world blessing and reject the people of Israel. God has said He will not alter it, so there must be a future for this people, sinful though they may be. "Once (verse 35) have I sworn by my holiness that I will not lie unto David." Look what language God is using! He has put the onus on Himself—"I have sworn. I have promised", and this cannot fail, no matter what Israel does. Verse 30: "His seed shall endure for ever, and his throne as the sun before me. It shall be established for ever as the moon and as the faithful witness in heaven." These precious and definite promises are 'the sure mercies of David'. Now, the Apostle Paul says, the resurrection of the Lord Jesus Christ has made them possible for Israel. He was raised so that He might take His place as the true descendants of David and sit on David's throne.

Now let us note what is said in connection with the Lord's birth and see how it all fits in with this great plan. In Luke i. 31 we have the record of the angel speaking to the Virgin Mary before His birth. "And, behold thou shalt conceive in thy womb, and bring forth a son, and shalt call his name JESUS. He shall be great and shall be called the Son of the Highest, and the Lord God shall give unto Him the throne of His father David. And He shall reign over the house of Jacob for ever; and of His kingdom there shall be no end." This is "the sure mercies of David". He shall reign over the house of Jacob for ever! Now the house of Jacob is not a title for the Church which is His Body. This Church has no connection with the man Jacob, or his posterity. Surely it ought not to be necessary to stress that! Jacob is the name given to his descendants, the people of Israel. here then we have David's throne, the Lord fulfilling that promise, the One alone who could reign over the house of Israel.

Let us go back to the record of Matt. ii. 1. Wise men came from the east asking this question: "Where is he that is born King of the Jews?" the One that was to be born to sit on David's throne. And the leaders told him that He was to be born at Bethlehem, because Micah had prophesied this centuries before. Verse 5: "And they said to him, In Bethlehem of Judaea for thus it is written by (or through) the prophet, And thou, Bethlehem, in the land of Juda art not the least among the princes of Juda, for out of thee shall come a Governor that shall rule my people Israel". He came to be Israel's King, their Priest-King after the order of Melchisedec: He was the only One Who could combine those two things, both absolutely essential for the bringing-in of this kingdom, because the question of Israel's sin had to be dealt with before this was possible. That is the word of the Priest, and the Offering, and once this had been accomplished, then the glorious reign could have been realized and the promise of sitting on David's throne fulfilled. Christ is the King of Israel; He is the King who is going to rule over the house of Jacob.

There is one other Scripture to note before we go any further. Let us turn to the first chapter of John and read of Nathaniel's confession to the Lord Jesus Christ. "Nathaniel answered and said unto Him (to Christ), Rabbi, Thou art the Son of God, Thou art the King of Israel" (i. 49). That is true; He is not the King of the Church—He is Israel's King. This was the title that was put over the Cross in mockery, but it was true. He is the King of the Jews.

Coming back to the Acts: Peter stresses the Lord's relation as King to the people of Israel and in chapter xiii. Paul does the same thing, showing that they are still right in the centre of God's purpose. His plan has not changed. It is still possible for them to repent, still possible for their sin to be blotted out; still possible for the Lord to use them to take the knowledge of His truth and gospel to the ends of the earth. Still it is possible for that kingdom to come in, and then Christ would reign over the house of Jacob, as foretold at His birth.

Before he finishes his speech at Antioch, the Apostle Paul gives the Jews serious warning: "Beware therefore, lest that come upon you which is spoken of in the prophets", and he quoted from Hab. i. 5: "Behold, you despisers, and wonder, and perish." The possibility of perishing lay ahead of them for refusing to believe the gospel instead of realizing the sure mercies of David. What was the result; did they heed that warning? Look at verse 45: 'But when the Jews saw the multitudes they were filled with envy, and spake against those things which were spoken by Paul, contradicting and blaspheming." How often this was Israel's attitude, opposing God instead of thankfully accepting the role He had planned for them! It didn't seem to have the slightest effect upon this people. What a dreadful state they must have been in! And yet God's longsuffering waits. What a marvelous thing this is! "Then Paul and Barnabas waxed bold and said, it was necessary that the word of God should first have been spoken to you" (verse 46). Why? Why must they have the message first? Because the divine plan is still possible at this point for the Jew to be the centre of blessing to the whole earth if only they will repent and believe the gospel. "In thee shall all families of the earth be blessed." If that is so, they must have the message first; they must be right with God first if the world is going to get the blessing through them and God is going to work that way. Now that is what Peter said in chapter iii. "Unto you first", he said to the people of Israel. So both Peter and Paul, in their public ministry, show that the Jew has not been cast aside by God but that they are still in the centre of this plan. They must have the message first, and God is graciously waiting upon their response. Paul goes on to tell the Jew, "But seeing ye have put it from you and judge yourselves unworthy of everlasting life, lo, we turn to the Gentiles". Some have thought that this is the point where Israel is rejected. But this cannot be true, because we shall find that every new place Paul goes to, the first thing he does is to go to the Jewish synagogue. So it was only a local turning away at Antioch. Note chapter xiv. 1: "And it came to pass in Iconium that they went both together into the synagogue of the Jews", so back he is again with them although he had said "lo, we turn to the Gentiles". Again we see the opposition of this people: 'But the Jews stirred up the devout and honourable women, and the chief men of the city, and raised persecution against Paul and Barnabas and expelled them out of their coasts." The warning was unheeded. The nation still persisted in their fanatical opposition and blindness.

We come now to chapter xiv. and will take bigger steps and just get the drift of God's revealed purpose in this book. In doing so we may have to pass over much that is interesting. We now have another miracle of healing. Peter had healed a crippled Jew and now Paul heals one. Israel were a people of type and symbol. In the O.T., their prophets sometimes had to 'act out' the truth in front of them. So here, what God could do physically He could do for this people spiritually. Israel were crippled with unbelief, in no position to go to the ends of the earth with the message. The man, we are told, leaped up and walked (verse 10), and that shows, typically, what God was prepared to do for this nation if they would only repent and believe.

Now we come to chapter xv.; this is a very important chapter. We are told that "certain men which came down from Judaea taught the brethren and said, Except ye be circumcised after the manner of Moses ye cannot be saved". Now here is one of those awful half-truths; this rite of circumcision was part of God's law in the O.T., there is no doubt about that. If anyone did not observe it they were cut off from covenant relationship with God. But here we have got a mixture of two opposing things, and when you get that, you always get error! God had never said that going through any rite could save anybody; that is what so many people still think. Oh, the thousands who think that if they go through some piece of ritual, some ceremony, that this puts them right for heaven, and God will accept them! Nothing could be further from the truth. There is only One who can save, and He is the Lord Jesus. And this salvation only becomes personal, to the person concerned, when it is received by faith in Him, the one and only Way. There is only one Name given under heaven whereby we must be saved (Acts iv. 12). But we do well to realize that the early church had a problem with the coming-in of Gentiles who, after all, were pagans brought up in the utmost darkness. It is difficult for us to realize just what the pagan world was like in Paul's day. It was appalling, a sink of iniquity, immorality and darkness; yet God's wondrous grace was saving such and then they were brought into relationship with believing Jews. Think of the different upbringing of an orthodox Jew to a pagan and then, by the grace of God, they are brought together, to live together, to walk together, and to witness together. Can you not see the tremendous problems that would be involved? If there was to be any sense of unity there would have to be some giving from the standpoint of the Jew, and certainly a change round on the part of the Gentile. What would happen for instance, concerning the law of Moses, all the rites and ceremonies, the fasts and the feasts, and their relationship to the saved pagan? Would they be binding upon such? That was the problem; so a meeting of the leaders was arranged at Jerusalem to discuss this problem. The Apostle Paul was there; Peter was there; James, the leader at Jerusalem, was there. And so they came together to seek the Lord's will as to what should be done with the Gentile believer and the law of Moses. This is the problem that we must consider in our next study.

We have seen, when we were looking at chapter xv. of the Acts, that the early church had the great problem of how to bring in the pagan who had been saved into harmonious relationship with the saved people of Israel, who had been the custodians of God's light and truth. Since the Exodus their standard of living and walk were so utterly and absolutely different to the unsaved Gentile that the church had to face up to this fact and decide the relationship the converted Gentile had to the law of Moses. Some of the Jews had come up and said, "Unless you are circumcised, unless you keep the whole law, you cannot be saved". They should have known enough of the truth to realize that was wrong, because salvation is by grace, by faith in Christ. And so, at this most important meeting at the centre at Jerusalem we find the Apostle Paul speaking; we find Peter speaking, and then follows James, the Lord's brother, the overseer of the church at Jerusalem. Let us note what James said, in verse 13 and onward, "And after they had held their peace James answered saying, Men and brethren, listen to me—hearken unto me. Simeon (that is Simon Peter) hath declared how God at the first did visit the Gentiles to take out of them a people for his name". The people that was taken out from the Gentiles were linked to and only blessed through the people of Israel. Up to this point there was no question of the possibility of Gentiles blessed apart from the people of Israel. They could come in and share Israel's blessings if they came in as proselytes; or, at this point they could come and be partakers of Israel's spiritual things through salvation; but to get this apart from the Jew—no! That is not possible yet; so let us always think of the Gentile who was saved in the Acts as linked to the people of Israel with the idea of stirring them up spiritually, remembering, of course, the Jew's narrow conceptions that God was only going to use them; that He shared and kept all His light and blessing for them and them only. How erroneous, how absolutely wrong! Now the purpose is widening; the Gentile is being brought in, just a representative number, to provoke Israel to emulation, to prevent, if humanly possible their sinking into complete unbelief and spiritual death. This, said James, is in harmony with the O.T.: "And to this agree the words of the prophets."

The word "agree" in verse 15 is the word 'harmonize'. You will note that he does not say this completely fulfils what the O.T. predicted, but it is going along in harmony with it. There was nothing secret about God's intention to bless the Gentile world! That had been clearly revealed in the O.T. Scriptures. It was part of the glorious part that we have been considering so much. So James quotes from the prophet Amos, chapter ix. 11, "In that day will I raise up the tabernacle of David that is fallen and close up the breaches thereof, and I will raise up his ruins, and I will build it as in the days of old". Now what is this but restoration? God says I am going to build again, I am going to restore: and we have just seen in the previous study that the tabernacle of David and the throne of David are very vital things at this point in God's purpose. Christ was raised from the dead to occupy that very throne, and God had made a promise, a covenant to David that He would not break it. And although things had gone badly in Israel's history because of their transgression, God declares there is coming a time when He will restore all that pertains to David's throne. This word 'restore' was a Key-word at the beginning of the Acts: "Lord, wilt thou at this time restore again the kingdom to Israel?" (i. 6). And then in chapter iii. of the Acts, the times of restoration (R.V.) are promised by God upon the repentance and conversion of the Jewish nation (iii. 19-26). This restoration of the earthly kingdom is part of O.T. prophecy and was no mystery, or secret such as is connected with the Body of Christ. So you see its all of a piece, its all together.

We read a little further on in Amos, verse 13: of blessing when restoration comes. The blessing on their land, material blessing, because they are an earthly people and have earthly blessings to go with their earthly calling. "Behold the days come, saith the Lord, that the ploughman shall overtake the reaper, and the treader of grapes him that soweth seed: and the mountains shall drop sweet wine and all the hills shall melt, and I will bring again the captivity of my people Israel". God is going to restore this people. He is going to do away with their captivity "And they shall build the waste cities and inhabit them; and they shall plant vineyards and drink the wine thereof. They shall also make gardens and eat the fruit of them, and I will plant them upon their land and they shall no more be pulled up out of their land which I have given them". Could you have plainer words? The land—remember how He promised it to Abraham?—is going to be theirs for ever and they will never be dispossessed. There was nothing in the Acts so far that contradicted this. All was in harmony with it as long as God's longsuffering held out to this people. It agreed with what Amos had written.

So the church at Jerusalem singled out four necessary things—four only—out of the law of Moses which they would ask saved Gentiles to keep in their walk and practice. Verse 20: "But that we write unto them that they abstain from pollutions of idols (idolatry, meat offered to idols and so on, one of the great problems of the early church), and from fornication, and from things strangled and from blood (because God claimed the life which was in the blood)." But the inference is that the Jewish believer would keep the whole ceremonial law. Look at the next verse: "For Moses of old time hath in every city them that preach him, being read in the synagogue every Sabbath day", not just four points of the law, but the law in its entirety. Now I ask you, could that make for perfect unity in daily walk and practice? This could never be while there were two standards of conduct in the same community. How very obvious it should be that here we are not dealing with the Body of Christ, where there is no Jew or Gentile as such and no ceremonial law to regulate the daily life and witness!

There may be some who will assert that this decision regarding the four necessary points of conduct for the Gentile believer was merely the opinion of men even though they were Christians. But let us read verse 28: "For it seemed good to the Holy Ghost and to us, to lay upon you no greater burden than these necessary things"—these four points. So God did agree with it; you will have to charge the Holy Spirit with making a mistake if you think this was not the Lord's will.

Now in chapter xvi. you find those deputized to take these four necessary things to the churches and these are called "the decrees" (verse 4). "And as they went through the cities they delivered them the decrees for to keep that were ordained of the apostles and the elders which were at Jerusalem." Now when we come to the truth revealed for the Body of Christ through Paul's later ministry—his prison ministry—we are told there distinctly, in the second chapter of Ephesians, that we have been delivered from all these decrees (or ordinances); they were against us, and in this company of the redeemed they do not exist any longer. Colossians talks about the ordinances that were against us, and how Christ has finished them; they have been nailed to His Cross. So, you see, we cannot be dealing with this church in Acts xv. where these decrees were necessary.

We must now go in fairly big steps. Let us turn to chapter xvii: The Apostle comes to Thessalonica, and though he had said "lo, we turn to the Gentiles" (xiii. 46), he still goes back to the Jew; so that turning away at Antioch was only a local one. As long as the Jew is in covenant relationship with God, he must have the Word first. So we read in Acts xvii. 1, "Now when they had passed through Amphipolis and Apollonia, they came to Thessalonica where there was a synagogue of the Jews. And Paul, as his manner was . . . . ." Now that is important because it gives us what Paul did habitually. As his custom was, whenever he reached a new place, he went straight to the synagogue, to the chosen people, to the Jew, to give them the message first. "As his manner was he went in unto them, and three sabbath days reasoned with them out of the scriptures." He was dealing with a people to whom had been given the O.T. Scriptures, so what better than to go to the Word of God? You will notice that, when he went to the unenlightened Gentile who had no scriptures at all, he does not refer to them! He approaches them in quite a different way; and when you and I want to be used of God, let us see to it that, in wisdom, we find some point of contact with the people we are trying to help. At this point shall we turn to the Epistle to the Romans, to a verse that is so often misunderstood (Rom. i. 16): "For I am not ashamed of the Gospel of Christ for it is the power of God"—literally, "the miracle of God". God still works miracles; not the same perhaps as in the Acts period, but this is a glorious miracle, the salvation of the sinner, "the miracle of God unto salvation to everyone that believeth, to the Jew first, and also to the Greek". Now that is why it was necessary, Paul said, that the people of Israel had the message first; and he goes to the Jew first, all through the Acts. As long as there is the possibility of Israel repenting and taking their rightful place, the Jew has priority. Now Romans was written during the Acts of the Apostles, so we read "to the Jew first". Now, not only is this true for the gospel, but it cuts the other way; not only for blessing, but for judgment: "But unto them that are contentious and do not obey the truth, but obey unrighteousness, indignation and wrath. Tribulation and anguish upon every soul of man that doeth evil, of the Jew first . . . . ." (Rom. ii. 8). The next verse continues: "But glory, honour, and peace to every man that worketh good, to the Jew first." So we must keep in mind the Scriptural reason why the Jew had the message first.

Coming back, then, to Acts xvii. 4 we find the Apostle carrying this out again in practice and the sad, but continual opposition of the chosen people to his message of salvation and restoration. "And some of them believed and consorted with Paul Silas, and of the devout Greeks a great multitude, and of the chief women not a few. But the Jews which believed not, moved with envy, took unto them certain lewd fellows of the baser sort, and gathered a company, and set all the city on an uproar." Every new place to which Paul goes and gives the glorious message of the gospel to the Jew, he gets this treatment! The result is that he has to go away by night; and he goes on to Berea. It says (verse 10) "And the brethren immediately sent away Paul and Silas by night unto Berea, who, coming thither, went into the synagogue of the Jews". Now a very important thing is said about these believers of Berea. They were "more noble than those in Thessalonica, in that they received the word with all readiness of mind and searched the scriptures daily whether those things were so". There are two very important things here that we should consider. Do we really want truth? If we do there are two essentials. The first is readiness of mind, but that does not quite give its meaning. There are a number of modern translations which render it more vividly "eagerness", "good speed", "great eagerness". Are we like that; so keen for truth that it's a thing we are most eager about? If we are half-hearted about truth, we shall never progress in the knowledge of it. People can be keen on anything these days and be looked on as being normal. But if they are keen to get to know God or His truth they are often looked on as cranky! Are we willing to be thought a crank or abnormal for the sake of the tremendous privilege of getting to know God's truth? The next thing is, are we willing to search the Scriptures and test all we hear and read by them? This is the only safe ground that we have, to check everything by the Word of Truth rightly divided. If Christians would only do this, what chance would error have today? Very little! It is because God's children are either too indifferent, or too lazy to do this that false doctrine makes such headway. We must not begrudge time in looking into the Word of God, but be willing to search it; keen and eager to do so. This is the only way to get light and blessing: and to get to know the wonders of God's revelation today.

The Pleroma

No.17. The title Head, and its relation to the Fullness.
pp. 31 - 34

The highest title ascribed to Christ in any dispensation other than that of the Mystery is that of "A Priest for ever after the order of Melchisedec". This Priesthood is superior to that of Aaron. It functions at the right hand of God, its sphere is the true Tabernacle which God pitched and not man, namely "heaven itself", and it combines the two offices of King and Priest. Just as water cannot rise above its own level, so no calling can rise above that set by Christ, and thus the calling that recognizes Him as King-Priest is itself 'a kingdom of Priests', "A holy nation and a royal priesthood". It is significant that throughout the Prison Epistles Christ is never called either 'King' or "Priest', even as it is equally true that the church of that calling is never called a kingdom although not outside the Kingdom of God or a priesthood, but is called the Body of Christ. Argument from the absence of terms, like arguing from a negative is in most cases suspect, but in this particular it cannot be said that a 'kingdom' is never mentioned in the Prison Epistles. We read in Eph. v. 5 of "The kingdom of Christ and of God", in Col. i. 13 and iv. 11 of "The kingdom of His dear Son" and of "The kingdom of God", and in II Tim. iv. 1 and 18, "His appearing and His kingdom", and "His heavenly kingdom".

In the epistles of Paul other than the four great prison epistles, a "kingdom" is mentioned nine times, but the only passage where Christ can be said to have the title King is I Tim. vi. 15, where however the exhibition of the title is spoken of as a future event "Which in His times He shall show, Who is that blessed and only potentate, the King of kings, and Lord of lords", yet even this passage can only be spoken of as of Christ by inference. The epistles to the Ephesians and the Colossians contain passages that seem to demand the work of a Priest, such as 'acceptance', 'access', 'made nigh', 'offer', yet there is not a single reference outside of Hebrews to Christ as a Priest. In epistles before and after Acts xxviii., Christ is represented as 'seated at the right hand of God', yet never, outside of Hebrews is the office of priest mentioned. If a 'dominion' and a 'coronation' are indications of the presence of a king, then Adam was a king. The 'dominion' given to him is the translation of the Hebrew radah, a word translated elsewhere 'reign' and 'rule' and used of Christ "the King's Son" in Psa. lxxii. 8. The word translated 'crowned' in Psa. viii. 5 is the Hebrew atar, which is the verb form of atarah "the king's crown" (II Sam. xii. 30). Adam, however, is never once spoken of as a king. He was a figure of Him that was to come, and can be spoken of with propriety as HEAD of the human race, and as such he embraced all that kingship can mean, but much more. Noah not only had dominion in his degree (Gen. ix. 2) but he offered sacrifices with acceptance (Gen. viii. 20, 21). The word 'sweet' which is used of the savour of the sacrifice offered is employed throughout the O.T. to indicate the 'savour' or 'odour' of sacrifice. We should therefore not be surprised to find that Noah was called a priest. Yet he is never so called. He can be, however, designated as Adam was before him, head of the race of which those delivered from the flood were the progenitors. Abraham was the father of 'kings' (Gen. xvii. 6) and even of THE KING, the Lord Himself, Who was, according to the flesh, both son of Abraham and son of David, yet Abraham himself is never called a king.

Abraham not only built an altar at the beginning of his pilgrimage upon which the only sacrifices permitted would have been those taken from the herd or the flock. He came nearer to the heart of all true sacrifice when he was called upon to offer his only begotten son Isaac, yet Abraham is never called a priest. Like Adam and Noah, Abraham is more than king, more than priest, he is the father of Israel, to which he stands without contradiction as head. Even when we leave the chosen people, and turn our attention to the first great king whose reign commenced the times of the Gentiles—Nebuchadnezzar, he too is spoken of by Daniel as "This head of gold" (Dan. ii. 38). Each one of the great outstanding figures that have foreshadowed the pleroma, or fullness, were 'heads' and in this they foreshadowed more than the office of King, Priest or Prophet alone, or together, could set forth. Even though Christ be never called either Prophet, Priest or King in the epistles of the Mystery, the church of the One Body loses nothing if Christ is its Head. He is more than King and Priest and Prophet to the church, for headship covers all.

With this preparation, let us turn to the Epistles of the Fullness, the prison epistles of Paul, and observe the way in which this title is employed. The Greek word kephale is used here seven times, and the verb anakephalaioomai once. Let us look at the usage of this verb, which means 'to head up'. It occurs in Eph. i. 10 where it is translated 'to gather together in one' in the A.V., 'to sum up' in the R.V., and in Weymouth's translation "of restoring the whole creation to find its one Head in Christ", and by J. N. Darby, 'to head up all things in Christ'. It is in connection with the pleroma of the seasons that the figure of 'heading up' is used, no other term being so appropriate or so complete. When that 'fullness' arrives, Christ will be infinitely more than King or Priest, He will be "Head". The references to Christ as 'Head' in the prison epistles are limited to Ephesians and Colossians (Eph. i. 22; iv. 15; v. 23; Col. i. 18; ii. 10; ii. 19).

These six references to kephale, expand the promise of Eph. i. 10, the church of the present dispensation being the most complete foreshadowing of the goal of the ages that the Scriptures contain. To turn back to the types and shadows employed in earlier Scriptures is to turn by comparison from substance to shadow, although the substance here must necessarily be but in its turn a shadow of the reality yet to come. The first passage brings us back from the day when all things in heaven and earth shall be headed up in Christ, to the present period when in a day of rejection, confusion and darkness, an elect company acknowledge that Christ is to them, what He will be universally in the future.

"And gave Him to be Head over all things TO THE CHURCH" (Eph. i. 22). Christ is not yet recognized as 'Head over all things'. The day is future when 'every knee shall bow and every tongue confess', but what will be true then in its widest sense is true now 'to the church which is His Body'. In the glorious future God will be all in all (I Cor. xv. 28), but that day has not yet come. Today "Christ is all and in all" (Col. iii. 11). In the glorious future 'all things' are put under His feet (I Cor. xv. 27) but as in Hebrews, even though we say today "we see not yet all things put under Him"

(Heb. ii. 8), we can recognize that His ascension 'far above all principality and power, and might, and dominion, and every name that is named, not only in this world, but also in that which is to come', and the fact that He is already Head over all things to the church, is a most glorious anticipation of this universal subjection of all to Him. This Eph. i. 22 demonstrates by joining together the two themes:

(1) "And hath put all things under His feet."
(2) "And gave Him to be the Head over all things to His church."

This church is in a unique position. It anticipates as no other calling and company has or can, the goal of the ages. It is meet therefore that this should be set forth, and the Apostle follows the passage already quoted by revealing that the Body of Christ is something more; it is 'the fullness' of Him, Who in His turn is the One that 'filleth all in all' (Eph. i. 23). All the fullness of the Godhead dwells in Him bodily, the church which is His Body and in Whom He dwells (Eph. ii. 22' iii. 17) is His fullness. What Christ is to the invisible God, this church is to Christ. What Christ is to the whole purpose of the ages, the church of the One Body is in the heavenly realm. Eph. i. 10 is here illustrated, foreshadowed and anticipated, and this of itself is a glorious position to occupy, quite apart from all the other wonders of grace and glory that are associated with this high calling of God in Christ Jesus.

Rotherham translates Eph. i. 23:

> "Which indeed is His body, the fullness of Him Who the all things in all is for Himself filling up."

Moffatt reads:

> "Filled by Him Who fills the universe entirely."

Possibly the rendering given by Cunnington is nearest the truth.

> "The fullness of Him Who all in all is receiving His fullness."

The fullness of Him that filleth all in all is the most blessed anticipation of the day when God shall be all in all (I Cor. xv. 28).

No.18. The title Head, and its relation to the Fullness.
pp. 69 - 72

The largest section of the Epistle to the Ephesians is in the practical portion, and occupies the whole of chapter v., and nine verses of chapter vi. This great section falls into two parts. (1) A threefold walk; (2) A threefold relationship.

The threefold walk

a | v. 2. Walk in love.
b | v. 8. Walk as children of light.
c | v. 15. Walk circumspectly.

The threefold relationship

a | v. 22, 23. Wives and husbands.
b | vi. 1-4. Children and parents.
c | vi. 5-9. Servants and masters.

The first thing to observe is that if Eph. v. 22-33 teaches that the church is "The Bride" or "The Wife", then by parity of reasoning, w must continue the analogy and say that the church is also a 'child' and a 'servant', but that would be untrue in this connection, for while individuals believers are 'children of God' and many of the Lord's children are also His 'servants' that is very different from teaching that the church in its dispensational aspect is itself either child or servant. This is not true. The church of the Mystery is categorically called in the doctrinal section "The Church which is His Body, the fullness of Him that filleth all in all", and to forget that Eph. v. and vi. deals with the practical outworking of the truth in the daily life of the individual believer is to make an initial mistake, the consequences of which are far reaching. While we are dealing with this aspect of the subject, let us deal with another, which is allied. It is sometimes taught that seeing that the word 'Church' is feminine that Eph. v. 25 should be translated 'As Christ also loved the church and gave Himself for HER', but this is to confuse gender with sex. In many languages both ancient and modern, things are often expressed in either the masculine or the feminine gender, but this is in reference to the language employed, not the thing itself. The very word we have before us "The Head" is the Greek kephale which is feminine, consequently the same argument that demands 'her' in Eph. v. 25 would demand that we use 'she' when speaking of Christ the Head! Peace and forgiveness are feminine, but blessings and will are masculine. This has reference only to their grammatical form. The reference to "The Head" which is the reason for turning to Eph. v. is found in verse 23:

> "For the husband is the head of the wife, even as Christ is the head of the church; and He is the saviour of the body."

It is evident that this passage is part of an argument, an argument that develops from the closing statement of verse 21:

> "Submitting yourselves one to another in the fear of God (or of Christ)."

Observe that it does not say, wives submit to husbands, or husbands submit to wives, but 'submitting yourself one to another'. This 'submission' flows out of the position of the Lord and the Church's relationship with Him. The Greek word hupotasso 'to submit' or 'to be subject' is used in Eph. i. 22 where we read 'And hath put all things under His feet'. It is evident, however, from the same passage that the Church which is His Body, is not put in subjection under His feet, for the near context speaks of this same company as 'seated together' in the heavenlies. The first occurrence of the Greek word hupotasso is Luke ii. 51, where it speaks of Christ as a lad of twelve years of age, who returned with His parents to Nazareth 'and was SUBJECT unto them'. Can we not enter into the next sentence "But His mother kept all these sayings in her heart"? The last reference to hupotasso so far as fulfillment is concerned is I Cor. xv. 28:

> "And when all things shall be subdued unto Him, then shall the Son also Himself be subject unto Him that put all things under Him, that God may be all in all."

Between the first occurrence and the last, we have the death, resurrection and ascension of Christ, with all things being placed under His feet, first as Head of the Church of the one Body (Eph. i. 22, 23), then over 'the world to come' whereof Paul speaks in Hebrews (Heb. ii. 5-8), of which the heavenly section is dealt with in this epistle, and the earthly in such prophecies as Psa. ii. and Psa. cx., and Rev. xi. 15. These successive subjections were set forth in type when Adam was created, given dominion, and commanded not only to replenish the earth but to 'subdue' it (Gen. i. 28). In the light of the age-purpose, in the light of the submission of the Son of God Himself, all resentment, all sense of humiliation, all argument concerning equality or rights or any other objection that arises in the human breast, falters and dies in the presence of such utter devotion to the glorious purpose of redeeming love. What husband or what wife, having seen such a grace and condescension manifested for their salvation and peace, would not gladly and willingly co-operate with such love that passes knowledge, and count it a joy and a privilege to have the smallest place in the outworking of such a purpose? Both the husband and the wife are in the first place types and shadows. The husband is a type of the Headship of Christ, the wife a type of the Church which is His Body. Neither the one nor the other is superior or inferior, both are essential to the completion of the figure. Wives are called upon to submit themselves unto their own husbands 'as unto the Lord'. Husbands are called upon to love their wives 'even as Christ loved the church'. This is an entirely different plane than that of human affection. In the ordinary way of life one expects a husband to love his wife, and where there is such love, there is usually no argument as to who is head of the family. This is taken for granted in Eph. v. The Apostle is not instructing husbands and wives in things they already know and feel, he is concerned with the type 'as unto the Lord', 'As Christ also loved'. In verse 23, there is an addition or clause. After the parallel is complete "for the husband is the head of the wife, even as Christ is the head of the Church" the Apostle adds "And He is the Saviour of the body". There is but one reference to the Saviour in Ephesians, and but one in Philippians, and both deal with the Body. In Ephesians, the Body, the Church is in view; in Philippians (iii. 21) the transfiguration of the body of the believer in resurrection is in view. The words appear to be added in Eph. v. 23 for several reasons:

(1) No human husband can be called ‘The saviour of the body’ whether ‘the body’ refers to himself, his wife, the church, or the resurrection.

(2) The reference to ‘the body’ seems to be included here, and in verses 28 and 30, to prevent the idea forming in the mind that the church here can be looked upon as the ‘wife’. The husband is to love his wife as his own body.

(3) The quotation from Gen. ii. 24 follows, but lest we should think that Gen. ii. is speaking of that which was a mystery at that time ‘hid in God’ and so be self contradictory, the Apostle adds:

(4) “This is a great mystery”, i.e. the fact that in true marriage a man and wife become ‘one flesh’.

(5) This he differentiates from the relationship of Christ in the Church by saying immediately ‘But I speak concerning Christ and the church’. Then leaving once again the type, the Apostle returns to the obligations which devolve upon both husband and wife saying ‘Nevertheless, let every one of you in particular so love his wife even as himself, and the wife see that she reverence her husband’.

The fact that the exhortation to husband and wives are an integral part of a threefold exhortation that includes children and parents, servants and masters, must be kept before the mind throughout the reading of this chapter. Even if there had been no revelation which indicated the relationship of the church with Christ, it would still have been necessary to remind husband and wives of their relationship one to another, and to the need to express in their mutual love and relationship the doctrine already given. That relationship having been given as that of a ‘Body’ with the ‘Head’ cannot be altered simply because some believers in that company happened to be married, any more than the constitution of the one Body could be modified, simply because other believers in that company were masters or slaves. The blessed truth which can easily be lost sight of in this argument is that the highest revelation of doctrine, the highest of all callings, the most wonderful of all spheres of blessing, are not too high but that they may be exemplified in the daily life in home and business of the humblest member. The exhortations of Eph. v. and vi. are but a part of the demand made by the Apostle that all believers should walk worthy of the vocation wherewith they had been called, the ‘walk in love’ with which Eph. v. opened, being most clearly exemplified by the love of the husband to the wife. If every Christian home could but be run on these lines what a witness it would be both to men and to angels. In the light of the Saviour’s own selfless love, and subjection for our sakes, such relationships should be nothing more than our ‘reasonable service’.

No.19a. The title Head, and its relation to the Fullness.
pp. 119, 120

The next reference to the Headship of Christ, and its relation to the 'Fullness' is found in Col. i. In this passage two creations come into view, the old and the new, and in both, Christ has the pre-eminence. This twofold feature is not only true of Col. i., but of the epistle as a whole, as will be made manifest if the corresponding sections Col. i. 13-23 and iii. 5-15 are set out before the eye:

i. 13 - 23 and iii. 5 - 15.

G | i. 15, 16. The Creator. The Image.
H | i. 20. Reconciliation of heaven and earth.
I | i. 17, 18. Christ pre-eminent. All in Him.
J | i. 20. Peace and forgiveness of sins.
K | i. 22. Holy, blameless, unreproveable.

BEWARE*—Col. ii. 4 - 23.

G | iii. 10. Created after the Image.
H | iii. 11. Reconciliation of Jew and Greek.
I | iii. 11. Christ is all and in all.
J | iii. 13-15. Peace. Forgive quarrel.
K | iii. 9, 12. Put off, put on, holy and beloved.

The reader will realize that a complete structure which would avoid transposing Col. i. 20 as we have done, would necessitate a much more elaborate framework, but would not be of any greater assistance to us in our present enquiry. The two sections obviously echo one another, and that is all we desire to demonstrate at the moment. When we come to build a doctrine upon a structure of any passage, then any such accommodation is ruled out there must never be the remotest suspicion that any verse or feature has been displaced for ulterior motives. Consequently before we go further we must present the actual literary structure of Col. i. 13-23 without reference to the evident parallels that exist in chapter iii.

Col. i. 13 - 23.

A | 13. Translation methistemi.
B | 14. Redemption and forgiveness of sins.
C | 15-17. | a | Image of invisible God.
b | Firstborn of every creature.
c | CREATION. "By Him."
Heaven and earth.
d | He is before all.
e | In Him all things consist.
C | 18-20. | a | The Beginning. Head of the body, the church.
b | Firstborn from the dead.
d | In all things pre-eminent.
e | In Him all the fullness dwells.
c | RECONCILIATION. Through blood of cross.
Earth and heaven.
B | 21, 22. Reconciliation. Presentation.
A | 23. Not moved away metakineo.

Christ is set forth in verse 15 under two figures "Image" and "Firstborn". He is the Image of the invisible God, which is a revelation of truth similar, even if more advanced, to that found in John i. 1-18, where as 'The Word' He declares Him Whom no man hath seen at any time. He is set forth as the 'Firstborn of all creation' because He is the Creator of all things even as in John i. 1-8, as 'The Word' He made all things.

We have already seen that ta panta 'the all things' indicates the universe as redeemed and reconciled, and may not necessarily include 'all things' panta, that indicate the universe without reservation of any kind. This recognition compels us to stop at Col. i. 16. The A.V. reads "For BY Him, were all things created", but the R.V. reads "For IN Him were all things created". Some have objected to the 'pantheism' that permitted this rendering to enter the R.V. but such an objection can hardly be laid to the charge of Alford or Bishop Lightfoot who follow the R.V. here.

No.19b. The title Head, and its relation to the Fullness.

There is an evident connection between the title "Firstborn" and the subsequent statement 'For' and 'Because' in Him were all things created. John employs the title 'Word' or Logos which was much in use among the Alexandrian philosophers, Paul uses the title prototokos "Firstborn" in much the same way. This title is found in Psa. lxxxix. 27 "Also I will make Him My Firstborn, higher than the kings of the earth", and in the Rabbinical writings the title 'Firstborn' (Hebrew bekov) was used as a recognized title of the Messiah. The sense of priority which this title assumed, was intended in its use of Israel 'Israel is my son, my firstborn' (Exod. iv. 22), for by no stretch of imagination or argument can Israel be shown to have existed before any other nation on the earth, their priority being not one of time but of dignity. So entirely removed from the idea of birth had this title become, that Rabbi Beshai, when writing on the Pentateuch, actually gives the title "Firstborn of the world" to God Himself. Other examples of this use and meaning are Job xviii. 13 'The firstborn of death' and Isa. xiv. 30 'The firstborn of the poor'. Christ is shown to be the Firstborn of all creation by the fact that He created everything that is in heaven and in earth. The word 'for' being the Greek hoti means 'because', and "it is added to a speaker's words to show what ground he gives for his opinion". The Apostle gives the grounds for his opinion that Christ was the Firstborn of every creature, by immediately adding 'Because by (or in) Him were all things created'. The Greek phrase hoti en auto "because in Him comes twice in this section, and in perfect structural balance.

C | c | CREATION. ta panta "Because in Him."
C | c | RECONCILIATION. ta panta "Because in Him."

In what way does the creation prove that Christ was Firstborn? If we translate "For BY Him" we see no connection, and we rob ourselves of the parallel reference in verses 19, 20. If we translate "For IN Him" we open the way to further teaching. Ta panta is used both of creation (16) and of reconciliation (20). In verse 16 ta panta moreover is said to be "For Him" eis auton, so in verse 20 ta panta is said to be reconciled 'unto Himself', where the Greek is identical eis auton. Further Christ is set forth in this passage as 'The Firstborn from the dead', indicating that whatever relation He had to the original creation, He holds to the New, and moreover, we are not left to make our own deductions, for the Apostle immediately explains in what way Christ is the Firstborn from the dead, by saying "In order that (hina) He might have the preeminence", a phrase that is even more suggestive when read in the original. He is 'Firstborn' PROTOTOKOS, in order that He may have the 'pre-eminence' PROTEUON (first place). Yet this is not all. As the firstborn from the dead He is 'The Head of the Body the church'. In Him as Firstborn, that creation which is denominated ta panta had its origin and being. It included things in heaven and earth, visible and invisible, and the whole hierarchy of glory. This creation, ta panta was not only created IN Him, but on account of Him, and for Him. Moreover He is before all, in Him this universe consists, or is held together. In II Pet. iii. 5 this same word is used of the material creation where it is translated 'standing' in the A.V. and 'compacted' in the R.V. Recent scientific researches into the composition of the atom and the release of atomic energy enables us to perceive something of the mighty power that is involved in holding the elements of creation to their appointed place. In the year 1927 a fountain pen was given to me by a friend of The Berean Expositor. For over thirty years that pen has written many thousands of words, and is writing this sentence at the moment. Think of the power that has held the particles that compose the nib in place all these years. Then think of the whole fabric of creation upheld, and held together by the power of the Saviour. When we have in any measure comprehended this, then let us transfer our wondering thoughts from the material creation of II Pet. iii., to the spiritual creation of Col. iii. 17, and worship as we realize that it too is held together by a power that nothing can disturb or dissipate. The unity of the Spirit is held together in the bond of peace, and this is only one of many ways in which this most blessed fact is expressed.

> "IN HIM" all things were created (Col. i. 16).
> "IN HIM" all things in the new creation are held together (Col. i. 17).
> "IN HIM" it was well pleasing that all the fullness should dwell (Col. i. 19).

In the new and spiritual creation Christ is not only 'Firstborn' or 'Pre-eminent', but He is 'Head', for this new creation is a 'Body', and as Head all fullness dwells in Him, and as a Body, this new company is the fullness of Him that filleth all in all. Before the overthrow of the world, this church was chosen "IN HIM" (Eph. i. 4). "IN HIM" they have redemption (Eph. i. 7), "IN HIM" they are made nigh (Eph. ii. 13), Christ is all and in all to this company. Colossians, like Ephesians is devoted to the teaching and revelation of the Mystery, and the references to creation at the beginning and to reconciliation at the end, have this dispensation of the Mystery in view. This dispensation is intimately associated with the creation of ta panta "the all things" (Eph. iii. 9). The Greek verb ktizo 'to create' occurs 14 times in the N.T., seven of which occurrences are found in the Prison Epistles. The limitations indicated by the words ta panta show us that, like the term 'all Israel', we must limit the extent of this creation to those who were viewed 'in Christ', just as we must limit the term 'all Israel' to those who were called 'In Isaac'. In the Firstborn of all creation this company were chosen, and in the fullness of time they, though fallen, were redeemed and reconciled. He Who was the Firstborn of all creation now becomes the 'Firstborn from the dead', and as such is Head of the Body the church. The 'fullness' the pleroma, that which nullifies all rents and divisions occasioned by sin of the past, whether human, angelic or satanic, is at last achieved and God becomes all in all. It is the privilege of the church of the Mystery to anticipate that great consummation, and here and now to hold Christ the Head and confess that He is 'all in all' to them.

A seed was known to God at the creation of Man. That seed was attacked in the earliest times. The conflict of the ages has been the conflict of the two seeds. Nevertheless, He Who upholds all things by the word of His power, in Whom all things consists or are held together, brings that chosen seed, ta panta, whether earthly or heavenly, whether human or angelic, gloriously and triumphantly through to victory. In order that the Headship of Christ may be seen to include principality and power we turn to Col. ii.:

> "For in Him dwelleth all the fullness of the Godhead bodily. And ye are complete in Him, which is the Head of all principality and power" (Col. ii. 10).

These are the principalities and powers who are said to have been created 'in Him' in Col. i. 16. That there are other principalities and powers who are not included in Col. ii. 10 is made evident by reading on. In verse 15 He 'spoiled principalities and powers', making a show of them openly, triumphing over them by His cross. These, like the principalities and powers of Eph. vi. 12, are associated with the rulers of darkness of this world, and are called 'spiritual wickednesses' over which Christ is not Head. The one reference left, namely Col. ii. 19, takes us back to the position already indicated in Eph. iv. 15, 16. "Not holding the Head" is the signal for disaster, even as 'Not after Christ' is the index of all that is untrue (Col. ii. 8). Here in this last reference to Christ as the Head, we are brought back to the church of the One Body with its many members, and with it we must close our examination of this great title, a title that is not only peculiarly characteristic of the dispensation of the Mystery, but a title which we have seen gathers up into itself all other titles by which the Christ of God and the purposes of grace associated with Him, have been unfolded down the ages. We who live at the end of time, who see with our own eyes the approach of prophetic days, have been highly favoured among the redeemed, in that Christ to us is more than Prophet, Priest or King, He is Head, and we are more than subjects of a kingdom, more than a royal nation or a holy priesthood, more than the Bride of the Lamb, we are the very 'members of His Body'. Let us therefore heed the exhortation 'Hold the Head', that we may 'increase with the increase of God'.

"Fullness" looks to 'Emptiness' as its opposite, and both terms are ones of Christ. Indeed before all the fullness could dwell in Him as the one Mediator and Head, He emptied Himself for our sakes, that we through His poverty might be rich. 'Fullness' is the glory of Ephesians and Colossians, but 'Self-Emptying' is equally the glory of Philippians. "He made Himself of no reputation" (Phil. ii. 7) translates the Greek word kenoo. For a detailed examination of Phil. ii., see the book entitled The Prize of the High Calling.

No.20. The title Head, and its relation to the Fullness.
pp. 192 - 196

We have seen that the title 'Head' gathers up unto itself, all that the separate titles 'King', 'Priest' and 'Prophet' imply, with ever so much more than either of these titles taken separately, or all together can ever teach or contain. That church of which Christ is Head not only lacks nothing, but is infinitely more blessed, is in a closer relationship with Christ, and anticipates the goal of the ages in a way that no other company could ever do. We have seen that Eph. i. 10 finds its expansion and anticipation in Eph. i. 22, 23, and we now pass on to the other references to Christ as the Head as they occur in the epistles of the Mystery. The next reference to Christ as Head occurs in the practical section of Ephesians:

> "But speaking the truth in love, may grow up into Him in all things, which is the Head, even Christ" (Eph. iv. 15).

Practice grows out of doctrine, and doctrine deals with calling, sphere of blessing, and standing in grace. What is stated as a fact before God in the revelation of the doctrine of Ephesians, awaits experimental realization in the practical section. Let us see this in the large, before concentrating our attention upon the detail of Eph. iv. 15.

As a consequence of the Saviour's exaltation 'Far above all' in Eph. i. 20-22, He is seen as Head over all things to the church, which is called 'the fullness of Him that filleth all in all'. Turning to Eph. iv., we find that the ascension 'far above all' is restated, and the 'fullness' indicated as a goal:

> "He that descended is the same also that ascended up FAR ABOVE ALL heavens, that He might FILL ALL THINGS" (Eph. iv. 10).

It is this ascended One Who gives the ministry that has as its goal 'the perfect man'. It is evident from the language of Eph. iv. 8-13, that here we are presented with the outworking of the truth set out in chapter i.

Coming now to Eph. iv. 15, we observe that the words of the A.V. 'speaking the truth in love' are a somewhat free translation, there being no equivalent in the Greek for the word 'speaking'. The A.V. margin puts as an alternative 'being sincere' and the R.V. margin reads 'dealing truly'. The Greek word under consideration is aletheuein, of which Alford, in his commentary, says 'it is almost impossible to express it satisfactorily in English' and suggests the translation 'being followers of truth', but says of this, "The objection to 'followers of truth' is that it may be mistaken for 'searchers after truth'—but I can find no expression which does not lie open to equal objection." The only other occurrence of aletheuein is Gal. iv. 16, where the A.V. renders it 'because I tell (you) the truth'. It is not possible in English to say 'truthing in love' we must say 'being sincere', 'being true and truthful' or 'speaking the truth'. None of these expressions however exactly present to the mind what the verb aletheuein does. The LXX of Gen. xlii. 16 employs this word where we read, 'Ye shall be kept in prison, that your words may be proved, whether there be any truth in you; or else by the life of Pharaoh surely ye are spies'. In Isa. xliv. 26, the LXX employs aletheuein to translate the word shalam 'perform', but when the same Hebrew word occurs again in verse 28, it is there translated by the Greek poiein 'to make or to do'. If we can imagine a word in English that conjures up to the mind a person whose whole life is truth, whose very breadth and atmosphere is truth whose desires, will, plans and activity are truth, we may perhaps approach the meaning of Eph. iv. 15. This utter regard for truth, however, is kept in balance, for it must be 'in love'—without which, such zeal in present circumstances would lead to fanaticism and to a persecuting spirit. This utter regard for truth held in love is the greatest accessory to growth, 'may grow into Him in all things'. Growing up into Christ in all things is the practical echo of the basic doctrinal fact that has already been revealed concerning the constitution of the church of the One Body in Eph. i. 22, 23. Not only so, but it is the practical & experimental echo of the truth revealed in Eph. ii. 21.

The word sunarmologemai is repeated in Eph. iv. 16 where it is translated 'FITLY JOINED TOGETHER', and the words auxano and auxesis are found in Eph. iv. 15, 16 "May GROW UP (auxano) unto Him", "Maketh INCREASE (auxesis) of the Body". Not only do these words recur, but just as the church of the One Body is the fullness of Him that filleth ALL (ta panta) in all, so this growth of Eph. iv. 15 is unto Him in ALL THINGS (ta panta). Most translators supply the preposition 'in' before 'all things' in order to make easy reading, and this reading may give the intention of the Apostle, namely, that the Church should grow up into Christ in every particular, in all ways, in all things. Nevertheless, the mind will return to the fact that what the Apostle actually wrote was auxesomen eis auton ta panta, which rendered literally reads, "We may grow into Him the all things", which while it does not read well and is not good English, leaves in the mind a different conception from that of the A.V. Can it be that Paul intends us to understand him to mean, that by holding the truth inviolate in love, we shall be encouraging that growth into Him, which the N.T. speaks of as ta panta, some specific, blessed totality of glory, in which Christ is now ta panta "the all things" in all? (Col. iii. 11) anticipating the goal of God, when God shall be ta panta en pasin 'the all things in all' (I Cor. xv. 28).

Before, however, such words can have their true effect, it becomes necessary that we pause here, in order to place before the reader the peculiar usage of the phrase ta panta, for the phrase 'the all things' sounds strange to our ears. Pas is an adjective, translated either 'all' or 'every' in the majority of cases. The plural panta 'all things' is used with or without the article, and these two forms must be distinguished. We cannot very well translate ta panta 'The all things' for that has an un-English sound but a survey of the usage of these two forms panta and ta panta, may enable us to reach some agreed rendering that will satisfy every claim, and present a fair translation of the inspired original. The two forms are found in Rom. viii., and their choice is easily recognized by reason of the context of each form. There is a good deal of suffering in Rom. viii., induced both by the failure and frailty of the believer himself, and coming upon him by reason of his fellowship with Christ, his place in a groaning creation, and the attack of enemies. In consequence, he is sometimes at a loss to know what to pray for as he ought, but he does know, in the midst of all life's uncertainty, that 'all things work together for good to them that love God' (Rom. viii. 28). Here 'all things' is panta, all things whether good or evil. Later in the chapter the Apostle says:

> "He that spared not His own Son, but delivered Him up for us all, how shall He not with Him also freely give us all things?" (Rom. viii. 32).

Here 'all things' is ta panta, some specific 'all things' namely those things which come under the heading of Redemption, and which constitute the goal and consummation of the ages. Panta without the article is unlimited, panta with the article is restricted to the realm of redeeming grace. Rom. xi. does not teach that 'all things' without limit or restriction owe their origin, persistence and final blessing to the Lord.

> "For of Him, and through Him, and to Him are ta panta" (Rom. xi. 36), that conception of the universe that embraces all in heaven and in earth which come under the grace and power of the Redeemer. The advocates of universal reconciliation, while recognizing the presence of the article in Rom. xi. 32 use this verse to support their doctrine and omit the articles in their translation. It is not the teaching of Rom. xi. 32, that "God hath concluded ALL in unbelief, that He might have mercy upon ALL" but as the A.V. renders correctly, at least the first clause, and as the whole verse should be rendered:

> "For God hath concluded THEM ALL in unbelief, that He might have mercy on THEM ALL" (Rom. xi. 32).

Where universality is intended in Rom. ix. 5, the article is omitted, GOD is over ALL without limitation and reserve. In the verse that follows Paul uses ALL without the article with this same discrimination, "For they are not all Israel (pantes without the article) which are of Israel", the 'seed' were called 'in Isaac' (Rom. ix. 6, 7). We must therefore read the words "And so all Israel shall be saved" (Rom. xi. 26) in the light of Rom. ix. 6, 7. The 'all' that are to be saved being those who were 'In Isaac'—a type and shadow of the greater company of the saved at the end. In case the reader should expect to find the article here we point out that the word 'all' does not here stand alone and without qualification, pas Israel, 'all Israel' is already limited and does not need the article 'the'. Let us note the use of panta and ta panta in Ephesians, and by this we do not intend every single occurrence, for such phrases as 'all spiritual blessings' do not come within the scope of this inquiry. That which is to be "gathered together in one" is ta panta (Eph. i. 10), not panta without the article. That which is 'put in subjection under His feet' is panta all things including enemies (Eph. i. 22). He is also Head over all things panta, good as well as evil, to the church which is His Body (Eph. i. 22), and He is the One who fills ta panta, that special company in all, without limit and reserve. The second reference to 'all' is without the article, and en pasin has been rendered 'everywhere', 'in every way' and 'in every case'. The creation of 'all things' ta panta of Eph. iii. 9 is limited, because it is directly associated with the Mystery which had been hid in God. Where the words "One God and Father of ALL, Who is above ALL, and through ALL and in (you) ALL" (Eph. iv. 5) occur, the word used is panton and pasin without the article. This is universal, because the subject is already limited to 'the unity of the Spirit', and the insertion of humin 'you' in the text followed by the A.V. shows that this sense was clearly understood. J.N.D. adopts the reading hemim 'in us all' which has been rendered by some 'and in all TO YOU', making the passage balance Eph. i. 22, where Christ is not revealed as Head over all in the fullest sense yet, but as Head over all TO THE CHURCH.

One passage in Colossians must be included. Paul speaks of the new creation 'where there is neither Greek nor Jew . . . . . but (ta panta kai en pasin Christos) the all things and in all Christ' (Col. iii. 11). Here 'Christ' is put in a position to 'the all things', He Himself sums up in Himself the entire new creation. Of this He is the Head, it is in His image that all will be renewed, and where all other categories of worth and privilege are lost and put aside. So also in Eph. iv. 15 ta panta 'the all things' is in opposition with the "Head, even Christ". The 'fullness' that embraces this 'all things' is Christ and His church, not Christ alone, and certainly not the church alone. Of both Christ and His church is fullness predicated, but only as Head and Body making One blessed company. True growth presses on to 'the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ' and in this dispensation, the growth of the One Body up into Him Who is the Head, is the great example and exhibition of what the day of glory will reveal in its perfection. Christ as Head is our theme, and here we see the first unfolding of that which is in germ in Eph. i. 22, 23. As we prosecute our studies we shall learn that other phases of this growth and perfecting are associated with Christ the Head until we hope, when the survey is complete, every reader will concur with our proposition, that whatever blessings are to be associated with the great titles of King, Priest and Prophet, they are all absorbed, filled and taken to their true end, in the one great title given to Christ in the epistles of the Mystery "The Head".

The First Epistle to the Thessalonians.

No.1. pp. 16 - 20

The epistles to the Thessalonian church are among the earliest of Paul's writings. The older Bible scholars placed these epistles first, but with the added light from Sir William Ramsay's researches we believe Galatians to be the first letter that the Apostle wrote and these Thessalonian epistles the next in order.

Paul's initial visit to Thessalonica, probably in the summer of 50A.D., is narrated in Acts xvii. 1-9. This formed part of his second missionary journey, the ministry of which commenced at Philippi (xvi. 12-40). He refers to his coming to Thessalonica after the persecution and shameful treatment he had received at Philippi with Silas, in I Thess. ii. 2.

There, according to his custom, he visited the synagogue for three successive sabbaths and reasoned with them out of the Scriptures concerning the death and resurrection of the Lord Jesus, proving that He was and is the Christ. As a result, some of the Jews believed, together with a large number of God fearing Gentiles, but as a result of further Jewish opposition, an uproar was started which spread over the whole of the city. Jason, Paul's host, and other friends of the Apostle, went bail for him and Silas, and finally sent them away by night to Berea (Acts xvii. 1-10).

The young church, which they were forced to leave behind at Thessalonica, was therefore exposed to active persecution which gave Paul great concern for their spiritual welfare, specially as his sudden departure prevented him from giving them all the instruction he could have wished (I Thess. iii. 10). From Thessalonica he went on to Berea where further Jewish opposition caused him to go on to Athens (Acts xvii. 14, 15).

Meanwhile he sent Timothy back to inquire of their spiritual state and to establish and comfort them (I Thess. iii. 1-3). When Timothy returned to him, he was able to report that they were standing fast in spite of the persecution, and more than this, that they were actively propagating the gospel themselves (I Thess. iii. 6, 7; i. 8).

But there were several matters concerning which they desired further enlightenment. Among these was the return of the Lord Jesus and specially what would be the position of those believers who had died, in relation to this great event. The Apostle was obviously overjoyed and comforted at the good news Timothy brought of their spiritual welfare and wrote at once to encourage and strengthen them. This is the epistle we are now studying. It is well to remember that every epistle has a human background and a reason for writing, and while all are inspired by God, the reasons concerned can only contribute to our understanding of their content.

Thessalonica (modern Saloniki) was originally called Therme, but was refounded by Cassander about B.C.315 and renamed Thessalonica after his wife, who was a step-sister of Alexander the Great. It was an important city in Roman and Macedonian times and the Romans made it the capital of Macedonia in B.C.164. The city has always had a large proportion of Jews among its inhabitants.

The first epistle which Paul wrote to the Thessalonian church revolves around the three graces of faith, hope and love (I Cor. xiii. 13). It is significant that the Apostle frequently groups them together in other epistles.

Thus we have faith followed by seven gifts in Rom. xii. 6; love in seven aspects in xii. 9, and hope with seven consequences in xii. 12. In Col. i. 4, 5 we find them grouped together again as also in Heb. x. 22-24. It should be noted that in verse 23 'faith' should read 'hope'.

Without faith it is impossible to please God (Heb. xi. 6). We are saved by hope (Rom. viii. 24) a hope that does not make ashamed (v. 5) and the love of God which is poured out in our hearts is the greatest of all gifts and includes them all.

So in I Thessalonians we have the 'work of faith, and the labour of love, and the patience of hope'. These are gathered up again in the last chapter.

> "But let us, who are of the day, be sober, putting on the breastplate of faith and love; and for an helmet, the hope of salvation" (I Thess. v. 8).

Chapters i. and ii. are largely introductory, the real theme being reached in chapter iii. and onwards. There the three graces form the framework of this section—thus:

Faith	iii. 1-10.
Love	iii. 11 - iv. 12.
Hope	iv. 13 - v. 11.

We now give the outline of the two opening chapters.

I Thessalonians i. and ii.

A | i. 2-10. | a | Remembrance without ceasing.
b | The gospel came not in word only.
c | Result. Ye became followers.
d | End. Deliverance from wrath.
B | ii. 1-12. How the gospel came to Thessalonica.
A | ii. 13-16. | a | Thanks without ceasing.
b | The Word received—not as the word of man.
c | Result. Ye became followers.
d | End. The opposers. Wrath to the uttermost.

Chapter i. has its own structure which is as follows:

I Thessalonians i. 2 - 10.

A | 2, 3. | a | Work of faith.
b | Labour of love.
c | Patience of hope.
B | 5. "For"—the gospel's coming—not only \
But also } How
What manner /
C | 6. Followers.
D | 6. The Word and much affliction.
C | 7. Examples.
B | 8. "For"—The Word's sounding out—not only \
But also } Where
What manner /
A | 9, 10. | a | Turned to God.
b | To serve the living God.
c | Wait for His Son from heaven.

By observing the members marked "A" we shall see that faith, hope and love are resolved by the faithful Thessalonian believers into action. The work of faith is exhibited by the fact that they turned away from idols to God and put their faith in Him. Their labour of love was shown in their service to the living and true God in contrast to their former service to dead idols, the work of men's hands.

Their patience of hope was manifested in their waiting for the Son from heaven. Christ was their hope—as He is the Hope of all believers, but this hope did not leave them with their heads in the clouds; it made them intensely practical in service and devotion to the One Who had so gloriously saved them. They had become examples to believers all over Greece for their faithful witness and through them the gospel had spread not only through Greece but beyond (i. 7, 8).

No wonder Paul, in his opening remarks, gave thanks to God always for them and constantly remembered them at the Throne of Grace (verse 2). We cannot help noticing that, wherever possible, the Apostle gave commendation, praise and encouragement. Even when he had to correct departure from Truth, he usually finds something to praise first. He did not look for faults, rather he sought and found the fruits of the Spirit wherever he could. "Whatsoever things are true, honest, just, pure, lovely . . . . ." He reckoned in others (Phil. iv. 9). What an example to all of us! How much easier would the work of the Lord be if believers would constantly manifest this spirit instead of the critical, harsh attitude that is sometimes found in Christian circles.

The Apostle continues 'knowing, brethren beloved, your election of God'. The A.V. margin reads "or, beloved of God, your election", and with this agrees the R.V. This is more in harmony with the natural flow of the Greek.

How did Paul know their election? Had he some special access to Divine counsels which gave him this knowledge? While it was true that this great servant of the Lord had many revelations from God, some of them peculiar to his ministry, there is no reason to believe that this was the case here. Verse 5 supplies the answer. It commences with the Greek hoti translated 'for', but better rendered here 'because'. He knew their election because of the manner in which the gospel came "in power, and in the Holy Ghost, and in much assurance" and also by the practical effect on the Thessalonian believers. "Ye became imitators (followers) of us, and of the Lord, having received the word in much affliction, with joy of the Holy Ghost" (verse 6).

For every effect there must be a cause, and such manifest results as the Apostle saw could only spring from the fact that there had been a real work of the Spirit among them which proved their election. The root of a tree is invisible, but its fruit can be seen by all. Election is like the root and the practical effect in the believer's life, the fruit.

The gospel proclaimed by Paul had become something more than words. There had been abundant confirmation by the Holy Spirit, and during the Acts period, this was manifested by supernatural gifts (I Cor. xii.).

While there is no mention of such gifts in this context, we need not rule them out. This confirmation was not only external but internal. The gospel came with 'much assurance' (verse 5). The Greek plerophoria occurs four times and only in Paul's epistles. Col. ii. 2 refers to "full assurance of understanding". Heb. vi. 11 to "full assurance of hope" and in x. 22 "full assurance of faith".

This is a magnificent word and a corrective to those who are always doubting and fearing and who regard assurance as being something parallel with pride. "These things have I written unto you that believe on the name of the Son of God, that ye may know that ye have eternal life" wrote the Apostle John (I John v. 13). Assurance is God's will for all His children and this comes when His Word is accepted and believed apart from anything else in the way of feelings or other attitudes of mind. A doubting believer is a contradiction and a paralyzed man. He is incapable of any real witness for the Lord. Not in this way did the believers at Thessalonica receive the Word of the Lord preached by His servant Paul. They regarded it as the Word of God which energizes (worketh effectually) them that believe. This is the only source of spiritual power for Christian witness. It always has been and ever will be so, and practically the last injunction that Paul gave was "preach the Word" (II Tim. iv. 2). Where the Word of God is not honoured as the Word of Truth and fully proclaimed as such, there is powerlessness, spiritual deadness, and lack of response. This is what we see largely around us in Christendom. It is useless to complain of the lack of lasting results in Christian witness when God's Word is not given its proper place.

Believers at Thessalonica had received the gospel not as the word of men, not as Pauline doctrine although preached by Paul, but as it is in Truth, the Word of God. When they had done this, results followed! And this was no surface stirring, for much affliction immediately occurred which failed to move them or shake their "much assurance" (i. 6).

Let us all remember that we have received the Word of God as a stewardship; that God has promised to honour and work through His Word by the Holy Spirit, and if we want to see a lasting effect in Christian witness we must minister that Word in all its purity and then look to him to "give the increase" (I Cor. iii. 6).

No.2. i. 6 - ii. 16.

After commenting upon the work of faith, labour of love and patience of hope of the Thessalonian believers, the Apostle declares that they had become imitators of him and of the Lord. This had led them through much tribulation and persecution for their faithful witness, but through it all there had been joy of the Holy Spirit to more than compensate.

The result was that they had become "ensamples to all that believe in Macedonia and Achaia" (i. 7). The critical texts read the singular number "ensample". This is the Greek tupos which gives us the English word type. Paul stated that he had been an example or pattern to them in his behaviour, by working night and day so that he would not be chargeable to them (II Thess. iii. 8, 9). Again he holds himself up as a pattern to the Philippian saints (Phil. iii. 17). Both Timothy and Titus are exhorted to be "examples" or "types" (I Tim. iv. 12; Titus ii. 7). The church at Thessalonica had become a pattern to the whole of Greece and beyond (i. 7). The Apostle could hardly give higher commendation than this. Their Christian testimony sounded out far and wide and so the Truth spread abroad.

The need for bold and fearless witness is not the less needed in our day. We all should show clearly Whose we are and Whom we serve. There are far too many secret disciples, those who are afraid to let the light shine. Specially is this so concerning the deeper truths revealed in Paul's prison epistles. Many keep quiet because of the fear of man that bringeth a snare even when these are believers. They are afraid of the price they will have to pay. May we all be so strengthened and inspired to "shine as lights in the world, holding forth the word of life" (Phil. ii. 15, 16) and so avoid being "ashamed of the Lord and His prisoner" (II Tim. i. 8).

In view of the practical effects that accrued from the outstanding witness of the Thessalonian saints, the Apostle states that he had no need to speak anything; rather the people of Macedonia and Achaia reported what manner of entering in he had to them and with the results that had glorified the Lord so much.

The closing verses of the chapter strike a dispensational note. Believers at Thessalonica were awaiting the Lord Jesus from heaven. This can only mean that they expected, as their hope, the return of the Saviour in their lifetime. The Apostle also identifies himself with this hope in the phrase in chapter iv. 17, "we which are alive and remain". The early coming of Christ is not only a feature of this epistle, it is common to all the epistles written during the period covered by the Acts.

There are two classes of people who disregard this truth. One is the modernist, who plainly states that in his opinion, Paul and the early converts were quite sincere in their belief that Christ would return in their lifetime, but they were mistaken. The other is the more conservative believer, who, not seeing the epistle's dispensational setting, yet confronted with the fact of its stress upon the imminence of the Lord's Return and that this has not happened though nearly 2,000 years have passed by since it was written, seeks to resolve the difficulty by explaining that "a thousand years is as one day" (II Pet. iii. 8) and therefore scarcely two days have passed in the Lord's reckoning!

But this is forced and unnatural and in any case Peter reverses the statement by saying "one day is with the Lord as a thousand years"! The epistles to the Thessalonian church were two of the earliest of Paul's writings and had their origin in the Acts period when the possibility of the Second Advent hung upon the repentance of Israel and their turning back to God (Acts iii. 19-26). Believers in this church and elsewhere were instructed that practical faith was to turn away from idols to God; practical response was to serve the living and true God; and for a practical hope, they were to "wait for His Son from heaven" (i. 9), being rescued from the coming wrath, so graphically and solemnly described later in the book of Revelation.

The Apostle now begins a long section in which he defends his conduct towards them. It was unlike Paul to give prominence to himself unless he had been deliberately misrepresented and the truth made known through him brought into danger. It is obvious that this was the case, otherwise he would not have denied the charges of deceit, uncleanness, and guile (ii. 3) or of flattering words and covetousness (verse 5), or of seeking glory for himself (verse 6) if these insinuations had not been made.

The tactics of the enemy are ever the same: smear the messenger and seek to ruin the message. It is splendid to realize that Paul did not hit back and render evil for evil. Rather he reminds them of his gentleness among them as a nurse carefully looking after her children. He had been willing not only to make known the gospel to them but to give himself to the limit for their sakes (verse 8). He had worked night and day so that he would not be chargeable and a burden to them (verse 9). He had behaved like a loving and wise father exhorting and consoling them (11), and from this context we have brought before us the ideal leader who combines the tenderness of a mother with the strength of a father. One without the other may lead to undue hardness or softness of character. Would that we all could emulate the Apostle in his balanced witness in these respects.

The epistle continues with Paul's commendation of the way the Thessalonian believers had received his message. He makes a tremendous statement by saying that they received it not as something human, just the word of a man, but, as it is in truth, the Word of God. They must have been persuaded that Paul was not giving them his opinions. There could not have been any in this assembly who regarded the message as just “Pauline theology”. It was as though God Himself had spoken to them and therefore what they had heard through the Apostle’s lips was regarded as God’s Word. If only this was the attitude of the churches today, what a difference we should see in faith and practice! It would start to work as it did in the Thessalonian believers:

> “Ye received it (the message given through Paul) . . . . . as it is in truth the Word of God which effectually worketh also in you that believe” (ii. 13).

Effectually work is the translation of the Greek energeo from which we get our word energize. Lasting practical results followed such a reception of the Truth and would do so today if it was faithfully proclaimed and made known. The message would not return void to God and be barren of results. It is our responsibility to sow the seed of the Word of truth. It is the Lord’s promise to “give the growth” (I Cor. iii. 7).

In the case of the Thessalonian church, the reception of the Truth had not been without cost:

> “For ye, brethren, became followers of the churches of God which in Judaea are in Christ Jesus: for ye also have suffered like things of your own countrymen, even as they have of the Jews . . . . .” (ii. 14).

The churches of Judaea had been formed by the dispersal of the mother church at Jerusalem through persecution (Acts viii. 1). They had suffered from the bitterness and venom of the unbelieving Jews and it was this means that Satan used most of all at this time to antagonize the purpose of God and to frustrate His will. Over and over again the Apostle suffered at the hands of his own nation as the record of the Acts clearly shows. They dogged his footsteps wherever he went, seeking all the while to stir up strife and enmity. Not only did they do this to him, but they vented their spite on all those who believed the gospel and made a faithful stand for the Lord. No wonder he went on to write:

> “Who both killed the Lord Jesus, and their own prophets, and have persecuted us; and they please not God and are contrary to all men; forbidding us to speak to the Gentiles that they might be saved, to fill up their sins alway: for the wrath is come upon them to the uttermost” (ii. 15, 16).

Terrible words, but a true commentary on the attitude of Israel during the period covered by the Acts of the Apostles. No wonder Rom. x. 22 was written of them later, describing the attitude of the Lord:

> “All day long I have stretched forth my hands unto a disobedient and gainsaying people.”

Turning away from the bitter opposition of the Jew, Paul now declares his longing to revisit Thessalonica and be united with them again. He writes:

> “But we, brethren, being taken from you for a short time in presence, not in heart, endeavoured the more abundantly to see your face with great desire” (ii. 17).

“Being taken from you” is a translation of the Greek aporphanisthentes which literally means to be bereaved and shows us how keenly the Apostle felt his forced absence from the Thessalonian Christians. He desired to visit them, but the enemy hindered all his plans.

Just how far Satan can delay the plans of God and obstruct His servants is not possible to say. We do know that his power and that of the hosts of darkness under his control is very great. He was able to hold up an angelic messenger to Daniel for three weeks (Dan. x. 12, 13), and there is no reason to believe that his power is lessened in any way today.

The conflict of the ages still goes on and but for the glorious redemptive work of our Saviour we should certainly not be on the winning side. The purpose of his saving grace is that we should be "more than conquerors through Him that loved us" (Rom. viii. 37). Meanwhile may we seek to put on the whole armour of God (Eph. vi. 11) and clad in this way, we shall be safe from all the malignity and enmity of the foe.

No.3. ii. 19 - iv. 2.
pp. 57 - 60

The next section of this epistle commences with the words:

> "For what is our hope, our joy, or crown of rejoicing? Are not ye in the presence of our Lord Jesus Christ at His Coming? For ye are our glory and joy."

When the Apostle talks of a 'crown', he is not dealing with foundation truths, but with the subsequent faithful 'working out', resulting in reward, which is given when all service is tested by the Lord at His Bema or Award Seat. In his final summing up of his life's witness he said:

> "I have finished my course . . . . . henceforth there is laid up for me the crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous Judge, shall give me at that day" (II Tim. iv. 7, 8).

This is but a figurative way of speaking, not just of living with Christ in glory, but being associated with His Throne, or reigning with Him (II Tim. ii. 12).

Faithful service earns this crown, and in that day there will be practical evidence of this in the presence of all those believers who have been saved through his devoted labours for the Lord. The Thessalonian saints would then be "his crown of rejoicing (boasting)", even as the Philippian believers were (Phil. iv. 1).

There are two words which are translated 'boasting' in the N.T.: kauchema and kauchesis. They are obviously allied. Dr. E. W. Bullinger in his Lexicon says:

> Kauchesis, reason to boast, denoting the act.
> Kauchema, a subject of boasting.

Paul uses the latter word exclusively, and also the former word excepting one occurrence in James iv. 16.

The verbal form kauchaomai occurs 33 times in the N.T., 31 of them being found in Paul's writings.

His boasting or rejoicing was in his Lord or what his Lord had done through him. He had learned to avoid the emptiness of boasting in himself or of his own achievements. Even in the famous passage where he does boast, it was forced on him by his detractors, and then he makes it clear that his labours and sufferings were on account of his devotion to Christ (II Cor. xi. 16-31).

The boasting in the Thessalonian saints would be at the Lord's Coming. The word is the familiar parousia and together with the word apokalupsis gives us the hope of the churches formed during the Acts period. We have considered this word before and noted its connection with Matt. xxiv. There is no need to invent a "secret coming" as some have done. This is only a confession of inability to see the difference between the hope of the believer during the Acts of the Apostles compared with the revelation of the Mystery in Paul's prison epistles later on.

Chapter iii. commences with the connection link "wherefore" (dio). Because of the close link between the Apostle and his Thessalonian converts, when he could no longer forbear, he sent Timothy to them, being unable to go himself. "Forbear" is the Greek stego and is used 4 times and only in Paul's writings.

The word means to cover or conceal, and doubtless refers to his anxiety for them, as he knew full well the persecution they were enduring and wondered whether their faith was steadfast through it all.

Only those who have been used by the Lord in the salvation and building up of others know the intimate connection that exists between them. Every blow aimed at the convert affects the leader and all such can well understand Paul's deep concern for all the believers he had been forced to have at Thessalonica. When he could conceal his anxiety no longer, he sends Timothy, whom he describes as his "brother and God's minister in the gospel of Christ" (R.V.).

We have now arrived at the heart of the epistle, all else up to now being introductory. In our opening studies we pointed out how the whole of this letter revolves around the three graces of faith, hope and love. We now commence a section dealing with faith and set out the middle section of the epistle as a whole:

Comfort you concerning your faith (2).
I sent to know your faith (5).
Timothy brought good tidings of your faith (6).
Perfect that which is lacking in your faith (10).

LOVE iii. 11 - iv. 12. |
Abound in love (iii. 12).
Concerning brotherly love ye need not that I write unto you (iv. 9).
HOPE iv. 13 - v. 11. |
Sorrow as others which have no hope (iv. 13).
Hope expanded in doctrine of the Lord's Coming.

There are four references to faith in the first section, iii. 1-10. The Apostle had sent Timothy to comfort and encourage them concerning their faith, so that the severe afflictions they were undergoing would not move them away from the Truth. Paul had warned them beforehand of the inevitability of their faith being tested by suffering (4). What was a problem in O.T. days concerning the suffering and trials of the righteous now became the normal experience of God's people and they were taught to accept this joyfully as the will of God for them. It was indeed a precious thing, as Peter asserts in his first epistle (I Pet. i. 7), for it had a refining effect and took their faith out of the realm of theory and transplanted it into the realm of certainty and fact, so that they were in no doubt of its reality.

Paul had been anxious lest the Tempter had used these difficult experiences to turn them away from the faith (verse 5) and spoil his work, but the return of Timothy with the reassuring news of their steadfastness, greatly cheered him, as it did to learn that they longed to see him again. He had been concerned lest his enforced departure from Thessalonica had been used by Satan to break the link between them, but he was now overjoyed to know that his fears had been groundless.

> "For what thanksgiving can we render again unto God for you, for all the joy wherewith we joy for your sakes before our God; night and day praying exceedingly that we may see your face, and may perfect that which is lacking in your faith?" (I Thess. iii. 9, 10 R.V.).

He continues to pray that the way might be opened for him to revisit them; meanwhile he asks that their love may increase toward each other and verses 11 to iv. 12 expands the theme as it touches Christian practice. Overflowing love would so touch their hearts and lives that it would lead to their strengthening and establishment, resulting in an unblameable walk before our God and Father (verses 11-13). The Greek amemptos translated 'unblameable' occurs 4 times in Paul's epistles:

> "That ye may be blameless" (Phil. ii. 15).
> "The righteousness which is in the law, blameless" (Phil. iii. 6).
> "Stablish your hearts unblameable" (I Thess. iii. 13).
> "If that first (covenant) had been faultless" (Heb. viii. 7).

As an adverb it occurs twice in the epistle we are studying. The Apostle had lived out the Truth before them, for he could write:

> "Ye are witnesses, how . . . . . unblameably we behaved ourselves toward you that believe" (ii. 10).

In chapter v. 23 we have:

> "I pray God your whole spirit and soul and body be preserved blameless unto the Coming of our Lord Jesus Christ."

Paul's prayer for these believers was not only that they might be preserved alive until the near return of the Lord Jesus, but that they might be found to His approval when this great event took place.

Chapter iv. starts with the Greek to loipon, literally 'for the rest', hardly 'finally' as the R.V. The "furtherance" of the A.V. seems nearer its meaning, the Apostle continuing the theme of brotherly love as it works out in practice:

> "We beseech and exhort you in the Lord Jesus, that, as ye have received of us how ye ought to walk and to please God, even as ye do walk, that ye abound more and more" (iv. 1 R.V.).

Note the phrase "even as ye do (or are) walking" in the R.V. which is added by reason of the best Greek texts. Even though their standard of walk was so exemplary, Paul would have them not rest on their laurels, but 'abound' more and more. Perisseuo translated 'abound' is a typical Pauline word being used by him some 26 times. In this epistle its occurrences are:

> "The Lord make you to increase and abound in love" (iii. 12).
> "So that ye would abound more and more" (iv. 1).
> "We beseech you . . . . . that ye increase more and more" (iv. 10).

We never get to the limits of practical love in the Christian life. This greatest of all gifts is best shown in spending and being spent for others, pouring ourselves out, as it were, in the loving service without stint for fellow-members of the Body of Christ. This will be not just love—but overflowing love which is such a characteristic feature of God's unfathomable love to us. It was this that Paul urged the Thessalonian believers to evidence more and more. What opportunity has the world, the flesh or the devil, to enter into a gathering of God's people where such a spirit is manifest?

The Apostle refers to the commands he had given them verbally 'by the Lord Jesus'. Later on in the chapter he speaks of details concerning the Lord's parousia or Coming which he had 'by the word of the Lord' (15). This does not necessarily mean, as some assume, that these matters are entirely new, but Paul received his commission and all it involved in revelation "not of men, neither by man, but by Jesus Christ and God the Father" (Gal. i. 1). It was not necessary to refer them to anything that God had revealed through the Apostles of the Circumcision or by Christ when on earth. Paul's revelation from the Lord was complete in all points, and whether some of it characterized truth given in other callings or not did not matter; it was "by the Lord Jesus", now Risen and Ascended, and conveyed through himself, an earthen vessel.

Just what this involves we must leave to the next article.

No.4. iii. 12 - iv. 14.
pp. 65 - 69

Before we go any further, let us examine the structure of the passage before us:

I Thess. iii. 12 - iv. 12. The labour of love.

A | iii. 12, 13. | a | Abound in love.
b | One to another.
B | iv. 1. | c | Walk and please God.
d | Abound (perisseuein) more and more.
C | iv. 2-8. | e | Commands of the Lord Jesus.
f | Sanctification, not lust.
g | The brother defrauded.
g | The Lord the Avenger.
f | Not uncleanness, but holiness.
e | Rejecting God.
A | iv. 9. | a | Brotherly love.
b | Love one another.
B | iv. 10-12. | d | Abound (perisseuein) more and more.
c | Walk honestly to those without.

The stress, not merely upon love, but on love that overflows or abounds is obvious, and such love will have a very marked effect upon the practical walk of the believer, as the context shows. The Apostle reminds the Thessalonian believers of the charge (R.V.) he had given them "through the Lord Jesus" (R.V.). As we have seen, this once more confirms the independent ministry of Paul who received this ministry and all it involved directly from the Risen Christ and not from the Twelve, nor can it refer to the words spoken by the Lord when on earth, for these the Apostle never heard, and even if he had, as unconverted Saul of Tarsus, the Christ hater, they would have conveyed little.

This charge had to do with their sanctification, or separation to God by redemption, and their separation from all that the flesh and the world involved. The moral laxity of the time made it necessary to stress purity of living.

What does Paul mean when he says, "That every one of you should know how to possess his vessel in sanctification and honour . . . . . that no man go beyond (transgress R.V.) and defraud (wrong) his brother in the matter (not 'any matter' as A.V., but the matter under discussion)"? There are two different views held by expositors as to the interpretation of this passage.

(1) The "vessel" refers to the body, and the injunction is to self-control.
(2) The "vessel" refers to a "wife", and the need for faithfulness to the marriage bond.

The Greek word skeuos, vessel, occurs 22 times in the N.T. It is used of a receptacle (John xix. 29), a person's possessions (Matt. xii. 29; Mark iii. 37), the believer as a channel which God can use (II Cor. iv. 7; II Tim. ii. 21). Not only this, but in I Pet. iii. 7 it is used of a wife:

> "Likewise, ye husbands . . . . . giving honour to the wife, as unto the weaker vessel . . . . ."

"How to possess his vessel." The word 'possess' is ktaomai, which means, not so much to possess, but to 'gain possession of', to 'acquire' or 'purchase':

> "Now this man purchased a field with the reward of iniquity" (Acts i. 18).
> "Thou hast thought that the gift of God may be purchased with money" (Acts viii. 20).
> "With a great sum obtained I this freedom" (Acts xxii. 28).

In what sense can the body be acquired or possessed? Moreover the sense of the next verses does not connect well if the word 'vessel' is given this meaning.

On the other hand, if skeuos means 'wife', then to 'acquire a wife' can be understood, and with this sense it is rendered by a number of translations.

> ". . . . . that each man among you shall know how to procure a wife who shall be his own in purity and honour" (Weymouth).

So also Alford, Moffatt, Cunnington, Twentieth Century Version, Goodspeed, Williams, and Berkeley Version. Leaning to the first view are Bloomfield, J. N. Darby, Rotherham and F. F. Bruce. Both views express truth, but the second fits into the context more naturally. The Apostle again stresses sanctification in verse 7:

> "For God hath not called us unto uncleanness, but unto sanctification (holiness A.V.)."

However, love is still the dominating theme of this section and now the saints at Thessalonica are reminded that one practical aspect of Christian love is to "study to be quiet, and to do your business, and to work with your own hands, as we commanded you". Evidently there were some who were wrongly regarding the nearness of the Lord's return. Such were refusing to work, with the result that, instead of being occupied by their own affairs, they were prying into the affairs of others and causing disturbances.

> "For we hear of some that walk among you disorderly, that work not at all, but are busybodies. Now them that are such we command and exhort in the Lord Jesus Christ, that with quietness they work, and eat their own bread" (II Thess. iii. 11, 12 R.V.).

Both in this epistle and in the context we are considering, there is a stress on being "quiet". Hesuchazo means to be silent, to be tranquil, as opposed to excitability which has a bad effect on others. The verb translated 'study' is philotimeomai, 'to be ambitious' literally, and the phrase almost means 'be ambitious to be unambitious'. "Make it your ambition to live quietly and to mind your own concerns (do your own things, literally), and to work with your own hands". Such a walk would be a good witness to the outside world and moreover each believer would then lack nothing (12).

To this very day, the doctrine of the Second Advent has had a similar effect on some. We have heard of those who have given up their homes and businesses to wait for the Lord's return, forgetting that the best way to be ready is to do what He Himself commanded "occupy, till I come" (Luke xix. 13). To do nothing, to be idle is to open the door to the Adversary and this was happening at Thessalonica, hence the Apostle's warning. By example as well as by precept, he taught them to be busily engaged in doing the Lord's will, whether in the home, trade, or in the Lord's work.

We now enter upon a new section of the epistle which revolves around the question of hope and accordingly we set out its structural outline.

I Thess. iv. 13 - v. 11. The patience of hope.

A | iv. 13. I would not have you ignorant concerning them that sleep.
B | iv. 14. First reason—Resurrection and sleep.
C | iv. 15. Second reason—Living shall not go before them that sleep.
D | iv. 16, 17. Ever with the Lord.
E | iv. 18. Wherefore comfort one another with these words.
A | v. 1-3. You know perfectly concerning the day of the Lord.
B | v. 4-6. First reason—Let us not sleep.
C | v. 7, 8. Second reason—Those that sleep in the night.
D | v. 9,10 Live together with Him.
E | v. 11. Wherefore comfort yourselves together.

It is evident that some had lost dear ones and they were deeply concerned about them in view of the Lord's early return. Would they be left behind? Would those that are alive be taken and those who had died be left in their graves until a later period? To these problems Paul now turns and seeks to give them comfort and instruction.

> "But I would not have you to be ignorant, brethren, concerning them which are asleep" (iv. 13).

In five other places the Apostle states that he did not wish believers to be ignorant or without knowledge of certain vital truths. In Rom. xi. 25 he is dealing with the secret of Israel's blindness lest they should be wise in their own conceits and imagine that God had cast off the unbelieving nation forever and exalted the Gentile to take their place. In I Cor. x. 1 he reminds the Corinthian church that, while all Israel at the Exodus were 'baptized unto Moses, in the cloud and in the sea', and were typically redeemed and linked with all that Moses stood for in law and ceremonial type and shadow, yet all did not enter the promised land, for with 'many of them God was not well pleased' (x. 5). They lost their prize, that is, entering into the inheritance of Canaan. In the same epistle Paul uses the phrase again and states that he would not have them ignorant concerning spiritual gifts (xii. 1). Detailed instructions were necessary so that these gifts should be used in an orderly fashion and to the edification of the local assembly.

When we writes his second letter to the church at Corinth he says that he would not have them ignorant of the trouble he had endured in Asia. So great was it that he despaired even of life (II Cor. i. 8). This led him away from self-trust or self-confidence. "But we had the sentence of death in ourselves, that we should not trust in ourselves, but in God which raiseth the dead" (9). In his letter to the Roman saints the Apostle stated that he had often planned to visit them but had been hindered. He was concerned that they should not be ignorant of this, or misunderstand his inability (Rom. i. 13).

In each context where this phrase is used, something important is being stressed and so it is in I Thess. iv. To the sorrowful saints who were mourning the loss of dear ones, Paul does not attempt to inculcate a Stoic indifference. Such could not help sorrowing in these circumstances. At the same time they could remember for their own comfort that the Saviour Himself was a Man of sorrows and acquainted with grief. He stood beside the grave of a beloved friend and wept, and was deeply moved at the havoc and loss that death brings. One thing that we are apt to forget is that redemption not only delivers from sin, but from the penalty of sin which is death.

> "I will ransom them from the power of the grave; I will redeem them from death; O death, I will be thy plagues; O grave, I will be thy destruction" (Hosea xiii. 14).

So that while we sorrow, we sorrow not as others who have no hope. This is one of the great differences between the saved and the unsaved. For believers, death is described in the Word as a sleep, an interlude before the real life starts in resurrection glory. This figure is never used for the unbelievers. For him the 'sting of death is sin' and this sting has not been removed as far as he is concerned. Such a person is without Christ, without hope and of all men most miserable (I Cor. xv. 17-19). Regarding the state of death, no one, of themselves, can have any real or sure knowledge of what it is like. No ordinary mortal has come back from the grave to give us any information as to its character, saving those who in Bible times, were raised from the dead, Lazarus being a case in point. Thus it is that we are shut up entirely to the revelation of God's Word for any knowledge we can have.

When God wishes to describe to us what the state of death is, what illustration will He use? And at least we must admit that his illustrations are always apt. Consistently in O.T. and N.T. He uses the figure of sleep, and if we will only consider what healthy sleep is like we shall know all that God has revealed on this subject. We are not aware of any Scripture that talks about death as the sleep of the body, the soul or the spirit, separately; it is the sleep of the whole person concerned. Likewise the Word does not speak of the resurrection of the body, that is what human creeds do. It treats of the resurrection of the dead (I Cor. xv. 12, 13, 16, 20, 21). If Christians would only carefully keep to Scriptural language, what trouble and false doctrine would be avoided! We should not hear then of such senseless and unscriptural phrases as 'soul-sleep'. The trouble is that so many Christians are not content with what God has revealed. They much prefer to indulge in wishful thinking and add their own faulty and misleading ideas concerning a subject that they can know nothing of themselves. Tradition and man-made creeds add their quota of error and the whole subject gets leavened with false notions which are very difficult to throw aside. How often has one heard the phrase "I like to believe my loved ones are in bliss; it is comforting", which only goes to show that personal preferences are made the basis of belief, instead of the revelation of the Word of God.

There are two words in the Greek for sleep, katheudo 'to get to sleep', referring to normal slumber, and koimao 'to fall asleep involuntarily', which in the passive is used in the N.T. of the sleep of death. In verse 14 we have the phrase 'those who sleep in Jesus will God bring with Him'. The word 'in' is the preposition dia 'through', 'by means of', "those who are laid to sleep by Jesus". The thought underlying these words is extremely beautiful. Just as a parent lays his little child to rest at night time, so the Saviour does for His children, and resurrection is the morning of glory when He will say "wake up".

> "Marvel not at this: for the hour is coming, in the which all that are in the graves (not heaven, or merely their bodies in the grave) shall hear His voice, and shall come forth . . . . ." (John v. 28, 29).
> "I am the Resurrection and the Life" (John xi. 25).

Realizing this, Bishop Ken (1692) wrote in one of his hymns:

> Teach me to live, that I may dread The grave as little as my bed.

Believers, taught by God's Word, will know that death is no more to be feared than going to sleep at night time. It is sleep in Christ (I Cor. xv. 16-18). After the death of Lazarus, the Lord said to His disciples, "our friend Lazarus sleepeth; but I go, that I may awake him out of sleep" (John xi. 11). This is just what death and resurrection is for the believer, and one would have thought that, to all such, these words of the Saviour would be sufficient; but alas, to so many who name the Name of Christ, it is not so. They are determined to keep their own traditional ideas on the subject. May we be found among those who believe what God says and reveals, rather than the opinions of men.

No.5. iv. 14 - 18.
pp. 95 - 99

We have seen that the Apostle Paul, under the guidance of the Holy Spirit, brings the teaching concerning resurrection and the Lord's Coming before the Thessalonian believers who were experiencing bereavement.

> "For this we say unto you by the word of the Lord, that we who are alive, that are left unto the Coming of the Lord, shall in no wise precede them that are fallen asleep. For the Lord Himself shall descend from heaven, with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God: and the dead in Christ shall rise first; then we that are alive, that are left, shall together with them be caught up in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air: and so shall we ever be with the Lord. Wherefore comfort one another with these words" (I Thess. iv. 15-18 R.V.).

The Apostle stresses the fact that he is writing "by the Word of the Lord". This doubly emphasizes the truth of the passage we are dealing with. We can find no reference to such teaching in the Lord's earthly ministry, but as Paul received the gospel and all subsequent truth by revelation (Gal. i. 11, 12; Eph. iii. 3), there is no difficulty in understanding the source of the truth expressed here. He now explains the effect of the Lord's Coming during the period covered by the Acts (Acts iii. 19-26), and this epistle was one of the Apostle's earliest writings. We will say more of this later on.

The word 'coming' translates the Greek parousia, which means 'presence' (R.V. margin) or 'arrival' rather than the motion of coming. This parousia had been fully explained by the Lord in Matt. xxiv. in response to the disciples' question as to what should be its sign and when it should take place. There the Lord Jesus had said:

> "Immediately after the tribulation of those days . . . . . then shall appear the sign of the Son of Man in heaven, and they shall see the Son of Man coming in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory" (xxiv. 29, 30).

Here we are on sure ground. From this statement we know that the parousia must take place after the Great Tribulation and not before it. We know that some, in order to get out the difficulty of the believer going through this awful time of trouble, invent another parousia, a secret one. But where is the passage of Scripture that clearly teaches this? Such are not helped either by the usage of the word apokalupsis, revelation. Where in the N.T. do we get a secret apokalupsis of the Lord for believers? Apokalupsis and parousia are used inter-changeably during the period covered by the Acts of the Apostles and must refer to the same event. These words are not used in the Prison Epistles for the hope of the Body of Christ, which is distinct from the Coming of the Lord to the earth to destroy the man of sin and the antichristian kingdom of the end-time and to end the Great Tribulation, which is a time of Jacob's (Israel's) trouble, although it involves the whole earth in a measure.

It may be helpful here if we observe the united testimony of the early epistles on the imminent Coming of the Lord.

> ". . . . . so that ye come behind in no gift; waiting for the Coming of our Lord Jesus Christ" (I Cor. i. 6, 7).
> ". . . . . the time is short; it remaineth that both they that have wives be as thought they had none" (vii. 29).
> "Now these things happened unto them by way of example; and they are written for our admonition, upon whom the ends of the ages are come" (x. 11 R.V.).
> "Maranatha: the Lord cometh" (xvi. 22 margin).
> "The God of peace shall bruise Satan under your feet shortly" (Rom. xvi. 20).
> "The night is far spent, the day is at hand" (xiii. 12).
> "For a yet little while and He that shall come will come and will not tarry" (Heb. x. 37).
> "Ye turned to God . . . . . to wait for His son from heaven" (I Thess. i. 9, 10).
> "We which are alive and remain to the Coming of the Lord" (iv. 15).
> "I pray God your whole spirit, and soul and body be preserved blameless unto the Coming of our Lord Jesus Christ" (v. 23).
> "To you who are troubled rest with us at the revelation of the Lord Jesus from heaven with the angels of His power in flaming fire" (II Thess. i. 7 R.V.).
> "Now we beseech you, brethren . . . . . by our gathering together unto Him" (ii. 1).
> "The end of all things is at hand" (I Pet. iv. 7).
> "The Coming of the Lord draweth nigh" (James v. 8).
> "The Judge standeth before the door" (v. 9).
> "It is the last time (hour) . . . . . even now are there many antichrists whereby we know that it is the last time (or hour)" (I John ii. 18).

This is an impressive list. Not only is it clear that believers at this period expected to be alive at the Lord's Coming, but that Coming was looked upon as imminent, and yet nearly 2,000 years have passed and still this great event has not taken place. This is surely one of the major problems of the N.T. and it is not resolved by assuming that the early Christians were mistaken in their beliefs. This would raise the problem of inspiration, enlightenment of the Holy Spirit, and the very basis of the Christian faith. If they were mistaken here, they could be mistaken anywhere in their doctrine and all assurance would vanish. Nor can we accept the explanation that 'a thousand years is as a day with the Lord'. God has written His word to instruct us who are creatures of time and when He deals with time, it is time as we know it, that is of ordinary days, months and years. When He says 'quickly' He means quickly. It would be mockery to ask believers to hold fast under fierce persecution with a view to the Coming of Christ, if that Coming was not possible for another two millenniums.

Speaking generally, evangelical Christendom has ignored or bypassed this great problem, and its great Scriptural importance has been missed. The Divine promise to Israel, given through Peter's lips in Acts iii. 19-26, that, if the nation of Israel repented and turned to God, their sins would be forgiven and blotted out, the Lord Jesus would be sent back to them and the times of restoration and setting up of the earthly kingdom as revealed through the O.T. prophets would come to pass, is the key to this difficulty. In view of this, no wonder believers looked on the Lord's Second Coming as being a possibility in their lives and all the passages we have quoted reinforce this fact. The so-called orthodox position, having set Israel aside as being cast off by God at the crucifixion, throws away the key to the understanding of the Acts of the Apostles and then wonders why it has no Scriptural answer to such far reaching statements as that of Peter, 'the end of all things has drawn near', or John ". . . we know it is the last hour . . ." (I John ii. 18), or Paul "the ends of the ages are come" (I Cor. x. 11 R.V.).

All these statements were completely true at the time they were written (i.e. during the Acts period), and clearly indicate that the end of the age was near and the return of the Lord Jesus was imminent, all, humanly speaking, depended upon the repentance of Israel. The fact that they were not going to be 'converted' or 'turned' to God at this time, was known to Him only, and no believer could have had any idea what God would do in such a circumstance. The temptation is great to read into these portions of Scripture future events and the condition of things after the Acts. If we do this, we nullify truth, blind our own minds and lose a correct understanding of the purpose of God. Always we must seek to put ourselves in the place of those to whom the portion of Scripture we are studying was given, and to go as far as the truth was explicitly revealed to them and no further.

If only believers could see that the near Coming of Christ was a possibility during the Acts period and will be truth again when God's prophetic clock starts once more and He resumes His dealings with Israel and Daniel's 70th week of years runs its course, they would then be in a position to consider and understand the Scriptures that deal with the interval between these events and reveal what God has been doing during this time. In other words the truth that covers this age would then stand out sharply in all its clearness and speak to heart and mind, giving Divine illumination and guidance as to where believers stand today in the Divine purpose of the ages, their calling and the practical response in testimony and service that the Lord is requiring from them.

Coming back to I Thess. iv. 15-18, we note that the Apostle again stresses that what he is teaching is the "Word of the Lord". There is no room here then for his own ideas. This is Christ's revelation on the hope of the believer then obtaining. He assures the Thessalonian believers that those who are living when the Lord returns will on no account precede (prevent—old English of the A.V.) or realize their hope before believers who have died. There was no need for them to worry about loved ones who had fallen asleep. They would not be left behind but would rise from their graves first and then those who are living would be caught away to join them in the clouds and so—IN THIS WAY, and only in this way, would they be with the Lord Jesus for ever.

Together they would meet the Lord as He descends to the air. The word "meet" is the Greek apantesis. It has the thought of meeting with the idea of returning. Such is its meaning in Matt. xxv. 6, where the midnight cry exhorts the ten virgins to go out and meet the Bridegroom as he comes: also in Acts xxviii. 15, where the brethren go as far as the Apii Forum to meet Paul and return with him to Rome.

> "When a dignitary paid an official visit or parousia to a city in Hellenistic times, the action of the leading citizens in going out to meet him and escorting him on the final stage of his journey was called the apantesis" (F. F. Bruce, D.D.).

This is all in line with the hope of the Acts period. The one hope that dominates this period is Israel's hope (Acts xxvi. 6, 7; xxviii. 20). Rom. xv. 12, 13 links this hope with the millennial chapter of Isa. xi., making quite clear that it is to be realized on the earth. What more natural then, that those who share in it should return to the earth with the returning Lord and the holy angels, at the parousia He revealed so clearly in Matt. xxiv. 27-31?

I Thess. iv. 15-17 does not teach that these saints are on the way to heaven. There is not the slightest hint here, that, after descending into the air, the Lord takes them back to heaven or the heavenly Jerusalem, yet this idea is often supplied in the minds of believers who are not careful to check their conceptions with what God has written and revealed.

The Lord descends with a "shout" keleusma. This means 'the word of command' and note its one occurrence in the LXX (Prov. xxx. 27). "With the voice of the archangel." Scripture gives us his name—Michael (Jude 9) and in Dan. xii. 1 he is linked with Israel (the children of Daniel's people) and the Great Tribulation and this definitely fits the time described by the Lord in Matt. xxiv. and Israel's hope as we have seen. This is again confirmed by the next statement "and with the trumpet of God". I Cor. xv. 51-53 links the believer's hope in the Acts period with resurrection at the last trumpet. Now 'the last trumpet' presupposes a series, and the only series of trumpets in the N.T. are in the Book of Revelation. The 'last trumpet', the seventh, leads us to the same point as I Thess. iv., the realization of the kingdom of the Lord on the earth (Rev. xi. 15), which most clearly takes place at His parousia or Second Coming.

It is pathetic to see the efforts of some expositors who seek to dissociate 'the last trump' of I Cor. xv. from the seventh trumpet of the Revelation. This is obviously because they are confusing the 'things that differ' and seeking to make the hope of the period covered by the Acts, the hope of the church after the Acts as revealed in Paul's prison epistles, which is definitely not the parousia of Matt. xxiv. or I Thess. iv., with its earthly goal, but a hope that takes us to the glory of heaven's holiest of all.

No.6. v. 1 - 28.

Chapter v. commences with the words, "But of the times and the seasons, brethren, ye have no need that I write unto you (or better as R.V. 'that aught be written unto you')". Why? Because their calling and its hope had no connection with times or seasons? So some teach who see no difference between the position and hope of the churches formed during the Acts, and the church of the joint-Body revealed afterwards. But the reason given by the Apostle Paul is very different and perfectly simple—they knew already. "For yourselves know perfectly that the day of the Lord so cometh as a thief in the night." This they had most probably learned from his oral ministry. That he had given them detailed instruction verbally concerning the prophetic period known as the Day of the Lord and such happenings as the rise of the man of sin II Thess. ii. 15 makes clear.

They knew that the Day of the Lord would come suddenly and without warning as a thief in the night. This most important prophetic time has its first occurrence in the Scriptures in Isa. ii. 12 and there are nineteen other occurrences in the O.T. The N.T. has three direct references (I Thess. v. 2; II Thess. ii. 2; II Pet. iii. 10) and if we include Rev. i. 10 "the Lord's Day", we have four. The main theme is the exaltation of Jehovah over all the earth and the abasement of man (Isa. ii.). Now God is silent and man has all the say—it is "man's day". When God begins to take a direct hand in government of this world, resuming his dealings with Israel and intervenes in history by the Second Advent of Christ, "the Lord alone will be exalted in that day" (Isa. ii. 11, 17) and all opposition of men will be silenced. This is the prophetic time following this age of grace.

> "When they are saying, Peace and safety, then sudden destruction cometh upon them, as travail upon a woman with child: and they shall in no wise escape" (v. 3 R.V.).

Evidently the Apostle means the unbelieving world at large when he uses the word 'they'. The crying need of the world is peace and safety and never more so than with the generation in which we live. The threat of war and the ever mounting weapons of destruction devised by man make these themes of paramount importance. The prophetic Scriptures make it clear that, at the end of this age, Satan will produce a spurious world peace.

> "And the dragon (Satan) gave him (the Beast) his power and his throne and great authority . . . . . and the whole world wondered after the Beast; and they worshipped the dragon, because he gave his authority unto the Beast; and they worshiped the Beast, saying who is like unto the Beast; and who is able to war with him?" (Rev. xiii. 2-4).

Satan now has authority over the air (Eph. ii. 2) and whoever can control the aerial regions, dominates the earth. The Beast receives this Satanic power at the end time and so is able to guarantee peace in exchange for world worship. This is all part of the gigantic deception which characterizes the close of this age—world peace without Christ! Paul, however, reminds the Thessalonians that the enlightenment of the Truth has saved them from such deception and darkness.

> "But ye, brethren, are not in darkness, that that day should overtake you as a thief" (I Thess. v. 4).

He does not say this period would not overtake them, but that it would not find them unprepared and overtake them as a thief, which is a different matter. The Second Coming to the earth of the Lord Jesus would not only be the hope of the believer at this time, but would fall as a sudden catastrophic blow on an unbelieving world, just as Daniel portrays the stone cut without hands (the Lord Jesus) smashing the whole Image of Nebuchadnezzar (Gentile dominion) and destroying it completely. The Apostle goes on to remind them that they are 'sons of light' (verse 5 R.V.), and as such they must watch and be sober. He then once more brings in the three graces around which this epistle is woven.

This is only another way of 'putting on the Lord Jesus Christ' and making no provision for the flesh. There was no excuse for the instructed believer at this time becoming drowsy or unwatchful. He was exhorted to be on the alert continually and ready for the Lord's arrival. The word 'wake' of the A.V. in verse 10 is the same as 'watch' of verse 6 and should be so translated. The goal is the obtaining of salvation through our Lord Jesus Christ so that the believer 'should live together with Him', and this living and being with Him is once more linked by implication with His Return and not with death.

> "Wherefore encourage one another, and build each other up, even as also you are doing" (verse 11).

The Apostle lays great stress upon positive building up in the truth throughout his epistles (see Rom. xiv. 19; I Cor. xiv. 26; II Cor. xii. 19; Eph. iv. 11, 12, 15, 16, 29; Col. ii. 7). There can be no substitute for this, whether we are dealing with the Acts period or the present age. Where this is ignored, immaturity, spiritual weakness and ineffectiveness surely follow.

The Thessalonian believers are now exhorted to highly esteem their leaders.

> "But we beseech you, brethren, to know them that labour among you, and are over you in the Lord, and admonish you; and to esteem them exceeding highly in love for their work's sake" (verse 13 R.V.).

This is high commendation indeed, and it may be that the staunch and fruitful witness of this church was largely due to their faithful and enthusiastic leaders. Verses 14 and 15 may have been written for their guidance.

> "And we exhort you, brethren, admonish the disorderly, encourage the fainthearted, support the weak, be longsuffering toward all" (14 R.V.).

The word 'disorderly' ('unruly' A.V.) is ataktous which literally means 'those who do not remain in the ranks'. Dr. F. F. Bruce's note here is 'or those who play truant', referring to loafers (Moffatt) who neglected their daily duty and lived in idleness. Such would be a continual source of trouble and must be checked. There is a similar reference in II Thess. iii. 11, 12.

The Apostle now reminds them of the need for continual rejoicing, unceasing prayer and giving thanks, for this was the will of God for them, as it is for believers of all dispensations. This is the atmosphere in which the Christian life and witness should be lived and it is the only one in which it can flourish. The next injunctions relate specially to Pentecost gifts.

> "Quench not the Spirit. Despise not prophesyings. Prove all things. Hold fast that which is good" (19, 20).

The special gifts which were peculiar to the Acts period are made clear in I Cor. xii. They were given by the Holy Spirit and distributed to believers as He willed. The gift of prophecy was one of them, hence it was not so much the Holy Spirit who could be quenched, but the special gift he had given. "The spirits of the prophets are subject to the prophets" (I Cor. xiv. 32). No one was compelled by irresistible power to use whatever gift had been given. It could be neglected and therefore 'quenched'. The warning not to 'quench the Spirit' was specially related to believers living in the period covered by the Acts of the Apostles. Not only could these gifts be quenched, they could be counterfeited and so the Thessalonian saints are warned to 'prove all things'.

These sign gifts were not an unmixed blessing, for they gave the Enemy an opportunity of doing his clever work of copying and imitating the work of God in order to deceive. Those today who long for them back should remember this and the dangers attached to them. For ourselves, we are thankful to realize that we belong to a calling where there are none, but every blessing is spiritual and connected with riches beyond dreams associated with the Lord Jesus at the right hand of God (Eph. i. 3, 18; iii. 16-19).

> "Hold fast that which is good. Abstain from every appearance (form R.V.) of evil" (21).

These two commands are evidently complimentary. Eidos evil has at least two meanings: (1) outward appearance; (2) kind. The A.V. leans to (1); the R.V. to (2). Both meanings are suitable to the context. Holding fast that which is good must necessarily exclude all evil whether in appearance or fact.

The epistle continues:

> "And the God of peace Himself sanctify you wholly; and may your spirit and soul and body be preserved entire, without blame at the Coming of our Lord Jesus Christ" (23, 24 R.V.).

We have the God of peace in Rom. xv. 33, Phil. iv. 9 and in this context. Peace with God and the peace of God is wonderful, but the Giver must ever be greater than His gift! Here He is the Sanctifier, setting apart believers to His will, and guarding them, the Second Coming of the Lord being in view all the time, for, as we have seen this hope dominates the epistle. It is doubtful whether verse 23 can be interpreted as teaching a tripartite nature for man. Mark xii. 30 could be used to teach a fourfold nature for man, but would be straining the context so to do. The Apostle is not aiming to set forth a tripartite nature. His object is clear; he is desiring that each believer should be preserved alive and blameless to the Lord's Coming back to the earth.

> "Faithful is He that calleth you, who also will do (or perform) it" (24).

Paul is assured of the mighty power of God who can accomplish all this. The epistle closes with a request for prayer by the Apostle for himself. He puts his own needs last, just as he does in Ephesians (Eph. vi. 19). It is so good to realize that this great servant of Christ was not so strong and independent that he could disregard the intercessory ministry of others on his behalf. Prayer along the lines of the Lord's will, makes a difference as Phil. i. 19 and Philemon 22, clearly show. Here is service for the Saviour that is often disregarded perhaps because there is nothing to show for it externally. Those who assess Christian work by what they call 'results' may not be greatly drawn to such a hidden ministry. But a ministry it is and one of vast importance in whatever age we deal with. God's people are not like mechanical toys, wound up, as it were, by Him and forced in all they do day by day. The private prayer life of each one of us reflects accurately our spiritual condition and practical response to God's Truth.

Paul concludes by charging the Thessalonians that this epistle be read to all the believers in the assembly.

> "I charge you by the Lord that this epistle be read unto all the holy brethren. The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you" (27, 28).

The word 'charge' is horkizo 'to cause someone to swear or take an oath'. The R.V. following the critical Greek texts has the strengthened form of enorkizo translating it 'adjure'. There was evidently an important reason why Paul uses this solemn word to urge that this letter be read to everyone belonging to the Thessalonian church, though it is difficult for us to decide today exactly what it was. Possibly the reason was for those who were unruly, so that they should hear his warnings.

And so we come to the end of the epistle of "faith, hope and love", wherein is recorded a faith that was constantly growing, a hope that burned all the brighter because of the possibility of the Lord's early return, and a love which showed itself by responding and making the most of the time that was left in spreading the Gospel and the wonders of God’s redeeming grace.

The SECOND Epistle to the THESSALONIANS

No.1. i. 1 - 9.
pp. 124 - 128

The second letter to the Thessalonians, like the first, is addressed to the church of the Thessalonians by Paul, Silvanus and Timothy. It was evidently sent not long after the first letter, possibly from Corinth. When the Apostle send a second letter to a church, it was normally to correct misunderstanding arising from the first letter, or an expansion of some aspect of truth that had not been fully understood. We have seen that the first letter revolves around the graces of 'faith, hope and love'. Both faith and love are mentioned in the introduction to this second letter.

> "We are bound to thank God always for you, brethren, as it is meet, because that your faith groweth exceedingly, and the charity (love) of every one of you all toward each other aboundeth" (i. 3).

But as we read on we find that hope is missing, and it was largely because some had misunderstood his teaching concerning the Lord's Second Coming, possibly being misled by a spurious epistle purporting to come from him (ii. 2), that the Apostle writes this second epistle as a corrective.

Before we go any further, we set out the structure of the epistle as a whole:

II Thessalonians.

A | i. 1, 2. Grace and peace.
B | a | i. 3-10. Bound to thank. Counted Worthy.
b | i. 11, 12. Prayer for you. Work of faith.
c | ii. 1-12. We beseech. Man of lawlessness, his coming and deception.
B | a | ii. 13-15. Bound to thank. Obtaining the glory.
b | ii. 16 - iii. 5. Pray for us. Good work.
c | iii. 6-15. We command. Disorderliness.
A | iii. 16-18. Peace and grace.

The outstanding section is B | c | ii. 1-12 dealing with the coming of the man of lawlessness, the son of perdition and the lying miracles whereby he accomplishes mass deception. The whole subject is compressed because Paul had dealt with it in detail when he was with the Thessalonian saints. He reminds them of this (ii. 15), and it is the compression of a complicated prophetic subject that makes this passage one of the most difficult to interpret in the N.T.

Coming back to chapter i., the Apostle highly commends them for their courageous endurance in persecution, which was a proof of the genuineness of their faith:

> ". . . . . we ourselves glory (boast) in you in the churches of God for your patience and faith in all your persecutions and tribulations which ye endure" (i. 4).

Anechesthe, ye endure, is in the present tense, you are enduring, showing that the persecution was still going on when Paul wrote. He was greatly cheered as he saw this practical demonstration of the reality of their faith, the faith that keeps steadfast under suffering. In the first letter he had reminded them that this was part of God's will for them.

> "that no man should be moved by these afflictions; for yourselves know that we are appointed thereunto", so that they might be 'counted worthy of the Kingdom of God, for which ye also suffer' (II Thess. ii. 5). Tribulation is the translation of thlipsis which is used four times either as a noun or verb in this context (verses 4, 6 and 7). It is difficult to bring this over into English as we have no verb associated with the word tribulation. If we render thlipsis 'oppression', then somewhat literally we have:

> "Seeing it is a righteous thing with God to recompense oppression to those who oppress you. And to you who are oppressed, rest with us at the apocalypse (revelation) of the Lord Jesus from heaven with His might angels . . . . ."

The R.V. preserves the insistence on these words by translating thlipsis 'affliction', "if so be that it is a righteous thing with God to recompense affliction to them that afflict you, and to you that are afflicted rest with us . . . . ." There is an even-handed justice being worked out here. The suffering endured by the Thessalonian believers would be meted out by the Lord to their persecutors and this, said the Apostle, was a righteous thing. The Lord's apocalypse or revelation is brought before them as the final solution of their sufferings. Then, after all the tension and affliction, there would be relaxation and rest.

> "And to you that are afflicted rest with us at the revelation of the Lord Jesus from heaven with the angels of His power, in flaming fire, rendering vengeance to them that know not God, and to them that obey not the gospel of our Lord Jesus" (7-9 R.V.).

Anesis, rest, is a vivid word which means release from tension, a sudden ending to all the testing and persecution. This apocalypse is the same event as described in Rev. xix., Matt. xxiv. 25, 31, (see also I Cor. i. 7; I Pet. i. 7, 13). It is not possible to introduce a secret coming in any of these passages. Those who do so bring confusion into the context. Nor is it sound exposition to try and make the coming, parousia, the personal arrival or presence of the Lord detailed in I Thess. iv., different from His revelation here. In I Thessalonians believers are waiting for the Son from heaven and this is bound up with the Parousia. The same believers are told in II Thessalonians that they would obtain rest from suffering at the Lord's revelation from heaven with His mighty angels, therefore these two terms must refer to the same event, which Matt. xxv. 31 links with His arrival on the earth with power and great majesty, the King of kings and Lord of lords of Rev. xix. The Thessalonian saints could not have had two different phases of the Lord's descent from His present glory as their hope at one and the same time.

The revelation of the Lord Jesus not only meant deliverance and vindication for the saints of the Acts period, but judgment on their enemies, those who know not God and obey not the gospel. 'Taking vengeance' in verse 8 is literally giving vengeance. The R.V. translates rendering vengeance. Ekdikesis, vengeance, is a late Greek word from ekdikeo to vindicate, or give justice. This is not the action of a revengeful God, but a God of justice bringing retribution upon those ensnared in the lie of Babylonianism at the end time, so graphically described in the book of Revelation. These shall 'suffer punishment', diken tisousin. Tisousin is the future of an old verb tino and occurs only here in the N.T. It means literally to pay compensation for a wrong done, to pay penalty. Dike is right or justice, and was the name of the heathen goddess of Justice or Nemesis. The phrase is therefore 'a penalty shall pay' and this is described as olethron aionion, literally age-long ruin.

Olethros occurs three more times in the N.T. and wise are we if we let these references colour our theology and not vice versa.

> "To deliver such an one to Satan for the destruction of the flesh (not the whole person)" (I Cor. v. 5).
> "When they shall say, peace and safety, then sudden destruction cometh upon them" (I Thess. v. 3).
> ". . . . . many foolish and hurtful lusts which drown men in destruction and perdition" (I Tim. vi. 9).

In none of these cases can eternal conscious suffering be substituted. In the first case the 'destruction' only applies to the flesh, but the spirit is saved in the day of the Lord Jesus (I Cor. v. 5). The verse in I Thessalonians does not teach that hell-fire suddenly comes to those on the earth who say 'peace and safety'. The eternal future of such is settled later at the day of judgment. In the third reference Paul is warning believers against seeking to be rich and the snares that come from such a course of action. Note the figurative language used—drown not burn men in destruction. We must be careful to understand olethros as a result and not a process, and consider it in the light of such statements as "eternal judgment" (Heb. vi. 2 not eternal judging); eternal salvation (Heb. v. 9 not eternal saving). It is the eternal or better age-long effect of an act or state that is stressed. Olethros aionios occurs nowhere else in the N.T. but it is found in 4Maccabees10:15 'the eternal destruction of the tyrant' i.e. Antiochus Epiphanes, which likewise does not support the popular conception of hell.

Concerning aionios, Dr. A. T. Robertson says "aionios in itself only means age-long and the papyri and inscriptions give it in the weakened sense of a Caesar's life (see Milligan)" Word Pictures in the N.T. We believe Dr. Weymouth did the right thing in his N.T. translation rendering aion and aionios as age and age-long, and this is in line with the contemporary Greek of N.T. times. Much light can be gained by seeing the revelation of the great span of time sub-divided into ages in the Bible, and all this is lost if eternal and eternity is substituted. In no way is our future as believers jeopardized, for such a future does not depend upon a word like aion, but rests on the glorious fact that the redeemed are permanently united to the risen Saviour who can die no more. "Because I live, ye shall live also", He said. "Christ being raised from the dead dieth no more; death hath no more dominion over Him" (Rom. vi. 9). Nor is this limited meaning of aion and aionios invalidated because it is used of God and salvation. While the phrase 'the eternal God' sounds very majestic, and 'the eonian God' or the 'God of the ages' seems a poor substitute, yet this is nearer Scriptural truth, for this adjective does not touch or describe the being or attributes of God; rather that He is the origin or creator of the great span of time, during which He is working out His great redemptive purposes. Heb. i. 2 tells us that through Christ the ages were made (not 'world' as A.V.), and Isa. ix. 6 agrees with this, describing literally the Child that is born as the 'Father (i.e. Origin) of the ages', not 'everlasting Father' (A.V.). Christ is the God of the ages, the eonian God, and it is the ages that span the Bible. Because there are so vast and long that we cannot see their end, we have no right to assume they are the same as eternity.

Eternity can definitely be predicated both of God and the believer, but this is not explained in Biblical revelation, and it matters not how much the words 'eternal' and 'eternity' are rolled on the tongue, the fact is that we know absolutely nothing of the eternal state for the simple reason that God has not seen fit to reveal it. Evidently it is too much for our present limited understanding and we are far wiser to keep to the exact statements of Holy Writ and not let our imagination run away with us into idle speculation and guesswork.

There is a false argument based upon the word aionios that is sometimes used by evangelicals concerning Matt. xxv. 46, "And these (the goat nations living at the time of the Lord's Return) shall go away into everlasting punishment, but the righteous into life eternal". 'Everlasting' and 'eternal' here are translations of aionios and should be consistently rendered by one word as the R.V. attempts to do. The reasoning above mentioned is along these lines: the believer's life is eternal; the same word is used of the unbeliever and therefore the punishment of such must also be eternal and this is usually held as meaning eternal conscious torment and suffering too terrible for the human mind to comprehend.

On the surface this may look like sound reasoning, but there are at least three fallacies underlying such a conception. (1) First of all it must be proved from Scriptural usage that kolasis, punishment, means eternal conscious suffering. See its only other occurrence in the N.T. in I John iv. 18 ('torment'), and carefully note whether it applies to the saved or the unsaved. (2) This idea assumes that what a limited number of mankind receive at the Second Advent, i.e. certain nations living at this time, is true of all unbelievers from Adam onward and so makes this judgment God's assize for all the unsaved, assuming the resurrection of the wicked, whereas no resurrection is mentioned in the context. This is confusing this judgment with that of the Great White Throne (Rev. xx.). (3) A false deduction is made from translating aionios as eternal, whereas in both cases aionios should be more accurately rendered age-long, leaving what is beyond in the hands of Him who not only made the ages, but who is bringing His 'plan of the ages' (so the literal rendering of Eph. iii. 11) with its age-long salvation, to a glorious finish, and then will follow the now incomprehensible wonders of eternity.

No.2. i. 10 - ii. 5.
pp. 145 - 149

After describing the apocalypse of the Lord from heaven to the earth with His mighty angels, a stupendous event which is referred to in Luke ix. 26, ". . . . . when He shall come in His own glory, and in His Father's, and of the holy angels", and also Matt. xxiv. 29-31, xxv. 31, the Apostle Paul refers to it as 'rest' for the believer, who belongs to the company of the saved of the Acts period, and age-long destruction or deprivation from the face of the Lord for those who know not God and obey not the gospel (II Thess. i. 9). Professor F. F. Bruce's note here is "Everlasting destruction, i.e. the destruction of the age to come, with decisive implication of finality. It consists of exclusion from the presence of the Lord, with whom alone is 'the fountain of life'."

The next two verses are better given in the R.V.:

> ". . . . . when He shall come to be glorified in His saints, and to be marveled at in all them that believed (because our testimony unto you was believed) in that day. To which end we also pray always for you, that our God may count you worthy of your calling, and fulfil every desire of goodness and every work of faith, with power; that the Name of our Lord Jesus may be glorified in you, and ye in Him, according to the grace of our God and the Lord Jesus Christ."

The glorifying and exalting of the Lord Jesus is the subject of this section. Paul longs that the Name of the Saviour shall be glorified in the present experience of these Thessalonian believers and not only this, but he directs their minds forward to His Second Advent when He shall be more fully glorified in them and marveled at by each one as they see Him at last in all His wonder and majesty returning as King of kings and Lord of lords to take control and be vindicated and exalted in the earth that once rejected Him. These words describe an overwhelming experience, as the realization of the hope of every calling of God's people must surely do, and it was sufficient to enable these sufferings saints to hold fast and endure to the end and so practically exhibit the fact that they had been counted worthy of their calling and of the Kingdom of God for which they were suffering (verses 5 and 11).

In chapter ii. the Apostle comes closer to the difficulties that were troubling some of them, causing them to have a wrong conception of their hope and the events leading up to the Lord's Second Advent:

> "Now we beseech you, brethren, touching the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, and our gathering together unto Him: to the end that ye be not quickly shaken from your mind, nor yet be troubled, either by spirit, or by word, or by epistle as from us, as that the day of the Lord is now present" (II Thess. ii. 1, 2 R.V.).

Paul's subject is still the Lord's Coming, not 'by the Coming' as the A.V. but 'touching the Coming' as the R.V. translates. Here he uses the word parousia instead of apocalupsis of i. 7, showing that these words describe the same glorious event. By the overruling of the Spirit of God both these words are kept to the Gospels and the Acts and the epistles written by the apostles of the circumcision, Peter and John. They do not describe the hope of the Body of Christ as revealed in Paul's prison letters. This church as a heavenly company, has a heavenly hope, one that is realized in the heaven of heavens where Christ is enthroned, and so the aspect of the Lord's return to the earth, described in the early Thessalonian epistles, is not its hope and we must not import into these epistles something that was going to be revealed through Paul the prisoner later on.

"Our gathering together unto Him" episunagoge. This word contains the word 'synagogue' in its make-up and occurs only once more in the N.T. namely Heb. x. 25. In its verbal form it occurs seven times (Matt. xxiii. 37; xxiv. 31; Mark i. 33; xiii. 27; Luke xii. 1; xiii. 34). The 'gathering together' here is a reference back to I Thess. iv. 17, the 'catching away' to meet the Lord in the air. The Apostle now puts his finger upon the causes which were misleading and upsetting some of the saints. He is concerned lest they are 'shaken in' their minds and 'troubled'. Saleuo, shaken, means to agitate, to cause to totter like a reed (Matt. xi. 7), or the earth being shaken (Heb. xii. 26). Throeomai (from throos, clamour, tumult) means 'to be in a state of nervous excitement' (A.T. Robertson). In both cases this state of mind played into the hands of the enemy who is always trying to undermine the peace and the confidence of the believer. 'Either by spirit, or by word, or by epistle as from us.' Here were the means Satan was using—false revelation from evil spirits, travestying the spiritual gifts of prophecy and utterance that had been directly given to some by the Holy Spirit (I Cor. xii.); or a supposed 'word' or remark by the Apostle; or a spurious epistle purporting to come from him. By these means the assertion was made that 'the day of the Lord is now present' (verse 2 R.V. with the best Greek texts). Not 'the day of Christ' as A.V. but the great prophetic Lord's Day of the O.T., a day when God will intervene in this world's affairs in judgment. The first occurrence of this prophetic period is in Isa. ii. 12, 17, 19 (see also Isa. xiii. 6-13; Jer. xlvi. 10; Joel i. 15; ii. 1, 2; iii. 14; Amos v. 18-20). Some commentators make the mistake of using the day of the Lord and the Second Advent of Christ as interchangeable terms. Consequently, because Paul here definitely teaches that the day of the Lord was not yet present and that certain prophetic events must first take place, they assert that the Second Coming of Christ was not imminent or possible, and that the Apostle did not teach such a thing. But he most surely did, and so did Peter, James and John in their epistles written during this period.

> "The end of all things is at hand" (I Pet. iv. 7).
> "The Coming of the Lord draweth nigh . . . . . the Judge standeth before the door" (v. 7-9).
> "It is the last time (literally the last hour), even now are there many antichrists, whereby we know that it is the last time (hour)" (I John ii. 18).

To these passages must be added the following in I Corinthians, Romans, and Hebrews:

> ". . . . . so that ye come behind in no gift; waiting for the Coming of our Lord Jesus Christ" (I Cor. i. 6, 7).
> ". . . . . the time is short; it remaineth that both they that have wives be as though they had none" (vii. 29, Yet after the Acts period the Apostle urges widows to marry—I Tim. v. 14).

"Now these things happened unto them by way of ensample; and they are written for our admonition, upon whom the ends of the ages are come (literally, the ends of the ages have arrived)" (x. 11).

"Maranatha: the Lord cometh" (xvi. 22 margin).

"The God of peace shall bruise Satan under your feet shortly" (Rom. xvi. 20).

"The night is far spent, the day is at hand" (xiii. 12).

The combined testimony of these passages is clear and definite. Believers at this time were being exhorted to avoid anything that would entangle or become a weight in view of the nearness of the Lord's Coming, even to the extent of avoiding marriage. They were encouraged to hold fast during persecution because it might be 'only a little while' and the Lord would come back and that would mean deliverance. No one would have been helped to endure the discipline of suffering at that time by being pointed to an event that is even yet future to us. They might have been pointed to the Lord's strengthening grace to assist them, but hardly to His Second Advent, if that event was not going to be realized until some 2,000 years later! The Apostle did not assert that the Second Coming of the Lord was fixed in the counsels of God to take place in the lifetime of believers then living, but of its possibility, the only 'if' being the 'if' of Israel's repentance and conversion (Acts iii. 19-26), which fact had been proclaimed publicly by the Apostle Peter. We need to avoid the two extremes of viewpoint, both of which are erroneous: (1) that neither Paul or the other N.T. writers taught that the Lord's coming was imminent; (2) that the Second Advent would definitely take place at that time. Let us remember that what 'draws near' can withdraw, if the Lord sees fit and His conditions are not realized. As with the earthly Kingdom purposes, so with the visible Return of the Lord, which is so intimately connected with its setting up, this too could be proclaimed as being 'near', if Israel obeyed the Divine command to repent and turn back to God, or to be withdrawn if they refused to do so.

Paul now states that the prophetic Day of the Lord would not take place until certain events had first occurred. They are (1) the apostasy; (2) the revelation of the man of sin, the son of perdition. We must not make the mistake of thinking that a long time must elapse before this was possible, or that these happenings would occupy a long period in running their course. The stage was already set in the Acts period for such conditions to develop. An age that could produce a monster like Nero could surely produce the wild Beast of Rev. xiii. and the episode of Herod in royal apparel, taking Divine honours (Acts xii.), is only a picture of events that this chapter in the Revelation also describes. The Apostle wrote:

"Let no man beguile you in any wise: for it (the Day of the Lord) will not be, except the falling away (apostasy) come first, and the man of sin be revealed, the son of perdition, he that opposeth and exalteth himself against all that is called God or that is worshiped; so that he sitteth in the temple of God, setting himself forth as God. Remember ye not, that when I was yet with you, I told you these things?" (II Thess. ii. 3-6 R.V.).

There commences now a passage of Scripture that is exceedingly difficult to interpret. It has been called by expositors 'the little Apocalypse' because it gives much of the teaching of the Book of the Revelation in compressed form, the reason being that Paul had expounded the subject to them in his oral ministry and therefore there was no need for minute detail when he wrote to them. We of course have not the Apostle's spoken ministry which doubtless treated the subject fully, and in this we are handicapped. The only sure help we can get is by comparing Scripture with Scripture and seeking the Holy Spirit's aid in understanding, and if we have this we have all that is necessary, although we may not be able to fully understand all that is latent in this passage.

Just as the Lord Jesus, when dealing with events leading up to His Second Advent, as recorded in Matt. xxiv., warned his followers against being deceived (verses 4, 6, 24), so the Apostle here warns the Thessalonian believers lest they should be 'beguiled' (3). Prophecy has always been the happy hunting ground of the spiritual charlatan and utmost caution is necessary when we seek to expound or understand it. If we take care to keep exactly to what Scripture says we cannot go wrong. The theories of the various prophetic schools need not bother us provided that we have the solid ground of revealed truth, with due regard to context, under our feet.

Paul now states explicitly that the Day of the Lord cannot take place until the apostasy sets in. The words 'falling away' are a rendering of the Greek apostasia a late form of apostasis. The LXX uses it for 'rebellion' in Josh. xxii. 22. It is also used in the Apocrypha concerning Antiochus Epiphanes who was enforcing the apostasy from Judaism to Hellenism. The only other occurrence of the word in the N.T. is found in Acts xxi. 21,

". . . . . thou teachest all the Jews which are among the Gentiles to forsake Moses . . . . ."

The thought behind the word is 'revolt' or 'rebellion', a willful departure from truth and this is obviously in direct contrast to the conception that the world is going to get better and better before Christ returns. Practically every context in the N.T. that deals with conditions prior to the Second Advent, portrays these as being utterly dark and unrelieved in gloom and departure from the Lord and Christian standards. This accords too with the teaching concerning the Day of the Lord in the O.T. Such a condition, the Apostle stated, will set in before the Day of the Lord. The next event would be the revelation of the man of sin, the son of perdition. Apokalupto, to reveal, gives us the word 'apocalypse' and occurs in verses 3, 6 and 8. It is the same word that is used of the revelation of Jesus Christ, the Lord's Second Advent, either as a noun or a verb, by both Peter and Paul (I Cor. i. 7; I Pet. i. 7, 13; iv. 13). It literally means to 'unveil' and we see that all the great happenings connected with the Lord's Return are travestied by Satan, the Cross and the Resurrection (Rev. xiii. 3, 12; xvii. 8) and here the Second Coming.

The phrase, 'the son of perdition', has already been used by the Lord of Judas Iscariot (John xvii. 12) and some have taught that the man of sin is Judas Iscariot resurrected. We do not think there is sufficient Scriptural evidence for this, but the man of sin is possibly one of the two Satanic personages of Rev. xiii. portrayed there as wild beasts.

Some have interpreted this passage as relating to the Emperor Gaius, who in 40A.D. attempted to have his statue set up in the Temple at Jerusalem. However, this was only one of the end-time characteristics of the Acts period which we have before sought to show. It certainly did not fulfil II Thess. ii. 4. In his great discourse on the mount of Olives as recorded in Matt. xxiv., one of the events described by the Lord Jesus as a forerunner to His Second Advent, is the 'abomination of desolation' (Matt. xxiv. 15). This marks the beginning of the great time of persecution, known as the Great Tribulation, and the faithful Jewish remnant are warned to escape to the mountains as quickly as possible.

Certain it is that the Satan inspired world dictator of the end of this age will seek Divine honours and will receive them from the majority of the world's inhabitants (Rev. xiii. 3, 4, 8), the book of the Revelation making it clear that it is Satan who finally receives this worship which he has been scheming for since his fall.

No.3. ii. 6 - 12.

We now approach a section of the second chapter of II Thessalonian which bristles with difficulties in interpretation. We give it in the R.V. (ii. 6-9):

> "And now ye know that which restraineth, to the end that he may be revealed in his own season. For the mystery of lawlessness doth already work: only there is one that restraineth now, until he be taken out of the way. And then shall be revealed the lawless one, whom the Lord Jesus shall slay with the breadth of his mouth, and bring to nought by the manifestation of His Coming; even he, whose coming is according to the working of Satan with all power and signs and lying wonders."

It is obvious from this passage that someone or something is restraining or keeping in check the revelation of the man of sin. There have been varying explanations of this, such as:

(1) The Roman Empire,
(2) The Holy Spirit,
(3) The Jewish State.

Regarding (1) there is an element of truth in it. Early in the Apostle's experience, the imperial power had protected him rather than hindered his message. As we have seen, it was his own nation, Israel that continually opposed and persecuted him. On more than one occasion, Paul had reason to be grateful to the Roman authorities who restrained the forces which opposed the truth as proclaimed by him. But very soon Rome was to produce that monster Nero, who many of the early Christians identified with the Beast. Nero came on the scene before the Apostle Paul finished his witness, exhibiting the very traits of the godless dictator of the end-time, and so Rome could hardly be the fulfillment of this passage which deals with the restraining of the man of lawlessness and his fearful deeds. In any case the Roman Empire has long since passed away and the lawless one has not been revealed.

(2) The Holy Spirit. Some evangelical expositors adopt this view, but when one asks what Scriptural support exists for it, one is met with a blank, for there is none. It is assumed that when the Church is raptured, the Holy Spirit departs from the earth, but if this is true, it means that believer such as the faithful Jewish remnant, who will have to live through this dread period, are left without the Holy Spirit's aid! The Lord Jesus described it as a time of 'great tribulation, such as hath not been from the beginning of the world until now, no, nor ever shall be. And except those days had been shortened, no flesh would have been saved' (Matt. xxiv. 21, 22 R.V). In other words, it is the most terrible and desperate time of trouble in all the world's history. If ever those who determine to be faithful whatever the cost, even life itself, will need the Holy Spirit, it is at such a time. We reject such an interpretation as completely lacking in Scriptural support and unthinkable.

(3) The Jewish State. B. B. Warfield adopts this view. He writes:

> "So soon as the Jewish apostasy was complete and Jerusalem given over to the Gentiles . . . . . the separation of Christianity from Judaism, which had already begun, became evident to every eye; the conflict between the new faith and heathenism, culminating in and now alive almost only in Emperor-worship, became intense; and the persecuting power of the empire was inevitably let loose." (Biblical and Theological Studies).

But, as we have seen, the bulk of the Jewish nation was no restrainer of evil, very much the opposite, 'All the day long did I spread out my hands unto a disobedient and gainsaying people' (Rom. x. 21 R.V.) is God's comment on Israel's attitude to him and His attitude to them during the Acts period.

There is yet another interpretation of this difficult passage which has the merit of finding the explanation in the words of Scripture, which after all is the only safe way. First of all let us note that the verb translated 'withhold' in verse 6 and 'let' in verse 7 is the same in the Greek and is katecho. The R.V. renders it in each case 'restrain'. Katecho means 'to hold firmly, to hold fast', and occurs nineteen times in the N.T. We have not space to quote in full each of these references, but we give a representative selection, leaving it to the searcher for truth to investigate all of them by means of a concordance:

> "Who hold the truth in unrighteousness" (Rom. i. 18).
> "Being dead wherein we were held" (Rom. vii. 6).
> "And yet possessing all things" (II Cor. vi. 10).
> "Hold fast that which is good" (I Thess. v. 21).
> "Whom I would have retained with me" (Philemon 13).
> "If we hold fast the confidence" (Heb. iii. 6).
> "If we hold the beginning" (Heb. iii. 14).
> "Let us hold fast the profession" (Heb. x. 23).

"Hold fast" is therefore a good rendering of this Greek word. But we may ask 'what is it that holds fast the man of sin, and who is it that holds something fast' (verse 7), for katecho is a transitive verb and must have an object. It is omitted by the Figure Ellipsis and should be supplied to complete the sense. The answer to our first question is found in Rev. ix. 1, 2 and xi. 7. The man of sin, that Satan inspired personage, is held fast by the 'bottomless pit' or better 'abyss' as rendered by the R.V., until the 'appointed season' or time of his manifestation to the world.

The second question finds its solution in Satan, who holds fast to his possessions in the aerial regions (see Eph. ii. 2) until he is taken out of the way or removed. How this happens Rev. xii. 7-17 describes. There is war in heaven; Michael and his angels fight against Satan and the fallen angels under his control, and the Deceiver is cast down to the earth with terrible results, leading to the Great Tribulation. When this happens, as a last desperate throw, Satan calls up his man from the abyss, and for a short time he dominates the whole world, Satan receiving, as we have seen, world worship through the Beast.

All this Paul must have explained in detail to the Thessalonian believers, for he says, "Remember ye not, that when I was yet with you, I told you these things?" Taking note of what we have seen of the usage of katecho, the following verses may be rendered as follows with explanations in brackets:

> "And now ye know what holds him (the lawless one) fast, to the end that he may be revealed in his own appointed season (this is the abyss). For the secret of lawlessness already works; only there is one (Satan) who now holds fast (to the aerial regions), until he is taken out of way (i.e. cast out into the earth, Rev. xii. 9-12) and then shall be revealed that lawless one whom the Lord Jesus shall slay with the spirit (or breath) of His mouth, and bring to nought by the brightness (epiphaneia) of His coming."

The Apostle, describing the destruction of the lawless one evidently has Isa. xi. 4 in mind.

> "He shall smite the earth (or the oppressor) with the rod of His mouth, and with the breath of His lips, shall He slay the wicked (one)."

It takes the glory of the Lord's Coming and His almighty power to destroy this superhuman being. We believe it will be beyond the capacity of man to do this. furthermore it explains why the O.T. Scriptures, such as the prophecy of Daniel, deal somewhat mysteriously with his end. In Dan. xi. 44, 45 R.V. we read:

> "But tidings out of the east and out of the north shall trouble him: and he shall go forth with great fury to destroy and utterly to make away many. And he shall plant the tents of his palace between the sea and the glorious holy mountain; yet he shall come to his end, and none shall help him", but the prophet does not describe how he comes to his end. That is left to II Thess. to reveal.

Paul uses the word epiphaneia here which gives us our English word epiphany. He uses it in an adjectival way with the word parousia, which, as we have seen, is the characteristic word to describe the hope of the Acts period, the Lord's arrival back on this earth in power and great glory. Parousia is not used again by the Apostle after Acts xxviii., but epiphaneia is, standing by itself from this point onwards, and usually rendered ‘appearing’, to set forth the new hope of the Body of Christ which is connected not with the air, but with the glory of the highest heaven where the Lord is now enthroned, and this church is seen positionally in Him (Eph. ii. 6). II Thess. ii. 8 is the only occurrence of epiphaneia before Acts xxviii., and then it is not used in a parallel way, but as an adjective describing the magnificence of the Lord’s Second Advent as He descends to the earth. The wonder of the revelation of His glory in heaven’s holiest of all to which the hope of the Body is linked, is beyond the power of words to adequately describe. It needs the illumination of the Holy Spirit (Eph. i. 17, 18), for it is far beyond all things earthly.

We note that Paul, under the guidance of the same Holy Spirit, does not hesitate to use parousia for the coming of the lawless one.

> “Even he, whose coming (parousia) is according to the working of Satan, with all power, and signs and wonders of a lie (literally).”

Satan is no creator, but he is a marvelous imitator. It could appear that he copies or travesties the basic truths of Christianity to ensnare and deceive the whole world at the time of the end. Christ’s death, resurrection and coming again are copied by Satan acting through the Beast:

> “And I saw one of his heads as though it had been smitten unto death; and his death stroke was healed: and the whole earth wondered after the beast” (Rev. xiii. 3 R.V.).
> “The beast that thou sawest, was and is not; and is about to come up out of the abyss . . . . . and they that dwell on the earth shall wonder, they whose name hath not been written in the book of life from the foundation of the world, when they behold the beast, how that he was, and is not, and shall come” (Rev. xvii. 8 R.V.).

Even the word of II Thess. ii. 9 describing the advent of the lawless one are used directly of the Holy Spirit and His miraculous gifts:

> “God also bearing them witness, both with signs and wonders and with divers miracles and gifts of the Holy Ghost, according to His own will” (Heb. ii. 4).

All these Satanic happenings are the climax of the evil system described in the Word of God as the lie, originating from the Deceiver at his fall, and in direct conflict with God and the truth as personified in Christ. The great battle of the ages now leaves its ‘mystery’ form or secret working and comes right out into the open. There are two mysteries or secrets allied to these opposing forces and both are resolved in a person. The Beast, when manifested on the earth in his appointed time, is Satan personified (Rev. xiii.), or Satan’s Messiah, or the mystery of lawlessness revealed. In opposition to this we have the Lord Jesus Christ, Who is the Mystery or Secret of God (Col. ii. 2 R.V.). Those who think that miracles are necessarily a proof that a deed is of Divine origin are going to fare very badly at this period of history. Satan, to a certain point, can work miracles, but they are lying miracles with one object—to deceive. How great this deception will be can now be appreciated and the need realized, of the Lord’s warning when He was dealing with this very time:

> “For there shall arise false Christs, and false prophets, and shall show great signs and wonders; so as to lead astray, if possible, even the elect” (Matt. xxiv. 24 R.V.).

The Apostle confirms this with the words:

> "And with all deceit of unrighteousness for them that are perishing; because they received not the love of the truth, that they might be saved. And for this cause God sendeth them a working of error, that they should believe a lie (Greek, the lie); that they all might be judged who believed not the truth, but had pleasure in unrighteousness" (II Thess. ii. 10-12 R.V.).

Having been deceived by Satan's miracles, these dupes willingly accept the lie, which is his system of evil directed against Christ, and they reject the truth and so bring themselves under God's judgment. They act like the early nations 'who exchanged the truth of God for the lie' (Rom. i. 25). At last, Satan gets what he has been scheming for since his fall, the worship of the world, aspiring to the position of God, Who alone has the right to receive this.

But for what a short period he triumphs! At the most it can be 3½ years, the last half of Daniel's 70th week of years, and then the return of the Lord Jesus Christ as King of kings and Lord of lords shatters this ghastly nightmare, destroys the man of sin and the Deceiver is taken and shut up for a 1,000 years (Rev. xx. 3) in the abyss. Such are the momentous events which must have been explained by the Apostle Paul in his spoken ministry to the Thessalonian believers. Today we can only piece it together by comparing Scripture with Scripture and seeking the Spirit's guidance.

No.4. ii. 13 - iii. 6.
pp. 215 - 219

We now commence another section of the epistle which balances i. 3-10 in the structure thus:

B | a | i. 3-10. Bound to thank. Counted Worthy.
B | a | ii. 13-15. Bound to thank. Obtaining the glory.

The Apostle, as he thinks of the Thessalonian believers with their loyalty and zeal in making known the truth, says:

> "But we are bound to give thanks always to God for you, brethren beloved of the Lord, because God hath from the beginning chosen you to salvation through sanctification of the Spirit and belief of the truth: whereunto He called you by our gospel, to the obtaining of the glory of our Lord Jesus Christ" (II Thess. ii. 13, 14).

Paul evidently felt a debt to the Lord of thanksgiving for this church's wholehearted response to the truth. Then, as He thinks of God's purpose, he goes back to the 'beginning' and forward to the end when their hope would be realized, 'the obtaining of the glory of our Lord Jesus Christ', at His Second Advent to the earth. J. Denney writes: "The thirteenth and fourteenth verses of this chapter are a system of theology in miniature. The Apostle's thanksgiving covers the whole work of salvation from the eternal choice of God to the obtaining of the glory of our Lord Jesus Christ in the world to come."

What does the Apostle mean by "from the beginning"? If he alluded to the earliest days of his preaching at Thessalonica we should have expected a phrase like 'the beginning of the gospel' (Phil. iv. 15). As it stands, he doubtless meant the choice of God at the beginning of His great redemptive purpose. However there is an alternative reading which is interesting. "From the beginning" is ap' arches. The R.V. in the margin says "many ancient authorities read 'as firstfruits'." This would be aparchen, which looks similar to ap' arches. Aparchen is adopted by the Nestlè Greek text and the meaning would then be in line with James i. 18:

> "Of His own will begat He us with the word of truth, that we should be a kind of firstfruits of His creatures."

Actually this describes just what the Pentecostal churches were, that is, a firstfruits of the earthly kingdom. The longsuffering of God was still waiting for the obedience of the people of Israel to "repent and turn again" as commanded through Peter's lips (Acts iii. 19-26). Those who did respond were an earnest of the coming kingdom. Had the whole nation been obedient, that kingdom could have come and the world blessed through Israel as the kingdom of priests, the Divine channel of blessing.

The word 'salvation' in this context cannot be restricted to salvation from sin. The Apostle links with it sanctification wrought by the Spirit, a separation from Satan's sphere of domination and deception which the previous verses have described, and he adds 'and belief of the truth'. This is in sharp contrast to the 'lie' and its outworking in the miracles and wonders performed through Satan's power by the man of sin, and those who are deceived and do not 'love the truth', but willingly reject it. The faithful Thessalonian believers would be preserved unto salvation at the Lord's Coming.

The Apostle continues:

> "Therefore, brethren, stand fast, and hold the traditions which ye have been taught, whether by word, or our epistle."

Therefore, ara oun, is the practical conclusion to the preceding verses. "Accordingly then stand fast." Steko which is derived from the perfect active of histemi, to stand, in its N.T. usage generally has the meaning of 'stand fast' and not wavering.

> "Stand fast therefore in the liberty wherewith Christ hath made us free" (Gal. v. 1).
> ". . . . . I may hear of your affairs, that ye stand fast in one spirit . . . . ." (Phil. i. 27).
> "So stand fast in the Lord, my dearly beloved" (Phil. iv. 1).

Krateo is often translated to 'lay hold on' (Mark iii. 21; vi. 17; xii. 12). It means to have a masterful grip on a thing and in this context 'to hold fast' to the traditions which the Thessalonian believers had been taught. Paradosis (tradition) has an ominous sound to many Bible students. The Lord Jesus solemnly warned the Pharisees of rejecting and making of none effect the Word of God by their traditions (Mark vii. 9, 13). Both Paul and Peter knew its blinding power:

> "I persecuted the church of God . . . . . being more exceedingly zealous of the traditions of my fathers" (Gal. i. 14).
> ". . . . . your vain conversation received by tradition from your fathers" (I Pet. i. 18).

This thing is one of the most potent forces in Satan's hands to blind the eyes and veil the truth from believers as well as unbelievers. How many of God's children are accepting certain things as truth, not because they have personally tested them from the Word of God and found them true, but because 'Christians generally believe such things', or they are 'taught by this denomination or that', or their parents believed them and so on. Such is tradition, and often believers are not only prepared to receive such ideas as truth, but even antagonize those who have taken the trouble to search the Scriptures and test and have found so much of it to be sheer error. It holds many a believer in a vice-like grip, and as the Saviour said, makes void the Word of God and empties it of its real import. How we all need to pray to be redeemed from tradition! No progress in the knowledge of the Truth can be made while we are in such bondage.

However, in the context we are considering, tradition is used in a good sense. Paradosis and pardidomi refer to what is handed over to one. Closely allied to this is the Greek verb paralambano, "to receive in turn" and both words are used by the Apostle in I Cor. xi. 23:

> "For I have received (parelabon) of the Lord that which also I delivered (paredokia) unto you . . . . ."

Before the N.T. was completed, the early churches rested upon the oral ministry of the apostles which they in turn had received from the Lord Jesus, either in the days of His flesh, like the ministers of the circumcision, or from Him in resurrection as the Apostle Paul. There was therefore a continuity in the transmission of Truth. With the completion of the N.T., the Word of God as a whole becomes the one basis for the Christian faith, and any addition becomes merely the word of man or tradition, a thing to be avoided at all costs.

Before the epistle closes, Paul uses the word 'tradition' once more in a good sense:

> "Now we command you, brethren, in the Name of our Lord Jesus Christ, that ye withdraw yourselves from every brother that walketh disorderly and not after the tradition which he received of us" (iii. 6).

It is obvious then that we must take care in our handling of 'tradition', learning to rightly divide between the true and the false.

The Apostle now interposes a prayer that the Thessalonian saints be comforted and established, reminding them of the eternal love and consolation of the Lord Jesus Christ and God our Father, and the good hope that was theirs through grace (16), the fact of grace stressing that this was entirely undeserved on their part. Having prayed for them, he requests prayer for himself and his witness:

> "Finally, brethren, pray for us, that the Word of the Lord may have free course (run R.V.) and be glorified, even as it is with you" (iii. 1).

The tense of the verb 'pray' is present and means 'keep on praying'. Spasmodic intercession for others is useless. Effective praying is a work, a labour, as Epaphras well knew (Col. iv. 12), and must be persisted in to be of lasting value. It costs both in time and strength. The Apostle Paul knew only too well the opposition of the evil one, working largely through his Jewish opponents, and so he asks that the Word of truth may 'run' (R.V.) unhindered and be glorified in carrying out the purpose of its Divine Author. This running reminds one of Psa. cxlvii. 15:

In this context we get one more example of the blending of prayer with the outworking of God's plan. From one angle we might say that surely it was God's will for His Word to run and prosper and all hindrances to be removed. Yet Paul did not hesitate to call for prayer that this might be realized in practice. Such praying is greatly needed today, for the blocks that Satan seeks to put in the pathway of the Word of Truth are no less at the present time than they were at the beginning. Lightfoot translates the phrase 'may run and be glorified', 'may have a triumphant career'. This had already happened at Thessalonica and so Paul could add 'even as it is with you'. We note too that both the verbs in the verse under consideration are in the present subjunctive tense, 'may keep on running and being glorified', that is, a continual experience, and we too today can use this prayer effectively.

Paul now makes a second and more personal request:

> "And that we may be delivered from unreasonable and wicked men: for all men have not faith" (iii. 2).

"Deliver" is ruomai, to rescue, which occurs so graphically in Col. i. 13 where we are said to be rescued (delivered A.V.) from the authority of darkness. 'Unreasonable' is atopos, literally out of place, and then comes to mean 'perverse'. The Apostle is referring to his Jewish opponents who dogged his footsteps wherever he went and violently opposed the truth proclaimed by him 'for all men have not faith'. This means either faith in Christ, or do not hold the faith—faith being equivalent to truth; either is possible. The last word in the sentence is pistis faith. The next word is pistos faithful, there being a play upon words to bring into contrast the faithfulness of the Lord. He can be relied on however perverse men may be. "Faithful is the Lord, who will confirm (establish) you and will guard you from the evil one." The A.V. reads impersonally 'evil', but the R.V. the 'evil one', i.e. Satan, and this promise is for the comfort of the Thessalonian believers.

Paul is assured that they carry out his commands and will continue to do so (verse 4). Here is a note of apostolic authority, yet with love behind it.

> "And the Lord direct your hearts into the love of God, and into the patience of Christ" (iii. 5 R.V.).

The love of God can be regarded here either objectively or subjectively. If subjectively then it refers to God's love for His children, or if objectively, their love for Him. The R.V. regards the phrase the 'patience of Christ' as relating to the patience shown by Christ rather than the believers 'patient waiting for Christ' as the A.V. There is no word for 'waiting' in the Greek. The example of His unflagging patience was to be the prime source of inspiration to any who were troubled.

With verse 6 a new section commences, going on to verse 15. In the structure of the epistle this balances the section ii. 1-12 thus:

B | c | ii. 1-12. We beseech. Lawlessness.
B | c | iii. 6-15. We command. Disorderliness.

> "Now we command you, brethren, in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, that ye withdraw yourselves from every brother that walketh disorderly, and not after the tradition which he received of us" (iii. 6).

The Apostle now deals with some in the church who were lazy and giving a bad witness to an unbelieving world. Ataktos disorderly, is a military word 'to break rank' or 'play truant'. It occurs as an adjective, as we have seen in I Thess. v. 14, where it is translated 'unruly'. The doctrine of the Second Advent was being misinterpreted by some and used as an excuse to give up working. The saying that 'Satan finds mischief for idle hands to do' was well illustrated here. Paul declares that such were not only refusing to work, but were busybodies, interfering in other people's affairs, and so causing trouble"

> "For we hear that there are some which walk among you disorderly working not at all, but are busybodies" (iii. 11).

Again there is a play upon words in the Greek. Moffatt brings it over well into English by rendering: "Busybodies instead of busy." As a contrast to this the Apostle brings forward his own example, how he worked night and day so that he would not be chargeable to any one of them. How absolutely practical was this great man of God! Later on to the church at Philippi he could write:

> "Those things, which ye have both learned, and received, and heard, and seen in me, do: and the God of peace shall be with you" (iv. 9).

Only one who is living very close to the Lord could write like this without idle boasting. May it be the aim of both writer and reader so to combine doctrine and practice, that it can be said truthfully that we are living epistles known and read of all men.

No.5. iii. 6 - 18.

We are dealing with a section of this epistle (iii. 6-15) where the Apostle Paul has to reprimand some who were ceasing to work and interfering in the affairs of others. He could draw the attention of the Thessalonian believers to his own example:

> "For yourselves know how ye ought to follow us, for we behaved not ourselves disorderly among you. Neither did we eat any man's bread for nought; but wrought with labour and travail night and day, that we might not be chargeable to any of you. Not because we have not power, but to make ourselves an ensample unto you to follow us" (iii. 7-9).

The word 'follow' in verses 7 and 9 is mimeomai from mimos, an actor, a mimic. It only occurs elsewhere in Heb. xiii. 7 and III John 11, where the R.V. correctly translates it "imitate". The Apostle could always draw attention to the way he combined doctrine and practice. He had set before the Thessalonian church a Christ-like example, working night and day at his trade of leather work, so that he might not be a financial burden to them. He had previously drawn their attention to this in his first epistle (I Thess. ii. 9, 10). At the same time he reminds them that he had the apostolic authority (power, II Thess. iii. 9) to be supported by them, but he waived it in order to be an example in all things. The Greek reads literally, 'but that we might give ourselves a type to you'.

> "For even when we were with you, this we commanded you, that if any would not work, neither should he eat. For we hear that there are some which walk among you disorderly (ataktos), working not at all, but are busybodies" (10, 11).

The Apostle quotes what is apparently a Jewish proverb based on Gen. iii. 19. Those who refused to work, had no claim to receive food. Deissmann (Light from the Ancient East) sees Paul borrowing a piece of workshop morality, and it was plainly needed. There has always been a tendency to regard labour as a curse, something to be avoided as far as possible, and much of the labour trouble in the world today has its roots in this mistaken idea. But when Adam sinned, God cursed the ground for his sake (Gen. iii. 17), for the worst possible thing for a sinner, is to have nothing to do to occupy his time. Such a situation always results in boredom and further declension, and the Apostle is concerned that this should not spread any further in the church at Thessalonica. The imperfect tense of the verb 'command' shows that more than once he had urged such to diligence. Again he uses a play upon words, ergazomenous alla periergazomenous. Moffatt renders it well, "busybodies instead of busy", that is, minding everyone's business but their own, and this as a result of idling and sponging upon others.

> "Now them that are such we command and exhort by our Lord Jesus Christ, that with quietness they work, and eat their own bread. But ye, brethren, be not weary in well-doing. And if any man obey not our word by this epistle, note that man and have no company with him, that he may be ashamed. Yet count him not as an enemy, but admonish him as a brother" (iii. 12-15).

Note how Paul combines the note of authority with a certain amount of tenderness, 'we command and exhort'. The Apostle was no hard autocrat. He knew how to blend firmness with love and so to handle wisely such difficult situations that sometimes arise among believers. The words 'by our Lord Jesus Christ' indicate clearly that he was Christ's spokesman. It was as though the Lord Himself was speaking and commanding and so always ought we to regard the teaching given through Paul. Paul the man is only a channel, 'less than the least of all saints' (Eph. iii. 8), but as the Apostle (sent one) of Christ Jesus he speaks with all the Lord's authority. Would that professing Christendom could grasp this truth. They would then cease to talk of 'Pauline doctrine' or to set up the teaching given through Christ in the days of His flesh as being superior to that He gave through the Apostle. In both, the Lord Jesus is the Author of the teaching, but in each case it is received through a human channel. His ministry when on earth being mediated to us by Matthew, Mark, Luke and John, and His heavenly ministry through the witness of Paul to us who are Gentiles, and the twelve apostles to the circumcision (Jew).

In the case of the Lord's earthly ministry, we have it on His authority that it was limited to the people of Israel (Matt. xv. 24) and with this agrees Rom. ix. 3-5, xv. 8; also that the fullness of revelation was yet future, awaiting the coming of the Holy Spirit (John xvi. 12-14) and the time when in Resurrection and Ascension He Himself would have no such limitations as to one people. The false idea that the 'words of Jesus' (the Gospels) give a higher revelation and are more authoritative than the epistles, are the cause of much of the spiritual blindness and stunted spiritual growth that we see around us today in the Christian world. This conception is a present exaltation in glory and the church's close association with Him there, from being realized and enjoyed by the believer. We who have had opened eyes in this respect need to combat such false ideas with all the energy and wisdom possible, for, until these are removed from the mind, any testimony concerning the unsearchable riches of Christ revealed in Paul's prison epistles will be practically valueless.

So we see that, in the context we are dealing with, the Apostle could command as from the Lord, and expect to be obeyed by the faithful. The indolent are charged to work with quietness and eat what comes from their own labour, and then he writes to the whole assembly. Paul exhorts them not to be 'weary in well doing', that is, the 'right of honourable thing'. This is the only occurrence of kalopoieo in the N.T., but it is used in the LXX, and the Apostle uses a like expression in II Cor. xiii. 7, to kalon poiete 'do that which is honest', Rom. vii. 21 'to do good' and very similarly to II Thess. iii. 13 in Gal. vi. 9 'let us not be weary in well doing'. A similar word agathoerges 'to do good' is found in I Tim. vi. 18.

Paul's last word to the idlers and busybodies is now given. All such are to be 'marked men' ('note that man'). Semeioo is from semeion, a sign, token or mark. The faithful are not to mix with (have company with) such, in order to bring the offenders to a sense of shame. Such discipline was remedial in its object and was not excommunication as verse 15 shows. Such were not to be regarded as enemies, but brothers who were erring, with the hope that they would repent and reform their ways. The professing church down the centuries has used the extreme discipline of excommunication far too freely. Very seldom has the N.T. basis for such action been considered. Far too often the bad and narrow spirit of Luke ix. 49, 54 has been manifest and many of God's children cast out of fellowship because 'they followed not with us' and did not toe the line to every vagary of doctrine. Much heartbreak and sorrow could have been avoided if II Thess. iii. 15 and Gal. vi. 1 had been acted upon. The church of Rome has not been the only Christian group to exhibit this harshness. Professing Christians at the other extreme have been equally guilty and this is still going on in our own day with dire results to Christian witness.

The Apostle now draws to a conclusion with a prayer for their blessing:

> "Now the Lord of peace Himself give you peace always by all means. The Lord be with you all. The salutation of Paul with mine own hand, which is the token in every epistle: so I write. The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all. Amen."

In the first epistle he desired the God of peace to sanctify them wholly (v. 23). Now he requests that the same God, the Lord of peace, should give them peace 'at all times in all ways' (R.V.). This is comprehensive indeed, and the precious gift of peace is more and more needed today with its pressure, rush and bustle and distraction. The Saviour promised it to His followers (John xiv. 27; xvi. 33) and it comes when everything has been committed to Him (Phil. iv. 6, 7), so enabling the believer to remain unruffled and confident whatever turmoil surrounds Him.

The Apostle closes with a greeting in his own handwriting. We have noted that the enemy of truth had seen to it that spurious letters were circulating among the churches purporting to come from Paul. He now gives them a guarantee whereby they can know for certain the epistle was his. Having dictated it so far, he now takes the pen, and in his own handwriting, which they knew, he gives the benediction connected with the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ.

It is a fact that every one of Paul's letters concludes with a reference to the grace of Christ and this is not the characteristic of the other epistles written by Peter, James, John an Jude. If any one draws attention to the Book of Revelation, then it must be pointed out that this is not an epistle, and if the late date generally assigned to it is true, it was written after Paul's day. It is noteworthy that the Epistle to the Hebrews also concludes with a similar benediction 'Grace be with you all', which must be given due weight when the controversial subject of the authorship of this letter is discussed.

It seems to be obvious that the Holy Spirit who inspired the N.T. writers, kept this particular conclusion to the Apostle Paul, and this was for the protection of the early groups of believers from Satanic deception. It would have been nullified had others used it, and while it may seem a trivial matter to us today, it was of vital import to believers at the beginning when the evil one was doing his best to counteract the truth and the outworking of God's purposes of grace.

The Apostle therefore concludes, in his own handwriting with his usual benediction:

> "The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all."

This is similar to the first epistle and Rom. xvi. 20. So concludes two of the earliest letters of Paul. It should hardly be necessary to say that no doctrinal import can be placed on the order of the epistles given in the A.V. Though the Thessalonian letters come last in this grouping, no teaching can be deduced from this. To teach that these letters give the climax of revelation given in Paul's epistles because of this position is false. The Apostle was in the early stages of his ministry at this point and the climax was yet to come in his prison letters after the nation of Israel had been set aside in unbelief at the ends of the Acts period.

Those who hold the above mentioned view fail to understand the position of the people of Israel during this time and the relationship of I Thess. iv., with its emphasis on the return of Christ, to the purpose then being worked out. So much is usually mentally added by such to what is actually taught in this chapter that a distorted view is bound to result. How many who read the words, 'The Lord Himself shall descend from heaven with a shout . . . . . then we which are alive and remain shall be caught up together with them in the air . . . . .' add in their minds the thought that these believers are then taken up to heaven? The addition of the word 'up' in our English version partly suggest this idea, but there is no warrant for it in the original Greek. There is no thought of direction in the verb harpago; it could just as easily mean 'caught downwards' as upwards. The immediate context does not deal with what happens after this 'catching away'. Only the remoter context and what had already been revealed can guide us here. It is the descending Lord that these saints meet and as both these letters deal with the Lord's arrival (parousia) there is nothing that need be added by ourselves in order to understand what iv. 16, 17 is teaching. Those who do so evidently have an axe to grind and this is not the way to get truth.

We have intensely grateful for these early epistles of Paul, showing us, as they do, his faithful concern for the well-being of the Thessalonian saints, their zeal as well as some of their problems which could only be resolved by understanding the purpose of God so far as it had been revealed at this time. May we have grace to imitate their practical keenness and outworking of the Truth, so that it can be said of us, as it was of them,

> "Ye were ensamples to all that believe" (I Thess. i. 7).

The Epistle to TITUS.

No.1. pp. 6 - 9

It is always important to note when dealing with the epistles of Paul, the way they group themselves with relation to the dispensational dividing line at Acts xxviii. While Israel was still in covenant relationship with God, and this held good right through the Acts, Paul wrote seven epistles, Galatians, Hebrews, I Thessalonians, II Thessalonians, I Corinthians, II Corinthians, & Romans. After the Acts, when Israel became lo-ammi, not My people, that covenant relationship was broken and they were soon scattered in judgment throughout the world. The Apostle is then inspired to write seven more epistles, namely, Ephesians, Philippians, Colossians, Philemon, I Timothy, Titus and II Timothy.

It is evident by what Paul said when he wrote to Philemon and the church at Philippi that he expected to be released from his Roman prison (Phil. ii. 24; Philemon 22). Then follows some five years in which he resumed his ministry as a free man.

During this time the possibility is that he realized his intention of visiting Spain and preaching the gospel there (Rom. xv. 23, 24). This view is supported by writers of the early church, such as Clement, first bishop of Rome, Eusebius and Chrysostom as well as the Muratorian Canon. Towards the end of the five years the Apostle evidently returned to Ephesus and found the predictions which he had long ago uttered to the Ephesian overseers were already receiving their fulfillment. People like Hymenaeus and Philetus were sowing seeds of error which were destined to bear deadly fruit in time to come. Jewish superstitions and erroneous teachings concerning the law, together with the baneful influence of the Gnostics, the self-styled aristocrats of knowledge, were already doing deadly work among the assemblies.

From the epistles to Timothy and Titus written about this time, we gather that Paul was prevented by other duties from staying in this region and hence he writes to these two fellow-labourers and gives them instructions how to meet this error in order to prevent its spreading and overthrowing the faith of believers.

Furthermore we must remember that after the truth of the Mystery had been revealed in Ephesians, local assemblies did not cease to exist. They embraced the new teaching as a whole and continued to function as before. Consequently at this time the Truth was still organized and leaders like Timothy would need guidance as to how to conduct themselves in the "house of God" which was the "church of the living God" (I Tim. iii. 15).

By the time that we come to II Timothy, which cannot have been written much later than I Timothy and Titus, we find a state of affairs which is anything but healthy. "This thou knowest, that all that are in Asia turned away from me" (II Tim. i. 15 R.V.) and in chapter iv. 16 we read "At my first defence no one took my part, but all forsook me" (R.V.). The second statement may be a commentary on the first, but there may be more in it than just a company of Christians in Asia were afraid to stay by the Apostle in this time of danger. It appeared to be a definite act of repudiation on their part. Had the truth for which he stood been held tenaciously and worked out in practice by believers in Asia, such a situation could not have arisen despite the peril of the times. And when we remember the one other verse in this epistle that uses the verb 'turn away'—we are led to believe that the Apostle is describing a falling away from the Truth that was then taking place. "For the time will come when they will not endure the sound doctrine . . . . . and they shall turn away their ears from the truth and shall be turned to myths. But watch then in all things . . . . ." Paul is forewarning Timothy of conditions he would have to face, not of something that would take place centuries later.

When we bear in mind this departure from the 'good deposit' of Truth entrusted for this present age to the Apostle of the Gentiles, and also the leaven of false doctrine actively working before Paul's death, we are not surprised that most, if not all that he stood for, was soon lost. The early Christian writers of the first and succeeding centuries exhibit little or no understanding of his distinctive ministry and a study of church history fails to show any general recovery of such truth. The Reformation was a beginning, but it was left to roughly 100 years ago for the Truth of the Mystery with all its wonder and glory, to begin to come to the forefront again. Not that this truth has been completely blotted out, for there must have been individuals all through the centuries who have believed God's Word however dimly, regarding this distinctive heavenly calling. Coming back to the Pastoral Epistles, we see there that I Timothy and Titus were written after Acts xxviii. when the Apostle Paul had been liberated from his first imprisonment. Hence we find in them no references to prison, but definite instructions to two believers who were to take the lead at a time when the Truth was still organized in assemblies.

Concerning Titus himself we know little. The strange thing is that he is not once mentioned during the Acts by Luke and yet by Paul's references to him he evidently stood high in the Apostle's esteem. We know of no satisfactory explanation of this. In the second letter to the Corinthian church, he is referred to no less than nine times (II Cor. ii. 13; vii. 6, 13, 14; viii. 6, 16, 23; xii. 18 twice).

Paul had sent him to investigate and report to him the state of the church at Corinth, particularly after his first epistle had been received, and also to hasten the collection for the poor brethren in Judaea.

He was a Gentile converted under the Apostle's ministry (Titus i. 4), and was taken by Paul and Barnabas to the council of the apostles and elders which was convened at Jerusalem to consider the question of the relationship of Gentile believers to the Mosaic law (Gal. ii. 1, 3). The reason was clear; Titus was uncircumcised and Paul was determined not to allow any act of ritual to mar the glorious doctrine of justification by faith in Christ apart from works.

We know little more of Titus than the above mentioned facts. He evidently visited Crete with Paul after his liberation and was left there to 'set in order the things that are wanting, and ordain elders in every city' (Titus i. 5). He is bidden to come to the Apostle (After the arrival of Artemas or Tychicus—iii. 12). Paul had decided to spend the winter at Nicopolis and Titus is exhorted to join him there. The next reference is in Paul's last epistle, II Timothy. He has now been apprehended the second time from which he realizes there will be no deliverance and is prepared to give his life for his Saviour and Lord very shortly (II Tim. iv. 6). Only Luke is with him (II Tim. iv. 11). Demas has forsaken him, Crescens had gone to Galatia, Titus to Dalmatia (verse 10). This is the last reference to Titus in the Scriptures. We cannot help noticing that he is mentioned and Crescens in the same breath almost as forsaking Demas. One is left wondering. Does this mean that Titus had also manifested the same spirit as Demas? Nothing definite is said, only the context is not an encouraging one. We can only hope he made the journey to Dalmatia at the advice of the Apostle, although Paul does not state this to be the case.

We may now ask what Christian witness existed in Crete at this time. We know from Josephus that it abounded with Jews of wealth and influence (Ant. 17:12,1). But how did the gospel reach there? In Acts ii. 11 Cretans are named among those who heard the utterance of the Spirit on the day of Pentecost. It is more than likely that the Cretan churches owed their origin to the witness of those people who brought back a knowledge of salvation with them.

Two things remain to be noticed, the condition of the churches and the character of the Cretans in general. From the epistle it is evident that false teachers had crept in and were putting forward doctrines which were essentially antichristian. There is much that is parallel between I Timothy and Titus, for they had more or less the same errors to face. From the start Satan has never left the truth unchallenged. It is all a part of the great conflict of the ages and will not cease until the mystery of iniquity has been revealed and dealt with by the glorious Return of Christ to the earth and Satan is bound and cast into the abyss. In our day we must expect opposition to the proclamation of the Truth of a rightly divided Word and the sacred deposit committed to our charge. This opposition is more likely to come from within than from without, and we must not be unprepared to meet it.

Concerning the Cretans themselves, Paul apparently quotes one of their own poets, Epimenides who lived in the 6th century B.C. "Always liars and beasts are the Cretans and inwardly sluggish" (i. 12). So infamous were some of them for their habitual practice of falsehood that the Greek word kretizein, to act like a Cretan, was a proverbial term for telling a lie.

What unlikely and difficult material for the grace of God to work upon! Yet this but magnifies that grace all the more, reminding us that God has not picked the best, rather sometimes He has apparently chosen the worst to lavish His love and mercy upon with the object that He may have all the glory at the end. "God hath chosen the foolish things . . . . . the weak things . . . . . the base things and things which are despised . . . . . that no flesh should glory in His Presence" (I Cor. i. 27-29).

No.2. The Epistle as a whole.

Before we proceed with the study of the epistle, we will set forth its structure so that we get the Divine outline to guide us as we seek to unfold its truth.

One thing stands out clearly is the six references to good works in the members marked B. In fact it would be true to say that the whole epistle revolves around the question of works, first of all in its relationship to those who are called to lead, like Timothy and Titus, and then to those who believe in the Lord Jesus Christ whatever their sphere of witness and work for the Lord.

The next thing we would draw attention to is the way the title Saviour is used in this epistle. It occurs six times and is distributed as follows:

A1 | i. 3. Commandments of God our Saviour.
B1 | i. 14. Grace from the Lord Jesus Christ our Saviour.
A2 | ii. 10. Adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour.
B2 | ii. 13. Appearing of our great God and Saviour Jesus Christ (R.V.).
A3 | iii. 4. Love of God our Saviour.
B3 | iii. 6. Through Jesus Christ our Saviour.

These occur in the members marked “A” in the structure and it will be noticed that they alternate between God and Christ.

TITUS* as a whole.

[* - This structure has not appeared in any previous publication.]

A1 | i. 1-4. Hope of eternal life.
Commandments of God our Saviour.
Grace from the Lord Jesus Christ our Saviour.
B1 | i. 5-16. Titus left at Crete.
Set right what is lacking (leiponta).
Unruly vain talkers, circumcision.
Every good work reprobate.
C | ii. 1. TITUS. Speak (lalei) sound doctrine.
B2 | ii. 2-8. Believers. Subject (hupotasso)
that Word be not blasphemed (blasphemetai).
A pattern of good works.
A2 | ii. 9-14. Adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour.
Grace of God hath appeared (epiphano).
Blessed Hope. A glorious appearing (epiphaneian) of our great God & Saviour Jesus Christ.
B3 | ii. 14. Peculiar people. Zealous of good work.
C | ii. 15 - iii. 1-. TITUS. Speak (lalei), rebuke, exhort.
B4 | iii. -1, 2. Believers. Subject (hupotasso) to authority.
Ready to every good work, not speak evil (blasphemein).
A3 | iii. 3-7. Kindness and love of God our Saviour appeared (epiphane).
Jesus Christ our Saviour.
Hope of eternal life.
B5 | iii. 8-15. Striving about the law, heretick reject.
Zenas and Apollos set forward nothing lacking (leipe).
Maintain good work (verse 8, 14).

The occurrence in ii. 13 has given rise to debate. Those who deny the deity of Christ, insist that two persons are referred to, the title 'great God' not referring to Jesus Christ in their estimation.

> "Awaiting the blessed hope of the appearance of the glory of the great God and of our Saviour Christ Jesus" (Moffatt).
> "While we wait for the happy hope and the glorious manifestation of the great God and of our Saviour Christ Jesus" (New World Translation).

The A.V. likewise separates the two titles. But the R.V. reads:

> "Looking for the blessed hope and appearing of the glory of our great God and Saviour Jesus Christ", putting the other reading in the margin. The R.V. translation was the view of the Greek orthodox Fathers and of the most ancient commentators. Professor A. T. Robertson, one of the greatest authorities on N.T. Greek, writes, "This is the necessary meaning of the one article with theou and soteros". There is a similar construction in II Pet. i. 1 which the R.V. correctly renders, "Our God and Saviour Jesus Christ" as against the A.V. "God and our Saviour Jesus Christ; see likewise in verse 11 'our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ', where again only one article is used. The structure given above, however, finally throws in its weight, for we have a definite alternation between the titles God our Saviour and Jesus Christ our Saviour. The occurrence in chapter ii. 13 we have taken from the R.V. to show the perfect balance which is completely spoiled if the A.V. and the modernist rendering be adhered to.

Nothing is clearer in the Scriptures that there is one Saviour, and that Saviour is God in the highest sense.

> "I, even I, am Jehovah; and beside me there is no Saviour" (Isa. xliii. 11; xlv. 21).

God has never delegated the work of salvation to any created being, however great. The Apostle Paul, under inspiration, does not hesitate in the epistle to Titus to apply the title "Saviour" to God, and also to Christ, and if the Lord Jesus is not God in the highest sense and the one Saviour, then words are meaningless, and moreover to bracket a creature (if Christ be not God) with One Who is the great God as in ii. 13 would be blasphemy indeed. Moreover, we might ask what Scriptural foundation is there for a glorious appearing of the Father and Son together? There is absolutely none. We have one God, one Lord (Eph. iv. 5) and one Saviour (Isa. xliii. 11) and He is the Lord Jesus Christ, who gave Himself for us. Anything less than this comes from the father of lies whose one aim is to dethrone Christ and usurp his place as God.

Before we pass on, we give Cunnington's translation of Titus ii. 13:

> "Looking for the blessed hope and manifestation of our great God and Saviour's glory, Christ Jesus."

The next point of interest is the occurrences of the verb epiphaino and the noun epiphaneia. In ii. 11 we have the grace of God, salvation-bringing to all men, hath appeared (A.V.) or was manifested, and in iii. 4 the love of God our Saviour toward man appeared or was manifested, both being the same tense of the verb epiphaino.

Epiphaneia, the noun, occurs in II Tim. i. 10, 'the appearing of our Saviour Jesus Christ', all these references pointing to His first Advent. Epiphaneia is also used of the hope of the Church which is His Body.

> "The Lord Jesus Christ who shall judge the living and the dead at His appearing and His Kingdom" (II Tim. iv. 1).
> "A crown of righteousness . . . . . not to me only, but unto all them also that have love His appearing" (II Tim. iv. 8).
> "Looking for that blessed hope and the appearing of the glory of our great God and Saviour Jesus Christ" (Titus ii. 13).

The word epiphaneia as a noun standing alone, is only used after Acts xxviii. to describe the new aspect of hope of the redeemed who form the church of the Mystery revealed in Eph. iii.

Its occurrence in II Thess. ii. 8 is not parallel. There it is used like an adjective to describe one of the aspects of the parousia which the Lord had revealed in Matt. xxiv. 27-30.

Thus, in the post-Acts epistles of Paul, it describes the giving of God's unspeakable Gift, His own Beloved Son and with Him the riches of His grace and surpassing love in choosing, saving and redeeming each member of the Church which is His Body, and also looks forward to the climax of their salvation, when His glory shall be revealed to the wondering gaze of heaven's principalities and powers and this church shall be manifested there with him, Head and Body united in heaven's Holiest of all (Col. iii. 1-4).

Another word which is characteristic of the Pastoral Epistles, and one which is greatly stressed, is the word doctrine didaskalia. It occurs fifteen times in these epistles, 8 times in I Timothy, 4 times in Titus, and 3 times in II Timothy. We now give a concordance of this word in these epistles:

Didaskalia in the Pastoral Epistles.

"if there be any other thing that is contrary to sound doctrine" (I Tim. i. 10).
"giving heed to seducing spirits, and doctrines of devils" (iv. 1).
"words of faith and of good doctrine" (iv. 6).
"give attendance to reading, to exhortation, to doctrine" (iv. 13).
"take heed unto thyself, and unto the doctrine" (iv. 16).
"they who labour in the word and doctrine" (v. 17).
"that the name of God and His doctrine be not blasphemed" (vi. 1).
"the doctrine which is according to godliness" (vi. 3).
"that he may be able by sound doctrine . . . . . to convince the gainsayers" (Titus i. 9).
"the things which become sound doctrine" (ii. 1).
"in doctrine showing uncorruptness" (ii. 7).
"that they may adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour" (ii. 10).
"thou hast fully known my doctrine" (II Tim. iii. 10).
"all scripture is . . . . . profitable for doctrine" (iii. 16).
"the time will come when they will not endure sound doctrine" (iv. 3).

That this is one of the key words of these epistles is obvious. The word 'doctrine' is often linked in the mind with something that is dry and uninteresting. If we substitute the word teaching we shall see the closer link with teacher, as didaskalia, doctrine, is linked with didaskalos, one who teaches. The epistle to Timothy and Titus were addressed to those who had been called to teach and to lead, hence the vast importance of the subject or subjects taught.

These believers could be sound teachers of the Truth, or like some of the Apostle's day and at the end time, teachers of myths, pleasing those who have itching ears (II Tim. iv. 3, 4). There is sound or healthy teaching (Titus i. 9) and in contrast the teaching of demons (I Tim. iv. 1). The former is linked with the One who is the Truth (John xiv. 6) and His Word which is Truth (John xvii. 17), and the other with the father of lies (John viii. 44).

From this it will be seen that the responsibility of the teacher is very great. What he teaches is either furthering the Truth or the lie. "My brethren be not many teachers (didaskaloi) knowing that we shall receive the greater condemnation" (James iii. 1). The ministry of the teacher is therefore not to be sought lightly. The faithful teacher has one great subject, the Word of God, and the living Word, the Lord Jesus Christ.

One of the last injunctions to Timothy by the Apostle Paul was this: "proclaim (preach) the Word" (II Tim. iv. 2), and a rightly-divided Word at that, as the previous chapter so solemnly stresses (II Tim. ii. 15). Merely quoting the Bible is not sufficient. The Judaizers undoubtedly quoted chapter and verse when they said to the early churches 'except ye be circumcised after the manner of Moses, ye cannot be saved' (Acts xv. 1). But they were not teaching truth, rather the grossest error, for they were lifting it out of its Divine setting and propagating the way of Cain which presumes to come to God as a sinner with works, thus nullifying the gospel of His grace.

All the creeds appeal to the Bible, but how many rightly divide the Word of Truth? How many are bringing over to this dispensation teaching which was true in a past dispensation but is not truth for today? Surely it is right to say that if the professing church had made known as its doctrine or message for this Gentile age the teaching of the Apostle of the Gentiles, and obeyed the commandment of II Tim. ii. 15, the present divided state of modern Christendom would never have happened.

Doctrine does matter. It is absolutely vital and those who have absorbed the glorious teaching of the ascended Christ through Paul will never lack a subject to expound and will never need to descend to the puerilities and errors of much modern preaching.

> "Thou hast fully known my doctrine" (II Tim. iii. 10).
> "Take heed unto thyself, and unto the doctrine; continue in them" (I Tim. iv. 16).

No.3. i. 1 - 3.
pp. 48 - 51

We now commence our study of the epistle and turn to the first chapter. It reads: "Paul, a bondslave (servant) of God and an apostle of Jesus Christ." This is somewhat like his introduction to the Roman epistle. "Paul a bondslave of Jesus Christ, a called apostle." When he writes to the Philippian church he likewise describes himself, with Timothy, bondslaves (servants) of Jesus Christ and omits any reference to his apostleship. Philippians is pre-eminently the epistle of service and this sets the tone of the letter straight away.

Romans, Philippians and Titus are the only epistles where Paul describes himself as a bondslave in the introduction. Usually it is his apostleship, conferred by the ascended Christ, that is brought forward first thus stressing his divine authority. But here the champion of liberty presents himself as a slave! A seeming paradox, but one in which the Apostle gloried. So much real doctrine is wrapped up in this word. It reminds us that, while redemption snaps the chains of sin and death, and leads us into liberty, yet that liberty is not without its Divine obligations. We have not been delivered from Satan, the flesh and the world system, to please ourselves and go the way of our choosing, but to acknowledge the lordship or domination of the One who has saved us by His precious Blood.

We are not our own, we are bought with a price and this nothing less than the life and death of the Son of God, who loved us and gave Himself for us (I Cor. vi. 19, 20; Gal. ii. 20). We are His property, His slave, and saving grace has simply changed masters for us, the Lord Jesus Christ instead of Satan, self and sin. Yet how many of God's people practically own this? Many know him as Saviour, who have never acknowledged His Lordship. Such could never call themselves, as Paul did, bondslaves of Jesus Christ, for a slave has no rights, no property, no will of his own; he existed solely for his master. The Apostle had laid everything at the feet of His Saviour without reserve, and we should face up to the fact that none of us can truly call ourselves "servants (bondslaves) of God", until we have done likewise. And then how wonderfully God is willing to accept such living sacrifices (Rom. xii. 1) and commence to do His work through them!

So Paul, writing to Titus who had been called of God as a servant, into which service the Apostle was about to guide him, likewise describes himself as a servant and an apostle (a sent one) of Jesus Christ.

This ministry and apostleship was "according to the faith of God's elect". Kata, the preposition used here with the accusative case, has the meaning of 'in harmony with'. We meet the truth of election at the beginning of this epistle, even as we do in Ephesians (Eph. i. 4). Eklektos is used in the Pauline epistles six times:

> "Who shall lay anything to the charge of God's elect?" (Rom. viii. 33).
> "Salute Rufus, chosen in the Lord." (Rom. xvi. 13).
> "Put on therefore, as the elect of God" (Col. iii. 12).
> "Jesus Christ and the elect angels" (I Tim. v. 21).
> "I endure all things for the elect's sakes" (II Tim. ii. 10).
> "According to the faith of God's elect" (Titus i. 1).

The noun ekloge is used of the Apostle himself by the Lord. "He is a chosen vessel unto Me", literally, he is a vessel of election unto Me (Acts ix. 15). The only other occurrences in Paul's epistles are in I Thess. i. 4, and four times in the dispensational section of Romans, each reference referring to Israel and the faithful remnant (Rom. ix. 11; xi. 5, 7, 28). The verb eklegomai, to choose or elect, occurs three times in I Cor. i. 27, 28 and the one reference in Ephesians before mentioned (i. 4).

It is clear then, that no one can believe the truth given through the Apostle of the Gentiles unless they accept the truth of election. But we must be careful here. In Scripture, election and predestination are definitely linked with God's foreknowledge (Rom. viii. 29; I Pet. i. 2) and Divine foreknowledge is as important as election and is indispensable in seeking to understand what election implies. Some have torn these two truths apart and have in consequence put forward views which come little short of fatalism. This is disastrous to growth in grace and response to the revealed will of God.

Verse one continues 'and the acknowledging of the truth which is after godliness'. Epignosis, translated 'acknowledge' has not the meaning of full knowledge so much as knowledge acted on, that is acknowledgment. Paul is not only revealing truth here, but stressing its practical claims on the believer's life. The whole epistle revolving as it does around the subject of good works, is really an exposition of what the believer's practical acknowledgment should be. This truth is 'after godliness'. The word godliness is a translation of the Greek eusebeia and occurs ten times in Paul's writings, all of them begin in the Pastoral epistles. They are I Tim. ii. 2; iii. 16; iv. 7, 8; vi. 3, 5, 6, 11; II Tim. iii. 5; Titus i. 1. Eusebeia is composed of eu, meaning 'well', and sebomai 'to worship'. Perhaps 'God-fearing' comes nearer its meaning than 'godliness', remembering the O.T. phrase 'the fear of the Lord' which occurs fourteen times in the Book of Proverbs. This fear is not the same as fear in the sense of being afraid, but reverence for God, a strong desire not to do anything that will hurt or grieve the One who is our Heavenly Father. Such will 'well-reverence' Him and so exhibit the godliness that these epistles stress so much. Thus the word has a deeper meaning than piety and is closely linked with true worship which is at the heart of all truth.

Verse two leads on to eternal life; "in hope of eternal life which God, that cannot lie, promised before the ages of time". This is the 'promise of life which is in Christ Jesus" (II Tim. i. 1), hope and promise being often linked together in Scripture. Men, as sinners, are 'alienated from the life of God' (Eph. iv. 18) but 'life and incorruption' have been brought to light through the gospel of the grace of God (II Tim. i. 10, 11) ministered by the Apostle Paul. John in his first epistle tells us "God hath given unto us eternal life and this life is in His Son . . . he that hath not the Son of God hath not life" (I John v. 11, 12).

From these Scriptures it is surely clear that living forever (divorced from Christ), is a delusion, but for the believer in the Lord Jesus this is absolute certainty, for it is based on a promise made by God and He cannot lie. How sure and steadfast this must be then! We can have indeed 'full assurance of faith' as we look beyond this present life which Scripture likens to a disappearing vapour (James iv. 14). Strictly speaking the word 'eternal' is the Greek aionios, eonian or age-long. There is a phase of this which relates to the earthly purpose of God through redeemed Israel and is featured in the Gospels. Another aspect of it is the basis of the hope of the Mystery. It is useless looking forward to being seated in the heavenly places in Christ Jesus and being shown the exceeding riches of God's grace in the ages to come (Eph. ii. 6, 7) unless we have the necessary life given us to enjoy it.

God's promise of life goes back "before the world began", or better, before the ages of time, which is nearer the original. This is linked up with the plan of God and His grace which also takes us back before time commenced, using the same phrase as here (II Tim. i. 9). Eph. i. 4 assures us that we were elected in Christ before the overthrow of the world. The Body of Christ is the only calling of the redeemed that reaches so far back into the past. Other callings have the time period "since the foundation of the world" (Matt. xxv. 34). Some have sought to limit the phrase 'eternal or age-long life' to the Millennium and the restored people of Israel. This is unnecessary as, while the ages run their course, members of the Body, as we have just seen, will need life in the heavenlies. This still leaves intact the special usage of eternal life in the Gospels.

The Lord Jesus said in John vii. 6, 8, "My time (season) is not yet come", but in Matt. xxvi. 18 it had come, for He now says "My time (season) is at hand (drawn near)". This was the particular point of all time when He should offer Himself as the Antitype of the Passover Lamb, with the consequence that the gospel of His grace can be proclaimed and we can tell men and women that 'now is the accepted time (season), now is the day of salvation' (II Cor. vi. 2).

There is not only a season for truth, but also for the lie and its outworking. The Apostle in II Tim. iii. 1 warns of perilous times (seasons) to come in the last days of this age, a season when sound doctrine, the truth of God, will not be endured (II Tim. iv. 3). This will lead on to the time or season when Antichrist shall be revealed (II Thess. ii. 6) who will be destroyed by the revelation from heaven of the Lord Jesus (II Thess. ii. 8). There is a season and a fitting time to every purpose under the heaven (Eccles. iii. 1) and truth for this Gentile age, while Israel as a nation is laid aside in unbelief, is revealed by the ascended Christ through Paul, the Apostle of the Gentiles. This completes the Word of God (Col. i. 25).

So in Titus i. 3 he refers to the proclamation (preaching) of the truth which had been entrusted to him according to God's commandment. This was now manifested, because 'its own peculiar season' for its revelation had come with the rejection of Israel, the covenant people.

Paul uses the same phrase in I Tim. ii. 6, "There is one God, and one Mediator between God and man, the Man Christ Jesus, who gave Himself as a ransom for all to be testified in due time". The Greek reads literally 'the testimony (concerning His work as Mediator) to be rendered in its own season". That season had arrived and Paul was the channel through which it was made known. The essence of dispensational truth is that recognition of the fact that there is a fitting time in the purpose of God for the revelation of truth. This is decided by the all-wise God and confusion is bound to result if due recognition is not given to this fact. If we read future truth into the past, or past truth into the present or future, we shall cloud our own minds and those with whom we come into contact.

The witness given by the Lord Jesus Christ through the Apostle of the Gentiles, after Israel's apostasy, is essentially truth for the times. Now is the fitting season of its revelation and the working out of that phase of Divine Plan which is made known therein. This concerns God's purpose for the heavenlies and the Church of the Mystery which is the glorious subject of Paul's Prison Epistles and the Pastoral Epistles written after Acts xxviii. Let us search this treasury of truth afresh and seek the Spirit of wisdom and revelation without which we can never get to know its unsearchable riches (Eph. i. 17, 18; iii. 8 9).

No.4. i. 1 - 9.

We have been considering the important opening section of this epistle, verses 1-4, marked "A" on the structure (see page 28). The Apostle addresses the letter to Titus, 'my own son'. The R.V. corrects this to 'my true child, after the common faith'. Gnesios is used as a substantive in II Cor. viii. 8 and is translated there 'the sincerity of your love'. In Phil. iv. 3 Paul addresses one whom he calls 'true yokefellow'. He uses this same phrase of Timothy in I Tim. i. 2. This clearly indicates that both Timothy and Titus were saved under the Apostle's ministry, and while he may not have had children in the flesh, the Lord gave him true spiritual sons who followed in his footsteps, and in view of the nearness of the end of his witness and the growing false teaching which was endangering the truth, he concentrates in these pastoral letters his instructions and spiritual guidance so that they should stand fast themselves and encourage others so to do.

The salutation is 'grace and peace, from God the Father and Christ Jesus, our Saviour' (R.V.). We have before commented on the way these titles are alternated in this epistle. The structure shows this clearly, throwing into prominence the word 'Saviour', which is used both of God the Father and the Lord Jesus. We have one God and one Saviour and He is God manifest in the flesh, the Lord Jesus Christ.

Verse 5 continues 'for this cause I left thee behind in Crete that thou mightest set right the things that are lacking, and appoint elders in every city as I commanded thee'.

It is obvious from this statement that Paul was not able to finish the work he had commenced when visiting the island after his release from imprisonment, and so he left Titus behind to 'set right' or 'correct' things that were still lacking. As to what these were the rest of the epistle makes clear. First of all there were no recognized leaders, and knowing the importance of true leadership, Paul gives this first place in his instructions to his son in the faith.

One must clearly keep in mind two things concerning the background of this epistle, (1) the character of the Cretans (see verses 12, 13) and (2) the false teaching which was spreading so insidiously into the assemblies and upsetting the faith of many. The leader had to be separate from all that this represents. Two words are used for such in the pastoral letters of Paul, presbuteros (elder) and episkopos (bishop). These designate one office (compare Acts xx. 17 with verse 28 where these words are used interchangeably). They occur again in the context we are considering (Titus i. 5, 7). It hardly seems necessary to say that these elders or bishops bear little or no relationship to those of the present day. There were no such distinctions as clergy and laity at this time, which came into being centuries later and are completely unscriptural. These overseers were humble men, chosen for their character in the home and loyalty to the truth, and were thus able to take care of the church of God.

The Apostle now points out these characteristics to Titus and exhorts him to seek for such and appoint them as leaders. Such leaders must be blameless (verses 6 and 7), the meaning of which is expanded by the context and the items that follow, the husband of one wife, and having faithful or believing children, not under accusation of riot or disobedience. The phrase "the husband of one wife" can be interpreted in two ways: (1) the opposite of polygamy; (2) only marrying once and having one wife, so that in the event of the wife's death, the husband must not marry again. Alford strongly contends for view (2) though it is difficult to see why a man should be better equipped in the Lord's work by not marrying the second time, unless the Apostle had the principle of I Cor. vii. 32, 35 in mind. We know that polygamy was practiced by the Jews at the time of writing this epistle and it may be this that is what is warned against. The Greek can bear either meaning, but if the second is the teaching of the passage, then it would certainly rule out many prominent Christian leaders of the present time.

Verse 6 goes on to stress the character of the home, 'having believing children, not accused of riot or insubordinate'. Paul had also stressed this in his first letter to Timothy. Chapter iii. 1-7 largely cover the same ground as the context we are considering. An overseer (bishop) must be 'one that ruleth well his own house . . . . . (for if a man know not how to rule his own house, how shall he take care of the church of God?)". The logic of this is inescapable. The manifestation of truth begins in the home, if a man cannot shine there, he cannot shine anywhere for the Lord.

It is interesting to notice the words which are common to I Timothy and Titus. Sophron, 'of good behaviour' (I Tim. iii. 2) Sober (Titus i. 8); me plekten, 'no striker' (I Tim. iii. 3; Titus i. 7); hiloxenon 'hospitable' (I Tim. iii. 2; Titus i. 8). In both cases "A husband of one wife" is stressed. Hospitality was an important Christian grace in early times. The church was often found in the house and traveling Christians could not resort to the houses of the heathen. The need therefore for hospitality on the part of those called to lead was obvious. This is still an essential part of Christian witness today. The burden usually falls more on the woman than the man, but in doing this as unto the Lord, a sister in Christ is rendering a valuable Christian act which is not unnoticed by Him. "Do not forget hospitality, for by this some entertained angels unawares" (Heb. xiii. 2). "Use hospitality to one another without murmuring" (I Pet. iv. 9). Any element of grudging or complaining spoils this important service in the Lord' sight. It must be done willingly and gladly as unto Him.

The word sophron (sober) and its derivatives form a prominent feature of this epistle. We tabulate them accordingly:

Sophron

i. 8. Sober.
ii. 2. Temperate.
ii. 5. Discreet.

Sophronos

ii. 12. Live soberly.

Sophroneo

ii. 6. Sober minded.

Sophronizo

ii. 4. Young women to be sober.

Sophron comes from two words, sos 'sound' and allied to 'salvation', and phren 'mind' and means of a sound mind as opposed to madness or even perhaps 'salvation-minded'. Sophronismos occurs in II Tim. i. 7, "God hath not given us the spirit of fear, but of power, and of love, and of a sound mind". This surely is one of the greatest of God's gifts to His redeemed children. Of what use can we be to Him or to our fellow creatures, apart from a healthy balanced mind? We walk with our minds primarily, not our feet, and every conscious action is directed by the mind. Salvation starts internally with the mind and the Greek sophron describes this mind and its effects in action. It is difficult to find one word in English that will adequately carry its meaning over. Perhaps 'discreet' and 'discretion' come nearest.

Dr. E. W. Bullinger says of sophroneo in his Lexicon 'to be of sound mind; think and act discreetly, to use sound judgment and moderation'. The rendering of the A.V. 'sober' is not good, as it is likely to be restricted in meaning to restraint in respect of wine, or to going about with a long face, a feature which some Christians seem to think glorifies the Lord.

It was essential that one who was called to be an overseer or bishop should practically exhibit this healthy, balanced and controlled outlook in word and action. This is attractive and would have a beneficial effect in every way on those who were in his charge. It is none the less essential today. If Christian beliefs do not lead to a wholesome sanity and balance, then they are of little use however high sounding they may appear.

A man truthfully so described would be a 'lover of good, just, holy and temperate' (Titus i. 8). He is called upon to 'hold fast the faithful word' and according to the instruction (didachen) in order that he may be able both to encourage with healthy teaching and to reprove (or convict) the gainsayers'. We give here a rendering that is nearer the original. The instruction referred to, was that pattern of truth given to Paul by the ascended Christ and now passed on to Timothy and Titus and all those who were called of God to take the lead in witness. Anything else would not be 'truth for the times'. Such were reminded that they were 'stewards of God' (verse 7). Oikonomos translated steward, is allied to oikonomia, dispensation, which is not so much a period of time, but a stewardship committed, that is, truth that had been entrusted by God to use and proclaim faithfully and live out in practice. All members of the Body are in some measure dispensers of a dispensation. They must do it in view of God's reckoning day when all will be asked by Him to 'give an account of their stewardship'. Only two classes will exist at that time, good (just) stewards, and bad (unjust) stewards. How we should covet to be in the former class! Of what use will be any material or worldly gains then? Or the approval of men whether Christian or otherwise?

The healthy teaching the context talks about is linked with the healthy mind we have been considering, although the word here is not sophron, but a part of the verb hugiano 'to be well in health', and then with regard to doctrine, to be sound, having no mixture of falsehood. This healthy teaching has two ends in view: (1) to encourage the faithful and (2) to reprove the opposers of the Truth.

The word translated encourage gives us the English paraclete rendered Comforter and Advocate as applied to the Holy Spirit and the Lord Jesus Christ (John xvi. 7; I John ii. 1). All who are determined to walk the way of the Truth rightly divided, will need encouragement and how great this is when we go on to absorb the testimony of the Lord given through His Prisoner! (II Tim. i. 8). It leads to a full assurance of faith and hope and steadfastness.

On the other hand we shall not go far before we meet the opposers. Satan will see to this, for he has challenged God's truth right from the beginning and the battle is still raging. The only equipment which is sufficient for all needs is this faithful Word committed to us. To attempt to combat error in any other way is to meet it with the arm of flesh and court defeat. We should hold it forth in a spirit of love and meekness as we are enjoined in II Tim. ii. 25, knowing that the inspired Word is profitable for reproof and correction as well as for doctrine and instruction in righteousness (II Tim. iii. 16, 17).

Thus Paul enjoined Titus to instruct those who were called to be overseers. The qualifications were rigid. They must be faithful men who would cling fast to the faithful Word and proclaim it in season and out of season, whether it pleased or displeased their hearers. Only in this way could false teaching be successfully combated and the Truth made known. We shall, D.V., consider in our next article the nature of the opposition that existed in Crete at the time of writing this epistle.

No.5. i. 10 - ii. 1.
pp. 85 - 88

In our last article we considered the type of person that the Apostle Paul designated in chapter i. 6-9, who was fitted to be a bishop or overseer. We saw that the necessary qualities were homely and lowly ones rather than of education, scholarship or worldly position. An overseer in Crete had special difficulties to contend with, namely, the lax character generally of Cretans (verse 12) and the opposition to the Truth that was endangering the faith of believers.

This opposition Timothy had to face too, and this accounts for the similarity of warnings in both I Timothy and Titus. Paul describes the opposers as "many insubordinate and vain talkers and mind-deceivers, specially those of the circumcision" (i. 10). The word phrenapatai, translated deceivers, only occurs here and in verbal form in Gal. vi. 3. It is the very opposite of sophron, the sound mind that we have already considered.

The mind of man is the battle ground between truth and error. Sin darkens and enslaves the mind and its thinking, whereas salvation and redemption snaps the chains, and the Holy Spirit renews the mind so that the things of God can be appreciated and received in each person's measure. Satan uses many and various means to get control of the human mind, but the object is always the same, namely its enslavement and subjection to himself. Even for the believer in Christ there is the danger of giving place to the Devil (Eph. iv. 27) and coming under his snare (II Tim. ii. 25, 26), and there is only one sure safeguard and that is to 'hold fast the faithful word' (Titus i. 9). Directly a Christian refuses to submit his thinking to God's revealed Word of truth he becomes a prey to error and bondage, however fair and good it is dressed up externally.

Those concerning whom Paul is warning Titus were in such a position. They were 'insubordinate' (unruly); they refused to submit themselves to that pattern of truth which had been committed to the Apostle and made known through him. They were chiefly Jews (i. 10) and while it may not be possible to say in detail what was the error they were propagating, one can judge from the references given in I Timothy and Titus that they were largely misinterpretations and additions to the O.T. Thus we have 'endless genealogies and fables (myths)' (I Tim. iv. 7; Titus iii. 9). They adulterated God's pure Word with their own fanciful and pernicious idea concerning descent, human or divine, so adding the 'commandments of men' (Titus i. 14) and destroying its truth. There were 'strivings about the law' (iii. 9) all of which the Apostle describes as 'unprofitable and vain' (verse 9) only leading to contention and disunity. Paul also refers to 'Jewish myths (fables)' (Titus i. 4). These were probably the seeds of Gnostic mythology already taking root and which were later on in the second century to bear such evil results. As we compare I Tim. iv. 3 and Col. ii. 16 22 it appears that these 'commandments of men' related to abstinence from meats and other things, seeking to promulgate a false standard of holiness (I Tim. iv. 3). To such the Apostle's reply was 'unto the pure all things (including the question of foods) are pure'. Those who have the sound healthy mind that the Truth brings can regard all legitimate things in this way. The differences in foods clean or unclean belonged to a past dispensation and their introduction here could only be a backward step that would lead to bondage and swerving from the good deposit which had been made known to Paul by the risen and ascended Saviour.

Those who were promulgating such teaching might 'profess to know God' (verse 16); indeed they did, hence the term 'gnosticism' which comes from the Greek word for knowledge, but this knowledge was not in accordance with the sound pattern of Truth ministered through the Apostle of the Gentiles. It was "knowledge falsely so called" (I Tim. vi. 20, 21). The reader must remember that the A.V. 'science' has no reference to the modern usage of the term. Here it is again gnosis (knowledge) but a knowledge derived from the lie (pseudonumou).

All error does one or both of two things to the Living Word and the Written Word. It either adds or detracts, in either case taking away from the completeness of the Lord Jesus and the Word of God. The traditions of the Pharisees and of the present day are an example of the former, while modernism is an example of the latter.

As before mentioned, in Paul's day we have the beginnings of error which afterwards developed into what is known as gnosticism. Broadly speaking its basic ideas were that matter is evil and only spirit is good, but by special knowledge of a kind known only to the initiates, the spirit of man might be released from its material bondage and rise upward to God through various mediators of their own devising. Thus it denied the possibility of a real incarnation, for God, being holy, could not be regarded as coming into contact with evil matter such as the body. It also sets aside the one Mediator, Christ Jesus. So redemption by blood was ruled out and a blow struck at the very foundation of Christian Truth.

It is important to note too that John, in his first epistle, combats the same error, insisting that it was the spirit of antichrist that denied that Jesus Christ had come in the flesh (I John iv. 1-3; II John 7) and as the epistle closes, he reiterates the word 'know' as a challenge to the false teachers (I John v. 2, 13, 15, 18, 19, 20).

All this was what Titus and Timothy as instructors and leaders had to face, hence Paul's insistence on sound or healthy doctrine. "My doctrine", he calls it (II Tim. iii. 10), or the 'form of sound words which thou hast heard of me' which must be held fast (i. 13). It was the 'testimony of the Lord' passing through His prisoner (i. 8), and as such has been the standard of truth for this age against which all Christian witness and service must be measured.

Paul designates the opposers as 'abominable, and disobedient and unto every good work reprobate' (Titus i. 16). Adokimos is the word translated reprobate; literally 'not approved', the very opposite to the unashamed workman of II Tim. ii. 15. But in contrast the Apostle exhorts Titus to "speak the things that become healthy doctrine" (ii. 1). If the reader consults the structure of the epistle given at the beginning of this series, he will see that this member "C" balances ii. 15 - iii. 1, where again Titus is encouraged to 'speak, exhort and rebuke with all authority', and the context gives the same healthy doctrine dealing with the One who has redeemed us from all lawlessness and purified to Himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works (verse 14). Sound or healthy doctrine occurs four times in the Pastoral Epistles as follows:

A | I Tim. i. 10. Any other thing contrary to sound doctrine.
B | Titus i. 9. Sound doctrine to convince the gainsayers.
B | Titus ii. 1. Speak things which become sound doctrine.
A | II Tim. iv. 3. They will not endure sound doctrine.

Doctrine or teaching is referred to four times in the epistle to Titus (i. 9; ii. 1, 7, 10). Sound doctrine is now expanded and brought to bear upon the conduct of those who are elderly both men and women (ii. 2, 3), then the young women and young men (4-6), and slaves with respect to their masters (9). The elderly men are to be sober. This is not the translation of sophron, discreet, but nephalious which comes nearer the English sober than sophron. It means temperate specially in respect to wine. They are to be grave (semnos). The word occurs in I Tim. iii. 8, 11 and Phil. iv. 8 where it is translated honest. The noun semnotes is found in I Tim. ii. 2. It occurs in iii. 4, and Titus ii. 7 where it is rendered gravity.

This is as likely to be misunderstood as the word sophron, usually translated sober. It is derived from sebomai to worship or reverence, and it indicates a dignity or character that merits respect, not one that is long faced and miserable. Such would always be serious in purpose though not necessarily always serious in demeanour. They too must be 'discreet, sound in faith, in love, in endurance'. The aged women in deportment are to be as becomes saints, not slanderers not enslaved to much wine but teachers of beautiful things (literally), that they may school the young women to be lovers of their husbands and children, discreet, chaste, workers at home, obedient to their own husbands, so that the Word of God be not till spoken of.

The A.V. translates the Greek blasphemetai literally, 'that the word of God be not blasphemed'. This occurs twice in this epistle, which the structure throws into relief. Its second occurrence is in chapter iii. 2: 'put them in remembrance . . . . . to speak evil of no man.' In English we keep the word blaspheme to impious words against God, but this context shows it is possible to blaspheme one another. Parkhurst's definition of this word is "to hurt or wound a person's reputation by evil reports". Alas, what terrible damage the little member called the tongue can do if it is not controlled by grace! The Apostle James vividly portrays what unsanctified speech can lead to:

> "Even so the tongue is a little member and boasteth great things. Behold, how great a matter a little fire kindleth! And the tongue is a fire, a world of iniquity; so is the tongue among our member, that it defileth the whole body, and setteth on fire the course of nature; and it is set on fire of hell . . . . . the tongue no man can tame; it is an unruly evil, full of deadly poison" (James iii. 5-8).

Paul knew what it was to suffer by the evil reports, spread about by others. In Rom. iii. 8 he declares he was 'slanderously reported' (blasphemoumetha). He uses the word again when he says, 'being defamed, we intreat' (I Cor. iv. 130.

Growth in grace and progression to maturity or perfection (Heb vi. 1) is marked not only by controlled action, but by controlled speech.

> "If any man offend not in word, the same is a perfect (mature) man, and able also to bridle the whole body" (James iii. 2).

The Lord Jesus said in a solemn context: "But I say unto you, that every idle word that men shall speak, they shall give account thereof in the day of judgment" (Matt. xii. 36). The word idle is argos which means literally 'not working', or non-productive, that is, of good.

Again in James i. 26 we are reminded that:

> "If any many among you seem to be religious, and bridelth not his tongue . . . . . this man's religion is vain."

We do well, therefore, to take our words seriously especially of others, lest we blaspheme both God and man. The O.T. has also something solemn to say about this (Lev. xix. 16).

Love in action will mould speech as well as deeds and will endeavour to 'cover a multitude of sins' (I Pet. iv. 8). It will always seek to be just and fair and to give credit where it is due, encouragement and a word in season where it is needed. All this is wrapped up in the healthy doctrine of Titus ii. 1. We shall need the emptying of self and Divine strengthening in order that we can not only believe and accept such healthy teaching but seek to adorn it by a practical response in word and deed. In this way it will be made beautiful in the eyes of others who are watching our lives and witness (Titus ii. 10).

No.6. ii. 1 - 13.

The Apostle has explained the practical implications of healthy (sound) doctrine as it affects the elder and younger men and women, and also slaves with regard to their relationship to their masters. All this flows out of verse 11 of chapter ii.:

> "For the grace of God that bringeth salvation hath appeared to all men, teaching us that, denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should live soberly, righteously, and godly in this present world, looking for that blessed Hope and the appearing of the glory of our great God and Saviour, Jesus Christ."

The carrying into effect of Paul's "healthy teaching" is the 'adornment' of the wondrous revelation of God's grace which instructs us so to respond and glorify Him.

The structure of the epistle brings out the two occurrences of epephane, 'appeared'. Chapter ii. 11, the grace of God 'appeared', and in iii. 4 the kindness and love toward man of God our Saviour 'appeared', resulting in salvation for all who have responded to such exceeding grace. This takes us back to His first Coming. But in ii. 13 our minds are directed to the future Hope and here we have epiphaneia, appearing, which is derived from epiphanes, a related word. It is also used of the First Coming in II Tim. i. 10.

So we see that all practical Christian response resolves around the great doctrines concerning the first appearing of Christ in the flesh and His future appearing in glory.

As the word epiphaneia is so intimately connected with our hope, we must pause to give careful consideration to its usage and teaching. The verbal form, epiphaino means 'to shine over or upon', 'to give light to' (Luke i. 79) and in the passive, 'to appear' or 'be manifested'. In this latter form the verb in Titus occurs in the two contexts we have mentioned. In classical Greek the word has the force of coming suddenly into view, and epiphaneia, the sudden appearance of an enemy. Parkhurst points out that the Greek writers particularly apply this word to the appearance of some deity in splendour. In later Greek, the papyri show that it is used in the sense of manifestation, or any conspicuous intervention on the part of higher powers.

It only occurs twice in the Septuagint (II Sam. vii. 23 and Amos v. 22) but often in the Apocrypha (Maccabees 2) where it is used of God's supernatural appearances in aid of His people. Some English versions translate it as 'advent', but this word, through the Latin, with its meaning of 'coming', does not convey the real sense and therefore must be rejected. Moreover, if translated thus it is apt to be used as synonymous with the word parousia (also translated 'coming'), which it is not.

To sum up, epiphaneia, when connected with a person, means their sudden appearance, manifestation, or coming into view, after being hidden.

Let us now note the occurrences of this word in the NT. The Apostle Paul is the only writer who is inspired to use it, and with one exception, all the occurrences are in the epistles written after Acts xxviii.:

> "That wicked one . . . . . whom the Lord . . . . . shall destroy with the brightness of His parousia (coming)" (II Thess. ii. 8).
> "Thou keep . . . . . until the appearing of our Lord Jesus Christ" (I Tim. vi. 14).
> "By the appearing of our Saviour Jesus Christ" (II Tim. i. 10).
> "At His appearing and His Kingdom" (II Tim. iv. 1).
> "To them who have loved His appearing" (II Tim. iv. 8).
> "The appearing of the glory of our great God and Saviour Jesus Christ" (Titus ii. 13).

It will be noted that the one occurrence before Acts xxviii., namely II Thess. ii. 8, is not parallel with its usage afterwards. There it does not stand alone describing the hope of the church, but is used to add detail to the parousia of Christ (Matt. xxiv. 29, 30), Whose overwhelming and revealed power will destroy the man of sin. In the later occurrences it stands alone, bringing before us a new aspect of hope for the church which is His Body. Up to the end of the Acts, the hope of Israel has been dominant (Acts iii. 19-26; xxvi. 6, 7; xxviii. 20) and coloured the hope of the church of that period.

Now that Israel, the nation, has been laid aside in unbelief and hardness of heart, and the Mystery revealed concerning God's purpose to bless some of His redeemed children in the heavenly places where Christ is seated, a new aspect of hope is stressed and epiphaneia, standing by itself, is used by the Holy Spirit to describe the consummation of salvation for this church.

The word 'appearing' suggests that, in some way, the glory of Christ is now hidden. This is also brought forward in Col. iii. 2-4:

> ". . . . . Seek those things which are above where Christ is seated at the right hand of God. Set your mind on things above, not on things on the earth; for ye died, and your life has been hid with Christ in God. When Christ, who is our life, shall be manifested, then also you with Him will be manifested in glory."

The word translated manifested is phaneroo and generally has the thought of bringing to light something that has been hidden (Mark xvi. 12, 14; Col. i. 26; I Tim. iii. 16).

Hope is the final realization of what we now hold by faith. By faith we are now seated together in the heavenly places in Christ Jesus (Eph. ii. 6); realized hope will take us actually there whether living or dead (II Tim. iv. 1). Then the stupendous glory of our great God and Saviour Christ Jesus will be revealed in the heavenly holiest of all. But this will not be the glory of Christ by Himself. It will be the revealed glory of Head and Body united for the first time. Or if we look to the tremendous goal of Eph. ii. 19-22 when this church will be completed and constitute a holy Temple, a 'dwelling place for God' in the heavenly places. Then the glory of our Saviour will fill it completely, as the glory of God did in the earthly type of Solomon's temple (II Chron. vii. 1, 2). It will be manifested there to all the heavenly host, and we shall have the highest honour of being living stones in that dwelling place of splendour, majesty and infinite joy.

This is indeed a 'blessed hope', one that words can only faintly portray. No wonder Paul prayed for the Ephesian saints that they should have enlightened eyes in order to know it for themselves (Eph. i. 17, 18). We are sometimes told that this is 'nebulous', 'ephemeral' or 'unreal'. People who talk like this want us to be able to describe this hope in earthly terms that our human senses can appreciate. They do not realize that this high calling, going far beyond the limitation of earthly things and earthly experiences, being related to a heavenly sphere that we know nothing about apart from the Scriptures is practically indescribable in human words. If we could so describe it, then it would not be the tremendous goal that the post-Acts epistles of Paul reveal.

The phase of the Second Advent that relates to the earth can be far more easily appreciated because we are within our own human sphere and can well imagine what the effect of such a Coming will be on earthly things and the activities of men. But the destiny of this church is so exalted that earthly terms utterly fail to adequately describe it. It is true to say that this highly favoured company will constitute the holiest of all itself. It will indeed be 'the fullness of Christ' (Eph. i. 23). In which case we can give humble and grateful thanks to the Father 'who has made us sufficient to be partakers of the holiest of all in the light' (Col. i. 12 contrast I Tim. vi. 14-16). What an exceeding work of grace was needed to do this! And what a change will be necessary for this body of weakness and humiliation! It will need nothing less than one fashioned like the body of His glory! (Phil. iii. 20, 21).

Some believers are greatly concerned as to how this will happen. In fact they seem to be more concerned with how they will get to glory than to appreciate the hope itself, the certainty of being there. The method has already been given in earlier epistles. It will be by change and rapture for those who are living and resurrection for those who have died. There can be no other way. We have no reason to believe that the hope of the Church which is the fullness of Him that filleth all in all, will be any less instantaneous than that of I Cor. xv. 51, 52. We shall know nothing about the process for it will be quicker than the 'twinkling of an eye'. The fact remains that we shall be there in the glory with our exalted Saviour and Head as His Temple and dwelling place. Surely then we can live, looking for such a wonderful hope to be realized (Titus ii. 13)? The word translated 'looking' is prosdechomai. This is used (1) of things, to admit or to allow; (2) of persons, to receive kindly, to entertain as a guest and (3) of things future, to wait for, to expect with confidence.

In this third sense it is used in Luke xii. 36, "and ye yourselves like unto men that wait for their Lord" or of Joseph of Arimathaea who waited for the Kingdom of God (Luke xxiii. 51). So here in Titus ii. 13; we should 'live . . . . . waiting for that blessed hope and the manifesting of the glory of our great God and Saviour Christ Jesus'. We shall certainly need divine patience to wait. This is one of the fruits of the Spirit which we all need so much, but it must be practical patience, not the patience of idleness. The best way we can practically manifest such an attitude is to continually seek His will in service and witness and then, by His grace and strengthening, to carry this out in deed and truth, all the while remembering that our eternal home is not here, but it already exists as a present fact in the heavens (Phil. iii. 20).

During this present life we have to deal with the things of earth in a measure, but wise are we if we do not allow these things to completely monopolize our thinking and outlook. The bent of our mind should be upon heavenly things where Christ is now enthroned (Col. iii. 1, 2) and where our life and citizenship now exist. To have the bent of our minds on earthly things is exceedingly dangerous, as Phil. iii. 19 warns us. Beware of any system of Bible teaching or theology that leans this way, even though it is dressed up attractively. We are a heavenly people with a destiny in the plan of God to carry out a phase of His purposes in the heavens 'far above all', just as redeemed Israel will be used on the earth. Our high calling has wonders beyond our dreams, safely treasured in Christ Jesus. Let us live with exceeding joy, anticipating the glories to come, which are as sure and certain as our Saviour Himself.

No.7. ii. 13, 14 – iii. 6.
pp. 156 - 160

We are still dealing with the wonderful context of Titus ii. 13, 14; having considered something of the magnificent hope which lies before every member of the Body of Christ, the manifesting of the glory of our great God and Saviour Jesus Christ in the heavenlies. Verse 14 continues:

> "Who gave Himself for us, that He might redeem us from all iniquity, and purify unto Himself a people for His own possession, zealous of good works."

This redemption was not effected by God merely putting forth His mighty power on our behalf. It goes infinitely deeper than that. It needed nothing less than the Lord Jesus 'giving Himself', and in giving Himself, He gave everything; "the Son of God, Who loved me and gave Himself for me" said the Apostle (Gal. ii. 20). In the same epistle we are told Christ 'gave Himself for our sins' (i. 4). Twice in Ephesians is this supreme Gift mentioned:

> "Walk in love . . . . . as Christ also . . . . . hath given Himself for us . . . . ." (v. 2).
> "Husbands, love your wives, even as Christ also loved the church, and gave Himself for it" (v. 25).

Again in I Tim. ii. 6 R.V.:

> ". . . . . Christ Jesus, Who gave Himself a ransom for all; the testimony to be borne in its own times."

The last reference is linked with the verse we are considering, for the verb lutroo translated 'redeem' in Titus ii. 14, is from lutron a ransom, 'to deliver by the payment of a price'. Two distinct aspects of the redeeming work of the Son of God are brought forward here; 'to redeem' and 'to purify'. In the O.T. types the Passover and the Exodus set forth the former, whereas the Tabernacle with its cleansing by water, or by the blood and ashes of a red heifer, show forth the latter. We not only need to be set free from the bondage of sin and death, but also to be made clean from their defilement. Iniquity is the Greek anomia, 'not subject to law', and therefore is better rendered 'lawlessness'. The cleansing or purifying (katharizo) is brought before us again in Eph. v. 26:

> "That He might sanctify and cleanse (katharizo) it (the church) with the washing of water by the Word", and how we can rejoice when we realize that not a spot or blemish remains after God's cleansing! This, the Apostle tells us, relates to 'a peculiar people, zealous of good works'. "Peculiar people" is laon periousion. The latter word comes from perieimi, to be over and above. As regards the Scripture it is found only in the LXX and here although there are examples of it in the papyri. The translators of the LXX seemed to use it in the sense of "one's own possession", and they use it to translate the Hebrew segullah 'peculiar treasure', referring to the people of Israel:

> "Now therefore, if ye will obey My voice indeed, and keep my covenant, then ye shall be a peculiar treasure unto Me above all people . . . . ." (Exod. xix. 5).

It is used similarly in Deut. xiv. 2; xxvi. 18; Psa. cxxxv. 4; Mal. iii. 17 (jewels). The phrase 'peculiar people' in I Pet. ii. 9 is not the same. Peripoiesis is the word used in this context, but the thought is similar. It should be noted that these words are used of Jewish believers, the Israel of God, and so there is a link with the 'peculiar treasure' of the O.T. Neither of these terms are used of Gentiles independently of Israel till after that nation is laid aside in unbelief at Acts xxviii. Now the Body of Christ, the heavenly people, is the special treasure, a people for the Lord's own possession, and they should be 'zealous of good works'.

It is possible for us to be keen on many things, but can we honestly say we have a burning zeal for good works? Knowledge without zeal is barren and unfruitful. Zeal without knowledge can be dangerous. Some may be surprised that Paul stresses good works so emphatically in this epistle. While he is led to set aside completely any form of good works or merit in obtaining salvation, 'not of works, lest any man should boast' (Eph. ii. 9), yet he immediately adds 'for we are His workmanship, created in Christ Jesus unto good works' (10) and truth is not seen in balance until equal prominence is given to both these statements. There have been those who have so emphasized grace apart from works, that the need for righteous living has been overlooked. This is certainly not to the glory of God.

It will be helpful if we set out the occurrences of 'works' in the epistle to Titus:

A | i. 16. In works they deny Him.
i. 16. unto every good work reprobate.
B | ii. 7. Titus, a pattern of good works.
C | ii. 14. A redeemed people zealous of good works.
B | iii. 1. (Cretan believers) ready unto every good work.
C | iii. 5. His mercy saved us, not by works of righteousness.
A | iii. 8. Believers maintain good works.
iii. 14. Our (people) maintain good works.

The emphasis on the believer producing and maintaining good works is plain for all to see, and may the Lord give us all grace and strength so to do (see also II Cor. ix. 8; II Tim. ii. 21 and iii. 17).

Not only does the Apostle stress this, but he instructs Titus to follow his example:

> "These things speak and exhort and reprove with all authority. Let no man despise thee" (ii. 15 R.V.).

We find similar teaching in I Tim. iv. 11, 12.

The first verse of chapter iii. again mentions good works with the added injunction to be obedient to rulers. We give the R.V. rendering:

> "Put them in mind to be in subjection to rulers, to authorities, to be obedient, to be ready unto every good work."

What should be the attitude of the believer to civil authorities? How wisely the Saviour expressed it when He said:

> "Render therefore unto Caesar the things which are Caesar's; and unto God the things that are God's" (Matt. xxii. 15-21).

This does not mean that God approves of all that governments do, but a measure of organized government is essential if we are to avoid chaos and anarchy, and the Christian does not glorify the Lord by refusing to pay taxes or to comply with regulations which he finds unpleasant. On the contrary he is exhorted to 'pray for kings and all that are in authority' (I Tim. ii. 2). It is only when human rule takes to itself Divine prerogatives and seeks to compel believers to deny the Truth, that exceptions must be taken.

The Apostle continues:

> "To speak evil of no man, not to be contentious, to be gentle, showing all meekness toward all men."

As we have before pointed out, 'to speak evil' is blasphemeo to blaspheme, and it may come as a shock to some to realize that in the Word of God we are warned against blaspheming our fellow man as well as God. The word occurs twice in this epistle as the structure shows:

B2 | ii. 2-8. Believers. Subject (hupotasso)
that Word be not blasphemed (blasphemetai).
A pattern of good works.

* * * * * * *

B4 | iii. -1, 2. Believers. Subject (hupotasso) to authority.
Ready to every good work, not speak evil (blasphemein).

In Christian circles this is often not treated with the seriousness it has in the Scriptures. Some would not dream of stealing a fellow-believer's possessions, but apparently they have no compunction in stealing away his character by untrue or unjust and prejudiced accusations. This has happened again and again by expositors who often have no first-hand knowledge of the people or writings they criticize. Such is sheer misrepresentation or blasphemy and cannot fail to come under the Lord's displeasure, both now and at His judgment seat.

Amachos, not contentious, is literally non-fighter, and is rendered "no brawler" in I Tim. iii. 3. Our wrestling is 'not with flesh and blood' (Eph. vi. 12). "The servant of the Lord must not fight (strive)" (II Tim. ii. 24). The only weapon we are allowed to use is 'the Sword of the Spirit, which is the Word of God' (Eph. vi. 17) and while this must be used faithfully, it should be in love, gentleness and meekness (Titus iii. 2).

The Apostle now looks back to the days when unsaved, just as he does in Eph. ii.:

> "For we also were aforetime foolish, disobedient, deceived, serving divers lusts and pleasures, living in malice and envy, hateful, hating one another" (Titus iii. 3 R.V.)

Not that every believer necessarily exhibited all these vices, but this was the general picture, indicating the great need of God our Saviour:

> "But when the kindness of God our Saviour, and His love toward man appeared" (4).

We are now taken back to the Lord's first appearing and the rich blessings that flow because of his redemptive work at Calvary. Chrestotes kindness, is several times translated 'goodness', e.g., Rom. ii. 4; xi. 22. Love towards man is philanthropia, our English 'philanthropy', which only occurs twice in the N.T., here and Acts xxviii. 2. God's philanthropy rises immeasurably above man's. It is exhibited supremely in the gift of His Beloved Son. In this way was the fathomless love of God manifested (Jn. iii. 16), and it was absolutely undeserved:

> "Not by works of righteousness which we have done, but according to His mercy He saved us, by the washing of regeneration, and renewing of the Holy Ghost, which He shed (poured out) upon us richly through Jesus Christ our Saviour" (5).

Not only do we experience God's kindness and His rich love, but His pity as well, which realized the depth of our need.

What does the washing of regeneration and renewal of the Holy Ghost mean? The word washing is loutron and many commentaries refer this to water baptism and see in it a reference to baptismal regeneration. If this is true, then it means that all who have not been immersed in water are unsaved. The general teaching regarding salvation by grace is perfectly clear in Paul's epistles and is completely divorced from good works, merit, or participation in any sort of ritual. The very context we are considering has just insisted that no righteous deed on our part can save us. One would have thought that this very fact would have prevented expositors from reading any act of water baptism into verse 5. When the N.T. wishes to teach the type or shadow, it uses the word baptism. Paul did not say the 'baptism of regeneration'. Had he meant this, he would have surely said so.

Loutron only occurs once more and that by the Apostle, so we have guidance in the way he uses it. This is found in Eph. v. 26 'the loutron washing of water by the Word'. The last phrase 'by the Word' shows us that literal water cannot be meant, but a figure is being employed. We are cleansed by the Word and the Lord Jesus taught the same truth in John xv. 3:

> "Now ye are clean through the Word which I have spoken unto you."

Likewise in Titus iii. 5. In a dispensation where all the shadows are gone and each member of the Body is filled to the full in Christ (Col. ii. 10, 16, 17) and therefore has the complete and lasting spiritual reality, water baptism is not only unnecessary, it would be an intrusion. The Apostle is teaching the cleansing that accompanies regeneration, and he follows it with the renewing of the Holy Spirit. The genitive here is subjective and is better rendered 'renewal by the Holy Spirit'. Anakainosis is used only elsewhere in Rom. xii. 2 'be ye transformed by the renewing of your mind' and the verb anakainoo also occurs only twice in the New Testament, "the inward man is renewed day by day" (II Cor. iv. 16), and 'ye have . . . . . put on the new man, which is being renewed unto knowledge after the image of Him that created him' (Col. iii. 10 R.V.). In each occurrence it is the work of the Holy Spirit in connection with the mind and its constant renewing. In this way it is also used in Titus iii. 5. This vital and necessary work of the Holy Spirit is no mere trickle. It has been 'poured out upon us richly through Jesus Christ our Saviour'. The glorious redemptive work of the Lord Jesus is the basis upon which this rich ministry of the Holy Spirit operates, putting each member of the Body into the position of being cleansed, and given a constantly renewed mind, which is then capable of receiving Truth and growing thereby.

No.8. iii. 7 – 15.
pp. 168 - 172

Having stressed the importance of the particular aspect of the work of the Holy Spirit in the cleansing and renewal of the mind, the apostle continues:

> "That being justified by His grace, we might be made heirs according to the hope of eternal life."

"That" expresses a purpose. It is hina "in order that", showing us that the great work of salvation, cleansing and renewing has the object of fitting us for an inheritance. All God's redeemed children must have an inheritance somewhere in the perfect new heavens and earth that will eventually come into being. "If children, then heirs" (Rom. viii. 17) is true for all time. The inheritance that lies before the members of the Body is no earthly one, but as Ephesians and Colossians make clear, is linked with the heavenly holiest of all. In other studies we have shown that instead of the word 'saints', we can translate the 'holiest of all' in Eph. i. 18 and Col. i. 12. Eph. i. 14 tells us that the Spirit of promise gives us the earnest or foretaste of this stupendous inheritance now, so this must be included in the 'renewing of the mind' we have just considered.

Justification is nearly always linked with faith in the N.T., but here it is by grace and grace definitely excludes works of any kind, as Rom. xi. 6 makes clear, and this again shows that the washing of regeneration cannot be referring to any act of ritual which can be added to salvation. The hope of eternal life balances chapter i. 2 in the structure of the epistle, and we have seen that there is a phase of eonian life to be enjoyed by the Body of Christ in the heavenlies while the ages run their course, which is not to be confused with the earthly kingdom during the Millennium.

> "Faithful is the saying, and concerning these things I will that thou affirm confidently, to the end that they which have believed God may be careful to maintain good works. These things are good and profitable unto men" (iii. 8 R.V.).

Verse 8 is one of the five 'faithful sayings' of the Pastoral Epistles. We bring together the other occurrences, quoting from the Revised Version:

> "Faithful is the saying, and worthy of all acceptation, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners, of whom I am chief (or first)" (I Tim. i. 15).
>
> "Faithful is the saying, If a man seeketh the office of a bishop, he desireth a good work" (I Tim. iii. 1).
>
> ". . . . . godliness, is profitable for all things, having promise of the life which now is, and of that which is to come. Faithful is the saying, and worthy of all acceptation" (I Tim. iv. 8, 9).
>
> "Faithful is the saying: For if we died with Him, we shall also live with Him" (II Tim. ii. 11).

Some expositors have felt that these sayings are fragments of the earliest Christian hymns, as they exhibit a regular pattern, such as poetry or a hymn would furnish and would tend to impress their truth upon the memory. Note the R.V. affirm confidently rather than the A.V. affirm constantly. Diabebaioomai only occurs elsewhere in I Tim. i. 7 where it is used of the dogmatism of the false teachers. The Apostle was insistent that the balance of truth should be constantly and confidently proclaimed by Titus as a leader; that is to say, while salvation is of God's free grace, apart from any human work, yet, once experienced, it must be followed by good works and Christ-like living as an external fruit of the internal work of the Spirit. There have been some in our day who have so stressed grace in the calling of the Body of Christ that the need for good works has been ruled out, hence the need is still to stress this most practical note, for how otherwise can we adorn or make beautiful the doctrine of God our Savior? (Titus ii. 10).

Ophelimos profitable is confined to these pastoral letters. I Tim. iv. 8 reminds us that bodily exercise profiteth for a little while, not that it has no value at all. In moderation it is necessary for health but it has to be continued for any lasting effect. Godliness, however, is profitable unto all things (I Tim. iv. 8). II Tim. iii. 16 asserts that the God-breathed holy Writings, the Scriptures, are 'profitable for teaching, reproof, correction and instruction which is in righteousness' (R.V.) and in Titus iii. 8 we have the profit of this continued emphasis upon the good works in daily life which practically exhibit the Truth connected with the Body of Christ. These must be maintained, proistemi. This word is used intransitively, 'to take the lead in'. The Apostle is concerned that believers should not only continue in good works, but take the lead in them, as examples to others. May God give us all grace to learn the proper place that this epistle teaches concerning good works and to keep this constantly in mind and practice.

> "but shun foolish questionings, and genealogies, and strifes, and fightings about the law; for they are unprofitable and vain" (iii. 9 R.V.).

These were opposite to the conduct previously enjoined. They were as unprofitable as the maintenance of good works was profitable. Timothy was warned by the Apostle in a similar way, for he had to face like opposition as Titus did:

> "If any man teacheth a different doctrine . . . . . he is puffed up, knowing nothing, but doting about questionings and disputes of words whereof cometh envy, strife, railings, evil surmisings, wranglings of men corrupted in mind and bereft of the truth" (I Tim. vi. 4, 5 R.V.)

These were the Judaistic opposers that Satan was using to seek to wreck the progress of the truth.

> "A man that is heretical after a first and second admonition refuse, knowing that such a one is perverted, and sinneth, being self-condemned" (iii. 10, 11 R.V.).

Heretical hairetikos from haireomai, to choose, really means a self-chooser, one who has decided to reject revealed truth and choose his own ideas. This word has often been used unjustly of those who have sought to progress in the knowledge and acknowledgment of the Word of God, specially when this has conflicted with so-called orthodoxy. Such have been forced to be 'non-conformists' in the truest sense. The Reformers were such, and going back to the beginning so was the Apostle Paul as judged by some of his fellow countrymen:

> "After the way which they call heresy, so worship I the God of my fathers . . . . ." (Acts xxiv. 14).

There is only one standard of true orthodoxy and that is an acceptance and practice of the Word of God rightly divided. As long as this is our position we need not be afraid of such taunts. In fact we are in good company. All else is but the fallible opinion of men, however eminent or religious.

However, the Apostle instructs Titus concerning those who rightly come under the description of heretics, self-choosers, and dividers. Such were perverted. Ekstrepho, to turn inside out, to twist or pervert, is used only here in the N.T. They were to be given two warnings and then, if hot heeded, were to be avoided. The A.V. 'reject' is somewhat too strong, for it sounds like excommunication, but this is not what Paul is enjoining. The R.V. translates 'refuse' and puts 'avoid' in the margin. Similar exhortations are given in the epistles to Timothy, "from such withdraw thyself" (I Tim. vi. 5). "Foolish and unlearned questions avoid" (II Tim. ii. 23). "From such turn away" (II Tim. iii. 5). The only hope for such backsliders is that "God will give them repentance to the acknowledging of the truth" (II Tim. ii. 25).

The closing verses of the epistle have several personal touches. Paul gives instructions concerning Artemas, Tychicus, Zenas and Apollos. Of Artemas we know nothing, for this is the only reference in the N.T. to him, likewise Zenas, the lawyer. The designation 'lawyer' should be understood as one who was expert in the Mosaic law, not necessarily in ordinary civil law. Tychicus is the well-loved follower of the Apostle (Eph. vi. 21; Col. iv. 7; II Tim. iv. 12), also Apollos, the disciple who was 'mighty in the Scriptures' and who had been led on further into the Truth by the gracious witness of Aquila and Priscilla. Zenas and Apollos were possibly bearers of this epistle. They were to be given all facilities for their journey and this would doubtless include hospitality. The early Christians were taught to entertain and provide for Christian travelers, specially those who ministered the Word.

Titus is exhorted to hasten (give diligence) to come to the Apostle at Nicopolis, where he had decided to spend the winter. There were three cities which bore this name, in Cilicia, Thrace or Macedonia, and in Epirus. The latter is probably the one referred to. Augustus had built it to commemorate his naval victory over Mark Anthony in B.C.31. The title means 'city of victory', a fitting place for the close of the Apostle's live; victorious in a very different sense to Caesar Augustus.

> "And let our people also learn to maintain good works for necessary uses, that they be not unfruitful" (iii. 14 R.V.).

Paul cannot close the epistle without another reference to the importance of maintaining good works. If ever a portion of the N.T. clearly teaches the right and the wrong place for good works it is this letter. Much unbalance and wrong doctrine has resulted from this aspect of truth not being appreciated. Good works are likened to fruit. They are the outcome of a healthy root just as in the realm of nature. 'Rooted and grounded' in Christ is the basis for all spiritual growth and practical response, and without this there is no possibility of producing works which will be acceptable to the Lord. The closing words are characteristic of the Apostle:

> "All that are with me salute thee. Salute them that love us in faith. Grace be with you all" (iii. 15 R.V.).

Most evidently he valued the love of his friends, some of whom manifested it by staying with him to the end, as Luke did (II Tim. iv. 11). He concludes with his usual reference to grace as the mark of this being a genuine epistle from him (II Thess. iii. 17, 18).

This letter, together with the two of Timothy, throw a flood of light on the conditions these two overseers had to face, and the wisdom, strength and grace they would need to discharge their responsibilities to the Lord, and to those to whom they ministered. They are a word in season to all who are called upon to lead, for such will always have to deal with those who respond and others who reject and even oppose.

We are thankful for this epistle to Titus with its wholesome balance on doctrine and good works (practice) which should surely follow. It has vividly brought before us the two appearings of the Lord Jesus, the first accomplished nearly 2,000 years ago which provides the basis of all our salvation and calling, and the second which takes our mind to the future and the full assurance of hope that will be realized at the manifestation of the glory of our great God and Saviour. Nothing is dated here; it is a moment known only to God, but there is no prophetic event to be fulfilled first, so we can "live . . . . . looking" in joyful anticipation for it each day. For we know not when the last member of the Body will be gathered in and this may not be long delayed.

Meanwhile may we prove that this is not only a happy and a certain hope, but a very practical one as well, as enabling us to make the most of the time left in faithful witness and full response to whatever the claims of the Lord and His will are upon each of us.

DEAR FELLOW-MEMBERS,

This issue of The Berean Expositor completes Volume XLIV. As we look back over the past two years, we have been saddened by the loss of its founder, Charles H. Welch, yet his long life, his vigorous and faithful witness to a rightly divided Word, is an eloquent testimony to the abounding grace of God, and we are thankful for every remembrance of him. We have his written and taped expositions which are a concrete and permanent expression of his monumental labours in the study of the Scriptures.

We mourn the loss too, of Mrs. E. R. Billington of West Kirby, who for so many years so staunchly supported this witness behind the scenes and maintained a testimony to the Truth in her beautiful home in the Wirral. We are glad to say, however, that others have joined us, mostly young people, who are being gripped by the Word of God and already are taking an active part in the work and witness represented by The Berean Expositor. We are thankful for them and take this opportunity of expressing our appreciation of their efforts, and not only them, but all who lead and labour in the various groups in this country and abroad. Truly it is in "the effectual working in the measure of every part" (Eph iv. 16) that the whole Body of Christ grows and progresses to its goal.

As we look around the world scene and the deepening darkness and apostasy, let us all re-dedicate ourselves and serve to the full while opportunity lasts.

The Funeral of Mr. C. H. Welch.

This took place at the Crystal Palace and District Cemetery, Beckenham, at 3p.m. on Thursday, November 9th 1967. Besides the family, there were about thirty friends present. Two had made the long journey from Scotland, traveling overnight, and one friend came up from Somerset. The service was kept short and simple. The Principal read part of I Cor. xv., and then, in a few words, reminded each one of how much we owe to the Lord and to our brother for his long and loyal witness to the truth. The Assistant Principal closed in prayer, and at the graveside the Principal gave the committal.

The memory of our late President will long be with us for inspiration and encouragement.

ROMANS

Separated unto the gospel of God (Rom. i. 1).

p. 100

"Separate Me Barnabas and Saul for the work whereunto I have called them" (Acts xiii. 2).

Here the word 'separate' is the Greek aphorizo, and it is the identical word that is used by Paul in his epistles regarding his own peculiar apostleship.

> "Separated unto the gospel of God" (Rom. i. 1).
> "It pleased God Who separated me from my mother's womb, and called me by His grace, to reveal His Son in me, that I might preach Him among the Gentiles (heathen)" (Gal. i. 15, 16).

Neither Paul, Peter, John nor any of the apostles 'sent' their epistles, rather they 'delivered' them as "sent" from God. While for convenience we speak of Pauline or Petrine doctrine, that only means that God made choice of His ministers, making Paul "the Apostle of the Gentiles" and Peter the minister and "Apostle of the Circumcision". At Jerusalem on the day of Pentecost "there were 'Jews' out of every nation under heaven", and Peter addressed the gathering as "men of Judea, and all that dwell at Jerusalem", referring them to the prophet Joel for an explanation of the out-pouring of the Spirit. The earthly ministry of the Saviour Himself was limited to "the lost sheep of the house of Israel" and no messenger was sent to "the Gentiles" until He had finished the redemptive work of the Cross, and even then this was not independent of Israel.

Stephen's speech is addressed entirely to "Men, brethren, and fathers", and God is the God of the O.T. Peter refers to "our beloved brother Paul" as having written one epistle to the same Hebrew Christians to whom he was writing, although it contained "some things hard to be understood". The expression "The Apostles" which occurs 21 times in Acts i. - xi. refers only to "The Twelve". Paul comes into the apostolic order in the thirteenth chapter.

The Authorship of the Epistle to the Hebrews.

No.1. pp. 28 - 32

One peculiar characteristic of this epistle is that it commences without a customary salutation, or giving the name of the writer and those to whom it was addressed. This has caused, from the earliest times, considerable research and debate as to who the human author was, even though the epistle is accepted as canonical without question, and part of the inspired Word of God. The A.V. heading: "The Epistle of Paul the Apostle to the Hebrews" is only found in late Greek manuscripts; it is not found in the oldest manuscripts, which simply read Pros Hebraious, To Hebrews, and it is not certain that even this formed part of the original document, but it must have been given to the epistle at an early date in the second century, when it first came into public use as part of a collection of apostolic letters. That this title was undoubtedly right, the internal testimony clearly shows, for its setting forth of the types and shadows given to the fathers of Israel, finally finding their fulfillment in Christ, would have no meaning to the pagan Gentile world to whom the Apostle Paul ministered. It might have had some meaning to the number of God-fearing Gentiles (as Cornelius) who attended the Jewish Synagogue, but there is no evidence whatsoever that these are in the mind of the author of this epistle. It is much more natural to see those addressed as being a number of Hebrew Christians, to whom the Mosaic tabernacle and Levitical offerings would have real meaning, although their residence cannot be determined with absolute certainty.

It is a peculiar fact that, from the first, the Eastern Church decided that the epistle was the Apostle Paul's, if not directly, then mediately, either as a free translation of his words or a reproduction of his thoughts and teaching; whereas the Western Church did not reckon it among the Pauline epistles or recognize its canonical authority until the fourth century A.D.

The first witness is Clement of Rome who shows clear evidence that he was acquainted with it, in the letter he wrote to the Corinthian church about 96A.D., but he nowhere names the epistle or its author. The most explicit testimony is that of the Alexandrian church preserved by Eusebius (264-340) from the lost writings of Clement of Alexandria (about 190-203) and Origen (185-254). Eusebius relates that Clement in his Hypotyposes (sketches or outlines) says: ". . . . . that the epistle is Paul's, and that it was written to Hebrews in the Hebrews (Aramaic) language, and that Luke translated it with zealous care and published it to the Greeks, whence it is that the same complexion of style is found in the translation of this epistle and the Acts". He states further that ". . . . . the phrase, 'Paul an Apostle', was not placed at the head of the epistle for good reason; in writing to the Hebrews who had formed a prejudice against him and viewed him with suspicion, he was wise not to repel them at the beginning by setting his name there". It is possible, from another quotation of Clement, that he derived the idea of an Aramaic original from his master, 'the blessed presbyter', Pantaenus.

Coming to the testimony of Origen, Eusebius gives it in Origen's own words:

> "If I were to express my own opinion I should say that the thoughts are the thoughts of the Apostle, but the language and the composition that of one who recalled from memory and, as it were, made notes of what was said by his master. If therefore any church holds this epistle as Paul's, let it be approved for this also for it was not without reason that men of old time have handed it down as Paul's (that is as substantially expressing his thoughts). But who wrote the epistle God only knows certainly. The account that has reached us is twofold: some say that Clement, who became bishop of the Romans, wrote the epistle; others that Luke wrote it, who wrote the Gospel and the Acts. But on this I will say no more."

This testimony is supplementary to that of Clement's. Origen was obviously aware that some churches did not receive the epistle as Paul's. In the strictest sense of authorship he agreed with them, but at the same time held that it could be regarded as the Apostle's, as embodying his thoughts and doctrine and he (Origen) was prepared to defend it as such. In other writings he uses such phrases as 'in the epistle to the Hebrews, the same Paul says', and "Paul himself, the greatest of the apostles, writing to the Hebrews, says" and then quotes Heb. xii. 18, 23. Origen goes back to the opinion held "in ancient times". As he was born in 185A.D., this must refer to apostolic, or sub-apostolic times. Consequently as Hallet remarks:

> "It is very certain, then, that the churches and writers who were ancient with respect to Origen, had one common tradition, that St. Paul was the author of the epistle to the Hebrews. And their testimony to this matter of fact cannot but be of great weight, since those Christians who were ancients with respect to Origen, must have conversed with the apostles, and at least with their immediate successors."

Origen therefore does not question the ancient tradition that linked the epistle to the Hebrews with Paul's name, but his standpoint is whether the epistle, precisely as we have it in Greek, can have been written by an amanuensis, which was a common occurrence in N.T. times, an example of which we have with the epistle to the Romans. Its material and doctrine is Paul's, but the actual writing was done by Tertius (Rom. xvi. 22), and just how much latitude was given to an amanuensis, we have no means of knowing, this possibly varied according to the attitude of the author and capability of the actual writer. We cannot say that it was always merely verbal dictation. Bishop Westcott sums up as follows:

> "Thus Clement and Origen, both familiar with the details of the tradition of the 'men of old time' to whom they refer, agree in regarding the Greek epistle as Paul's only in a secondary sense. Clement regards it as a free translation of a Hebrew (Aramaic) original, so made by St. Luke as to show the characteristics of his style. Origen regards it as a scholar's reproduction of his master's teaching. Each view must have been consistent with what was generally received . . . . . Both use the epistle as Paul's without any qualification, because it was naturally connected with the collection of his letters. Origen goes so far as to say that he was prepared to show that "the epistle was Paul's" in reply to those "who rejected it as not written by Paul" (Ep. ad Afric.9); and in another passage, preserved in a Latin translation, he speaks of 'fourteen epistles of St. Paul'."
> (Hom. In Jos. VII) "The Epistle to the Hebrews p.lxviii."

Eusebius having included Hebrews among the epistles of Paul, cites it as Pauline in some twenty seven passages. There is no doubt at all that the primitive tradition of the East associated the epistle with Paul, although not written with his actual hand.

In the West it was, as we have noted, altogether different. Irenaeus, bishop of Lyons (from circa 130A.D.) was among the first to cite the N.T. books by their titles, apparently, but rarely mentions the letter to the Hebrews and never declares it to be Pauline. Victorinus (303A.D.), the Muratorian Canon, and Gaius (circa 190) count only 13 epistles of Paul. Cyprian says that Paul wrote to seven churches: Rome, Corinth, Ephesus, Colossae, Philippi, Thessalonica and Galatia. There is no room here for an epistle to the Hebrews. Tertullian, with great decision, names Barnabas as its author. It can be said that, from the second to the fourth century, in Italy and Africa, the Hebrews epistle was held not be an epistle of the Apostle Paul. It came to the Western church but late and slowly. Paul is not named in the introduction, and it was therefore, from this and its un-Pauline Greek, not reckoned to be an epistle of his.

Thus we find two traditions weighing against each other, but that of the East is the heavier in the scale. The latter bears a positive character, whereas the West is negative. Apparently there was no doubt in Alexandria as to who was the real author, but, owing to its style, the amanuensis and translator who had worked it out was questioned. Those who come to a conclusion of authorship solely on internal grounds, should give an adequate explanation as to how the Eastern church so early arrived at the idea that this epistle was one sent from the Apostle Paul, even though he may not have been the actual pen-man.

Was Clement of Rome right in saying that the Hebrews epistle was a translation from an Aramaic original? There are grave doubts that it could have been a literal translation. The epistle has a good number of paronomasias or play on words, such as we find in the Greek of ii. 8; vii. 3, 19, 22-24; x. 29 etc. These and other genuinely Greek constructions would have no corresponding Aramaic equivalents and the development of thought would not lend itself either to Aramaic. The most that can be said is, that if there was such an Aramaic original, the Greek letter is a free reproduction of it, using it only as a basis, and is in no sense a translation.

From the earliest times many scholars have found difficulty in accepting the Pauline authorship of Hebrews, the chief difficulties being (1) the style of the Greek, (2) the statement of Heb. ii. 3, which apparently militates against the independent apostleship of Paul. As regards (1) it must be conceded that the Greek of the epistle to the Hebrews is generally unlike that of the Apostle. It shows everywhere traces of effort and care, and polish, very unlike the impetuous, almost rough Greek at times of the Apostle Paul. We must be careful here however. No one can say with certainty that Paul could not have written such elegant Greek had he desired to do so. On the other hand we may ask why he should have so altered his style when writing to Hebrew Christians? And there seems to be no definite answer. Coming to (2) which has often been put forward by expositors as making the Pauline authorship impossible, we will first quote the verse in full:

> "How shall we escape, if we neglect so great salvation; which at the first began to be spoken by the Lord, and was confirmed unto us by them that heard Him" (Heb. ii. 3).

Nothing is clearer than Paul's independent apostleship received from the risen Christ separately from the Twelve, but here the writer states that he was indebted to those who heard the Lord, namely the Twelve. There are several points which must be considered before we can come to a satisfactory conclusion. The 'us' can be regarded as the editorial 'we', the first person plural of exhortation being used right throughout this epistle. Note in the immediate context "we ought to give the more earnest heed to the things which we have heard, lest at any time we should let them slip . . . . . how shall we escape if we neglect so great salvation". In such a context "Confirmed unto us" is perfectly natural, whereas 'confirmed unto you' would not have been. It is possible that these Hebrew Christians were not the Apostle's converts. They easily could have come to a knowledge of Christ from saved Jews at Pentecost who were afterwards scattered through persecution (Acts viii. 1, 4; xi. 19). The latter could have come directly under the earthly ministry of the Lord Jesus, and thus be truthfully described as 'those who heard Him'. In the antithesis between the word of the law, spoken at Sinai through angels, and the special aspect of salvation which is characteristic of this letter, that of the salvation of the soul (x. 32-39) first spoken of by the Lord (Matt. xvi. 24-28 which Paul never could have heard), and confirmed "unto us", that is Hebrew Christians generally, by those that heard Him. It is significant that one of these, the Apostle Peter, develops this in his first epistle (I Pet. i. 6-9), linking it with the goal of the tested believer's faith, not his initial salvation from sin. The author of Hebrews had in view not so much himself, as his readers. It is because the word salvation here has been construed as the salvation of the sinner rather than the perfecting of the believer, that the problem has risen. Most certainly Paul received the Gospel of grace to the sinner apart from any human instrumentality (Gal. i. 11-12), but salvation in this sense is not found in Hebrews. It should be remembered that the typical teaching in this epistle does not start with the bondage in Egypt and deliverance through the blood of the Passover lamb (which it would have done had the salvation of the sinner been in view), but with the account of a redeemed people journeying through the wilderness with its tests and difficulties, to Canaan, the land of promise. Hence the particular suitability of that aspect of salvation, that of the soul, which so intimately pertains to be saved, having reward in view at the judgment seat of Christ.

From time to time various others, beside Paul, have been put forward as the writer of the epistle to the Hebrews. Tertullian was the first who suggested Barnabas. As a Cypriot and a Levite, he was evidently a man of standing at Jerusalem and would have had an insight into the ritual of the Tabernacle and Temple. He was named by the Apostles as the 'son of consolation' in Acts iv. 36, and the word 'consolation' is the same as 'exhortation' in Heb. xiii. 22. We have no other early evidence beside Tertullian, nor do we know anything of the capability of Barnabas as a writer. The apocryphal Epistle attributed to him does not help as there are too many divergencies between it and the Hebrew epistle. Luther advocated Apollos as author and has been followed by others including Kurtz, Farrar, Alford, and today T. W. Manson, W. F. Howard and C. Spicq. That Apollos was an eloquent man and mighty in the Scriptures, we are assured by the N.T., but again we have no writing of his to compare with, so this is really nothing more than clever guess-work. Harnack maintained that Aquila and Priscilla wrote the epistle, with Priscilla as the main partner, but against this we have xi. 32 ". . . . . the time would fail me telling . . . . ." where the participle diegoumenon, 'telling', is masculine, and once more we have nothing written by Aquila and Priscilla with which to compare the letter to the Hebrews. Sir William Ramsay hazarded Philip the deacon; others have favoured Silas.

Calvin thought of Luke or Clement of Rome as the author, and in the case of Luke we are on different ground, for we have the Acts of the Apostles and his Gospel with which to compare.

Professor F. F. Bruce writes:

> "Stylistically Hebrews is close to the writings of Luke than to anything else in the N.T., but this may be because our author and Luke approximate more closely than other N.T. writers to the model of literary Hellenistic—our author even more than Luke."
> (The Epistle to the Hebrews, p.41).

Many scholars have noticed the remarkable likeness of Luke's Greek to that of Hebrews and we shall have more to say about this later on.

No.2. pp. 53 - 57

One solution to the difficult question of the authorship of this epistle was put forward in 1916 by Dr. J. W. Thirtle, then editor of The Christian, namely that the Hebrews epistle was a covering letter or enclosure circulated with the epistle to the Galatians. He pointed out that in early times the epistle to the Hebrews followed that to the Galatians. This is evident from an examination of the Greek manuscript known as Codex B (Vaticanus) belonging to the fourth century. This famous manuscript exhibits, in the words of Bishop Westcott:

> "A marginal numeration which shows that the whole collection of Pauline epistles was divided, either in its archetype or in some earlier copy, into a series of sections numbered consecutively. In this collection the epistle to the Hebrews comes between the epistle to the Galatians and the Ephesians."
> (The Epistle to the Hebrews, p.xxx).

This arrangement approximates to that of the Thebaic and Bashmuric versions, in which the epistle comes between II Corinthians and Galatians. The mass of later Greek MSS follow the Syriac and place the epistle after the pastoral epistles and Philemon, which order has passed into the Received Text probably under this influence, and so gives us its present place in the N.T. Dr. F. H. Scrivener gives a similar testimony in his Introduction to the Criticism of the New Testament p.54:

> "The Pauline epistles are reckoned throughout as one book in the older notation, with however this remarkable peculiarity, that though in the Codex Vaticanus itself the epistle to the Hebrews stands next after the second to the Thessalonians, and on the same leaf with it, the section are arranged as if it stood between the epistles to the Galatians and > Ephesians . . . . . It plainly appears then, that the sections of the Codex Vaticanus must have been copied from some yet older document, in which the epistle to the Hebrews preceded that to the Ephesians."

This arrangement undoubtedly exhibits this association as obtaining in very early times, possibly the sub-Apostolic age, and that originally, the one epistle followed the other with nothing between. In which case, in a professedly Pauline section of the N.T., we find Galatians and Hebrews merely separated the one from the other by two words: Pros Hebraious, To Hebrews, and this, as we have noted, may not have formed part of the original text.

Dr. Thirtle asks: "Was this in reality dividing? Why not—sub-dividing?" He goes on to propound the theory that the epistle to the Hebrews was a covering letter to the Galatian letter and circulated with it, being specially addressed to a Hebrew Christian section in Galatia. In which case, the problem of the introduction without the author's name is solved, as the name of the Apostle Paul is evident in Gal. i. 1, and would not need to be repeated in the covering letter. As these two epistles became detached in course of time the anonymity of Hebrews naturally became a problem and its position in the N.T. writings became lost, being finally located after the Pastoral Epistles and Philemon, its present position.

Another problem would also be solved if Galatians and Hebrews circulated together and that is the extraordinary omission of the passing of the privilege of circumcision in Hebrews, one of whose main objects is to show that the types and shadows of Israel's economy had been fulfilled in the Antitype, the Lord Jesus Christ, and thus had become redundant. Yet circumcision, one of the main bases of Jewish pride and privilege, is not mentioned in the epistle to the Hebrews. This is understandable if these two epistles were designed to be kept together, for circumcision had been adequately dealt with in Galatians.

Dr. Thirtle leaned toward an Aramaic original. He felt that Gal. vi. 11, "Ye see how large a letter I have written unto you with mine own hand", refers not to large lettering due to defective eyesight, but to an epistle written by the Apostle 'with my own handwriting', possibly Aramaic; just as some have held to have been the case with the Gospel of Matthew. That gramma, 'letter' in the plural can mean this is confirmed by Arndt and Gingrich:

> "A document, piece of writing, mostly in the plural even of single copies"
> (I Esdras iii. 9, 13; Esther viii. 5, etc. A Greek-English Lexicon of the N.T.).

To the objection to an Aramaic original, the writer of Hebrews citing generally from the LXX and not the Hebrew text, he states that this feature "is consistent with a translation made by someone who saw reasons for following the general guidance of the LXX, but has not troubled to tell us why". And as regards the difficulty of the Greek being a literal expression of the Hebrew (Aramaic) he says: "If the Apostle could write good Hebrew (Aramaic), then a really competent translator could give the same attractive Greek. Such a writing as we actually possess, the Salkinson-Ginsburg version of the N.T., into Hebrew shows that every sentiment of the epistle may be expressed in glowing Biblical Hebrew. With a corresponding original, even though in later Hebrew or Aramaic, why should not a good translator produce a version in strong and even rhetorical Greek? To be successful, a translation should have such characteristics".

In our last study we gave reasons for doubting whether the Hebrews epistle is an attempt to literally translate Aramaic. The epistle could be a free reproduction, using an Aramaic original as a basis. If this epistle to the Hebrews is such a reproduction, whose work was it? We have already given various opinions of Bible scholars, most of them being little more than clever guess-work. The fact is, no one knows for certain. Some, however, have more probability than others. Names like Apollos, Priscilla and Aquila are not helpful, because we have no writing of these to compare with Hebrews. We have already remarked on the remarkable likeness of Luke's Greek to that of the Hebrews epistle and here we are on different ground, for we have his Gospel and the Acts of the Apostles to put alongside our epistle for comparison. Bishop Westcott writes:

> "It has been already seen that the earliest scholars who speak of the epistle notice its likeness in style to the writings of Luke; and when every allowance has been made for coincidences which consist in forms of expression which are found also in the LXX, or in other writers of the N.T., or in late Greek generally, the likeness is unquestionably remarkable. No one can work independently at the epistle without observing it."

We find that Franz Delitzsch and other scholar, including Calvin, take the same attitude. In his second volume of The Epistle to the Hebrews, Delitzsch devotes a chapter at the end to the authorship and decidedly favours Luke:

> "That St. Paul was not the direct author of the epistle to the Hebrews, we hold to be incontestably certain. Taking into account the observations made in the course of the exposition from the beginning to the end, we consider it in the highest degree probable that Luke composed the epistle from statements made to him by the Apostle, being commissioned by the latter thereto."

There are some 49 Greek words which only occur in Luke's writings and the epistle to the Hebrews. These, together with other predominantly Lucan words, are given later in an appendix. Such words as hothen; out of 15 occurrences in the N.T., Luke and Hebrews us it 10 times. The same is true of diamarturomai. Tungchano occurs 12 times in the N.T.; Luke and Hebrews use it 9 times. In Luke xx. 35, we have "they which shall be accounted worthy to obtain (tungchano) that world (age), and the resurrection from (ek) the dead". While Heb. xi. 35 reads: "that they might obtain (tungchano) a better resurrection", an obvious parallel and only found in Luke's writings and the Hebrew epistle. Then we find eis to panteles, no wise, uttermost, in Luke xiii. 11 and Heb. vii. 25; Diapantos continually, in Luke xxiv. 53; Acts x. 2; xxiv. 16; Heb. ix. 6; xiii. 15. The Gospel of Luke and the Acts must be carefully studied in the original and compared with Hebrews to note the stylistic likeness, which is too complex to deal with adequately here. It could be, as Prof. F. F. Bruce states: ". . . . . because our author and Luke approximate more closely than other N.T. writers to the model of literary Hellenistic—our author even more so than Luke". But we feel the likeness goes deeper than this, and while we cannot say dogmatically that Luke was the penman of Hebrews, we believe there is more evidence for his association with the epistle than any other who has been put forward.

While we are dealing with the difficult question of the un-Pauline Greek of Hebrews, it is only fair to mention an important work by a Roman Catholic writer, W. Leonard, D.D., The Authorship of the Epistle to the Hebrews (1939) in which he seeks to show that this has been sometimes exaggerated, as has the influence of Philo on the writer of this epistle. Dr. Leonard's work is very scholarly and merits the attention of every serious Bible student. While one is not able to accept all his view-points, distinctive Roman Catholic doctrines are not pressed.

If it is not the Apostle Paul's hand that has written Hebrews, can we say that it is his material and mind that is behind it? It is the fashion at present in evangelical circles to say 'no'. Yet, as we have seen, from the earliest times, the Eastern church accepted it as Pauline, whatever doubts they may have had regarding the amanuensis or editor. It has been represented that this was nothing more than an attempt to give the epistle canonicity. But the question can only be settled by the internal evidence of the epistle itself. Those who deny the Apostle Paul's connection with Hebrews bring forward a number of objections, the chief of which are the following:

(1) There is no trace of allegorical interpretation of the O.T., in Paul's epistles. But the association of allegory with the Hebrews is wrong. This is confusing allegory with type. Types are only types, and one of the great aims of this letter is to show that the O.T. types were only partial foreshadowings of the reality found and fulfilled in Christ alone. They could never perfect or bring the believer to maturity.

(2) The doctrine of resurrection is missing. The Apostle Paul never introduces doctrine just for the sake of it. In I Corinthians, resurrection is introduced because some in the church doubted it (I Cor. xv. 12). The epistle to the Galatians is undoubtedly Paul's, and there is no mention of the doctrine of resurrection in it!

(3) There is no Gentile stress in the Gospel. We have already shown that the Gospel which presents salvation to the sinner is not the theme of Hebrews. This letter is addressed to a group of Hebrew believers whose faith was being severely tested and they were in danger of giving up, drawing back and apostatizing.

(4) The characteristic Pauline doctrine of faith verses works is not developed. But this evidently was not the problem of these Hebrew Christians. However, the law is stressed as a shadow only, which can neither save nor perfect (Heb. viii. 4-5; x. 1). So Paul's teaching is implicit here. The same objection could be brought against the Thessalonian epistles.

(5) There is no mention of Christ as High Priest in Paul's epistle. While this is true, yet Rom. viii. 34, "Christ . . . . . is even at the right hand of God, Who also maketh intercession for us". And Gal. ii. 20, and Eph. v. 2, which stress Christ's giving Himself for us, surely show Him both as High Priest and Offering. The Lord is not represented as a layman offering Himself to another priest. His position as High Priest is implicit in the prayer of John xvii., as is His appearance in Rev. i. In Paul's later epistles He is brought forward in His great title as Head over all things to the church, which is His Body (Eph. i. 22-23; iv. 15; Col. ii. 19), and this is inclusive of all other titles. It was absolutely necessary for the Apostle to develop the theme of Christ as High Priest after the order of Melchisedec in Hebrews, as one of the main aims of this letter is to demonstrate to these Hebrew believers that the Lord Jesus was better than angels, or any position that any leader of Israel occupied in the O.T. days. He was infinitely better than Aaron, or the priesthood from Levi, and this could only be stressed by comparing the Melchisedek priesthood of the Lord with the Levitical.

We see, therefore, that such objections cannot be sustained. Unless the theme of Hebrews is clearly understood, its links with Pauline doctrine cannot be appreciated. It is not a manual showing the sinner how his sins may be forgiven, or how he may escape condemnation and receive eternal life. In other words, it does not cover the same ground as Romans. It is for the saved, specially the Hebrew believers, undergoing the trials of the wilderness journey, and with its perfecting or maturing effect spiritually, leading to the recompense of reward, or if failing and turning back to Judaism, eternal loss and Divine disapproval. If we give this great epistle an unbiased examination, we shall certainly find the mind and doctrine of Paul therein, even if it is expressed by another hand, and to this we propose to devote our next study.

No.3. Verbal links between Paul's Epistles and the Epistle to the Hebrews (1).

pp. 73 - 77

To all conversant with the subject of style, it must be clear that it is not the mere occurrence of a peculiar word, but the manner and connection or background in which it occurs, that stamps it with the impress of a particular author. We shall now consider not only words that are peculiar to Hebrews and Paul's epistles, but their context and background, and in doing so we are bound to note many links between the two. The figure of a race, with its striving and running with a reward in view, is peculiar to Paul and the Hebrews letter. Agon occurs six times in the N.T., five times used by Paul and once in Hebrews (xii. 1), ". . . . . let us lay aside every weight, and the sin which doth so easily beset us, and let us run with patience the race (agon) that is set before us". The same conception is found in Phil. iii., where the Apostle is reaching forth to the things that are ahead and pressing forward to the goal for the prize of the high calling. Similarly in I Cor. ix. 24, "Know ye not that they which run in a race run all, but one receiveth the prize? So run, that ye may obtain". Linked with agon is athleo and its cognates sunathleo and athlesis, to strive in the games, all of which are peculiar to Paul and Hebrews. In connection with these are the same words and ideas such as: hupomene endurance; trecho to run; out of 20 occurrences Paul uses this latter word 10 times, and the author of Hebrews exhorts his readers to "run with patience the race set before us" (xii. 1). Apekdechomai to wait for, is used only in Paul's epistles and Hebrews, where it occurs seven times. In the Pauline writings it is used exclusively for the hope of the believer connected with the Second Advent, and it is significant that Hebrews uses it in just the same way, ". . . . . unto them that look for Him shall He appear the second time without sin unto salvation" (Heb. ix. 28).

Aphilarguros not covetous, occurs only in I Tim. iii. 3 and Heb. xiii. 5; in both cases there is the thought of hospitality in the context. Douleia bondage, occurs5 times in the N.T., and is used by the Apostle 4 times and once in Heb. ii. 15, referring to those who through fear of death were all their lifetime subject to bondage. There is a verbal link between Gal. v. 1, ". . . . . be not entangled (enechesthe) again with the yoke of bondage" and Heb. ii. 15, ". . . . . subject (enochos) to bondage".

Endunamoo to be strong, is used eight times in the N.T., six by Paul, one by Luke (Acts ix. 22), and one in Hebrews. It is a characteristic Pauline word. Luke's one reference is to Paul himself, and the occurrences in the Apostle's last letter, the second epistle to Timothy, with the insistence on suffering and endurance (II Tim. ii. 1; iv. 17), with a view to the crown and reigning with Christ, are very parallel to Heb. xi. 34, where Hebrew believers are being tested in a similar way, and 'out of weakness were made strong'.

Euarestos well pleasing, and its cognates euarestos and euaresteo are limited to Paul's writings and the letter to the Hebrews. Note the link of sacrifice between Heb. xiii. 16, ". . . . . with such sacrifices God is well pleased", and Rom. xii. 1, ". . . . . present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable (well pleasing) unto God", and Phil. iv.18, ". . . . . I am full, having received from Epaphroditus the things which were sent from you . . . . . a sacrifice, acceptable, well pleasing to God". Also the thought of the will of God links Heb. xiii. 21, ". . . . . make you perfect in every good work to do His will, working in you that which is well-pleasing in His sight . . . . .", with Rom. xii. 2, ". . . . . that ye may prove what is that good, and acceptable, and perfect will of God".

Entunchano to intercede, out of five occurrences in the N.T. is used 3 times by Paul, once by Luke in Acts xxv. 24 (translated "dealt with"), and once by the writer to the Hebrews. Two of the Pauline references are in Rom. viii. in connection with the intercession of Christ at the right hand of God (viii. 27, 34), and once in xi. 2, of Elijah's intercession against Israel. It is significant that Heb. vii. 25, likewise deals with the intercessory work of the Saviour, Who can save to the uttermost and ever lives to intercede for His people. This ministry is peculiar to Hebrews and Paul's epistle to the Romans.

Tharreo to be bold or confident, had six N.T. references, all exclusive to Paul and Hebrews. It occurs five times in II Corinthians (v. 6, 8; vii. 16; x. 1, 2), and once in Hebrews (xiii. 6). Comparing this reference to II Cor. v. 6, 8, we find the Apostle in the Corinthians letter, stating his confidence because of what God has wrought for us in the provision of a resurrection body, ". . . . . a building of God, an house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens". This looks to the future. The reference in Hebrews looks to the present and the confidence in what God has wrought for us now in the tremendous promise "I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee". In both cases the link is the boldness and assurance that comes from what God has accomplished for us.

Latreia service, except for John xvi. 2, is confined to Paul's epistles and Hebrews. The Apostle in Rom. ix., lists the nation of Israel's divine privileges, and states: ". . . . . to whom pertaineth . . . . . the giving of the law, and the service of God . . . . ." The service being largely related to the ceremonial law. Comparing Hebrews, we find it used in a similar way. "Then verily the first covenant had also ordinances of divine service" (Heb. ix. 1), and in verse 6, ". . . . . the priests went always into the first tabernacle, accomplishing the service of God".

Leitourgeo, -ia, os, ikos, to minister, "ministry", are predominantly Pauline words and that of Hebrews. The verb leitourgeo is used by Luke once (Acts xiii. 2), and the other two occurrences are Rom. xv. 27 and Heb. x. 11. Leitourgia is used by Luke once (Luke i. 23). It occurs three times, in II Cor. ix. 12; Phil. ii. 17, 30; and twice in Hebrews: viii. 6 and ix. 21. Leitourgos is used 3 times by Paul, Rom. xiii. 6; xv. 16; Phil. ii. 25, and twice in Hebrews: i. 7; viii. 2; and nowhere else. Leitourgikos is only found in Heb. i. 14.

Mesites mediator, occurs only in Gal. iii. 19, 20; I Tim. ii. 5; and Heb. vii. 6; ix. 15; xii. 24. The Lord Jesus Christ as Mediator is peculiar to the witness of the Apostle Paul, and the three references in Hebrews are a strong link with Paul's ministry.

Mimetes follower, is found 5 times in Paul's writings: (I Cor. iv. 16; xi. 1; Eph. v. 1; I Thess. i. 6; ii. 14), and once in Hebrews (vi. 12), and nowhere else. (In I Pet. iii. 13, the critical texts read zelotai instead of mimetes). Note the link between I Thess. ii. 14 and Heb. vi. 12:

> "For ye, brethren, became followers of the churches of God . . . . . for ye also have suffered like things of your own countrymen, even as they have of the Jews" (I Thess. ii. 14).
> ". . . . . that ye be not slothful, but followers of them who through faith and patience inherit the promises" (Heb. vi. 12).

In the background of each is testing and suffering. In Hebrews this is expanded in chapter xi., where those linked with faith and patience and testing are given in detail.

Nekroo to treat as dead, occurs only three times in the N.T. (Rom. iv. 19; Col. iii. 5; and Heb. xi. 12). The similar usage in Rom. iv. 19 and Heb. xi. 12, is surely apparent. Both refer to Abraham ". . . . . as good as dead" as far as his physical capacity to have a son was concerned.

Olothreuo to destroy, and its cognates olothreutes have only one occurrence each in the N.T., the latter in I Cor. x. 10, "neither murmur ye, as some of them also murmured, and were destroyed of the destroyer . . . . .", and the former in Heb. xi. 28 ". . . . . lest he that destroyed the firstborn should touch them". The usage of the word is identical in both cases.

Homologia profession or confession, has six N.T. references, three by Paul and three in Hebrews (II Cor. ix. 13; I Tim. vi. 12, 13; Heb. iii. 1; iv. 14; x. 23). The essence of the three passages in Hebrews is condensed in I Tim. vi. 12, 13:

> "Fight the good fight of faith, lay hold of eternal life, whereunto thou art also called, and hast professed a good profession before many witnesses. I give thee charge in the sight of God, Who quickeneth all things, and before Christ Jesus, Who before Pontius Pilate witnessed a good confession . . . . ."

Oneidismos reproach, occurs five times in the N.T. (Rom. xv. 3; I Tim. iii. 7; Heb. x. 33; xi. 26; xiii. 13). In Rom. xv. 3, we have: "For even Christ pleased not Himself; but, as it is written, The reproaches of them that reproached Thee fell on Me", and in Heb. xiii. 13, "Let us go forth therefore unto Him without the camp, bearing His reproach".

Timoreo and timoria, to punish and punishment, have only three N.T. references. Luke in reporting Paul's speeches uses the former twice: "I . . . . . went to Damascus, to bring them which were there bound unto Jerusalem, for to be punished" (Acts xxii. 5) and in xxvi. 11, ". . . . . I punished them oft in every synagogue . . . . ." The third occurs in Heb. x. 29 ". . . . . of how much sorer punishment (timoria) suppose ye . . . . ."

Philoxenia hospitality, has only two N.T. occurrences which are quite parallel. Rom. xii. 13 ". . . . . Distributing to the necessity of the saints; given to hospitality", and Heb. xiii. 2 "Be not forgetful to entertain strangers, for thereby some have entertained angels unawares".

Phrasso to stop (the mouth), is another word having only three N.T. references, namely, Rom. iii. 19, II Cor. xi. 10 and Heb. xi. 33. Rom. iii. 19 deals with the mouths of men being stopped, and Heb. xi. 33 the mouth of lions.

Megas great, is only applied to Christ in the N.T. (Luke i. 32; vii. 16; Heb. iv. 14; x. 21). In Titus ii. 13, "Our great God and Saviour", and Heb. xiii. 20, ". . . . . that great Shepherd of the sheep".

Katargeo, occurs 27 times in the N.T. Luke uses it once in a non-doctrinal and primitive sense (Luke xiii. 7). Paul's epistles have 25 references and Hebrews one. It is peculiarly a Pauline word and the one reference in Heb. ii. 14 is used in the Apostle's manner:

> "Forasmuch then as the children are partakers of flesh and blood. He also Himself likewise took part of the same, that through death He might destroy him that had the power of death, that is, the devil."
>
> "The last enemy that shall be destroyed is death" (I Cor. xv. 26).
> ". . . . . Jesus Christ, Who hath abolished death . . . . ." (II Tim. i. 10).

Perissoteron and perissoteros, more abundantly and more exceedingly, with the exception of Mark vii. 36 and xv. 14, are limited to Paul's epistles and Hebrews; the former in I Cor. xv. 10; Heb. vi. 17; vii. 15, and the latter ten times in the epistles of Paul and twice in Hebrews. These are peculiarly Pauline words, as is also the word Stauros cross. Apart from its occurrences in the Gospels, this word is confined to the Apostle's writings, where it occurs ten times and once in the epistle to the Hebrews. Heb. xii. 2, "Looking unto Jesus . . . . . Who for the joy that was set before Him endured the cross . . . . ." Peter, James, John and Jude do not use the word in their epistles, either as a noun or a verb, which may appear surprising.

When we come to the connecting particles we find more links with Hebrews and Paul's epistles. Te is of frequent occurrence in Luke's writings, some 143 times in the Acts and seven times in his Gospel. In the epistles its usage is practically confined to Paul and Hebrews. It occurs twice in James iii. 7 and Jude 6. The Apostle uses it 26 times and Hebrews 22 times.

Kathaper as even as, is only found in Paul's writings and Hebrews, eleven in the former, and twice in the latter.

Mepo not yet, has only two N.T. references, namely Rom. ix. 11 and Heb. ix. 8.

Toigaroun therefore & wherefore, being found only in I Thess. iv. 8 and Heb. xii. 1.

Huperano above, is a word which occurs only in Ephesians (i. 21; iv. 10) and Heb. ix. 5.

The above are some of the verbal links with the Apostle Paul's writings and the epistle to the Hebrews. They are not haphazard occurrences, but, as we have demonstrated, have a similar background or thought, showing the same mind, if not the same hand. Archdeacon Paley, in his Horae Paulinae p. 196, writes:

> "Whoever writes two letters, or two discourses, nearly upon the same subject, and at no great distance of time, but without any express recollection of what he had written before, will find himself repeating some sentences, in the very order of the words in which he had already used them; but he will more frequently find himself employing some principal terms, with the order inadvertently changed, or with the order disturbed by the intermixture of other words and phrases expressive of ideas rising up at the time; or in many instances repeating not single words, nor yet whole sentences, but parts and fragments of sentences."

Not only do we find the repetition of words used in a similar way between Hebrews and Paul's epistles, but there are other links between the two which we will next consider.

No.4. Verbal links between Paul's Epistles and the Epistle to the Hebrews (2).

pp. 90 - 96

Among the peculiarities of the Apostle Paul's style of writing and argument may be mentioned a species of digression. It is a turning aside from the subject, upon the occurrence of some particular word, which causes him to temporarily forsake the train of thought then in hand, and enter upon a parenthetic sentence in which that word is the prevailing term or idea. An example of this can be seen in Eph. iv. 8-11:

> "Wherefore He saith, when He ascended up on high, He led captivity captive, and give gifts unto men, (Now that He ascended, what is it but that He also descended first into the lower part of the earth? He that descended is the same also that ascended up far above all heavens, that He might fill all things). And He gave some Apostles, and some prophets, and some evangelists, and some pastors and teachers."

In verse 8, the thought and the importance of the Ascension causes Paul to digress from the gift of Christ, and the digression is shown in the words contained in brackets. In the eleventh verse he returns again to the gifts of the Ascended Christ, "And He gave some apostles" etc. In chapter iii. we have yet another example. After the great climax of revelation at the end of chapter ii., where the Church changes from the figure of a Body to a holy temple, designed as a permanent dwelling place for God, the Apostle is constrained to pray. He started to do this in iii. 1, "for this cause I Paul"—he was going to follow with the words 'bow my knees unto the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ', which he does in verse 14, but after giving his title, "the prisoner of Christ Jesus for you Gentiles", he deviates and devotes verses 2-13 to explain this title and its relationship to the new revelation he had received from Christ, connected with a secret (mystery), hid in God from the ages (verses 9; Col. i. 26) about which he now aims to 'enlighten all'.

We see the same characteristic in Eph. v. 13-15: "But all things that are reproved are made manifest by the light; (for whatsoever doth make manifest is light. Wherefore He saith, Awake thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead, and Christ shall give thee light). See then that ye walk circumspectly, not as fools, but as wise". The Apostle's immediate context is reproving the works of darkness that are done in secret, walking as children of light (verse 8), and walking circumspectly (verse 15), but he turns aside momentarily to comment on the revealing power of light. II Cor. ii. 14-17, is a further example, verses 15 and 16 being parenthetical.

We find similar examples in the epistle to the Hebrews. In chapter xii. 18-24 the writer first states negatively: "For ye are not come unto the mount that might be touched" (i.e. Sinai), and then positively: "But ye are come unto mount Sion, and unto the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem . . . . ." The awe-inspiring accompaniments of the giving of the law at Sinai, "the sound of trumpet, and the voice of words" causes the author to digress, "which voice they that heard intreated that the word should not be spoken to them any more. For they could not endure that which was commanded. And if so much as a beast touch the mountain, it shall be stoned, or thrust through with a dart: And so terrible was the sight, that Moses said, I exceedingly fear and quake". Not only this, but at the beginning of the chapter we have an emphasis upon discipline (chastening) and the three words used are particularly Pauline, paideuo (xii. 6, 7, 10), see I Cor. xi. 32; II Cor. vi. 9; I Tim. i. 20; II Tim. ii. 25; and Titus ii. 12; elsewhere it is only used by Luke (Luke xxiii. 16, 22; Acts vii. 22; xxii. 3), and once in Rev. iii. 19. Paideutes 'instructor', only found in Rom. ii. 20 and Heb. xii. 9, paideia 'instruction', 'chastening', occurring only in Eph. vi. 4; II Tim. iii. 16 and Heb. xii. 5, 7, 8, 11. There is another example of digression in Heb. iii. 1-6, "For this man was counted worthy of more glory than Moses, inasmuch as he who hath builded the house hath more honour than the house (For every house is builded by some man; but He that built all things is God) And Moses was verily faithful in all his house, as a servant . . . . ." Moreover, in this passage we have three words which are peculiarly Pauline, namely klesis, calling, Rom. xi. 29; I Cor. i. 26; vii. 20; Eph. i. 18; iv. 1, 4; Phil. iii. 14; II Thess. i. 11; II Tim. i. 9. It occurs elsewhere only once (II Pet. i. 10). Homologia 'profession', has six N.T. references, three by Paul and three in Hebrews (II Cor. ix. 13; I Tim. vi. 12, 13; Heb. iii. 1; iv. 14; x. 23). Kauchema "rejoicing", (Rom. iv. 2; I Cor. v. 6; ix. 15, 16; II Cor. i. 14; v. 12; ix. 3; Gal. vi. 4; Phil. i. 26; and Heb. iii. 6).

When we compare I Cor. xv. 26-28 and Heb. ii. 5-14, we have striking evidence of the same mind behind the words. Not only is there the special use of 'destroy' applied to death as we have seen; there is in both the peculiar argument derived from the passage: "Thou didst put all things under His feet" taken from Psa. viii. This quotation is found nowhere else in the N.T. than in Paul's writings (I Cor. xv. 27; Eph. i. 22; Heb. ii. 8); in other words, they are confined to Paul and the writer of the epistle to the Hebrews. The argument in each case is exactly the same. Adam is referred to by name in I Cor. xv., and clearly implied in Heb. ii. 6. "It is manifest that He is excepted which did put all things under Him" (I Cor. xv. 27), is paralleled by the statement: "He left nothing that is not put under Him" (Heb. ii. 8).

Hupotasso 'to subject', is another Pauline word. Out of 40 N.T. reference Paul uses it 24 times and Hebrews 5 times in exactly the same way. Not only this, but in the same context in Hebrews we have the exclusive Pauline words: parabasis 'transgression' (Heb. ii. 2; ix. 15; Rom. ii. 23; iv. 15; v. 14; Gal. iii. 19; I Tim. ii. 14); parakoe "disobedience" (Heb. ii. 2; Rom. v. 19; II Cor. x. 6); endikos "just" (Heb. ii. 2; Rom. iii. 8); metecho "to be a partaker" (Heb. ii. 14; v. 13; vii. 13; I Cor. ix. 10, 12; x. 17, 21, 30); douleia "bondage" (Heb. ii. 15; Rom. viii. 15, 21; Gal. iv. 24; v. 1). This strong evidence indeed that we have the same mind behind these contexts in Hebrews and I Corinthians.

Quotations from the Old Testament.

When we come to consider further quotations from the O.T., we find the Pauline habit of accumulating O.T. passages (See Rom. iii. 10-18; ix. 7-33), often joined together by the characteristic kai palin 'and again' (Rom. xv. 9-12; I Cor. iii. 19, 20). We find the same characteristic in Hebrews; compare Heb. i. 5-14; ii. 12, 13; iv. 4, 5; x. 30. In

Heb. x. 30, the writer quotes from Deut. xxxii. 35, but does not give a literal translation of the Hebrew or a literal quotation from the LXX. In Rom. xii. 19, Paul quotes the same passage and uses exactly the same wording, which is remarkable. The famous quotation from Hab. ii. 4, "The just shall live by faith" gives the key-note of the Gospel of God's grace made known through Paul's ministry. It is absolutely basic to this Gospel, and the epistle to the Romans is written around it. It occurs in Galatians with a slightly different stress (iii. 11), and is not quoted by any other N.T. writer except the author of Hebrews. The emphasis here is on the word 'live', for the great theme of this epistle is the perfecting of the believer through trial and suffering (Heb. vi. 1; x. 32-39) with a reward in view. The Apostle does not quote the actual words of Habakkuk, but gives his own rendering. It is noteworthy that the words of Rom. i. 17, and Heb. x. 38, are identical. One of the chief objections to the Pauline authorship of Hebrews is the mode of Scriptural citation in this epistle, which, it is alleged, is very different to that of the Apostle. Schulz, De Wette, Bleek and others maintained that the Pauline habit is to name the human author, whereas the writer to the Hebrews represents the various Scriptural passages much more definitely as utterances of God the Holy Spirit, without any reference to the human instrument by whom it was communicated, and leans to the Alexandrian rather than the Palestinian Biblical method, being akin to the mechanical theory of inspiration held by Philo.

But what are the facts? In the Acts of the Apostles we have specimens of the way the Apostle Paul addresses the Jews, and how he varies his mode of introducing quotations from the O.T. There are six O.T. quotations in his speech at Antioch in Pisidia (Acts xiii.), prefixed by "He (God) gave testimony and said" (verse 22), "as it is also written in the second Psalm" (33), "He (God) said on this wise" (34), "He saith also in another Psalm" (35), "Beware therefore, lest that come upon you, which is spoken of in prophets" (40), "the Lord commanded us saying" (verse 47). It will be noticed that the human author is not once mentioned. There are only two more occasions in the Acts in which Paul formally quotes Scripture, namely when brought before the Sanhedrim, he reviles the high priest and then repents saying: ". . . . . for it is written, Thou shalt not speak evil of the ruler of thy people" (Acts xxiii. 5) and in the last chapter where he quotes for the last time in the N.T. the solemn words of Isa. vi. to the Jews at Rome. But he introduces the quotation, saying: "Well spake the Holy Ghost by Isaiah the prophet". In neither case is the human writer mentioned by himself.

From an examination of the epistles, it is clear that the Apostle had no stereotyped method of quoting O.T. Scripture. Three times he mentions Moses as the author of his quotation, David twice, Isaiah five times, but all these cases, with two exceptions (Acts xxviii. 25 and I Cor. ix. 9) occur in one epistle, that to the Romans, and there is no evidence that the Apostle attributed any particular doctrinal significance to the human authors. The fact is that Paul often used the impersonal way of introducing Scripture as is done in the epistle to the Hebrews. In at least three cases Paul makes God the speaker of a Scripture (Acts xiii. 35; II Cor. vi. 17; Eph. iv. 18), not merely quoting a word of God registered in the Scriptures.

Of the supposed Philonic and Alexandrian influence on the writer of Hebrews, Dr. W. Leonard writes:

> ". . . . . A fair estimate of his (Philo's) method may be deduced from a personal examination of three books, namely, the first book of Allegories, the first book on Dreams, and his work on the Intoxication of Noah. Such an examination, together with tests made on about two dozen quotations occurring in eight or ten different works of Philo citing Scripture has been very much exaggerated . . . . . As a matter of fact the Alexandrian writer very frequently indicates the human source of his quotations, sometimes by naming the collection of books, law, prophets or hymns, from which he quotes; sometimes by naming the individual authors, specially Moses . . . . . Philo, it is true, had a certain preference for a particular mode of citation, but that mode of citation is found not only in the epistle to the Hebrews, but in St. Paul and also in the Talmudic and Midrashic literature." (The Authorship of the Epistle to the Hebrews, pp.281, 282, 284).

We cannot do better than to quote Dr. Leonard's conclusion:

> "In regard to the formulae of citation, we have seen once again, how the critics have built on the sand of their own hasty impressions. They have failed to take adequate note of the whole citational formulary of Pauline epistles; they have neglected the testimony of the Acts, and especially the Apostle's synagogal address at Antioch of Pisidia. They have not recognized that the customary Palestinian modes of citation admitted very considerable variety. They have suppressed some of the facts regarding Philo, namely that he not infrequently names the human authors of Scriptural oracles, cites them under passive formulae, and in the quotation of Scripture uses phrases which our author would in all probability have imitated, had he been to any great extent under Philonic influence. The critics also have misrepresented the epistle to the Hebrews itself, because they have failed to note that the purely Scriptural dicta attributed to God do not exceed a half dozen, whereas direct oracles are predominant. They have not taken the intention of the author sufficiently into account. They have merely imagined oppositions to Pauline practice and they have drawn conclusions about the author's notion of inspiration which are wholly unwarranted, because they rest on the double sophism: non causa pro causa and ab uno ad omnes. They suppose that Philo's mantic view of inspiration must be the reason why he is so little concerned with the secondary human authors and then suppose that our author's insistence on the uniquely divine authority of Scripture must be due to the same cause.
> On the contrary, the facts which have been adduced above show that, whereas the mode of Scriptural citation in our epistle furnished no positive argument against its Pauline authorship, that mode of citation coincides with Pauline practice more than once, and is by no means Alexandrian rather than Palestinian."

Parallel passages and doctrine in Hebrews and Paul's epistles.

We have seen that the figure of a race or contest (agon) which is characteristic to Paul is found elsewhere only in Hebrews. "Ye did run well; who did hinder you?" (Gal. v. 7). "Let us run with patience the race set before us" (Heb. xii. 1. See also I Cor. ix. 24-27; Phil. iii. 13-15). There are remarkable parallels between the doctrine of Galatians and Hebrews. We have seen the emphasis on the old and new covenants:

> "And this I say, that the covenant, that was confirmed before of God in Christ, the law, which was 430 years after, cannot disannul . . . . ." (Gal. iii. 17).
> "For it is written, that Abraham had two sons, the one by a bondmaid, the other by a free woman . . . . . which things are an allegory: for these are the two covenants, the one from mount Sinai, which gendereth to bondage . . . . . but Jerusalem which is above is free . . . . ." (Gal. iv. 22-31).

"But now He hath obtained a more excellent ministry, by how much also He is the mediator of a better covenant . . . . . for if that first covenant had been faultless . . . . ." (Heb. viii. 6-13).

"For this cause He is the mediator of the new testament (covenant) . . . . ." (Heb. ix. 15-20; xii. 24).

"This is the covenant that I will make with them after those days, saith the Lord . . ." (Heb. x. 16).

In both Galatians and Hebrews a mediator is stressed (Gal. iii. 19, 20; Heb. viii. 6; ix. 15; xii. 24) and such argument is not found elsewhere. In both, the New Jerusalem figures prominently (Gal. iv. 26; Heb. xi. 10; xii. 22) and apart from the vision of it that John describes in Rev. xxi., this city is not mentioned anywhere else in the N.T. In both the characteristic Pauline doctrine of perfecting or going on to maturity is stressed, "Having begun in the Spirit, are ye now made perfect (epiteleo) by the flesh?" (Gal. iii. 3). "Let us go on to perfection" (Heb. vi. 1). Teleioo and its cognates occur no less than 24 times in this epistle. In fact these give its very doctrine, and without this, any exposition goes astray and misses the point. Reaching maturity or the goal, through trial and discipline, or missing it, is the essence of this letter. For the Israel redeemed from Egypt, the goal was Canaan; for the Hebrew believer to whom the Hebrew epistle was addressed, it was the heavenly Jerusalem (Heb. xi. 10, 14-16; xii. 22), which finally finds its location on the new earth (Rev. xxi.). Telos occurs five times (Heb. iii. 6, 14; vi. 8, 11; vii. 3); teleios twice (Heb. v. 14; ix. 11); teleioo 9 times (Heb. ii. 10; v. 9; vii. 19, 28; ix. 9; x. 1, 14; xi. 40; xii. 23); teleiosis once (Heb. vii. 11); teleiotes once (Heb. vi. 1) and teleiotes once (Heb. xii. 2); sunteleo once (Heb. viii. 8); sunteleia once (Heb. ix. 26); epiteleo twice (Heb. viii. 5; ix. 6); and teleutao once (Heb. xi. 22). The whole discourse revolves around the things which can or cannot perfect or led to maturity.

Developing from this is the antithesis between babyhood and adulthood, which is likewise peculiarly Pauline and is found elsewhere only in Hebrews.

"And I, brethren, could not speak unto you as unto spiritual, but as unto carnal, even as unto babes in Christ. I have fed you with milk and not with meat . . ." (I Cor. iii. 1, 2).

"For when for the time ye ought to be teachers, ye have need that one teach you again which be the first principles of the oracles of God; and are become such as have need of milk, and not of strong meat . . . . . for he is a babe. But strong meat belongeth to them that are of full age (teleios) . . . . ." (Heb. v. 12-14).

Compare also Eph. iv. 13, 14, ". . . . . till we all come in the unity of the faith, and of the knowledge of the Son of God, unto a perfect (full grown) man, unto the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ: that we henceforth be no more children (babes)", also I Cor. xiv. 20, "Brethren, be not children in understanding: . . . . . but in understanding be men" (margin perfect or of full age).

Added to this we must keep in mind that the goal of the race or contest is this perfecting or maturity, whether in Hebrews or Paul's writings. "Let us go on to full growth (perfection)" (Heb. vi. 1). "Let us run with patience the race that is set before us, looking unto Jesus, the Author and Perfecter (teleiotes) of our faith" (Heb. xii. 1, 2). "Not as though I had already attained, either were already mature (teleioo perfect), but I follow after (pursue) . . . . . I press toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus. Let us therefore as many as be mature (teleios), be thus minded" (Phil. iii. 12-15). "None of these things move me . . . . . so that I might finish (teleiosai) my course (race) with joy" (Acts xx. 24). "I have finished (teleo) the course (race) . . . . . henceforth there is laid up for me the crown of righteousness" (II Tim. iv. 7, 8).

No.5. Verbal links between Paul's Epistles and the Epistle to the Hebrews (3).

pp. 114 - 120

In I Cor. viii. 6, we have the expression: "One God, the Father, of (ex) Whom are all things . . . . . and one Lord Jesus Christ, by (dia) Whom are all things". This is paralleled by Heb. ii. 10, "For it became Him, for (dia) Whom are all things, and by (dia) Whom are all things", and this is found nowhere else in the N.T.

"The Living God." In the epistles this title only occurs in Paul's writings, where it is used seven times: (Rom. ix. 26; II Cor. iii. 3; vi. 16; I Thess. i. 9; I Tim. iii. 15; iv. 10; vi. 17). The writer of Hebrews employs it four times (iii. 12; ix. 14; x. 31; xii. 22).

The Lord Jesus Christ, as the Image of God, is a Pauline conception (II Cor. iv. 4; Col. i. 15). It is found elsewhere only in Heb. i. 3, "Who being the brightness of His glory, and the express Image of His Person".

The Ascension of Christ is vital to Paul's ministry, especially the doctrine concerning the Body of Christ, so closely identified with the Head, that it is looked upon as being seated in the heavenly places where He is now enthroned (Eph. i. 19-23; ii. 6); consequently we have the Ascension stressed first in Ephesians before the position of the Body is dealt with. In the same way Col. iii. 1-3 emphasizes this, and urges the believer to set his mind upon and seek those things which are above "where Christ sitteth on the right hand of God". The doctrine of the Ascension, likewise, is stressed in Hebrews, where it is referred to seven times: (i. 3; iv. 14; vi. 19, 20; viii. 1; x. 12; xii. 2). Used in this manner, it is peculiar to Paul's writings and the Hebrew epistle. Peter makes but one reference to the Ascension, I Pet. iii. 22, and it is not essential to the doctrine set forth in his epistle.

Related to the Ascension is the present intercession of the Lord Jesus:

> ". . . . . Who is he that condemneth? It is Christ that died, yea rather, that is risen again, Who is even at the right hand of God, Who also maketh intercession for us" (Rom. viii. 34).

The only other mention of this in the N.T. is Heb. vii. 25:

"Wherefore He is able also to save them to the uttermost that come unto God by Him, seeing He ever liveth to make intercession for them."

The destruction of Satan, death and its power by the Lord Jesus, is characteristic of Paul's ministry:

". . . . . our Saviour Jesus Christ, Who hath abolished death, and hath brought life and immortality to light through the Gospel" (II Tim. i. 10). "So when this corruptible shall have put on incorruption, and this mortal shall have put on immortality, then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written. Death is swallowed up in victory. O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory?" (I Cor. xv. 54, 55).

This is another peculiar link with Hebrews:

"Forasmuch then as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, He also Himself likewise took part of the same; that through death He might destroy him that had the power of death, that is, the devil . . . . ." (Heb. ii. 14).

So also is the thought that Christ, having died once, will never die again. His one sacrifice for sin is all-sufficient, and never to be repeated:

"Knowing that Christ being raised from the dead dieth no more; death hath no more dominion over Him. For in that He died, He died unto sin once; but in that He liveth, He liveth unto God" (Rom. vi. 9-10).

". . . . But now once in the end of the world hath He appeared to put away sin by the sacrifice of Himself . . . . . So Christ was once offered to bear the sins of many . . . . ." (Heb. ix. 26-28).

"But this man, after He had offered one sacrifice for sins for ever, sat down on the right hand of God" (Heb. x. 12).

Though we must be careful with the 'alls' and 'everys' of Scripture, there is another doctrinal link between II Corinthians and Hebrews:

". . . . . Because we thus judge, that if one died for all, then were all dead: and that He died for all, that they which live should not henceforth live unto themselves . . . . ." (II Cor. v. 14, 15).

"But we see Jesus . . . . . for the suffering of death, crowned with glory and honour; that He by the grace of God should taste death for every man" (Heb. ii. 9).

Both Hebrews and Paul's epistles treat the law of Moses in a special way. The law cannot save, give righteousness, inheritance or life, and has been done away as a means of salvation:

". . . . . for if righteousness come by the law, then Christ is dead in vain" (Gal. ii. 21).

"For if the inheritance be of the law, it is no more of promise: but God gave it to Abraham by promise" (Gal. iii. 18).

". . . . . for if there had been a law given which could have given life, verily righteousness should have been by the law" (Gal. iii. 21).

"Christ is become of no effect unto you, whosoever of you are justified by the law; ye are fallen from grace" (Gal. v. 4).

"For there is verily a disannulling of the commandment going before for the weakness and unprofitableness thereof" (Heb. vii. 18).

"For if that first covenant had been faultless, then should no place have been sought for the second" (Heb. viii. 7).

". . . . . He taketh away the first, that He may establish the second" (Heb. x. 9).

Not only this, but special stress of the law as a shadow is peculiar to Hebrews and Paul's writings:

"Let no man therefore judge you in meat, or in drink, or in respect of an holyday, or of the new moon, or of the sabbath days: Which are a shadow of things to come" (Col. ii. 16, 17).

"For the law having a shadow of good things to come, and not the very image of the things, can never with those sacrifices which they offered year by year continually make the comers thereunto perfect" (Heb. x. 1).

The trinity of graces: faith, hope and love, are characteristic of the Apostle Paul:

"Now abideth faith, hope, love (charity), these three; but the greatest of these is love" (I Cor. xiii. 13).

They also occur in Rom. v. 1-8 in pairs; Gal. v. 5, 6; Eph. i. 15-20; Col. i. 4, 5; I Thess. v. 8; and twice in Hebrews and nowhere else (Heb. vi. 10-12; x. 22-24, where 'faith' in verse 23 should read 'hope', see the R.V.).

Paul is the only N.T. writer who requests prayer for himself, and this usually comes at the end of his epistles:

"Praying always with all prayer and supplication in the Spirit . . . . . and for me . . . . . that I might open my mouth boldly . . . . ." (Eph. vi. 18, 19).

"Withal praying also for us, that God would open unto us a door of utterance" (Col. iv. 3).

"Brethren, pray for us" (I Thess. v. 25).

"Finally, brethren, pray for us, that the Word of the Lord may have free course and be glorified, ..." (II Thess. iii. 1).

To which may be added Rom. xv. 30; Phil. i. 19 and Philemon 22.

Hebrews likewise requests prayer in the same way:

"Pray for us; for we trust we have a good conscience, in all things willing to live honestly" (Heb. xiii. 18).

And this feature is not found in Peter, James, Jude or John.

Another point needs to be made. The stress in Romans on Abraham and Sarah's physical incapacity to have a son and heir in their old age, and the quickening power of resurrection is seen also in Hebrews:

". . . . . Abraham, who is the father of us all. (As it is written, I have made thee a father of many nations) before Him Whom he believed, even God, Who quickeneth the dead . . . . . and being not weak in faith, he considered not his own body now dead . . . . . neither yet the deadness of Sarah's womb:" (Rom. iv. 16-19).

> "Through faith also Sara herself received strength to conceive seed, and was delivered of a child when she was past age . . . . . therefore sprang there even of one, and him as good as dead, so many as the stars of the sky in multitude . . . . ." (Heb. xi. 11, 12).

This power operated too in the willingness to sacrifice Isaac, the child of promise (Heb. xi. 17-19). No other N.T. writer treats of this matter.

Paul's Sign Manual.

One of the ways the enemy of truth was seeking to hinder the progress of the Gospel was by circulating spurious epistles purporting to come from the Apostle:

> "Now we beseech you, brethren, ... that ye be not soon shaken in mind, or be troubled, neither by spirit, nor by word, nor by letter as from us, as that the day of the Lord is at hand" (II Thess. ii. 1, 2 revised text).

In order to guard against this, Paul decided to end all his letters in one special way, in his own handwriting:

> "The salutation of Paul with mine own hand, which is the token in every epistle: so I write" (II Thess. iii. 17), and then follows a reference to the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, this, so fitting, coming from one who was predominantly the Apostle of grace. This is the way that all the thirteen epistles associated with his name ends. Not one of the other epistles concludes in such a way, and it must surely be obvious that if anyone else used the same formula, its use as a guarantee of genuineness would have been null and void. But the epistle to the Hebrews ends with it and this is another definite link with the Apostle Paul and his writings.

> "Grace be with you all. Amen" (Heb. xiii. 25).

Not only this, but there are remarkable doctrinal parallels between Philippians and Hebrews, as Charles H. Welch has shown in his Alphabetical Analysis, Part Two, p.108. These cannot be ignored by anyone who is studying this subject with an unbiased mind. We now exhibit them.

From all the foregoing facts, it surely is clear that behind the epistle to the Hebrews is the mind of Paul, if not his actual pen.

How expositors can deny this, passes our comprehension. Some may ask: does it really matter who the human author was? From one standpoint we answer "no", for, whoever he was, God the Holy Spirit overruled what he wrote, so that it could become part of inspired Scripture and He is the real Author. From another point of view the answer is "yes", for if Hebrews cannot be included in the Pauline collection of epistles, then the perfect arrangement and balance is upset.

There are 21 epistles in the N.T., and with Hebrews included in Paul's writings there is a perfect balance of sevens:

1. Galatians	1. Ephesians	1. I Peter
2. I Thessalonians	2. Philippians	2. II Peter
3. II Thessalonians	3. Colossians	3. James
4. I Corinthians	4. I Timothy	4. I John
5. II Corinthians	5. Titus	5. II John
6. Hebrews	6. Philemon	6. III John
7. Romans	7. II Timothy	7. Jude

While we do not wish to imagine or invent sevens in the Scriptures, the employment of this number by God from the very beginning of creation (seven days), its reiteration in the economy of Israel (the sabbath; seven weeks 'Pentecost'' seven years 'sabbath of the land'; 7X7 years to the Jubilee; 70X7 years of Dan. ix.; and the seven times of Leviticus), and in addition the accumulation of sevens in the book of the Revelation and elsewhere, show us that the purpose of the ages in Christ is divinely designed in sevens, and we therefore are not surprised to find the same feature in the epistles of the N.T. and we should not lightly set this aside.

If Hebrews is not linked with Paul, then we have thirteen epistles from him, (an ominous number, and linked with Satan in the Scriptures), the balance of epistles during and after the Acts is upset and moreover we have no epistle during the Acts which gives the doctrine of the practical outworking and perfecting of faith with reward in view. Hebrews stands to the Pentecostal church much in the same way as Philippians and II Timothy do to the prison ministry of the Apostle Paul, through which ministry the joint-Body, i.e. the Body of Christ, is unfolded.

If we were asked whose pen wrote the epistle to the Hebrews, we should hazard the opinion, for what it is worth, that Luke was the amanuensis or editor. Luke was the close companion of Paul right to the end (II Tim. iv. 11). We have not only his own writings (The Gospel and Acts) with which to compare, but also his reporting of Paul's speeches in the Acts period. We have before remarked on the likeness of Luke's Greek style to the Hebrews epistle, a feature which has been noticed by many scholars, and the Lucan tradition goes back, as we have seen, to the beginning of Christianity.

However, no one can dogmatically say who the penman was, and we feel a little modesty may not be amiss here. If early Christian scholars were not sure, how can we be, living more than 1900 years later? We believe Origen summed up the position well when he stated that he believed that "the thoughts are the thoughts of the Apostle, but the language and the composition, that of one who recalled from memory and, as it were, made notes of what was said by his master . . . . . it was not without reason that men of old time (Origen was born 185A.D.) have handed it down as Paul's . . . . . But who wrote the epistle (i.e., the amanuensis) God only knows certainly". There must have been an ancient and genuine tradition concerning the Pauline authorship of Hebrews for the Eastern church to give such a united testimony in this way.

From the foregoing Scriptural facts we have brought forward, we unhesitatingly take the same standpoint as Origen of old, although it may not be the fashion in theological circles at the moment to ascribe this magnificent and important epistle to Paul, the Apostle of the Gentiles.

As an appendix, we give a list of word which are only found in Luke's writings and the epistle to the Hebrews.

The Early Centuries and the Truth

No.1. Introduction, The Didache and 1 Clement.
pp. 126 - 130

The subject of Church History is a vast and complicated one, which entails much study and research in order to get a good grasp of it. Yet a knowledge of this subject is necessary in some degree if one is to understand the set-up of modern Christendom. Of particular interest are the early centuries, the sub-apostolic age and those following it, which give us the reactions of the early Christians to the books and doctrine of the N.T., before the Canon was fixed and afterwards.

As many will know, the fixation of the Canon took time to achieve, as there was much apocryphal and spurious literature among the churches thus necessitating careful sorting out, and there is no doubt whatsoever that the Holy Spirit overruled in all this, thus ensuring that no uninspired writing was finally admitted to the N.T. Canon.

As long as the Apostles and their disciples lived, with their oral and written teaching, there was no need of a Canon and it is not until the end of the second century that the concept of a Canon began to reveal itself, and this was precipitated by controversy and heresy, such as that provoked by Marcion of Sinope, who broke with the church of Rome about 150A.D. However, not yet were all the books now existing in the N.T. decided upon. Those accepted generally speaking, were the four Gospels, the Pauline epistles (but not Hebrews), the Acts of the Apostles, some of the general epistles and after a period, the Revelation.

It was not until the fourth century that we find the N.T., as we know it today, finally fixed. In the east this was achieved in 367A.D. as declared in the Thirty-ninth Paschal letter of Athanasius. In the west a similar point was reached at Carthage in 397A.D., when the same list of N.T. books as those contained in the Athanasian letter was agreed upon.

However, from the age of the Apostolic Fathers, one or two of the Gospels were known, and the epistles of Paul, as a whole, although there were doubts about Hebrews. The important point is: did they understand the teaching of the Apostle, whose writings are the key to the truth for this age of grace? What actually happened after the martyrdom of the Apostle Paul? We do know for certain that the body of Truth given by revelation of the Lord Jesus to him, was passed on to his son in the faith, Timothy. What happened to Timothy? Alas, we cannot say, for the earliest Christian literature does not mention him. The later apostolic age to the great apologists of the middle and late second century has been described by historians as a “very ill-lit tunnel”. We know little except that it was a period of persecution and pernicious propaganda. The earliest writings were those of the Didache, The Shepherd of Hermas and those of the Apostolic Fathers, meaning men who had contact with, or who were appointed by the Apostles, although only for Polycarp is there real evidence of such contact. We can examine these writings fortunately, and come to a definite conclusion as to how the Truth was still regarded from approximately the middle of the second century onwards. We must bear in mind that, by this time, the churches were spread widely throughout the Roman Empire and in the east, beyond it.

The Didache, or the Teaching of the Twelve Apostles.

This was an early manual of Church instruction, claiming to give the teaching of the Lord as handed down through the twelve Apostles. It probably had as its basis Matt. xxviii. 19, "Go ye therefore, and teach all nations baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost: teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you". The Didache was discovered in a Greek manuscript at Constantinople in 1873, and published by Bryennius ten years later. It is apparently composite, and dates from the early part of the second century. An earlier Latin version has been discovered which Professor E. J. Goodspeed considers is separate from the work, a primitive form of it. The Didascalia, late in the third century, and the Apostolic Constitutions, late in the fourth, clearly made use of The Didache. We can say it is roughly contemporary with Ignatius, Polycarp and 1 Clement.

It evidently had the recent convert in mind, and presents the Christian life under the titles of the "Way of Life" as opposed to the "Way of Death", but when we step from the N.T. to this writing, it is like entering another world. Do we find set forth the "worthy walk" and the practical outworking of the Truth as set forth in the epistles of Paul? The answer is decidedly 'No'. We are back in a negative legalism, and one wonders whether the author or authors had the slightest understanding of the body of Truth given by the Lord through this great servant of His. When we remember how much Paul's indignation and wonder was evoked by the legalistic spirit that had affected the Galatians, we cannot help feeling that his cause for amazement would have been increased a hundredfold, could he have lived a half century or more later and read this document. One might be pardoned for looking on it solely as a Jewish writing, for there is strangely wanting the great characteristic of grace and love that permeate the Gospel of Christ as made known through the Apostle of the Gentiles; in fact the failure to distinguish between Law and Grace, Salvation and Reward is most characteristic, as the following quotations will show:

> "Do not keep stretching out your hands to receive, and drawing them back when it comes to returning. If through your hands you have earned a ransom for your sins, you shall not hesitate to give it" (4:6,7).
> "See that no one leads you astray from this way of the Teaching, for he teaches you without God. For if you can bear the whole yoke of the Lord, you will be perfect, but if you cannot, do what you can" (6:2).
>
> "Your fasts must not be on the same days as the hypocrites, for they fast on Monday and Thursday, but you must fast on Wednesday and Friday" (8:1).
> "So you shall take the first-fruits of the produce of the wine-press and the threshing floor and of cattle and sheep, and give the first-fruits to the prophets, for they are your high priests" (13:3).

One rubs ones eyes with amazement when reading these extracts, specially when one remembers that this was given out as Christian teaching less than a hundred years after the full revelation of grace had been given in the N.T.

Moreover, the Person of Christ is not central, and there is no appreciation of the glorious fact that justification is the present possession of the believer. According to this teaching, on becoming saved, a person must keep to the right way in order to attain salvation; in other words, salvation becomes a reward for righteous living. The word 'grace' only occurs twice, and then it is used as a kind of Divine force, added to that of the believer sets out to perfect himself in the righteousness of the law, and when he fails, to make some kind of atonement by his own works, "through your hands you have earned a ransom for your sins" (4:6,7).

Sometimes we see it argued, that the nearer one gets to N.T. times, the nearer one is to the primitive Truth of the Scriptures. An examination of this early literature shows, alas, such an idea to be false. It is significant that this document goes back to the Twelve Apostles of the circumcision for the instruction of the church in Christian doctrine and living, rather than to the minister appointed by the ascended Christ—Paul, the Apostle of the Gentiles (Eph. iii. 1, 2; Col. i. 24, 25).

The First Epistle of Clement.

This epistle, apart from the N.T., is probably the earliest Christian document that has come down to us. The writer is not named, but from ancient times, it has been ascribed to Clement, who was bishop of Rome from 88-97A.D. He seems to have had acquaintance with Paul's epistles and the letter to the Hebrews and I Peter. The date of 1 Clement could be around 90-95A.D. It is found in Greek near the close of the Codex Alexandrinus of the fifth century and in the eleventh century manuscript found by Bryennius in 1873, Syriac, Latin and Coptic versions have also come to light.

It was addressed to the Corinthian church, which at this time was showing hostility to the office of elder or presbyter, and its purpose was an attempt to correct this. When we study its theology what do we find? He speaks warm-heartedly about Christ, His death, and once actually speaks of "faith in Christ". However, when we examine the contents of these statements we find he expresses sentiments which clearly show that he never properly gripped the truth of salvation by grace, apart from works. Such faith, as he mentions, pertains not so much to the Person of Christ, but to His precepts, the Lord Jesus to him was a preacher of the "grace of repentance". The Lord's death is said to procure, not atonement, but an opportunity to repent, and is brought in as an example, leading men to a strong desire to do good and to keep humble before God.

Let us look at the passage where he uses the expression "faith in Christ":

> "Let our children share in Christian instruction, let them learn what power humility has with God, what pure love can do with God, how good and great His fear is, and how it saves those who live in it with holiness with a pure mind. For He is the searcher of thoughts and desires, His breath is in us and when He pleases, He will take it away.

> Faith in Christ confirms all this, for He, Himself, through the Holy Spirit, invites us thus: Come, children, listen to me. I will teach you to revere the Lord. What man is there that desires life, and loves to see good days? Keep your tongue from evil and your lips from uttering deceit. Turn from evil and do what is good. Seek peace and pursue it. The Lord's eyes are on the upright and His ears are open to their appeal . . . . ."
> (1 Clement 21:8-22:8).

It will be noted that Clement, after referring to faith in Christ, appears to be about to quote the Lord's actual words, but instead refers to Psa. xxxiv. 11-7, which of course has nothing to do directly with faith in Christ, apart from works, for salvation. In fact, both before and after using the phrase "faith in Christ", we have a stress on good works. Fear "saves those who live in it with holiness and a pure mind", and a carrying out in practice of Psa. xxxiv. follows, which, to Clement, confirms what "faith in Christ" is. It is surely clear, that, in spite of his piety, Clement had never fully grasped the Gospel as proclaimed through Paul, of justification by faith in Christ, apart from works, and the proper place that good works have, of following and being the fruit of salvation, not the procuring cause. Other references make this abundantly clear.

> "Let us clothe ourselves with harmony, in humility and self control, keeping ourselves from all gossip and slander, and be justified by deeds, not by words" (30:3).

He goes on to quote the example of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob acting by faith, very much as Heb. xi., but he confesses the faith of the sinner in Christ that saves, with the overcoming faith of the believer, pressing on to the goal. Other references are illuminating:

> "You see, dear friends, how great and wonderful love is, and there is no describing its perfection. Who is to be found in it, except those whom God deems worthy?"
> "How happy are we . . . . . if we carry out the commandments of God in harmony with love, that our sins may be forgiven through love" (50:3,5).
> "Let us therefore strive to be found in the number of those that wait for Him, so that we may share in the gifts He has promised. But how shall this be? . . . . . if we perform acts that are in harmony with His blameless will" (35:4,5).

According to these statements, God's love is only for those He "deems worthy" and this in spite of Rom. v. 8, "But God commendeth His love toward us, in that, while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us", and "there is none righteous, no, not one" (iii. 10). "Sin being forgiven through love" may be very high sounding, but it is not N.T. truth nor the N.T. basis for forgiveness. Nor do God's "gifts" have to be "striven for".

To be fair, there is one passage where Clement seems to contradict all this:

> "So we too, who by His will have been called in Christ Jesus are made upright not through ourselves, or through our wisdom and understanding, or piety or deeds we have done in holiness of heart, but through faith, by which Almighty God has made all men upright from the beginning; to Him be glory for ever and ever. Amen" (32:4), which only goes to show there was no clear unwavering conception in Clement's mind of the Gospel of God's grace, apart from human merit, as preached by the Apostle Paul. It is one thing to quote the words of Paul's epistles; it is quite another to understand them. Clement's epistle on the whole looks on salvation, not so much linked with the Person of Christ, but as directly connected with the Father, Who, to him, is the Creator, and in the ultimate analysis, salvation relates to Him, the Father, Whom he describes as the "Father of the world", an unscriptural expression and quite contrary to John i. 11, 12.

Only the redeemed can claim God and say "Abba", "my Father". Salvation, according to this writer, can only be had by obeying God, keeping humble, and doing His will. When we bear in mind that all this was written within some 40 years of the good deposit of Truth being made known through the Apostle Paul, we can surely see how quickly the fundamental Truths were lost.

No.2. The Epistles of Ignatius.
pp. 143 - 146

Ignatius, bishop of Antioch, lived early in the second century. He was condemned to death and taken to Rome to be thrown to the lions in the Coliseum. As he passed through Asia, he was met by groups of Christians at Philadelphia and Smyrna, and the churches of Tralles, Magnesia and Ephesus sent delegations to greet him at Smyrna. To all these churches he sent letters of acknowledgment, urging them to avoid heresy and stand by their bishops. There are seven letters in all, which have had a chequered history, having been reduced in Syriac to three greatly abbreviated ones, and, on the other hand, in Greek and Latin having been increased by the addition of six or more spurious letters. Eusebius, the historian, in 326A.D., gives the list of seven epistles, and these, it is generally agreed, are the original collection. Eusebius tells us that Ignatius was martyred in the Coliseum in 107-108A.D., though modern scholarship gives 110-117A.D., as more likely to be the true date.

Examining these writings from the standpoint of the truth as revealed in the Pauline epistles, what do we find? First of all, there is no doubt that Ignatius whole-heartedly believed the Deity of Christ:

> ". . . . God became incarnate, true life in death, sprung from Mary and from God . . . Jesus Christ our Lord" (Eph.7:2).
>
> "For our God, Jesus Christ, was conceived by Mary by divine dispensation, of the line of David, and of the Holy Spirit . . . . ." (Eph.18:2-3).
>
> "I extol Jesus Christ, the God Who has given you such wisdom" (Smyrna1:1).
>
> "For our God, Jesus Christ, is more plainly visible now that He is in the Father" (Rom.3:3).

In one passage, he uses the striking phrase "the blood of God" (Eph.1:1) and for him, God can only be known through Jesus Christ:

> "Jesus Christ will show you that I am telling the truth when I say this. He is the unerring mouth by which the Father has spoken truly" (Rom.8:2).
> ". . . . . that the disobedient may be convinced that there is one God Who has manifested Himself through Jesus Christ, His Son" (Mag.8:2).

Ignatius writes too to warn the churches of the error of Docetism. This was one of the earliest of Satanic heresies, already combated by the Apostle John in his first epistle (iv. 2, 3). It was the theory that Christ, during His earthly life, had not a real body but only an apparent or phantom one. It sprang from the idea of the impurity of matter and the impossibility therefore of God having direct contact with it, whether in a body, or in any other way. This was the basis, not only of Docetism but of Gnosticism, and if the Docetic idea was true, then it is evident that the Lord Jesus could not have really died on the Cross or rose again from the dead, with consequence that the foundations of Christianity are destroyed. Ignatius takes care to expose this great error:

> "For He suffered all these things for our sakes, in order that we might be saved. And He suffered really, just as He also really raised Himself; it is not as some unbelievers say that He suffered seemingly . . . . ." (Smyrna1:2).
> ". . . . . he who . . . . . reviles my Lord by not admitting that He wore flesh and blood. Whoever does not say this has completely denied Him . . . . ." (Smyrna5:2).

However, when we come to the presentation of the Gospel, the doctrines of grace, eternal life, and the role that the church plays in the purpose of God, we find a veering away from the N.T. He exalts the local church to a position it never had in the Apostle Paul's epistles. In fact Ignatius conceives the church practically always in terms of the local assembly headed by the bishop, apart from which truth and salvation cannot exist, according to him. We give some examples:

> "It is proper for you to run your race in harmony with the mind of the bishop . . . . ." (Eph. 1:4).
>
> "So it is clear we must look upon the bishop as the Lord Himself . . . . ." (Eph.4:1).
>
> "I exhort you, be zealous to do everything in godly harmony, with the bishop presiding in the place of God" (Eph.6:1).
>
> "You must do nothing without the bishop and the elders" (Eph.7:1).
>
> "When you subordinate yourselves to the bishop as to Jesus Christ, you appear to me to be living not in the human way, but after the manner of Jesus Christ . . . . ." (Trall.2:1).
>
> "In the same way all must respect the deacons as Jesus Christ, as they do the bishop, for he symbolizes the Father and the elders as a council of God and a band of Apostles. Without these no body can be called a church" (Trall.3:1).
>
> "You must all follow the bishop, as Jesus Christ followed the Father . . . . . let that be considered a valid thanksgiving which is held under the bishop or someone authorized by him . . . . . It is not permissible to baptize or hold a religious meal without the bishop . . . It is well to recognize God and the bishop. Whoever honours the bishop is honoured by God. Whoever does anything without the bishop's knowledge is serving the devil . . . . ."
> "It is right for men and women who are marrying to form their union with the approval of the bishop, in order that their marriage may be in accordance with the Lord's will and not to gratify desire" (Poly.5:2).

No less than thirty times in his epistles Ignatius expresses similar sentiments, so that it would appear almost an obsession with him. As far as he was concerned, practically all truth was expressed, at least symbolically, in the local church with its presiding bishop. It is noteworthy too that he always uses 'bishop' in the singular, whereas the N.T. speaks of "bishops and deacons" (Phil. i. 1). Little did Ignatius realize that he was sowing the seeds of priestcraft and bondage to be expressed in Roman Catholicism later on. In his defence, it may be stated that he was living close to N.T. times, and the Apostle Paul had already given instruction concerning the character and position of bishops in his first epistle to Timothy. At the same time it should be noted that Ignatius does not teach an apostolic succession of bishops. This was unknown to him and was a later misconception.

It is sometimes said that in I Timothy we have the church in its rule, whereas in II Timothy we have the church in ruin, with the forsaking of Paul and the truth given through him. From this we must not deduce that after the Apostle's time, local churches ceased to exist. The reverse is the truth, as church history makes clear. It may be that Ignatius knew of Paul's first letter to Timothy, but it is obvious that he had got it all out of focus. For him, the guarding of the truth was to keep united to local assembly and its bishop; in other words we have a doctrine of union with Christ through the visible church, and from this logically follows the idea that repentance, spiritual life and growth can only be experienced in the same way:

> "Now the Lord forgives all who repent, if in repentance they turn in union with God and the council of the bishop" (Philad.8:1).
> "For all who belong to God and Jesus Christ are with the bishop . . . . . if anyone follows a schismatic, he cannot inherit the kingdom of God" (Philad.3:2,3).

For Ignatius, a 'schismatic' was anyone who had separated himself from the local church. If we search his writings for a clear conception of salvation by grace, apart from works, we shall search in vain. He is fond of using the expression 'reaching the presence of God' as the hope of the believer and the culmination of salvation, but this is to be attained by faithfulness and endurance. In other words, it is by works and merit:

> ". . . . . the Father. In union with Him, if we endure the ill-treatment of the evil genius of this world and escape, we will reach God" (Magnes.1:2).
>
> "If you endure everything for His (God's) sake, you will reach His presence" (Smyrna9:2).
>
> ". . . in order that, through your prayers, I may reach the presence of God" (Smyrna11:1).
> ". . . . . if only, through suffering, I may reach the presence of God" (Poly.7:1).

This explains why Ignatius forbad anyone trying to get his release and escape from martyrdom. He believed that only by suffering and faithfulness to death would he ever reach God's presence and so, rather than seeking to escape from the wild beasts at Rome, he seemed to welcome it:

> "Let me be eaten by the wild beasts, through whom I can reach the presence of God. I am God's wheat, and I am ground by the teeth of the wild beasts, so that I may be found pure bread of Christ . . . . . If I suffer, I shall be freed by Jesus Christ and I will rise in Him free . . . . . Fire and cross, and struggles with wild beasts, crushing of bones, mangling of limbs, grinding of my whole body, wicked torments of the devil, let them come upon me, only let me reach the presence of Jesus Christ" (Rom.4:1,2; 5:1-3).

These are the words of a brave man, who, as a believer, experienced this cruel death at Rome. How utterly pathetic that he apparently did not rejoice in the knowledge of the forgiveness of sins by grace alone, and the free gift and assurance of eternal life in Christ! As with all the Apostolic fathers, he confused salvation by faith in Christ, apart from works, with prize and reward for faithful service. In other words, he never learned the N.T. teaching regarding the position of good works. He wrote to the Magnesians:

> "Thos who believe with love, bear the stamp of God the Father through Jesus Christ, through Whom, unless we choose to die in His suffering, His life is not in use" (Magnes.5:2).
> "Be sober as God's athlete; the prize is immortality and eternal life" (Poly.2:3).

We wish to make it clear we are not dealing with these early Christian's characters, but their doctrine and beliefs.

They were men of the utmost courage personally, but as teachers, weighed in the balances of the Word of Truth, how often they failed to grasp its teaching, although living so near apostolic times!

No.3. The Epistles of Polycarp and Barnabas.
pp. 164 - 168

With Polycarp, Bishop of Smyrna (69-155A.D.), we have a direct link with the Apostolic age and we can regard him as the chief depository of the primitive gospel tradition. Irenaeus tells us that in early life Polycarp "had been taught by Apostles and lived in familiar intercourse with many that had seen Christ" (3:3,4). In words addressed to Florinus, Irenaeus informs us of Polycarp's direct contact with the Apostle John:

> ". . . . . I can even now point out the place where the blessed Polycarp used to sit when he discoursed, and describe . . . . . the discourses which he delivered to the people, how he used to speak of his intercourse with John and the rest of those who had seen the Lord, and how he would relate their words. And everything that he had heard from them about the Lord, about His miracles and about His teaching, Polycarp used to tell us as one who had received it from those who had seen the Word of Life with their own eyes, and all this in perfect harmony with the Scriptures . . . . ."

Polycarp thus becomes a living link between the Apostles and the writers who flourished at the end of the second century, and from the standpoint of our inquiry, occupies a position of great importance. If the truth was passed down in all its purity, we shall surely find it in his testimony. That he was a Christian who stood high in the favour of his contemporaries, there is no doubt. Nor can one question his implicit trust in the Lord Jesus Christ throughout his long life. In his old age he was martyred, and his words to the Roman proconsul, who offered to set him free, if he would deny the Lord, are well known: "Eighty and six years have I served Him, and He hath done me no wrong. How can I then speak evil of my King Who has saved me?" And thus he went bravely to his death.

There are four main sources of our knowledge of Polycarp: (1) The statements of Irenaeus. (2) The epistle of Polycarp. (3) The epistle of Ignatius to Polycarp. (4) The epistle of the church at Smyrna to the Philomelians, which gives the account of his martyrdom. We are immediately concerned with Polycarp's epistle to the Philippians. Dr. P. N. Harrison has shown it is possible, originally, that this document consisted of two epistles, chapters 13 and 14 having been written at the time of the death of Ignatius, and chapters 1-13 written several years later, but for our purpose we shall use the accepted name of the Epistle of Polycarp. It is a sequel to the letters of Ignatius. When Ignatius had left Philippi for Rome, on his way to martyrdom, the believers at Philippi wrote, as he had suggested, to Polycarp at Smyrna, asking him to send them the letters of Ignatius that he had in his possession, and this he did with a covering letter, which we know as Polycarp to the Philippians. As we examine it regarding its doctrine, what do we find? That he knew the text of a number of N.T. books there is no doubt, but it is one thing to quote the N.T., it is quite another to understand its teaching, and this is where so many of the Apostolic Fathers failed. Like Ignatius he made his stand against the early error of Docetism:

> "For every one who does not confess that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh is an anti-Christ; and whosoever does not confess the testimony of the cross is of the devil; and whosoever perverts the oracles of the Lord for his own lusts, and says there is neither resurrection nor judgment, this man is the first-born of Satan" (Phil.7:1).

On the opening of the epistle we are encouraged to read:

> ". . . . . For you know that you have been saved by His grace, not by what you have done, but by the will of God through Jesus Christ."

Yet, a few verses further on we find the following:

> "He Who raised Him (Christ) from the dead, will raise us also, if we do His will and live by His commands, and love what He loved, refraining from all injustice, covetousness, love of money, evil speaking, false witness; not returning evil for evil or abuse for abuse, or blow for blow, or curse for curse, but remembering what the Lord said when He taught: 'Do not judge, so that you may not judged; forgive and you will be forgiven; have mercy so that you may be shown mercy" (Phil.2:2,3).

We rub our eyes, as it were, and ask ourselves how Polycarp could have written this, had he really understood the doctrine of grace as made known in Paul's epistles? The answer is that he did not fully understand it. Actually he wrote:

> "For neither I, nor anyone else like me, can follow the wisdom of the blessed and glorious Paul, who, when he was among you, face to face with the men of that time, carefully and steadfastly uttered his teaching about truth . . . . ." (Phil.3:2).

Here, indeed, is modesty, and also a confession that he had not fully grasped the truth given through Paul. Later on he states that 'love delivers from death', which certainly is not N.T. teaching. For Polycarp, the death of Christ for our sins does not mean a forgiveness or justification that cancels the penalty and power of sin. Rather, by this act, Christ has set man on his feet again, as it were, and put him into a position where he can fully carry out his obligations to God in works of righteousness, in other words, can complete his salvation by his own acts. This kind of idea is common to all the Apostolic Fathers. There is an unconscious link with the pagan world that we must do something in order to be saved. This failure to grasp the real meaning of salvation by faith in Christ apart from works, is all the more startling when we remember the direct links that Polycarp had with the Apostle John and possibly other N.T. Apostles. It makes one wonder just how much basic doctrine of the N.T. epistles was really perceived and witnessed for by those who succeeded the writers of the N.T.

The Epistle of Barnabas.

This is an anonymous epistle, probably Alexandrine, of the early second century, between 70 and 120A.D., which has been attributed to Barnabas. It is very doubtful if he can be the companion of the Apostle Paul. Clement of Alexandria believed he was, but this was possibly an early guess. The internal evidence is strongly against it. The writer's attitude to the O.T. is incomprehensible if Barnabas the Levite is the author, who had worked so closely with the Apostle Paul. In its original form the letter possibly stopped with chapter 17, as one of the Latin manuscripts does. After this, with a crude transition, it continues with more than fifty commands taken from The Didache, which we have already considered. In effect, it is an allegorical commentary on the O.T., concerning which we shall have more to say later on.

As with the letters of the other Apostolic Fathers, we search it for its attitude to the basic truths of the Gospel and for any deeper truth. The writer refers often to the sufferings and death of Christ, but what place do these occupy in his theology? It must be said straight away, that he has no clear knowledge of justification by faith, apart from works, as present truth for the believer in Christ. Justification for him is a possible future experience but nothing more. He writes:

> "Do not withdraw by yourselves and live alone, as though you had already become justified, but gather together and seek out the common advantage . . . . ." (4:10).

Forgiveness of sins was linked by him with water baptism. In other words he believed in baptismal regeneration:

> "But let us inquire whether the Lord took care to foreshadow the water and the cross. About the water, it is written of Israel how they would not accept the baptism that brings forgiveness of sins, but would build for themselves" (11:1).
>
> "Observe how He has defined the water and the cross together. For this is what He means: Blessed are those who have set their hope on the cross and gone down into water . . . . ." (11:8).
> "And there was a river flowing from the right hand and beautiful trees grew out of it, and whosoever eats of them will live for ever. This means that we go down into the water full of sins and pollutions, and we come up bringing forth fear in our hearts and with hope in Jesus in our spirit" (11:11).

Barnabas knows nothing of the death of Christ as an all-sufficient sacrifice for sin. Like the other Apostolic Fathers he blends works with salvation. He exhorts his readers to 'Win salvation, children of love and peace' (21:9). Previous to this he writes:

> "It is well, therefore, after learning the ordinances of the Lord above written (the commands of The Didache) to live by them. For the man who does so will be glorified in the kingdom of God; the one that chooses their opposites will perish with his works" (21:1).
>
> "This then is the way of light, if anyone wishing to make his way to his appointed place, will be zealous in all his works" (19:1).

Perhaps nothing is more revealing than the following:

> "Thou shalt remember the day of judgment, night and day . . . . . and by meditating how to save a soul by the word, or by the hands thou shalt labour for the redemption of thy sins" (19:10).

No one with the most elementary understanding of the basic doctrines of grace, apart from merit of works, revealed through the Apostle Paul, could ever give expression to such ideas. Moreover Barnabas could not have believed that nothing "shall be able to separate us from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus our Lord" (Rom. viii. 39), for he writes:

> "Let us never . . . . . fall asleep over our sins, and so the evil ruler will get control of us, and thrust us out of the kingdom of the Lord" (4:13).

We find with this writer what is perhaps the first treatise in post-apostolic times on the allegorical method of treating Scripture. This is a pernicious system of interpretation which is destructive of true understanding of the Word. It has done so much to veil the truth over the centuries, and is seen today in amillennialism and kindred doctrines, and much of the teaching emanating from the Roman Catholic church. Those who hold such ideas never seem to grasp the true position of the people of Israel in the redemptive plan of God, and in missing this, they lose the key that opens so much of Bible teaching. If we err here, it is more than likely we shall err everywhere else in our conception of the Divine plan of the ages centred in Christ Jesus.

Barnabas is strongly anti-Judaistic; in fact he goes so far as to assert that the people of Israel were never in real covenant relationship with God. He even goes so far as to state that circumcision was practiced by them because they were deceived by an evil angel:

> "He (God) has commanded that there should be a circumcision not of the flesh but they (Israel) disobeyed, for an evil angel deluded them . . . . ." (9:4).

He takes all the literal commands of the Lord and spiritualizes them. Commenting on the Divine regulations of diet he says:

> "This then is why he (Moses) mentioned the swine; 'You shall not associated', he means, 'with men who are like swine' . . . . ."
>
> "Neither shall you eat the eagle or the hawk, or the kite, or the crow. You shall not, he means, associate with or come to resemble such men as do not know how to provide their food by toil and sweat, but lawlessly seize what belongs to others."
> "You shall not eat, he goes on, sea eel or polyp or cuttlefish. You shall not, he means, associate with such men . . . . . who are utterly ungodly and already condemned to death."
> "Moses received three decrees about food and uttered them in the Spirit, but they (Israel) in their fleshly desire, received them as having to do with eating" (10:3-9).

This is typical of the way this writer handles the O.T. Nothing means exactly what it says; some so-called spiritual interpretation must be found. What he did not realize, nor those who follow in his footsteps, that by so doing they are opening the door wide to error as there are as many different ideas as there are spiritualizers! If God does not mean what He says we might as well close the Book for all serious and practical purposes. This does not result in a wooden literality. Sound exegesis takes note of symbols and figures of speech. These have their place, but it is evident that God uses human words in their normal accepted meaning, otherwise how could He convey His truth to men?

The epistle of Barnabas shows two great flaws: (1) Failure to interpret the Word aright through extensive use of allegory. (2) Failure to grasp that good deposit of doctrine made known by the risen Christ to the Apostle Paul as the channel of Truth to the Gentiles, so fitting in this peculiarly Gentile age.

No.4. The Shepherd of Hermas and the Second Epistle of Clement.

pp. 183 - 187

Among the writings of the Apostolic Fathers, perhaps that which makes the strangest reading to Christian minds today is The Shepherd of Hermas. Hermas was a slave or a freedman in Rome, who lived somewhere around the last decade of the first century. In ancient times two opinions prevailed as regards his identity. Some held that he was the Hermas of Rom. xvi. 14. Origen states this opinion (Comment in Rom. lib. 10:31), and it is repeated by Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. 3:3) and Jerome (De Vris Illustribus e.x.). The second opinion is based on the Muratorian fragment on the Canon. This states "The Pastor was written very lately in our times, in the city of Rome by Hermas, while bishop Pius, his brother, sat in the chair of the church of the city of Rome". In view of conflicting evidence, it is not possible to be dogmatic as to who the author was, but it is certain that this writing is an early composition.

Hermas claimed to be a Christian prophet, and so the work begins with a series of four visions emphasizing repentance, in which he has interview with the angel of repentance, whom he calls the Shepherd. Three or four years later Hermas produced a larger work, The Shepherd proper, which begins with an apocalypse. Then follows a series of twelve Commands, showing how the truly repentant believer should live, and after this ten parables occur, setting forth the workings of repentance. Hermas was evidently concerned with the low standard of Christian walk in the Roman church and he sought, by his writing, to stir up believers at Rome and elsewhere. The Shepherd of Hermas was highly thought of by early Christians and was accepted as part of inspired Scripture by Clement of Alexandria towards the end of the second century, and by Origen in the third, Tertullian first accepted it, but later repudiated it. Eusebius, the historian, put it among the rejected writings. It stood at the end of the Codex Sinaiticus, about the middle of the fourth century. Athanasius (367A.D.) recommended it to converts for private reading.

What is the true value of this work? It is a loose presentation in allegorical form of what the writer deemed to be Christian truth, but when it is brought to the test of the N.T., how far it falls short! To begin with, the writer has the extraordinary idea that only one sin after conversion can be forgiven by God. In the dialogue between the Shepherd (the angel of repentance) and Hermas, we find the following:

> "If then, sir", I said, "after the wife is divorced, she repents and wishes to return to her own husband, will she not be taken back?"
> "Certainly", said he, "if her husband does not take her back, he sins and involves himself in great sin. The sinner who repents, must be taken back, but not often, for the slaves of God can have but one repentance" (Com. 4.1:7,8).
>
> "But I tell you", said he (the angel), "If after this great and holy invitation a man is severely tempted by the devil and sins, he has one opportunity to repent" (Com. 4.3:6).

Moreover, Divine forgiveness is not immediate. The Shepherd comments upon some who have repented of sin and says to Hermas:

> "I know that they have repented with all their hearts; then do you think that the sins of those who repent are immediately forgiven?
> Not at all! But the man who repents must torment his own soul . . . . . and be distressed with all kinds of afflictions" (Parable 7:4).

Here we have two cardinal errors: (1) the failure to see that the forgiveness of sins by God to the redeemed covers all sins past, present and future, and (2) such forgiveness is an act of grace on the part of God and cannot be mixed, or be dependent upon the believer's works, such as self affliction, and torment, etc.

Hermas knows nothing of external life as a free gift by faith in Christ. He is very fond of the expression "Living to God". It occurs many times throughout this writing, and in every case is connected with works and human merit of which the following is a sample:

> "Why, Sir" said I, "did you say of those that keep His commands, 'they will live to God'?" "Because" said he, ". . . . . life with God belongs to those who fear Him and keep His commands. But those who do not keep His commands do not have life . . . . ." (Com.7:5).
> "But now I say to you, if you do not keep them (God's commands), but neglect them, you will not have Salvation, nor your children, nor your family . . . . ." (Com. 12.3:6).

It is quite clear that, for Hermas, salvation is only realized through the law. His one object is a personal striving for legal conformity. If he "refrains from every evil passion, he will make sure of eternal life" (Vision 3.8:4). Grace, for him, is only an additional force to help him do this. The faith that he talks about, is not faith in Christ as Saviour, but faith that enables one to keep the commandments. Not only does this writer stress human merit, but also supererogatory merit. In fact we find the germ of later Roman Catholic doctrine in more than one sense in The Shepherd of Hermas. Vision 3:7 indicates a similar idea to that later developed; in other passages we have the doctrine of penance in the doctrine of purgatory. In Parable 5.3:3, we find the Shepherd speaking to Hermas:

> "I will show you His (God's) commands, and if you keep them, you will be pleasing to Him, ... and if you do anything good beyond God's command, you will gain greater glory for yourself and be more honoured in the sight of God than you would have been."

This is obviously the doctrine of supererogation in germ. If a believer does more than God ordains, he piles up for himself, as it were, a reserve of goodness and glory which, Romanism later asserted, could be drawn upon for others who were not so good! This is a flagrant contravention of the N.T.

Hermas not only knows nothing of salvation by grace apart from works, but he was ignorant of Christ as the one Mediator. For him, angels were the intermediaries through whom protection and revelation may be made. He believed that every man has two angels, "one of righteousness, and one of wickedness" (Com. 6.1:2).

Not only this, but he clearly held and taught baptismal regeneration. In Vision 3.3:5, the woman who represents the church says to him:

> "Hear then, why the tower is built on waters. It is because your life has been saved and will be saved by water."

And in Parable 9.16:3, Hermas addresses the angel and asks:

> "Why sir", said I, "did the stones come up from the deep places, and why were they put into the building of the tower . . . . .?"
> "They had to come up through water" said he, "to be made alive, for they could not enter the kingdom of God in any other way . . . . . So the water is the seal. They go down into the water dead, and they come up alive."

Even those who fell asleep before Christ must be baptized before they can enter the kingdom, and the Apostles and teachers are represented as preaching the Name of the Son of God to them (9.16:5). Not once do we read of salvation or atonement resting on the shed blood of the Lord Jesus Christ. It is self-justification, penance, and law-keeping. He even puts these words into the mouth of the explaining angel:

> "Listen", said he, "all who have ever suffered for the Name are glorious in the sight of God and the sins of all of them have been taken away, because they have suffered for the Name of the Son of God" (Parable 9.28:3).

If this is not salvation by works and merit, what is it? Regarding cleansing, this writer apparently knows nothing of cleansing by the blood of Christ (I John i. 7). Again and again, the reader is exhorted to 'cleanse himself' to make himself fit for the kingdom of God.

This apostolic writing makes melancholy reading when one compares it with the clear and pure doctrine of the N.T., and again one is forcibly reminded of how quickly must have been the falling away from the truth so faithfully made known by the Apostle Paul and those associated with him.

The Second Epistle of Clement.

The last of the writings of the Apostolic Fathers we shall consider is the second epistle of Clement. Strictly speaking, this is not an epistle at all, but a sermon, and has no connection with 1 Clement.

Eusebius mentioned it doubtfully as the second letter of Clement in his Church History (3.38:4). Its real author may have been Soter, bishop of Rome 166-174A.D., it being sent as a letter to the church at Corinth and acknowledged by Dionysius, bishop of Corinth, in a letter preserved in Eusebius (Church History 4.23:11). Dionysius says that the Corinthian church will preserve Soter's letter, and be able to draw advice from it, "as also from the former epistle which was written to us through Clement". This would explain how this sermon became linked with 1 Clement, both documents having been written from Rome and sent to the church at Corinth. They are both found at the end of the Codex Alexandrinus.

2 Clement gives us the earliest sermon of post-apostolic times and once again, we seek to weigh up its teaching in the light of the truth of the Holy Scriptures. In doing so, we find its theology running along the lines of the writings we have already considered, that is, that merit, repentance and persistent good works are the main factors in salvation.

It is significant that these ideas are central in all pagan conceptions of salvation. We must remember that the Apostolic Fathers were Greeks, their language Greek and their background Greek modes of thought, which their knowledge of the N.T. never completely eradicated. Max Muller is quoted in Moody's The Childhood of the Church as writing: "I have found the one keynote of all these so-called sacred books, whether it be the Veda of the Brahmans, the Puranas of Siva and Vishna, the Koran of the Mohammedans, the Zend-Avesta of the Parsees, the Tripitoka of the Buddhists—the one refrain through all—salvation by works. They all say that salvation must be purchased, must be bought with a price; and that the sole price must be our works and deserving". This idea, alas, runs through all the Apostolic Fathers who never really grasped the doctrine of grace. Even when they talk about the death of Christ, faith and grace, these are only means to help them keep the "commands of God", and only by so doing could they hope finally to be saved and enter the kingdom of God. The second epistle of Clement is no exception to this:

> "Therefore brethren, if we do the Father's will and keep the flesh pure, and keep the Lord's commands we shall receive eternal life" (8:2).
> "For as a recompense I ask you to repent with all your hearts and give yourselves salvation and life . . . . . let us therefore practice righteousness so that we may finally be saved . . . . . blessed are they that obey these commands . . . . . they will gather the immortal fruit of the resurrection" (19:1,3,4).

Even resurrection, therefore, is made to depend upon obedience, and the writer even thinks he can choose to be a member of the church:

> "So then, let us choose to be part of the church of life, in order that we may be saved" (14:1).

Not only this, but he has completely unscriptural conception of almsgiving:

> "Almsgiving is good even as repentance for sins; fasting is better than prayer, but the giving of alms is better than both . . . . . blessed is everyone who is found full of these things, for almsgiving lightens sin" (16:4).

There can be no doubt that the writer rested upon self-justification for his salvation, and entry into the Kingdom of God was by his own efforts. "If we do righteousness before God, we shall enter the Kingdom" (11:7). One cannot help wondering how it was possible for anyone to read seriously the epistles of Paul and hold such ideas, which only goes to show that it is one thing to read the words, but quite another to grasp the truth lying behind them. These Fathers unwittingly turned the Gospel into another law. It was Judaism and paganism in Christian dress. It seems impossible for them to realize that God could justify and save a sinner apart from his works. They never learned the true N.T. position of good works as flowing from salvation, rather than being the procuring cause of it. They became thoroughly moralistic, drawing up codes and rules, and represented salvation and the Christian life as doing one's best to carry these out to the utmost. They never grasped the supreme truth that Christ is the end of the law for righteousness to everyone that believeth (Rom. x. 4).

No.5. Constantine and the Middle Ages.
pp. 205 - 210

In summing up the teaching of the Apostolic Fathers, what do we find? One is surprised and even shocked to discover that none of them had a clear conception of the gospel of grace, Divinely delivered to the Apostle Paul and ministered by him. Rom. xi. 6 never really gripped them:

> "And if by grace, then is it no more of works: otherwise grace is no more grace. But if it be of works, then is it no more grace: otherwise work is no more work."

They never realized that grace and works, grace and human merit, can never be blended as far as the gospel is concerned. Theirs was a legalism with a Christian veneer; a salvation by personal righteousness with grace thrown in, as it were, as an added power to help them keep the law. Repentance was not regarded in the N.T. sense as the work of the Holy Spirit, but rather as an eternal principle of self-amendment before God, which they regarded as an adequate means for securing God's forgiveness and mercy. This does not reflect upon their characters of course, for they were brave men, willing to suffer and to die for what they held to be truth, and they conducted a splendid fight against the evil inherent in paganism around them. It was not that they opposed the N.T. gospel of grace, but simply that they did not properly understand it and its implications. It seem impossible for them to grasp that a God of grace could save a sinner, just as he is, by faith in Christ's redemptive work alone, apart from works. For them, salvation was a life-long struggle with sin and failure, with the result that they were driven into legalism and formalism.

Not only this, but their Christology was defective. The Person of Christ was largely pushed into the background, and His place was taken by God in the role of Law-giver, Judge and Creator. For them Christ's unique Mediatorial position was not grasped.

Their chief concern was His teaching as recorded in the Synoptic Gospels, and used as a way of living only, to be worked out by themselves as best they could. If they talked about grace, it was regarded as a special power given by God to supplement their own strivings towards self-justification. They were never able to distinguish between salvation, and prize or reward. Confusing these separate aspects of truth, as thousands have done since, and still do today, they were never able to appreciate properly the N.T. position of 'good works'. The Apostle Paul summed this up very clearly in Eph. ii. 8, 9:

> "For by grace are ye saved through faith; and that not of yourselves: it is the gift of God; not of works, lest any man should boast. For we are His workmanship, created in Christ Jesus unto good works . . . . .", good works being the fruit of salvation with a prize or crown in view and not the procuring cause.

The early Fathers were ready to take up the cross and suffer for Christ, but they had the mistaken idea that this was the necessary pathway for salvation and ultimate forgiveness. This is seen most clearly in the case of Ignatius, with his eagerness to suffer martyrdom, that by so doing, he might at the end be found worthy of salvation. Such confusion of truth is indeed tragic, when one remembers the lengths these early Christians were prepared to go to for their faith.

What is so startling is the fact of this landslide away from basic truth so soon after the Apostolic times, that is, 50 years after the death of the last Apostle, John. How did this happen? There may have been more than one reason. The gospel of grace was new and revolutionary and this fact alone made its acceptance difficult, both to the Jew with his legal background, and the Gentile with his pagan Greek thought. But this of itself is not sufficient to account for such a slipping away from truth. We believe Paul himself has supplied the answer. In his last letter, writing to Timothy, he said:

> "This thou knowest, that all that are in Asia turned away from me, of whom are Phygellus and Hermogenes" (II Tim. i. 15 R.V.).

There are some who interpret this verse as though it read 'those of Asia' and referred to certain Asiatic Christians who happened to be at Rome at the time of the Apostle's arrest and imprisonment, or who had gone to Rome for the purpose of bearing witness on behalf of Paul, but finding the extreme danger this would put them in by associating with him, forsook him and fled. Certainly in II Tim. iv. 16, Paul states:

> "At my first defence no one took my part, but all forsook me; may it not be laid to their account" (R.V.).

This must have referred to believers in Rome, but it is pure conjecture to link this with "all in Asia". Dr. H. D. Spence writes:

> "This simple and more obvious meaning is here to be preferred, and we assume as certain that the forsaking, the giving up St. Paul, took place in Asia itself. Large numbers of Christians, if not whole churches, repudiated their connection with the father of Gentile Christianity, and possibly disobeyed his teaching. What, in fact absolutely took place in Asia, while St. Paul lay bound, waiting for death in Rome, had been often > threatened in Corinth and other centres. Party feeling ran high in those days, we know; and one of the most sorrowful trials the great-hearted St. Paul had to endure . . . . . was the knowledge that his name and teaching no longer was held in honour by some of those Asian churches so dear to him."

The argument that history records no large defection from Paul's teaching carries little weight when one remembers the scanty knowledge we have of sub-apostolic times. It seems evident that the Apostle lived to see a large falling away from the truth committed to him by the Lord Jesus, and which he had so faithfully made known. No wonder he warned Timothy of those who would "turn away their ears from the truth, and turn aside unto fables" (II Tim. iv. 4 R.V.). If they turned away from him whom Christ had appointed as the ministry of the church which is His Body (Col. i. 24-26), and through whom the teaching was made known and vitally connected, then a forsaking of truth and apostasy was bound to result, the effect of which must have been felt at the end of the first century and thereafter. Had the truth for which Paul lived and died, been held faithfully by all the churches he founded, and kept by the succeeding members, the ignorance of the basic teaching of the gospel of grace amongst the Apostolic Fathers would have been impossible.

We once encountered an objection to the doctrine of the Mystery of Ephesians and Colossians with the statement that, if this was true, it would be reflected in the beliefs of the early Christians. This sounds reasonable on the surface, but it fails to take into account the apostasy of II Tim. i. 15. As we have seen, there is not even a clear conception of salvation by grace in the earliest sub-apostolic writings, and of the truth of the Mystery there is absolutely none, nor could there be, for, if the foundation was not understood, the top-stone was impossible of comprehension or witness. Neither is the situation much improved when we come to the later and Greek Fathers. Augustine (354-430A.D.) was probably the first one who had any real conception of grace as revealed in the N.T., but he gives no indication that he knew or rejoiced in the glories of the great Secret of Eph. iii. Outstanding man that he was, his conception of the church was always along the lines of the medieval identification of the kingdom of God with the outward ecclesiastical organization and Roman Catholicism of his day, and he held there was no salvation outside it. His stress on sacraments as vehicles of grace, his belief in purgatory and the use of the relics, and his allegorization of the Scriptures all combine to make an understanding of the Mystery impossible. Paul's aim ". . . . . to make all men see what is the dispensation of the Mystery" (secret, Eph. iii. 9 R.V.), was unknown to the early Christians. Turning away from him, they lost the key to the truth for this age, and until the last century, it has never been recovered in anything like its fullness.

Constantine.

Going back to the first centuries, there is no doubt that the conversion of the Emperor Constantine (died 337A.D.) played an important part in the evolution of Christendom. Up to his day, the professing church had endured great persecutions, through which it had survived. The story of his professed conversion is well known. Before the battle of the Milvian Bridge, October 27, 312A.D., when he defeated Maxentius, he passed through a remarkable experience. The story goes that he saw in the sky a flaming cross with the inscription in Greek, "By this sign conquer". Whether this was an optical illusion, or even a legend, it is difficult to say, but something affected him deeply and through this he professed conversion. No one can say with definiteness that this was the real work of the Spirit of God. He afterwards retained some of his old superstitions, but certainly showed that he believed in the God of the Christians, and shortly afterwards he joined with the fellow-emperor Licinius in issuing a decree giving full toleration to the Christian faith, restoring to the churches all places of worship which had been confiscated, making good all losses; and giving unconditional religious liberty to all, so that Christianity now enjoyed complete freedom throughout the Roman world. This was indeed a startling reversal of affairs, but while it was of great importance to the church, it was far from being an unmixed blessing. Constantine maintained close contact with the bishops and did his best to settle the various controversies which arose at this time. This led to an intervention by the State in church affairs which proved disastrous later on to spiritual liberty. The Christian leaders allowed the Emperor to have more say in internal church affairs than was his due. The linking of political power with spiritual authority proved what has always been found to be true in experience—the corrupting tendency of power, so that two extremes began to merge, viz., worldly, proud and domineering ecclesiastics, and on the other hand asceticism and monasticism. Spiritual liberty soon became restricted by an increase of centralized control and organization which afterwards developed into Roman Catholicism.

Even worse was the influx of pagans into the church under the disguise of Christianity. In his The Spreading Flame, Professor F. F. Bruce writes:

> "Constantine . . . . . showed clearly in a variety of ways that Christians enjoyed his special favour. Christianity thus became fashionable, which was not really a good thing. It meant a considerable ingress of Christianized pagans into the church—pagans who had learned the rudiments of Christian doctrine and had been baptized, but who remained largely pagan in their thoughts and ways. The mob in such great cities as Rome and Antioch and Alexandria became Christian in name, but in fact remained the unruly mob."

It is most important to grasp the implications of this, for it explains how, together with the falling away from N.T. truth that we have seen, Christianized paganism invaded Roman Catholicism at the beginning, and has remained ever since, infecting in some measure Protestantism as well. Paganism at its source goes back to the book of Genesis with the founding of Babel by Nimrod and his wife Semiramis. All pagan legends can finally be traced back here, as Hislop has shown in his book The Two Babylons. This was the beginning of Babylonianism, the organized system of Satan which the N.T. describes as "the lie", and is the very negation of all the truth of God and the position and person of the Lord Jesus Christ. Such a system is all the more dangerous with a Christian veneer, for few seem to have their eyes skinned to see it at its true worth. It is difficult to estimate its blinding power, operated by the god of this age over the minds of men. No wonder as this grew and held sway over the then known world, the terrible darkness of the Middle Ages set in.

In 604A.D. Pope Gregory the Great died, and his reign marked a great step forward in the development of the power of the Roman church and its erroneous doctrines, which is in such startling contrast to the truth of the N.T. Scriptures. We now find papal claims to universal sovereignty, not only supreme over all other churches and bishops, but over kings and rulers as well, and Rome did not hesitate to topple thrones if it suited her purpose. The Lord's Supper began to degenerate into the Mass with Transubstantiation advocated in 831A.D., and finally promulgated as a doctrine of the Roman church at the Lateran Council in 1215. This has enslaved millions from that time onwards. Purgatory had gained around ever since Augustine had expressed his belief in its probability. This was a direct take-over from paganism in which the belief in Purgatory was common. Prayers for the dead, indulgencies, and masses for the dead naturally grew up as the belief in Purgatory increased. Such prayers were officially recognized by Rome at the second Council of Nicaea in 787. At the Council of Ephesus in 431, Mary was declared to be Theotokos, the mother of God. By the end of the sixth century, adoration was offered her and prayers were addressed to her. This, again, was paganism in disguise, for we find a similar practice with regard to Cybele, Demeter and others. Private confession of sin before a priest, at first voluntary, became compulsory around 765, thus increasing the power of the priesthood over the people. Places of worship became more and more ornate and by 814 the worship of images had become a scandal.

Long before this the Muslims had begun to taunt the Christians with being idolaters because of their image worship. The burning of incense was used at first only for the fumigation of Christian buildings and both Tertullian and Lactantius refer to burning incense as pagan and not practiced by Christians. Later this became a recognized part of the corrupt system of worship. Vestments seem to have first been introduced in the reign of Constantine and by the end of the sixth century had become an essential part of the priest's equipment. In the early centuries leaders had worn no distinctive clerical dress, nor were there such divisions as clergy and laity.*

Soon Rome's power, with its bondage and darkness over Europe, was complete. When we add on top of this the inability of the ordinary person to read and write, the fact that the printing press had not been invented and practically all learning was confined to the monasteries, we have a state of affairs, from a human standpoint, which was utterly hopeless. The truth was all but swamped. How could it possibly flourish when the human mind was gripped as in a vice by the cruel bondage of Romanism and no possibility of any individual getting unrestricted access to, or being able to read the Word of God? Occasionally there were stirrings as some, sensing the darkness and bondage, tried to revolt. But it was not until the events leading to the Reformation and the Reformation itself that this monstrous slavery was broken. It is surely clear that the special truth for this age, given through the Apostle Paul, was forced underground during the terrible period of spiritual blindness covered by the Middle Ages.

No.6. The Reformation and Dispensational Beginnings.
pp. 224 - 229

Having considered the spiritual darkness and bondage of the Middle Ages, we now come to the means that were used by God to break through this terrible state of affairs. There were at least three: (1) the Renaissance, (2) the invention of the printing press, (3) the Reformation and all that led up to it.

The Renaissance (literally 'a rebirth') prepared the way for the Reformers by opening men's minds and leading them to a spirit of enquiry and thirst for knowledge. A new spirit was abroad of adventure and enterprise. In 1453 Constantinople fell to the Turks and as a result, many great scholars fled to the West, bringing with them treasures of Greek literature which had been carefully preserved. The use of the printing press spread knowledge among the masses as never before. At first several of the popes enthusiastically supported the new learning, not realizing that this new spirit of independent enquiry would deal a deadly blow to the authoritarian system represented by Roman Catholicism and the papacy.

In addition to this, opposition arose within the Roman church with such outstanding men as Marsilius of Padua (1270-1342), a physician by profession. He maintained that the supreme standard was the Bible and protested against the power of the papacy and the priests. William of Occam (1280-1347) took much the same line. John Wyclif has been acclaimed as "the morning star of the English Reformation", and no wonder, when he declared that "the only Head of the church is Christ. The pope, unless he be one of the predestinate who rule in the spirit of the gospel, is the vicar of Antichrist". He rejected transubstantiation, denied the infallibility of the church of Rome, rejected auricular confession and belief in purgatory, pilgrimages, the worship of saints and the veneration of relics as being unscriptural. He organized bands of preachers who lived simply and went throughout the land preaching the Word at a time when the people were absolutely uninstructed. His most important contribution, and of his followers, was the translation of the Vulgate into English—the first Bible in our language. As Prof. A. M. Renwick says: ". . . . . its effects were far reaching, for it brought home the truth to prince and peasant alike".

But it was the Reformation which gave the death blow to the domination of the Roman church over Europe and its apostasy. Martin Luther laid the axe at the roots of the whole papal system and brought freedom of conscience and liberty to all who would respond. The result of the work of the Reformers who followed was to bring back the basic truth of justification by faith in Christ apart from works or any visible ecclesiastical system. This was the first great step in the recovery of truth, and the pushing back of the darkness and bondage that had been rampant for so long. How sad it is to see many who profess to be believers, being willing to throw away this precious liberty so dearly bought for us by the blood of the martyrs, merely for an external unity between the sects of Christendom, including Rome, who basically has never changed, despite surface stirrings to the contrary. This is akin to Esau selling his birthright for a mess of pottage; such apparently are willing to risk going back to all the spiritual slavery of pre-Reformation days. Liberty is a plant of tender growth and does not survive automatically. Let us never forget that the price of Christian liberty, as of all liberty, is eternal vigilance.

As we have seen, there must have been a landslide from truth before the Apostle Paul died and through this, the truth and the glories of the Mystery of Ephesians, and justification by faith were lost, the early fathers giving no clear testimony to either of these precious doctrines. The literal Second Advent of Christ, which was taught by all the Apostles, and His literal reign for a thousand years, was held fast for some two centuries, but as the Lord tarried, the hope of His coming to set up the earthly Kingdom began to fade away. Not understanding the truth for the present age revealed through Paul's writings, the key to this problem was lost as well. The only way out seemed to be to spiritualize the promises to Israel and the prophecies which deal with the setting up of the earthly Kingdom. The Roman church seized upon these promises to Israel and appropriated them to herself and regarded herself as the true Israel—the Israel of God, the only visible expression of God's Kingdom on earth, disregarding the Scriptural fact that there is only one visible organized church on earth, the literal nation of Israel. Alas! that many Protestant expositors continue with Rome's error of spiritualizing and robbing Israel of her Scriptural place in the outworking of God's purpose for the establishment of His Kingdom in this world of ours.

After the Reformation, the truths that were made known through Paul's ministry slowly began to be recovered. To expect a recovery of all the "good deposit" at the Reformation is to expect too much. The wonder of it is that so much of the basic truth of the gospel of God's grace was brought to light again, when we remember the terrible spiritual darkness and bondage that had held sway for so long. It was the recognition of the dispensational principle of interpretation of the Scriptures that played such a large part in bringing back the deeper truths, culminating with the high water mark of revelation—the truth of the Mystery connected with the joint-Body of Christ. This has not been without misunderstanding and opposition, as we well know. The critics, who have never really grasped the N.T. meaning of the word dispensation and its practical outworking, charge this principle with being new-fangled, divisive and destructive of the unity of the Bible, a product of Dr. E. W. Bullinger and Charles H. Welch.

They invent such terms as Bullingerism, and many who do so have no first-hand knowledge of Dr. Bullinger's writings. The charges they make are completely false and unworthy of anyone who professes to be saved and a true believer in the Lord Jesus Christ, as we shall show. Even if it could be proved that dispensational teaching began only recently, that would not of itself prove it to be wrong. As Dr. C. C. Ryrie rightly says in his Dispensationalism Today: ". . . . . the fact that something was taught in the first century does not make it right (unless taught in the canonical Scriptures), and the fact that something was not taught until the nineteenth century does not make it wrong unless, of course, it is unscriptural". Non-dispensationalists surely know that baptismal regeneration was taught in the early centuries and yet many of them would not include that error in their theological systems simply because it is ancient and historic. After all the ultimate question is not, is dispensationalism—or any other teaching—historic, but is it Scriptural?

Some of the following facts we owe to Dr. Ryrie's researches, but we absolutely reject his conclusions regarding what he is pleased to call "ultra-dispensationalism" (pp. 66,67). He points out that the charge of newness was leveled long ago at the doctrine of the Reformers. Calvin answered it with characteristic straightforwardness. He wrote: "First by calling it new they do great wrong to God Whose Sacred Word does not deserve to be accused of novelty . . . . . that it has lain long unknown and buried is the fault of man's impiety. Now when it is restored to us by God's goodness, its claim to antiquity ought to be admitted at least by right of recovery" (Institutes of the Christian Religion, prefatory address to King Francis, p.3).

Sometimes it is alleged that dispensational teaching originated with the Brethren movement and is linked with the witness of J. N. Darby. This, too, is untrue and not according to the real facts. We can see its beginnings in the writings of the early Fathers, although none of them developed it into a system of interpretation. Irenaeus (130-200) wrote concerning the four Gospels:

> ". . . . . and the Gospel is quadriform, as is also the course followed by the Lord. For this reason there were four principal covenants given to the human race; one prior to the Deluge, under Adam; the second, that after the Deluge, under Noah; the third, the giving of the Law, under Moses; the fourth, that which renovates man . . . . . raising and bearing men upon its wings into the heavenly Kingdom" (Against Heresies. 3,11,8).

While he does not call these covenants dispensations, he often speaks of the dispensations of God and of the Christian dispensation. Here is an attempt to "try the things that differ" (Phil. i. 10 margin) which plays a vital part in true dispensational teaching. Clement of Alexandria (150-220) distinguished three Patriarchal dispensation (Adam, Noah and Abraham). Augustine wrote the following:

> "The divine institution of sacrifice was suitable in the former dispensation, but it is not suitable now. For the change suitable to the present age has been enjoined by God, Who knows infinitely better than man what is fitting for every age . . . . . There is no variableness with God, though in the former period of the world's history He enjoined one kind of offerings, and in the latter period another, therein ordering the symbolical actions pertaining to the blessed doctrine of true religion in harmony with the changes of successive epochs without any change in Himself . . . . . if it is now established that that which was for one age rightly ordained may be in another age rightly changed—the alteration indicating a change in the work, not in the plan of Him Who makes the change . . . . ." (To Marcellinus 138:5,7).

We do not suggest that the church Fathers were dispensationalists as the word is used today. But some of them saw Scriptural principles which later developed into dispensational concepts. The Reformation, as we have seen, was largely concerned with bringing back the basic truths of Christianity, and not until Bible students began to be once more concerned with prophecy and eschatology, did dispensational truth begin its part in Scriptural understanding.

Coming to the end of the seventeenth century we have Pierre Poiret, a French philosopher (1646-1719), whose major work L'Economie Divine was first published in Amsterdam and then translated into English and published in London in 1713 in six volumes. His viewpoint is pre-millennial and dispensational. His scheme is as follows: (1) Infancy—to the Deluge. (2) Childhood—to Moses. (3) Adolescence—to the prophets (about Solomon's time). (4) Youth—to the coming of Christ. (5) Manhood—some time after that. (6) Old age—to the time of man's decay. (The latter two seem to be the beginning and end of the Christian dispensation.) (7) Renovation of all things—the Millennium.

Elhert's comments are as follows:

> "There is no question that we have here a genuine dispensational scheme. He uses the phrase 'period or dispensation' and his Seventh dispensation is a literal 1000 year millennium with Christ returned and reigning in bodily form upon the earth with His saints, and Israel regathered and converted. He sees the overthrow of corrupt Protestantism, the rise of Antichrist, the two resurrections, and man of the end-time events."

John Edwards (1639-1716) published in 1699 two volumes entitled A Complete History or Survey of All the Dispensations, in which he attempted to show God's dealings from Genesis one to the end of the Revelation. He set out the following:

(1) Innocency—Adam created upright.
(2) Sin and Misery—Adam fallen.
(3) Reconciliation—or Adam recovered; from his redemption to the end of the world.
   A. Patriarchal economy (Antideluvian, Noahic and Abrahamic).
   B. Mosaical.
   C. Gentile (concurrent with A and B).
   D. Christian (infancy, primitive period, past, childhood present period. Manhood, future [Millennium]. Old age, from the loosing of Satan to the conflagration).

Isaac Watts (1674-1748) was a famous hymn writer and there is scarcely a hymnal that does not contain some of his hymns. It is not generally known that he was also a theologian. He wrote a forty-page essay entitled; The Harmony of all the Religions Which God ever prescribed to men, and His Dispensation towards Them. He writes:

> "The public dispensations of God towards man, are those wise and holy constitutions of His will and government, revealed or some way manifested to them in the successive periods or ages of the world . . . . . the dispensations of God may be described more briefly, as the appointed moral miles of God's dealings with mankind, considered as reasonable creatures, and as accountable to Him for their behaviour . . . . . each of these dispensations of God may be represented as . . . . . different forms of religion, appointed for man in the several successive ages of the world." (Isaac Watts Works 11:543,625).

He sets out the following scheme: (1) The dispensation of Innocence (before the fall). (2) The Adamic dispensation of the covenant of grace (after the fall). (3) The Noahic Dispensation. (4) The Abrahamic Dispensation. (5) The Mosaic Dispensation. (6) The Christian Dispensation. He did not regard the Millennium as a separate dispensation.

Coming to the beginning of the Brethren movement, it is sometimes asserted by opponents that dispensational truth originated with this movement. This is not true, as the above facts show, but there is no doubt that the witness of some of the founders helped forward a great deal the study of the Scriptures along dispensational lines, and also brought forward the doctrine of the Second Coming of Christ as the hope of the believer. One of the first things these writers did was to get the proper Scriptural position of the nation of Israel. This is an absolute essential if the Divine purposes revealed in the Word of God are ever to be understood. Once get this clear, and the doctrinal position of the church, the Body of Christ, will fall into line; but if we err here, we shall err everywhere and only get a distorted view of the purposes of the ages. B. W. Newton in his commentary on Romans eleven writes:

> "Circumstances however occurred, that led me to consider with care the eleventh chapter of Romans. I could not close my eyes to the fact that the future history of the literal Israel was there spoken of; and it was put in marked contrast with the history of those who are at present being gathered out from the Gentiles during the time of Israel's unbelief . . . . . I saw also that Israel when nationally converted, are not to be merged in the present Gentile church, for then they would have been represented in this chapter as grafted in upon the Gentile branch . . . . ."

He distinguishes three periods in Israel's history. (1) From Nebuchadnezzar to the dispersion by the Romans in 70A.D., a few years after Acts xxviii. (2) The present period of their dispersion during which there is a pause in the historic detail of Daniel. (3) The yet future period of their national re-establishment in unbelief. The calling out of the Body of Christ obviously takes place during (2).

J.N.Darby (1800-1882) promulgated a dispensational scheme as follows: (1) Paradise to the Flood. (2) Noah. (3) Abraham. (4) Israel. (4a) under the Law, (4b) under the Priesthood, (4c) under the Kings. (5) Gentiles. (6) The Spirit. (7) The Millennium (see his Collected Writings 11 pp.568-573). He writes:

> "This, however, we have to learn in its detail, in the various dispensations which led to or have followed the revelations of the incarnate Son in Whom all the fullness was pleased to dwell . . . . . but the dispensations themselves all declare some leading principle or interference of God, some condition in which He has placed man, principles which in themselves are everlastingly sanctioned by God, but in the course of those dispensations placed responsibility in the hands of man . . . . ." (1:192,3).

The closing words of his Synopsis on Acts xxviii. show that he believed in the setting aside of Israel here, and then he states believers enter into "another sphere on other grounds".

The Goal of God.

(I Cor. xv. 28).

No.4. "The End" (I Cor. xv. 24).

pp. 18 - 20

The revelation of God's purpose opens with a 'beginning' and in the N.T. reaches an 'end'. The end "is not yet" but sometimes, to perceive the end of a thing enables one to go back and understand a little better the beginning. If the 'end' be the cessation of time, then the beginning will be the commencement of time, but to utter such a statement produces a feeling of frustration. What can be meant by a cessation of time? It may be perfectly true that our present mode of measuring time by the day, hour and minute, will cease; it may be perfectly true that the timepiece of our present system will become obsolete, but if life is to continue, if the redeemed of the Lord are not to cease to be, time, essential time, must abide, for unless we can use the words 'now', 'then' and 'when, existence must cease.

It is a well known fact that the book of the Revelation is in structural correspondence with the book of Genesis, but while the book of the Revelation is canonically the book of the end, one passage in the epistle to the Corinthians takes us much further. Let us give this passage the attention which the solemnity of the subject demands, and with the light we receive, we shall be better able to go back to 'the beginning' of Gen. i. 1 with hope of a clearer understanding of its import.

The fifteenth chapter of the first epistle to the Corinthians is devoted to the fact and the outcome of the resurrection. It is not our intention to attempt an exposition of I Cor. xv., but in order to perceive the place which the section in mind occupies, we present the following analysis. The chapter, as a whole is divided into three parts.

(1) 1-11. EVIDENCE and EVANGELISTIC importance of resurrection.
(2) 12-34. FACT of the resurrection established.
(3) 35-58. MANNER of the resurrection discussed.

Taking the second and third section together, their relationship can be exhibited as follows:

I Corinthians xv. 12 - 58.

A | 12. FACT. "How?"
B | 13-33. ADAM and CHRIST. Death destroyed. "When"
C | 34. AWAKE.
A | 35. MANNER. "How?" "With what?"
B | 36-57. FIRST and LAST ADAM. Death swallowed up. "When?"
C | 58. BE STEDFAST.

The passage we are about to consider is contained in section B | 13-33 and this is arranged as follows:

I Corinthians xv. 13 - 33.

A	13-18.	FACT	relation to doctrine.
B	19.	FACT	present life.
C	20-23.	FACT	purpose, from Adam to parousia.
C	24-28.	FACT	the end.
B	29-32-.	FACT	present life.
A	-32, 33.	FACT	relation to practice.

This brings us to I Cor. xv. 24-28, the passage in point, and here we must call a halt, while we consider the terms used and their meaning and bearing upon both the goal of the ages and the opening words of Genesis.

"Then cometh the end" (I Cor. xv. 24).

"Then" refers to the preceding sentence 'at His coming', and in the structure we have noted that verses 20-23 extend from Adam to the parousia, that aspect of the Second Coming of Christ that pertains to all callings and spheres other than the hope of the dispensation of the Mystery.

Parousia. This word is derived from para 'beside' and eimi 'to be' and so "to be present" in opposition to apousia 'absence' (Phil. ii. 12). Paul speaks of the coming of Christ in I Cor. xv. 23, and the coming of Stephanas in I Cor. xvi. 17, in both cases using the word parousia. In II Cor. vii. 6, 7 he uses the same word of the coming of Titus, and in x. 10 of his own bodily 'presence'. So in Phil. i. 26 and ii. 12 he uses it of himself. The word is used altogether 24 times in the N.T., six occurrences speak of the presence of Stephanas, Titus or Paul, one passage speaks of the coming and personal presence of the man of sin (II Thess. ii. 9), one passage speaks of the coming of the day of God (II Pet. iii. 12), the remainder speak of the coming of Christ:

(1) As the Son of Man (Matt. xxiv. 3, 27, 37, 39).
(2) As the Lord (I Thess. iii. 13; iv. 15; v. 23; II Thess. ii. 1, 8; James v. 7, 8; II Pet. i. 16).
(3) As Christ (I Cor. xv. 23; I Thess. ii. 19).
(4) As "His", without specific title (II Pet. iii. 4; I John ii. 28).

It will be seen that the parousia is used in the great prophecy of Matt. xxiv., and by Paul in his epistles written while the hope of Israel was still possible of realization, and by Peter, James and John, but that while he freely uses the word in the prison epistle to the Philippians, he never uses it of the coming of Christ as the hope of the church of the Mystery, another word epiphaneia taking its place.

It may be as well if we take this opportunity of indicating the distinctive meaning of the various words that are translated "then" in I Cor. xv.:

(1) Tote "Then". This adverb of time is made up of to pote 'the when'. There are but two occurrences, namely verses 28 and 54.
"Then shall the Son also Himself be subject."
"Then shall be brought to pass the saying."

(2) Eita. This adverb of order or sequence; "then, afterwards". There are three occurrences of this word, namely in verses 5, 7 and 24.
"He was seen of Cephas, then of the twelve."
"Then of all the apostles."
"Then cometh the end."

The remaining occurrences of 'then' represent logical conjunctions:
"If Christ be not risen then is our preaching vain" (14).
"Then they also which are fallen asleep in Christ are perished" (18).

But these only come before us because the English word 'then' has to serve as a conjunction as well as for an adverb of time, but they have no bearing or relation with either tote or eita.

When we read "Then cometh the end" we must remember as Weymouth notes in his margin:

> "Later on. The 'then' of the A.V. is only a correct translation in the sense of 'next in order'. The Greek word denotes sequence not simultaneousness, as in Mark iv. 28 'after that the full corn in the ear'."

The END. Telos does not, as is commonly supposed, primarily denote the end, termination with reference to time, but THE GOAL REACHED, THE COMPLETION or CONCLUSION, at which anything arrives, either as ISSUE or ENDING. To illustrate or clarify this distinction:

(1) The "end" of the pen with which I write these words is an iridium point on the nib, which being dipped in ink makes marks on a sheet of paper. That is the physical end.
(2) The "end" telos of this pen however is to write. That is the purposeful end.

The end or terminus of a journey may be Euston Station, but the end or purpose of the journey may be to visit a relative. When therefore I Cor. xv. 24 says "Then cometh the end", it means that the goal of God has been attained.

No.5. "That God may be all in all" (I Cor. xv. 28).
pp. 49 - 53

Continuing our study of I Cor. xv., we give the structure of verses 24-28:

A | xv. 24-. The end.
B | a | -24-. WHEN He delivers up the kingdom.
b | -24. WHEN He abolishes all rule.
c | 25-. FOR He must reign.
d | -25. Till all enemies under His feet.
That
d | 26. The last enemy; death abolished.
c | 27-. FOR He hath put all things under His feet.
b | -27. WHEN The one exception.
a | 28-. WHEN The Son Himself subjected.
A | -28. That God may be all in all.

The goal is nothing less than that God may be all in all.

We were warned that the words "Then cometh the end" meant sequence, 'afterwards', not immediacy, and now we see that there are certain things that must be accomplished before the end is reached.

The reader will discover that there is a background of war in connection with every phase of the kingdom in the Scriptures. Passing a mass of detail concerning the kingdom of Israel, we find that "an enemy" is present in the record of the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven (Matt. xiii. 25, 39), the preaching of the kingdom of God was associated with authority over the power of the enemy (Luke x. 9, 19), and the translation of the Church of the One Body from the authority of darkness "into the Kingdom of His dear Son" (Col. i. 13) shows that the Mystery itself is no exception to the rule. The reign of Christ must continue until "all enemies" are completely subdued, and when this is achieved, the purpose of His reign and of His kingdom is attained. To perpetuate that aspect of kingship would be undispensational in the first degree, for it is evident from the teaching of Scripture that just as neither Priesthood, Temple, Altar or Sacrifice would ever have been introduced had there been no sin, so Kingship, Crown, Throne and Scepter would have found no place in the present creation had there been no enemy in view. The kingdom that will be delivered up at the end of the ages, will be the Mediatorial kingdom of the great King-Priest after the order of Melchisedec, Who, it should be noted, appears on the page of Scripture when Abraham was returning "from the slaughter of the kings" (Heb. vii. 1), a comment that is as inspired as the rest of the epistle, and intentionally links this King-Priest with war. Such is one aspect of the goal of the ages, the bringing in of perfect peace, by the subjugation of every man, that God may be all in all (I Cor. xv. 28).

We must remember the fact that when the kingdom is delivered up, it is delivered up by the SON to the FATHER, but the goal is not that the FATHER may be all in all, but that GOD may be. The same Scriptures that reveal that the Father is God, reveal that the Word was God, and if the monstrous translation "A God" be offered at John i. 1, it must equally be used in verses 6 and 18, and we shall then read "there was a man . . . . . sent from A God" and "No man hath seen A God at any time", which translations of truth are enough to throw grave suspicion on any who perpetrate this evidence of ignorance. It should be remembered that while there is no definite article "the" in these three passages, neither is there the indefinite 'a' that is added by the translator on his own responsibility. The Son is definitely called "God" in Heb. i. 8, and was acknowledged as such by Thomas with acceptance and without rebuke, while the doxology of Rom. ix. 5, after all the attacks of the enemy, remains impregnable as a testimony to the deity of Christ, the Son. With reference to this passage Wardlaw writes, in his book The Socinian Controversy:

> "This seems abundantly plain, so plain and so decisive, that if there were not another text in the Bible directly affirming this great truth, I know not how I should satisfy myself in rejecting its explicit testimony. It has accordingly been put upon the rack, to make it speak by dint of torture a different language. It might, perhaps, be enough to say, respecting this passage, that according to the order of the original words, the received translation is the most direct and natural rendering. This, so far as I know, no one has ventured to deny. All that has been affirmed is that it is capable of bearing a different sense. And this has accordingly been attempted in no fewer than five different ways:
> Of whom, by natural descent Christ came. God, Who is over all, be blessed for ever.
> Whose are the fathers, and of whom the Christ came, Who is above them all (viz. the fathers). God be blessed for ever.
> Of Whom Christ came, Who is over all things. God be blessed for ever.
> Of Whom Christ came, Who is as God, over all, blessed for ever.
> Of whom the Christ came (and) whose, or of whom, is the supreme God, blessed for ever."

In the earlier part of this same epistle to the Romans, we find a passage which is in some respects parallel with Rom. ix. 5:

> "Who worshipped and served the creature more than the Creator, Who is blessed for ever. Amen" (Rom. i. 25).

It is the consistent testimony of the N.T. that all things were created "by Him and for Him"—i.e. Christ (Col. i. 16), and the ascriptions of praise in Rom. ix. 5 and in xi. 36 are both offered to the same God. In Rom. ix. 5 He is over 'all things' (panton) without reservation, evil as well as good. In Rom. xi. 36 out of Him, and through Him, and unto Him are "the all things" (ta panta), certain specific 'all things', which do not include that which is evil. This important distinction we must discuss when we reach Rom. xi. 36 in the course of our exposition.

We joyfully acknowledge that which Israel in their blindness failed to see, that the Messiah Who came from themselves so far as the flesh was concerned, and Who, according to the Spirit, was declared to be the Son of God with power (Rom. i. 3, 4), was at the same time, "Over all, God blessed for ever". To this the Apostle adds his solemn

"Amen". May all who read and believe, echo that "Amen" and rejoice to know that one day Israel shall look on Him Whom they pierced, the One, Who, even in the days of Isaiah, was named "The mighty God", and shall at last say of Him:

> "Lo, this is our God; we have waited for Him, and He will save us" (Isa. xxv. 9).

When the Son is made subject to the Father, the end is reached for which He, Who originally existed in the form of God, emptied Himself (Phil. ii. 6, 7). He emptied Himself of His glory by becoming man. He further humbled Himself by taking the form of a servant and stooped to the death of the cross. Because of this He has been exalted, and given the name which is above every name, and the goal of I Cor. xv. 28, as well as the goal of Phil. ii. 11, is that the supreme exaltation of the Son should be to the glory of God the Father. When this is achieved, the Son Who is both Creator and Redeemer ascends the throne of Deity, He re-assumes the glory that was His before the world began, and once more, as it was in the beginning, one God occupies the throne of the universe, all His Mediatorial titles Elohim, Jehovah, El Shaddai, Father, Son, Spirit, Comforter, being completely realized and fulfilled that God, such a God, the God of Creation, Providence, Purpose, Redemption, the God against Whom Satan dared to raise his hand, at last will be all in all. A great disservice has been rendered to the cause of truth by the quasi-philosophical employment of the word 'persons' when speaking of the Godhead. This word 'person' is the translation of the Greek word hypostasis, a word used three times in the epistle to the Hebrews. In chapter xi. no one could possibly translate the opening verse "Now faith is the person of things hoped for", the word substance being derived from the Latin meaning 'to stand under' precisely as does the Greek hypostasis. Our acquaintance with the material world is mainly that of appearance; we do not get down to the underlying substance itself. So, in Heb. i. 3, we should read that Christ is "the Express Image of His substance", that is, He was "God manifest". The Latin version translated the Greek hypostasis 'persona', which has been misunderstood to the confusion of our conception of the Deity. The word person is derived from the Latin per=through and sono=to round, and means "A mask, especially one worn by play actors (Lloyd's Encyclopedic Dictionary).

If we would but keep in mind the idea of someone acting the part of some particular character and speaking the words of the part "through a mask" we should have the Scriptural symbol, as far as it can be revealed, of the One Invisible God, assuming at one time the office of Creator, at another, that of Redeemer and Comforter, without befogging the mind and virtually believing either in three Gods, or denying the Trinity of the Scriptures. In the 'person' of the Son, the humble God had played the part of Mediator, and when the glorious work of Mediator is accomplished, the 'person' i.e., the mask, will be laid aside. At the consummation "The Son" will not be all in all, "The Father" will not be all in all, but GOD will be all in all.

All in all. Let us seek to understand this ultimate term of the ages. Two anticipatory passages should be considered as we approach this great end. One describes the peculiar honour which is placed upon the Church of the One Body, the other the peculiar position of Christ during this dispensation of the Mystery. The first passage is in Eph. i., and the fact that it follows a quotation from Psa. viii., proves that it is intentionally linked with the consummation of I Cor. xv.

> "And hath put all things under His feet, and gave Him to be the Head over all things to the church which is His Body, the fullness of Him that filleth all in all" (Eph. i. 22, 23).

Christ at the moment has not been given Head over all things without restriction or limits. For that He is still 'expecting' till His foes be made His footstool. He has been given as Head over all things TO THE CHURCH, so that what He will be in the final and fullest sense, He is already in the more limited sense. The Church thus foreshadows the end.

> "The church . . . . . the Body . . . . . the fullness of Him."

Here we read two titles of the Church of the present dispensation. During the period of its formation it is called "The Body", but when every member has been called and quickened, its title changes; it will then be "the fullness of Him that filleth all in all". Consequently the more we understand the constitution of this church, and its relation with the Head, the more we shall understand 'the end' or goal to which all redemptive processes move. In Col. ii. we are not taken back to Psa. viii. where all things were put under His feet, but to Adam who was created in the image of God. Inasmuch as Psa. viii. also looks back to Adam the first man, and forward to Christ as the second Man and the last Adam, the passage in Colossians falls into line with Eph. i. 22, 23.

> "And have put on the new man, which is renewed in the knowledge after the image of Him that created him: Where there is neither Greek nor Jew, circumcision nor uncircumcision, Barbarian, Scythian, bond nor free: but Christ is all and in all" (Col. iii. 10, 11).

Here the Greek reads:

Alla	ta panta	kai	en pasi	Christos
But	the all	and	in all	Christ

In this passage the one unifying 'image' sets aside the conflicting differences of Jew and Greek, bond and free; these like 'all rule' authority and power are set aside in the higher unity of the Spirit. Human knowledge, being exceedingly limited, cannot expect to comprehend what the first term 'all' in I Cor. xv. 28 can mean; we must leave the answer to the coming day of glory, but we should be able to envisage the extent and character of the second 'all'. Does this passage teach Universalism? Does the word 'all' here embrace every one that has ever lived, including not only men, but angels and demons, wheat and tares, saved and lost? Yes say some, No say others; our quest therefore must be "What saith the Scriptures?".

No.6. The goal of the Mediatorial kingdom.
pp. 70 - 73

"All in all." What is the extent of this second word "all"? Is it the entire universe both of men, angel and spirit? Is it all men without exception? Is it all men without distinction? How can we discover the meaning of such a word? We know that it has one exception "It is manifest that He is excepted, which did put all things under Him", so that we can safely say that the word "all" is never used in its widest and fullest sense, but that where we have the entire universe in view, there is nevertheless an exception to be made. This is important, for if 'all' in such a context does not and cannot be used in its full universal sense, that may be true in other passages where the circumference is smaller. The word 'all' is universal, but the word cannot be used alone, the context supplying the things that are comprehended within its embrace. The idea of the word 'all' can be likened to a circle, but the size of the circle will vary according to the things spoken of; but however large or small the number of things there may be, the shape of the circle never changes; all, means, universality, but a universality of specified things. It is therefore of the utmost importance that 'the things' should be correctly stated, otherwise wild, fanatical and evil doctrine will arise. Let us consider the following pronouncement, "All men are sinners." If we know what we mean by "all men", the statement can stand; but strictly speaking it does not discriminate enough. Let us see,

"All men are sinners
Christ was a man
Therefore . . . . ."

We cannot, we dare not, take this statement to its logical conclusion. This is no criticism of logic, but it shows that a logical statement forces us to re-examine our premises, whenever the conclusion arrived at is untrue. We must therefore recast the opening term.

"All men descended by natural generation from Adam are sinners" and we can then go on to prove that Christ was not such a man because He was holy and did not sin. One circle can enclose another, the 'all' of redemption, being much larger in scope than the 'all' of the membership of the church of the Mystery. One circle may intersect another, because the things spoken of may be considered from more than one point of view. Let us now consider the usage of the word 'all' in I Cor. xv. 24-28, "All rule and all authority and power" are to be put down (I Cor. xv. 24), but it is manifest that the rule, authority and power of God Himself is not in view, else it would defeat the very object of this subjugation. If we read on to verse 25, we shall come to the inspired comment 'For'; this is a logical connective, and is prefaced to what follows and links it with what has already been said, "For He must reign, till He hath put all enemies under His feet". The rule, authority and power therefore of verse 24 are not universal, they refer to enemies, and when thus limited, the 'all' again assumes its universality, not some enemies, but all enemies are comprehended in this subjection. As a further explanation, the nature of these enemies is revealed by the statement "The last enemy that shall be destroyed is death". The enmity envisaged is spiritual, even as the rule, authority and power. Moreover, where verses 24, 25 use the words 'put down' or 'put under His feet', verse 26 says plainly 'destroyed', even as the corresponding passage in verse 54 declares that death shall be swallowed up in victory at the resurrection.

Having taken us so far, the Apostle returns to the subject, and this time makes a quotation from Psa. viii., "For He hath put all things under His feet". The placing of an enemy under the feet is an O.T. figure of conquest, and never means deliverance, liberation or blessing. Throughout I Cor. xv. 24-27, and in every passage where Psa. viii. 6 is quoted the redeemed are excepted. The first occurrence of this figure is in Josh. x. The kings of the Amorites and others, banded themselves together against Gibeon, and upon the triumphant expedition of Joshua against them, these kings hid themselves in a cave at Makkedah. They were brought out from their hiding place, and Joshua called to the captains of the men of war "Come near, put your feet upon the necks of these kings . . . . . and afterward Joshua smote them, and slew them, and hanged them on five trees" (Josh. x. 22-27). Makkedah was treated as was Jericho (x. 28), and it is utterly impossible to read into Josh. x ., the remotest hint that these enemies had the slightest hope of deliverance. This is the figure employed in I Cor. xv. 24-28 when all enemies are put under His feet of Christ the true Joshua.

When Paul assured the Roman believers that "The God of peace shall bruise Satan under your feet shortly", they knew that the age-long enmity between the two seeds was at length to terminate in the utter defeat of Satan, and the complete victory of the Redeemer and His people. When the eighth Psalm is quoted in Eph. i., the all things that are under His feet, are principality and power, might and dominion, but not the church. Here once again we could echo I Cor. xv. and say "It is manifest that one company is excepted, namely the Church which is His Body, the fullness of Him that filleth all in all". One of the services rendered by Colossians, an epistle which goes over much the same ground as that of Ephesians, is that it presents a truth stated in Ephesians from another angle. So in Col. iii. we read of a company:

> "Where there is neither Greek nor Jew, circumcision nor uncircumcision, Barbarian, Scythian, bond nor free: but Christ is all, and in all" (Col. iii. 11).

This is presenting the truth of Eph. i. 22, 23 from another view-point. It will be seen moreover, that Col. iii. 11 teaches that the church of the Mystery foreshadows and anticipates the day when God shall be all in all, Christ occupying that position here and now, even as the final subjugation of all rule, authority and power is anticipated in Eph. i. 21-23. When that great day comes, we read that, when all things are subdued unto Him, then shall the Son Himself be subject unto Him that put all things under Him, and this calls for careful consideration, lest by hasty conclusions and inconsiderate speech we dishonour the Lord. Of itself the Greek word translated 'subdue' and 'subject' is colourless; it does not of itself mean anything derogatory. Hupotasso, the verb in question is composed of hupo "under" and tasso "set" which gives us tagma "order" (I Cor. xv. 23). All in Christ are to be made alive, but even so, there will be differences of position for these, even as one star differs from another star, even though both are "in glory". This is indicated by the words "But every one in his own order". The Saviour as a member of a human family on earth, meekly and rightly took his own 'rank' and 'order', and so we read:

> "And He went down with them, and came to Nazareth, and was subject unto them" (Luke ii. 51).

This was all part of His voluntary self-emptying, when He humbled Himself to take the form of a servant and to be found in fashion as a man. It was of the very essence of that condescension that He should thus act as the perfect servant and the perfect Son should act, and instead of looking upon this subjecting as something of which we are somewhat ashamed, we look with worshipping wonder at this voluntary submission to Him that sent Him. The Apostle saw no incongruity in placing together the two exhortations:

> "Quit you like men, BE STRONG"
> "SUBMIT yourselves unto such" (I Cor. xvi. 13-16).

The only subjection that is ominous or an act of subjugation, is that which is said to be 'under His feet', and as surely as the church is not placed in subjection beneath the feet of Christ, but is to be raised and seated together in Christ Jesus in the heavenly places, so surely the subjection of the Son of God to the Father is not inconsistent with His ascension to the throne of Deity, that the glory which He had laid aside "for us men and for our salvation" shall at length be resumed; that God, not the Father nor the Son, but GOD, a title belonging equally to both Father and Son, that GOD may be all in all. The office of the Son, together with His Mediatorial kingdom may pass, because the purpose of their being has been so gloriously achieved; but this means added glory to the Saviour. The Mediatorial kingdom is not the only thing to pass, creation itself is to be folded up as a vesture and put aside, but even so, the Apostle says of Christ:

> "But Thou art the same, and Thy years shall not fail" (Heb. i. 12).

If we could but see things in their true light, we should rejoice that at long last the Son will thus be subject to Him that put all things under Him, for it speaks of work perfectly accomplished, nothing more calling for the self-emptying and humiliation of the Son of God. To wish that the Scripture did not teach that the kingdom of the Son would at length be delivered up to the Father, is to wish that the work of Redemption should never be achieved. Just as it will be the highest glory that the New Jerusalem has no temple therein, so it will be to the highest glory of the Lord, that kingship as well as priesthood, throne as well as altar, sceptre as well as sacrifice shall cease to function and be necessary. All that King and Priest ever mean will be more than included in the words "that God may be all in all", and much that could never come within this scope, because of sin and death, rebellion and uncleanness, will at length be the blessed experience of those who by grace enter that new world, where God indeed shall be all in all in a sense never yet realized either by the creature or by the Creator. Here is the goal of the ages, a goal achieved by sacrifice, and the steps that lead to its attainment marked by the slow fulfillment and passing of much, which to our limited understandings may seem worthy of retention. These things must decrease, as He must increase, and when that increase is at length reached, the former things will have for ever passed away.

No.7. The Creation of Gen. i. 1 a "Firstfruits".
pp. 101 - 104

We have considered very briefly "the end", the goal of the ages, the consummation of redemption, the day when God shall be all in all. An "end" presupposes a "beginning", and moreover, if we rightly apprehend what is aimed at in the "end", we shall better appreciate what is implied by "the beginning". Let us therefore turn back to the opening sentence of the Bible and reconsider what is intended by the revelation that "In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth" (Gen. i. 1). "Beginning", is the Hebrew reshith, derived from rosh "head", which is the translation of this word in 349 occurrences. In Gen. ii. 10 we have the four 'heads' or beginnings of the rivers that encompassed Eden, and the word occurs next in the great promise of Gen. iii. 15 "It shall bruise thy head". Reshith, the form of the word that is used in Gen. i. 1, occurs but three times in Genesis: "In the beginning" (i. 1), "the beginning of the kingdom" (x. 10), "the beginning of my strength" (xlix. 3), where it will be seen that Babel, a place or system, and Reuben, a person, not a date in the calendar, is in view. So in Leviticus to Deuteronomy we have the word translated "firstfruits" (Lev. ii. 12; xxiii. 10; Numb. xviii. 12; Deut. xviii. 4; xxvi. 10). Altogether the term "firstfruits" is stated in eleven passages, and implied in at least seven others. Several passages bring the two words 'beginning' and 'end' together.

> "Amalek was the first of the nations; but his latter end shall be that he perish for ever" (Numb. xxiv. 20).
> "From the beginning of the year even unto the end of the year" (Deut. xi. 12).
> "Though thy beginning was small, yet thy latter end should greatly increase" (Job viii. 7).
> "So the Lord blessed the latter end of Job more than his beginning" (Job xlii. 12).
> "Better is the end of a thing than the beginning thereof" (Eccles. vii. 8).
> "Declaring the end from the beginning" (Isa. xlvi. 10).

Common usage inclines the mind to think of time, when the phrase "in the beginning" is read, but if we press the point and ask "in the beginning of what?" how can we expect an answer? If God necessarily existed before the first act of creation, time cannot strictly be said to begin at all. When we consult a dictionary we find that the time element is of the first prominence. The English word is ultimately derived from the Greek ginomai and geno to become, to be brought forth, and the following are the headings of Lloyd's Encyclopedic Dictionary:

A. Transitive.
(1) To commence action; to pass from action to action.
(2) To trace the first ground, element, or existence of anything.

B. Intransitive.
(1) To come into being, or commence or enter on any particular state of existence.
(2) To commence any action or cause of action; to take the first step from non-action to action.
Begin and Begin with . . . . . To select any particular person or thing as the first of a series.

It will be observed that in the above quotation, time as such does not enter into the definition; what is uppermost is the commencement of an action or of a series. When we add to this the Scriptural concept of a 'firstfruits', a prematurely ripened pledge of a full harvest to come, Gen. i. 1 takes on a richer meaning.

The reference to wisdom in Prov. viii. 22-27 must not be omitted here.

> "The Lord possessed me in the beginning of His way, before His works of old. I was set up from everlasting, from the beginning, or ever the earth was . . . . . when He prepared the heavens, I was there."

Wisdom is here personified, and is practically the same as the Logos of John i. 1-3. This leads to the last and most important revelation of the meaning of the word "beginning" when applied to creation. In the book of Revelation the word arche 'beginning' is found four times, and never used in any other way than a title of the Saviour Himself.

> "I am Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the ending, saith the Lord, which is, and which was, and which is to come, the Almighty" (Rev. i. 8).
>
> "These things saith the Amen, the faithful and true witness, the beginning of the creation of God" (Rev. iii. 14).
>
> "And He said unto me, It is done. I am Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the end" (Rev. xxi. 6).
> "I am Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the end, the first and the last" (Rev. xxii. 13).

When the sacred volume opens, the words 'in the beginning' are left unexplained, but when it closes, we discover that they imply not only a time, a commencement, but a Person, a Firstfruits and a Pledge, indeed the Alpha and the Omega, the Yea and the Amen (II Cor. i. 20). There is no article "the" in the Hebrew phrase "In the beginning", the word being bereshith 'In beginning' or 'to begin with' or 'as a commencement' implying a goal that was in mind, a firstfruits, something future which was pledged in the opening act. Three great passages in the N.T. ascribe creation to the Saviour, namely John i., Heb. i., and Col. i., but as these passages are of fundamental importance we will reserve their study for a future article.

It may be a useful appendix to the present examination to give the translations of arche found in the N.T. other than the word 'beginning':

(1) Magistrates (Luke xii. 11). Power (of authority) (Luke xx. 20).
(2) Corner (Acts x. 11; xi. 5).
(3) First (Acts xxvi. 4). At the first (Heb. ii. 3). First adj. (Heb. vi. 1). First estate (Jude 6).
(4) Principality (Rom. viii. 38; Eph. i. 21; iii. 10; vi. 12; Col. i. 16; ii. 10, 15; Titus iii. 1).
(5) Rule (I Cor. xv. 24).

Some of these references must appear again when the N.T. references to creation are before us. Meanwhile we have attained to one all covering and wondrous idea, namely that creation was a first step towards a goal, the creation of heaven and earth being 'a kind of firstfruits' pledging the harvest, and ultimately seen to be vested in the Person of Him Who takes to Himself the title The Alpha and the Omega, the Beginning and the Ending, the Amen, the Beginning of the creation of God.

We now consider three great passages of the N.T. which ascribe creation to Christ.

> "In the beginning was the Word" (John i. 1-3).

There are four occurrences of the phrase en arche "in the beginning" in the N.T. namely John i. 1, 2, Acts xi. 15 and Phil. iv. 15, and it will be seen that after each occurrence we must add an explanatory term commencing with 'when'.

Relating John i. 1 with xvii. 5 and 24, we can read the opening words:

> "In the beginning / before the world was \
> \ and before it was overthrown / was the Word."

If there is one fundamental truth which underlies all other revelations concerning the Godhead, it is that GOD is the Creator, and consequently when we read John i., we gather that, before the first act of creation was undertaken by the Almighty, a movement took place which is beyond our ability to describe or understand, but which can be spoken of as a descent of the unconditioned and absolute God, "Who is invisible", into the realm of the conditioned and manifest. Hence, in the N.T. where creation is ascribed to Christ, He bears the titles "The Word", "The Image", and "The express Image of His Person". Essentially "God is spirit" (John iv. 24) and God is "one" (Deut. vi. 4).

> Economically, God is revealed as "Father" (Gal. i. 1), "Son" (Heb. i. 8) and "Holy Ghost" (Acts v. 3, 5), as well as Elohim, Jehovah and other titles.
> Manifestly, before incarnation as "The Word" (John i. 1), "The Image" (Col. i. 15) and "The express Image of His substance" (Heb. i. 3).
>
> Manifestly, at the incarnation "God was manifest in the flesh" (I Tim. iii.16), "The Word was made flesh" (John i. 14).

Creation is the work of God Manifest; redemption the work of God manifest in the flesh. Creation is ascribed to Him as "The Word" as follows:

> "All things were made (ginomai had a beginning, came into being) by Him; and without Him was not anything made that was made" (John i. 3).

Creation is ascribed to Him as "The Image of the Invisible God" as follows:

> "For by Him were all things created, that are in heaven, and that are in earth, visible and invisible, whether they be thrones, or dominions, or principalities, or powers; all things were created by Him, and for Him. And He is before all things, and by him all things consists" (Col. i. 16, 17).

Creation is ascribed to Him as "The express Image of His person" as follows:

> "And Thou, Lord, in the beginning hast laid the foundations of the earth; and the havens are the works of Thine hands" (Heb. i. 10).

It will be observed that in John's Gospel, the word 'create' is not used, but the word ginomai 'to become'. This seems to have been chosen to emphasize two great facts:

All things came into being through Him, that is the primeval creation (John i. 1-3).
Grace and truth, i.e. the new creation came into being (ginomai) through Him (John i. 17).

This is the first great comparison. The second is found in John viii. 58 and the recurring claims introduced by the words "I am".

"Before Abraham came into being (ginomai), I AM."
"I AM the bread of life . . . . . the light of the world . . . . . the good Shepherd . . . . . the resurrection and the life."

The word 'create' is not used in Heb. i. There we read:

"And Thou, Lord, in the beginning hast laid the foundation of the earth; and the heavens are the works of Thine hands" (Heb. i. 10), and the strange fact is that, even though the earth and the heavens were thus brought into being, "They shall perish . . . . . and wax old as doth a garment". This is revealed in order that the Hebrews should be prepared to find that some things which had been given as 'foundations', were now to be 'left' (Heb. vi. 1); that like the present heavens, the old covenant "waxeth old (and) is ready to vanish away" (Heb. viii. 13) in favour of the New Covenant, and that, just as the work of His 'fingers', so the Tabernacle 'made with hands' (Heb. ix. 11, 24) was also to be done away. The word 'create' is used in Col. i. 16 and iii. 10 of both the old and the new creations, and this relationship is further enforced by the repetition of the title "The Firstborn" in Col. i. 15 in connection with the primeval creation, and in Col. i. 18 of the church of the Mystery.

It is evident that these three books, John, Hebrews and Colossians, use their terms with precision, and the fact that inspiration has so pointed the way, makes it an established fact and no longer a pleasant theory that "In the beginning" really does mean in Gen. i. 1 that the primeval creation was 'a kind of firstfruits', pledging the attainment of the goal of the ages.

No.8. The Creation of Gen. i. 1 a "Firstfruits" (contd.).
pp. 121 - 126

Not only do we have the most careful choice of terms 'become' in John, 'work of Thine hands' in Hebrews, and 'create' in Colossians, but the three titles of the Creator are similarly selected and related.

"The Word" Logos reveals the hidden thoughts of God, and makes them manifest in creation. "The Image" eikon reveals that which is otherwise 'invisible', so that Christ could say "He that hath seen Me, hath seen the Father". "The express Image" is the character, the "Person" is hupostasis substratum, that which lies under.

Creation is the thought of God expressed in the material world. The Saviour is the Image of the invisible God, even as He is the external character of His invisible intangible reality. John says "all things were made by Him". Colossians says "all things were created by Him". Hebrews says that He it was Who "in the beginning" laid the foundations of the earth, and declares that the very heavens are the works of His hands.

These three great references to Christ as the Creator of Gen. i. 1 are followed by references to His descent into humanity for the purpose of redemption. Let us go over the ground again with this in view:

> "And the Word was made flesh, and dwelt (as in a tent or tabernacle) among us, and we beheld His glory, the glory as of the only begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth . . . . . and of His fullness have all we received" (John i. 14-16).
> "And He (Who created all things) is the Head of the Body, the Church: Who is the BEGINNING . . . . . in the body of His flesh through death, to present you . . . . . holy . . . . ." (Col. i. 18-22).

He Who is the express Image of His person, the Son Who is God, seeing that the children are partakers of flesh and blood, He also Himself likewise took part of the same; that through death He might destroy him that had the power of death, that is the devil, and deliver them who through fear of death were all their lifetime subject to bondage (Heb. ii. 14, 15).

When the heavens & earth were created, the goal of God set forth in I Cor. xv. 24-28, that God should be all in all was envisaged, and a word used by God to Job is highly suggestive of the redemptive character of creation.

> "Where wast thou when I laid the foundations of the earth . . . . . whereupon are the foundations thereof fastened?" (Job xxxviii. 4, 6).

Two very different Hebrew words are here translated 'foundation'. The first word is the Hebrew yasad, which means to establish anything upon a foundation and this is equivalent to Heb. i. 10, the same word being used in the Septuagint showing that the Almighty Who spoke to Job was the One we know as Christ, but the second word is peculiar. It is the Hebrew word eden a socket, which word is employed 52 times, for the silver sockets upon which the Tabernacle rested (Exod. xxvi. 19 etc.). When this fact is taken in conjunction with the testimony of Isa. xl. 22, that God stretched out the heavens 'as a curtain' and spread them out . . . . . as a tent (ohel) tabernacle (Exod. xxvi. 9) to dwell in, the redemptive aspect of creation is most vividly suggested. We must, moreover distinguish between the creation 'in the beginning' and the reconstruction of the earth, together with the limited 'firmament' or expansion which followed the 'overthrow' of Gen. i. 2. The creation of Gen. i. 1 seems to be in view in John i. 3 and in Col. i. 16, 17, but in Heb. i. 11, 12 the transitory character of the creation is stressed:

> "They shall perish; but Thou remainest; and they all shall wax old as doth a garment: and as a vesture shalt Thou fold them up, and they shall be changed."

This would fit 'the heavens' of II Pet. iii. 10 which are to pass away, or the heavens of Isa. xxxiv. 4 which shall be 'rolled together as a scroll', a figure that is congruous if the heavens here are 'the firmament', the stretched out curtain, but not congruous if it refers to the abiding dwelling place of the living God. When Scripture affirms that "In the beginning, God created the heavens and the earth", it also affirms that God must have been in Being before creation, and also that 'heaven' is not the dwelling place of God, the Invisible, Absolute and Unconditioned. God, Who existed before the first atom of creation came into existence, and cannot be conceived of as 'dwelling' anywhere. To 'dwell' in the very 'heavens' is a concession, a condescension, a self-imposed limitation. Solomon realized this when he said "The heaven and heaven of heavens CANNOT contain thee" (I Kings viii. 27). However much we may fight against it, when we point that "God is in heaven", we have mentally localized Him. This is not an error, it is simply the recognition that unless God stoops we can know nothing of Him. We maintain that God is a 'person' simply because a person is the highest form of existence that we know. Yet the word is derived from the Latin persona a mask, especially one worn by play actors, from per 'through' and sono 'sound':

Consequently when we speak of the 'Persons' in the Godhead, we employ a term that really means that the Invisible, Unconditional, Absolute has 'spoken through' the person of 'Father' or 'Son' or 'Holy Ghost' in the N.T., even as He spoke through the titles Elohim, Jehovah and El Shaddai in the O.T. No one name, nor all the names of God employed together, can encompass and fully present God Himself. Even the employment of the masculine pronoun 'He', 'Him' is a concession to our limitations, for God Who is Spirit, Invisible, having neither bodily parts, form or parts cannot be properly conceived of as male or female. At every turn human limitation is met by Divine condescension, and nowhere is this more evident and more necessary than in the revelation of His unspeakable nature to man. In philosophy or logic a name is 'a word taken at pleasure to serve for a mark, which may raise in our mind a thought like to some thought we had before', but like words, names are often mistaken for things to our undoing. God is Elohim, but He is infinitely more. God is Jehovah, God is Father, God is Son, God is Holy Ghost, but God is, in Himself—what? That is a question never raised and never answered in the Scriptures. For us, at least, until in the glory we shall be in a position to know even as we are known, we exultantly behold the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ, and if we ask ourselves, as we should, "What is God like?" the answer is that Christ is 'the character' (the express Image) of His invisible, unknowable substance or reality (hupostasis Heb. i. 3).

Now all this mighty movement, Creation, Purpose, Manifestation, Self-limitation must, if God be wise, holy and just, have an equally wonderful goal. That goal is indicated in I Cor. xv. as we have earlier suggested:

> "That God may be all in all."

That is 'the end', and creation, overthrow, Adam, redemption, resurrection, eternal life and ultimate glory, are all the blessed means adopted to ensure at last this most wonderful end is attained. We must contemplate this unfolding therefore with bowed heart and reverent thought, for the unveiling of this purpose will ultimately unveil the heart of the living God.

The key found in the words "Image and Likeness".

Let us now return to the opening theme of our study and endeavour with the light we have now received to take another step forward. We have already observed that in the world of Nature God is, and always has been, "All in all", and it is toward this same glorious and acknowledged supremacy and fullness in the world of moral agents that the purpose of the ages moves. Where, however, in the world of physics, God could say "Let there be light" and there was light, where, in the realm "He spake and it was done, He commanded and it stood fast", in this highest world of morals, it takes the slow unfolding centuries, the bitter lesson of the ages, in other words it takes "the perfecting through suffering" before the God of creation can be the confessed and acknowledged "All in all" in the hearts and consciences of men.

Two passages in Heb. ii. which have not yet been considered must now be given attention, for they contain within them the solution of one of the great problems of the ages, namely, in what way will God be so 'all in all' that the relationship shall carry within itself its own guarantee of permanence and its assurance of richest intimacy. The passages are:

> "Perfect through sufferings" and "all of one".

This oneness is to be effected between two parties separated by a gulf that at first seems impassable: The INFINITE God, Who is Spirit, and FINITE man who is flesh. The gulf is spanned by the provision of the Mediator, Job's "daysman", the One Who could lay His hands upon both God and man, in short, He Who was "God manifest in the flesh". Here, in Him, God and man can meet. We are already taught that God is 'like Christ', so that if redeemed man can become 'like Christ' also, oneness is assured and for ever established by the possession of this common likeness. This truth we now seek to establish by an examination of the Scriptural employment of the word "Image".

First we must consider those passages which teach that "God is Christ-like", in which God comes down and finds a meeting place with man, in the person of His Son, the One Mediator. Then we must consider the passages where man (1) by creation, (2) by redemption is said to be either created in the likeness of God, or predestinated to be conformed to the Image of His Son, or is yet to have a body like unto His body of glory; and having discovered in this blessed Person, the Son of God, the Divine meeting place of God and man, we shall have discovered the way, and the only way indicated in the Scriptures, for God to become All in all to His people. That will be when He Who is the Word, the Form, the Image, the Character of God, and they, for whom this same glorious One became flesh and was made like unto His brethren, shall have become one in the sense indicated in John xvii.:

> "That they all may be one, as Thou, Father, art in Me, and I in Thee, that they also may be one in us . . . . . I in them, and Thou in Me, that they may have been perfected into one" (John xvii. 21-23), or shall be 'all of one' as indicated in Heb. ii. 11.

This subject will scale the heights and descend into the depths, for it embraces Deity and Humanity, Creation and Redemption, and must be approached with reverence and with godly fear. Let us consider first of all those Scriptures which teach that God is "Christ-like".

There appears to be several ways of attempting to answer the question "What is God like?" There is the approach by metaphysics, but this avenue is one that ends in 'nothing', God being No-thing (see the philosophy of Hegel) or in a series of negative abstractions like "Infinite", that is to say "not finite". This approach is of no use to a seeking sinner or to the Bible student. The Being and Nature of God can be approached along the line of His relation to created things, so that we can understand that the invisible things of Him are clearly seen by the evidence of His handiwork. This however fails to teach us what God is like, for "that which may be known of God" by this means is exceedingly limited. We may deduce by logic a Being of Almighty Power, but we could never discover by this means "The God of all grace", for the necessary promises are not discernible in nature. Atonement, Redemption and Salvation lie outside the scope of creation's witness. We leave the work of His hands therefore, and come to the Word which He has inspired, and that Word focuses our attention upon One, the Son of God, the Lord Jesus, Who is the fullest manifestation of what God is like that has been or can be given. This manifestation is twofold. First, before creative times, Christ was "The Word" (John i. 1): "The Form" (Phil. ii. 6); "The Image" (Col. i. 15); "The Character of His substance" (Heb. i. 3); "The Brightness of His glory" (Heb. i. 3). Then, "The Word became flesh", and as a result, God Who is invisible, Whom no man hath seen at any time was 'declared' (John i. 14, 18). He Who in days past had spoken unto the fathers by the prophets, spoke at last "In Son". This strange expression is a Hebraism, as for example where in Exod. vi. 3 of the A.V. we read:

"And I appeared unto Abraham, unto Isaac, and unto Jacob, by the name of God Almighty", the Hebrew reads B'El Shaddai literally "in God Almighty". Just as to the Patriarchs, God had appeared to them "in God Almighty", so to their descendants the same God appeared "in Son".

In Isa. xlv. 18-23 we read:

> "God Himself . . . . . none else . . . . . no God else beside Me . . . . . I have sworn by Myself . . . . . that unto Me every knee shall bow, every tongue shall swear."

This the Apostle Paul, by race and upbringing a rigid upholder of the fact that there is "One God", refers to the Lord Jesus Christ (Phil. ii. 10, 11).

The same prophet Isaiah saw the Seraphim and heard their cry:

> "Holy, Holy, Holy, is Jehovah of Hosts" (Isa. vi. 3), and John declares that Isaiah saw the glory of Christ, and spoke of Him (John xii. 41).

Yet again, Isaiah says:

> "The voice of him that crieth in the wilderness, Prepare ye the way of the Lord, make straight in the desert a highway for our God" (Isa. xl. 3).

The Gospels reveal that this was fulfilled by John the Baptist the Forerunner of the Lord Jesus Christ.

When Israel tempted the Lord, Psa. lxxviii. 56 declares "They tempted and provoked the Most High God", yet I Cor. x. 9 says they tempted Christ! The epistle to Titus declares that our hope is directly associated with the glorious appearing of "our great God and Saviour Jesus Christ" (Titus ii. 13). Here in the Scriptures we have cited we find such titles as "God Himself; Jehovah of Hosts; The God; The Lord . . . . . our God; The Most High God; The great God", each and every one finding their full expression in one Person, the Lord Jesus Christ, Who is, as I Tim. iii.16 declares, "God manifest in the flesh". These mighty Scriptures are a sufficient justification for seeking further evidence of what God is like in the Person of Christ. Here are a few that doubtless come to the mind of every reader.

> "The light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ" (II Cor. iv. 6).

W shall see later that there is a transfiguring power in that "face" (II Cor. iii. 18) but this we must leave for the moment.

> "Have I been so long time with you, and yet hast thou not known Me, Philip? he that hath seen Me hath seen the Father" (John xiv. 9).
> "Ye have neither heard His voice at any time, nor seen His shape . . . . . for Whom He hath sent, Him ye believe not" (John v. 37, 38).

If I desire to understand the righteousness of God, the love of God, the peace of God, the forgiveness of God, or any other of His glorious attributes or gifts, I can see them as I shall never see them otherwise, in the life, person, walk and work of the Lord Jesus Christ.

> "That which was from the beginning, which we have heard, which we have seen with our eyes, which we have looked upon, and our hands have handled, of the Word of life (For the life was manifested, and we have seen it, and bear witness, and shew unto you that eternal life which was with the Father, and was manifested unto us" (I John i. 1, 2).

Here therefore is the Godward side of the great movement. God stoops down and reveals Himself in the Person of His Son. The manward side also will be found to be completely covered by the same term 'likeness' and this we must approach from more than one point of view, first as to man at his creation, secondly in his redemption and thirdly in the Person of Christ as The One Mediator, "The Man Christ Jesus". The reader must remember, therefore, that our argument has not yet been fully presented. We must consider the same line of teaching from man's standpoint.

No.9. An Examination of Gen. i. 26, 27.
Man as a "shadow" of the Lord and of His purpose.
pp. 141 - 143

We have seen that in the mystery of godliness, "God was manifest in the flesh", and that in the person of Christ, the invisible God, condescended to the limitations of His creatures, and that Christ is a necessary Mediator by reason of the gulf that exists between Creator and all creatures, just as surely as He must be the Mediator because of the moral gulf that exists between sinful man and a righteous God. Instead, however, of commencing with the teaching of Scripture, that Christ was made in the likeness of man, we must start with the creation of man, to see how emphatic the Scriptures are that in the beginning, man was made in the likeness of God. Two things are stated in Gen. i. 26 "In our image, after our likeness". How are these words to be understood? Delitzsch suggests that in the word 'image' we have the outline, and in the word 'likeness' we have the filling up of the outline, but upon close investigation it is difficult to understand in what way man was created in the outline of God and what the after "filling up of the outline of God" can mean. We must therefore turn once again to the fountain head of truth in order to obtain all the help we can by examining the usage of these two words and their equivalents in the N.T.

Tselem 'image'. This Hebrew word occurs 17 times in the O.T. and is translated 'image' every time, except in Psa. xxxix. 6 where it is rendered 'in a vain shew' (margin an image). The Chaldee tselem occurs also 17 times, and these references are confined to the book of Daniel. In every occurrence the Chaldee word is rendered 'image' except in Dan. iii. 19 where the AV. reading is 'form'. This word tselem is allied with tsel 'a shadow'. It is used not only in a literal sense, as 'a shadow from the heat', 'the shadow of a cloud' (Isa. xxv. 4, 5), but in various figurative ways, as for example:

> "All my members are as a shadow" (Job xvii. 7).
> "Our days upon earth are a shadow" (Job viii. 9).

In combination with the Hebrew word for 'death' we have the word tsalmaveth, translated throughout the A.V. by the words 'the shadow of death'. There can be no doubt in the mind of any who take the trouble to examine the word, its cognates and its usage, that the primary meaning of the word translated 'image' in Gen. i. 26 is 'shadow'.

Let us now turn our attention to the word translated "likeness", the Hebrew word demuth. This word comes from damah 'to be like'. "Man is like to vanity" (Psa. cxliv. 4). "I have compared thee, O my love" (Song i. 9). "I have . . . . . used similitudes, by the ministry of the prophets" (Hosea xii. 10).

Demuth itself occurs more frequently in the prophecy of Ezekiel than in the rest of the O.T. where it is translated 'likeness', and is chiefly used of the "four living creatures", the cherubim.

In that daring blasphemy of the king of Babylon, as recorded by Isaiah, we catch a glimpse of the intention of the word, as used in Gen. i. 26:

> "Thou hast said in thine heart, I will ascend into heaven, I will exalt my throne above the stars of God; . . . . . I will be like the Most High" (Isa. xiv. 13, 14).

There are many challenging passages in the O.T. Scriptures regarding this matter of comparison with the Most High.

> "Who in heaven can be compared unto the Lord? Who among the sons of the mighty can be likened unto the Lord?" (Psa. lxxxix. 6).
> "To whom will ye liken Me, and make Me equal, and compare Me, that we may be like?" (Isa. xlvi. 5).

The daring assumption of Babylon is the blasphemy of Antichrist, and to quote a passage dealing with another circumstance we can say:

> "And no man in heaven, nor in earth, neither under the earth" (Rev. v. 3), can be found worthy to be compared with the Most High. Yet, just as in Rev. v. the tears of John are stayed as he learns that the Lion of the tribe of Judah was worthy to open the seven sealed book, so the testimony of the Gospels and the Epistles reveal that in the Person of the Lord Jesus Christ, and in Him alone, may be found the answer to the challenge of Psa. lxxxix. 6 and of Isa. xlvi. 5. There is One, Who rightly ascended into heaven, whose throne is exalted above the stars of God. There is One Who thought it not robbery to be upon equality with God. There is One Who is the Image of the Invisible God, the Form of God, and the express Image or character of His substance. He is made known to us in Phil. ii., in Col. i., in Heb. i. and in John i.

The Lord Jesus Christ is "The Likeness" after Whom Adam was created. While it has always been a difficulty to interpret the image and the likeness of Gen. i. 26 on the physical plane, because God is spirit, the difficulty ceases when we realize that the "Image" is the "shadowing forth" for which honour Adam was created, and the 'likeness' according to which he was created, was the likeness of Him Who had form and shape before His incarnation, and was destined in the fullness of time to be made flesh, to be found in fashion as a man, to be made even in the 'likeness' of sinful flesh.

Man's hope in the Lord is not exclusively upon the plane of spirit. In the resurrection the exchange of the earthly image for the heavenly image is defined as the exchange of corruption for incorruption, of mortality for immortality, and even though the resurrection body of some will be a heavenly and a spiritual body, they will be bodies nevertheless, and not spirits. So, in Gen. v. we read:

> "In the day that God created man, in the likeness of God made He him . . . . . and Adam begat a son in his own likeness, after his image" (Gen. v. 1, 3).

There can be no doubt that Seth, the son of Adam not only resembled Adam his father in mind and spirit, but in body also. In Phil. iii. we have the pledge concerning the body, while in Col. iii. we have the insistence upon the mind, neither the one nor the other being a contradiction, but rather a presentation of complete truth.

> "Who shall change this body of our humiliation that it may be fashioned like unto His glorious body" (Phil. iii. 21).

That is the pledge regarding the renewal of the 'image' and 'likeness' so far as the body is concerned.

> "And have put on the new man, which is renewed in knowledge after the image of Him that created him" (Col. iii. 10).

It will be remembered that in explanation as it were of the intention of the Creator, the words "let them have dominion" immediately follow the words "in our image, after our likeness". This dominion first exercised over fish, fowl and beast, is to extend until some at least of Adam's sons, shall reign with Christ in that supernal glory "far above all". It will be remembered that the cherubim are described as having four faces, that of a lion, an ox, a man and an eagle. Adam, who had lost the dominion entrusted to him, would see in the symbolic cherubim at the gate of Paradise, God's pledge that this dominion should be restored.

As a parallel with this suggested meaning of the word cherub, we might place the name of the Archangel. Michael is simply mi 'who' Kha 'like' El 'God', "Who is like God?"

We have covered a deal of ground in our endeavour to attain to some Scriptural understanding of the meaning and intention of the words of Gen. i. 26, and we earnestly commend every reader not only to re-read the evidence submitted, but to supplement it by a personal examination of all the occurrences of the key words, so that the matter may be given the fullest examination. Adam was a 'shadow' only, just like the typical sacrifices. A "shadow of good things to come" indeed, but "not the very image" (Heb. x. 1), and just as Christ sets aside the 'shadows' of the sacrificial law, by coming in the flesh, and offering Himself, so as "the second Man" and "the last Adam" he sets aside the frail type, and is revealed as THE IMAGE of the invisible God, in Whose likeness it is the Divine will that every one of the redeemed shall one day be fashioned.

The wonder will grow as we allow the truth to enter, and the glory of the goal of the ages, focused as it is in the idea of one day being conformed to the image and likeness of the Son of God, will enable us to appreciate perhaps as never before, what lies behind and what leads up to the words,

"That God may be all in all".

No.10. The Teaching of the N.T. regarding the "Image".
pp. 161 - 164

There are many references to 'image' and 'likeness' in the O.T. that await examination, but some of them will come under the head of practical application of the truth involved, and therefore we pass from the O.T. usage to that of the N.T., where we shall find the interpretation and fulfillment of what is intended by the Lord in these two significant words. The words employed by the Septuagint Version for 'image' and 'likeness' are eikon and homoiosis. Eikon is derived from an almost obsolete root eiko 'to be like' which occurs in James i. 6 and 23:

> "He that wavereth is like a wave of the sea."
> "He is like unto a man beholding his natural face in a glass."

Homoiosis is derived from homoioo 'to be, or to make like'. This word occurs in James iii. 9 where we read:

> "Men, which are made after the similitude of God."

The distribution of the word 'image' in the N.T. is significant. The first group is that of the Gospels (Matt. xxii. 20; Mark xii. 16; Luke xx. 24). The second group the Epistles of Paul, and the third group- that of the Revelation (Rev. xiii.-xvi., xix. and xx.).

1st Group. The image of Caesar. Gentile dominion recognized by the Lord. "Render to Caesar the things that are Caesar's."
2nd Group. The doctrinal steps that lead to the goal of the ages.
3rd Group. The image of the "Beast". Worship demanded and denied. Gentile dominion comes to a terrible end. Caesar at length set aside, for "the Kingdoms of this world" must become "the Kingdom of our Lord and of His Christ".

Every one of these passages contribute their quota to the general impression and teaching of the Scriptures regarding the 'image', but those references which must occupy our attention before all others are those that occur in the epistles of Paul. These references are distributed as follows:

1. One occurrence in the epistle to the Hebrews.
2. Seven occurrences in the pre-Mystery epistles.
3. Two occurrences in the Mystery epistles.

We have already suggested, that, just as Adam was only a 'shadow' of the intended 'image', so all the sacrifices like typical law were 'shadows' and not the 'very image'. Both Adam and the types find their realization in Christ.

> "For the law having a shadow of good things to come, and not the very image of the things, can never with those sacrifices which they offered year by year, continually make the comers thereunto perfect" (Heb. x. 1).

The import of the word "image" here is decided by the antithesis "shadow". In Heb. viii. 5, the Aaronic priesthood:

> "Serve unto the example and shadow of heavenly things, as Moses was admonished of God when he was about to make the tabernacle: for, See, saith He, that thou make all things according to the pattern shewed to thee in the mount."

The 'shadow' of Heb. x. 1 is to the 'image' as the 'example' of Heb. viii. 5 is to the 'pattern'. These heavenly patterns, not the earthly copies, are "the very image" of unseen realities. When the Apostle wished to teach much of the same truth to those not so familiar with O.T. typology, he uses the contrasting words 'shadow' and 'body' instead of 'shadow' and 'image'. This is found in Colossians, where he sets aside meats, drinks and holy days, and says:

> "Which are a shadow of things to come; but the body is of Christ" (Col. ii. 17).

To use the word 'body' here as though it referred to "the church which is His body", is just the same error as it would be to use the word 'image' in Heb. x. 1 as one of a series of references to the doctrine of the "Image of God".

The way is therefore clear to consider the remaining references, all of which are found in Paul's epistles. These references form a doctrinal chain, having seven links, which carry the doctrine of the Divine Image from Creation to Restoration, as will be seen by the following analysis:

1. The distinctive position of man by creation (I Cor. xi. 7).
2. The degradation of that position by idolatry (Rom. i. 23).
3. The earthly and heavenly image, the first Adam and the Last (I Cor. xv. 49).
4. The transfiguring character of grace (II Cor. iii. 18; iv. 4).
5. The Divine determination (Rom. viii. 29).
6. The pre-eminent position of Christ (Col. i. 15).
7. The present anticipation of the restoration of the Divine Image (Col. iii. 10).

Reverting for a moment to an earlier observation, we remember that in the Gospels the Image of Caesar was tolerated, but that in the Revelation it had assumed such blasphemous pretensions that it had to be entirely abolished. The degradation that is manifested among kings and rulers, has taken place in individual man, and while at the moment "the powers that be" are permitted by God, the ideal toward which all history moves, will be that day when "all rule and all authority and power" shall be subjected beneath the feet of Christ, and when the Son Himself voluntarily submits, that "God may be all in all". The fact that this will be a moral realm, necessitates a long process of time for its attainment. Creation with its innocence gives place to conscience. The Patriarchal rule is followed by the reign of law. The Kingdom of David faintly foreshadows the reign of Christ. In this process the original purpose of man's creation is kept in mind. The new world that came into being after the Flood was not allowed to forget that man was made in the image of God:

> "Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed; for in the image of God made He man" (Gen. ix. 6).

We must however leave these outlying phases of the subject, and turn our attention to the doctrinal features that are characteristic of the references to 'image' in Paul's epistles. The first reference to Paul's epistles which must be studied, appears on the surface to contradict the testimony of Gen. i. 26, 27. It reads:

> "But I would have you know, that the head of every man is Christ and the head of the woman is the man; and the head of Christ is God" (I Cor. xi. 3).

In Gen. i. 27 we read:

> "So God created man in His own image, in the image of God created He . . . . . THEM" (Gen. i. 27), and in the book of the generations of Adam we have the additional statement:

> "Male and female created He them; and blessed them, and called THEIR name Adam, in the day when they were created" (Gen. v. 2).

Now whatever interpretation we may have accepted regarding Gen. i. 26, 27, we have proof positive that the Adam of Gen. v. is the Adam of Gen. ii., who was the husband of Eve and the father of Seth (Gen. v. 3). We also know that Adam was created first and alone (Gen. ii. 7, 18) and that his wife was 'built' from a 'rib', or preferably a cell taken from Adam while he slept, which occasioned the exclamation of the man upon the presentation of the woman:

> "This is now bone of my bones, and flesh of my flesh: she shall be called Woman, because she was taken out of man" (Gen. ii. 23).

In the creative purpose, Adam and all his posterity, whether male or female were given dominion over the works of God's hands. All were blessed, and all received the command to be fruitful and multiply. Does I Cor. xi. 3 ignore this patent fact? No, it looks at the matter from another angle. It grants all that may be said as to the oneness of the race in Adam, irrespective of age and sex, and does not question the full application of Gen. i. 26, 27 or Gen. v. 2 to woman equally with man.

But the home or the Church is a unit, and in both there must be some sort of order and rule. Now, says Paul, it is evident that, while both Adam and Eve were linked together in the purpose of creation as expressed in Gen. i., it is equally true that "Adam was first formed, then Eve" (I Tim. ii. 13), and this fact is made the basis of the Apostle's argument in I Cor. xi. 8, 9, to show that within the human circle, whether in the home (Eph. v. 23), or in the Church viewed as an assembled company on earth (I Cor. xi.), the 'image' of God as expressed in headship is vested in the man, and that, just as the head of Christ is God, and the head of man is Christ, so the head of woman, within this circle of humanity, is man.

> "For a man indeed ought not to cover his head, forasmuch as he is the image and glory of God: but the woman is the glory of the man" (I Cor. xi. 7).

It may appear on first consideration that this passage need not have been included in the references, seeing that we are concerned with the goal of the ages, and the ultimate realization of the Divine image in man, but no examination of Gen. i. 26, 27 would be complete without the light received from I Cor. xi., and further, one features emerges which is important, namely, the fact that the divine Image, finds one of its expressions in headship. Now all rule, authority and power are to be subjected beneath the feet of the Lord in that day, and that leads us to see, at least two things:

(1) The headship of man, foreshadows the universal headship of Christ, continuing in the frail successors of Adam what he himself only very dimly represented.

(2) This headship of man is temporary. When the goal of the ages is reached ALL rule and authority will have gone; and this indicates that man's headship now does not foreshadows the END, but foreshadows the Mediatorial office of Christ that leads up to the end, when God shall be all in all.

A great deal of heartburning on the part of Christian women, and a great deal of foolish self-assertion on the part of Christian men, would never have been had BOTH men and women realized that they were but playing an appointed part. Neither men nor women in themselves are either superior or inferior to one another, and before Paul enjoins the wife to be 'subject' or to 'submit' to her own husband he exhorts BOTH to 'submit' or be 'subject' to one another. It is just as foolish for a man to assume that he is intrinsically superior to a woman because he has been cast for the role of 'head', or for a woman to think that she has been degraded because she has been cast for a lower part, as it would be for an actor to assume royal airs and insignia simply because for a brief hour he played the part of a king in a Shakespearean tragedy. Neither the man nor the woman are anything else in this matter than 'shadows', and it would not do any harm to us all, sometimes to remind ourselves of the fact. The 'submission' enjoined in this relationship is but an anticipation of the greater 'submission' of I Cor. xv. 27, 28; for the same word hupotasso is used by the same writer in each epistle.

The remaining references to the ‘image’ that we have listed must now be considered. Meanwhile let us gladly yet humbly accept the role that Divine wisdom has appointed, remembering that it is an unspeakable honour to have ANY part in the outworking or the foreshadowing of our heavenly Father, and to be allowed, both in our homes and in our church order, to anticipate however faintly, the relation of Christ to His believing people.

No.11. “We must all be changed” From Earthly to Heavenly and from glory to glory.

pp. 181 - 183

We now pass on to the consideration of three connected references that, taken together, give light upon the ways, means and end in connection with the ‘image’ and ‘the goal of God’. “We must all be changed.”

(1) The Change. Earthly and Heavenly Image (I Cor. xv. 49).
(2) The Change. From glory to glory (II Cor. iii. 18; iv. 4).
(3) The Change. Conformed to the Image of His Son (Rom. viii. 29).

Before we can understand any particular passage, something more has to be done than merely collecting words even though they may be key words. The doctrine is decided by the scope of the passage and the scope is exhibited by the structure. In the case of I Cor. xv., the most casual reader would agree that the one great theme of the chapter is “Resurrection”. This is made very evident by the structure.

I Corinthians xv.

A1 | 1-11. Resurrection. EVIDENCE and EVANGEL.
A2 | 12-34. Resurrection. The FACT. “How?”
A3 | 35-58. Resurrection. The MANNER. “How?”

It is impossible to cover all the ground indicated by this structure, and so we must pass over the first member A1 | 1-11 and give our attention to the two sections dealing with the fact and the manner of resurrection.

I Corinthians xv. 12 - 58.

A | 12. FACT. “How?”
B | 13-33. ADAM. Death destroyed by CHRIST.
C | 34. Practical exhortation. “AWAKE.”
A | 35. MANNER. “How?”
B | 36-57. FIRST and SECOND MAN. Death swallowed up.
C | 58. Practical exhortation. “BE STEDFAST.”

The reference to the 'image' is found in verse 49, and is in the section which raises the question "How are the dead raised up, and with what body do they come?" The reference to the image in verse 49 is a part of a larger section which constitutes the Apostle's answer to this great problem.

> "And as we have borne the image of the earthly, we shall also bear the image of the heavenly" (I Cor. xv. 49).

We can range practically I Cor. xv. 35-57 under the two headings "earthly image" and "heavenly image".

> "That which thou sowest, thou sowest not that body that shall be . . . . . but God giveth it a body as it hath pleased Him."

That which is sown is 'the earthly', that body which 'shall be' is 'the heavenly'.

When Paul goes on to say "To every seed its own body" and to differentiate between the flesh of men, beasts, fishes and birds, and the difference between 'bodies celestial' and bodies terrestrial', he still thinks of the 'earthly' and the 'heavenly' image. So also in verse 42, the contrasts indicated there are but the differences between the 'earthly' and the 'heavenly'.

> "It is sown in corruption; it is raised in incorruption:
> It is sown in dishonour; it is raised in glory:
> It is sown in weakness; it is raised in power:
> It is sown a natural body; it is raised a spiritual body" (I Cor. xv. 42-44).
>
> "The first man Adam was made a living soul;
> the last Adam was made a quickening spirit" (I Cor. xv. 45).

The earthly image is that which is 'natural' and which comes first, the heavenly image is that which is 'spiritual'. We, who have borne the image of the earthly, with its corruption, its dishonour and its weakness. (O the glory of it), shall bear the image of the heavenly with its incorruption, its glory and its power. We shall exchange the 'natural body' for the 'spiritual body'; we shall be changed into the likeness of the 'last Adam' and of 'the second Man' the Lord from heaven.

"We shall all be changed" (I Cor. xv. 51).

Here is the first step towards the goal of God. We now turn to the references in II Cor. iii. and iv. to learn something of the atmosphere in which this change will be made. Here again 'change' meets us, for II Cor. iii. 18 contain the words:

> "We all . . . . . beholding . . . . . are changed into the same image."

The theme we are considering is the goal of God, seen in relation to the idea of the "Image" commencing with Creation (Gen. i. 26) and ending with satisfaction (Psa. xvii. 15); commencing with predestination (Rom. viii. 29) and ending with transfiguration (II Cor. iii. 18).

The word translated 'change' in II Cor. iii. 18 is the Greek metamorphoomai, a word which is used in the Gospels of the transfiguration of the Saviour. He was there glorified on our account, even as His sufferings were endured for us men and for our salvation. Glory had been placed in need of a 'transfiguration' had He not for our sakes humbled Himself to man's low estate. In Him we see the pattern to which God works, and His transfiguration is fulfillment of the teaching of I Cor. xv. where we read:

> "That was not first which is spiritual, but that which is natural; and afterward that which is spiritual" (I Cor. xv. 46).

According to I John iii., this 'change' is associated with seeing Him:

> "It does not yet appear what we shall be; but we know that when He shall appear, we shall be like Him; FOR WE SHALL SEE HIM AS HE IS" (I John iii. 2).

In like manner, the passage before us (II Cor. iii. 18; iv. 6) is most intimately connected with 'beholding with unveiled face', and 'the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ'.

The change is 'into the same image' and 'from glory to glory'. This latter phrase emphasizes the fact that this change operates in grace and not in law. There are two kinds of 'glory' in the context. The fading glory of the law, as exemplified by the face of Moses, and the lasting glory of grace as seen in the face of Jesus Christ.

In II Cor. iii. and iv. the Apostle is comparing the two covenants, and does so by a series of striking contrasts, culminating in the passing glory associated with the face of Moses, as contrasted with the abiding and transfiguring glory that pertains to the face of Jesus Christ. In order that these contrasts may be the better appreciated we set out some of them in two columns, thus:

The Old Covenant	The New Covenant
The letter that killeth (iii. 6).	The Spirit that quickeneth (iii. 6).
The ministration of death (iii. 7, 8).	The ministration of the spirit (iii. 7, 8).
The ministration of condemnation (iii. 9).	The ministration of righteousness (iii. 9).
That which is done away (iii. 11).	That which remaineth (iii. 11).
Moses and Israel vailed (iii. 13-15).	The vail done away in Christ (iii. 13-15).
When Israel turn, the vail removed (iii. 16-18).	We all with unveiled face (iii. 16-18).
The glory of God in the face of Moses (iii. 7).	The glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ (iv. 6).
This glory is 'done away' (iii. 7).	This glory 'transfigures' (iii. 18).

The A.V. has somewhat 'veiled' the truth by translating in verse 18 'open face' instead of 'unveiled face' and 'hid' in iv. 3 instead of 'veiled'. The transfiguration of this passage is 'from glory to glory', that is from the glory of the law which was done away, to the glory of the new covenant which excelleth. What is here seen in the change from law to grace, is but a shadow of that change which will be accomplished when the Saviour:

> "shall change the body of our humiliation that it may be fashioned like unto the body of His glory" (Phil. iii. 21).

In the context of II Cor. iii. 18, we meet with the passage that says:

> "Where the spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty" (17).

Moreover, we learn from Heb. iii. that Moses was a 'servant' but that Christ was a 'Son'. These words 'spirit', 'son', 'liberty', are key words of Rom. viii., the next passage to which we must turn.

No.12. I Cor. xv. 28.

The attainment of a goal not only involves Purpose, Wisdom and Power, but when the attainment of that goal includes moral creatures, who are free to love and serve, but also free to disobey, then margin must be allowed for moral lapses, sin may manifest itself, Redemption may be necessary, Reconciliation and Salvation, Death and Resurrection, all may be involved before such a goal, with such materials, can be reached. We have no need to labour this point, the whole testimony of Scripture and the witness of history are unanimous on the subject. James knew that the tongue of man might be used not only in the blessing of God, but in the cursing of man made in the similitude of God.

Man, as a son of Adam, quite irrespective of nationality, whether Jew or Gentile, was made in the image and after the likeness of the Creator, but man, irrespective of nationality, whether Jew or Gentile, degraded the high glory of his Maker, and in so doing degraded the high dignity of his own calling, by falling into the senseless sin of idolatry. Today, surrounded by the evidences of 'civilization', with science laying bare the innermost secrets of matter, and man triumphing in the physical conquest of earth, sea and sky, the idea of anyone becoming an 'idolater' seems absurd, yet we have to face the fact that idolatry has been well nigh universal, that it is confined to no class or period, that it was the snare not only of the ignorant barbarian, but of the people of Israel and of the men of Athens and moreover, that idolatry was seriously discussed in the early church (Acts xv. 20); in the epistles of Paul (I & II Corinthians; Galatians; Ephesians); by Peter (I Pet. iv. 3) and in the book of the future, the Revelation.

The epistle that contains the glorious determination of the God of all grace that His believing people shall one day be "conformed to the image of His Son" is the one that reveals the folly and degradation of the image of God in man. All indeed have sinned and come short of the glory of God. Man, as we have already seen is "the image and glory of God" (I Cor. xi. 7), and we have the Apostle's own argument to confirm our thought that this very fact alone should have made idolatry impossible (Rom. i. 23).

Speaking in a city renowned alike for its 'wisdom' as for its 'idolatry', namely Athens, Paul said:

> "For we are also His offspring. Forasmuch then as we are the offspring of God, we ought not to think that the Godhead is like unto gold, or silver, or stone, graven by art and man's device" (Acts xvii. 28, 29).

We come therefore to Rom. i. 23, where we read that men "changed the glory of the uncorruptible God into an image made like to corruptible man, and to birds, and four footed beasts, and creeping things". Did the nations know the truth or did they "hold down" the truth? The answer depends upon the meaning of katecho translated 'hold' in Rom. i. 18. A number of commentators feel that the ordinary meaning of katecho cannot be permitted in Rom. i. 18, and teach that in this instance the meaning must be 'hold down' or 'hold back'. Alford and Bloomfield take this view. The Companion Bible at Rom. i. 18 gives the note "Hold down, suppress. cp. II Thess. ii. 6", but when we turn to II Thess. ii. 6 we discover that katecho is not there translated "hold down" but "withholdeth". Paul uses the word 13 times out of the 19 found in the N.T. and in no passage does "hold down" make good sense. Rom. vii. 6 reads "held"; I Cor. vii. 30 "possessed"; I Cor. xi. 2 "keep"; I Thess. v. 21 "hold fast". We come back to Rom. i. 18 and read afresh that the ancients 'held' or 'possessed' the truth, but that they held it 'in unrighteousness'.

If one is acquainted with the writings of ancient philosophy, one is often struck with the fact that these men did have a knowledge of the unity and spirituality of the Godhead, but that as Socrates in his Timaeus says:

> "It is neither easy to find the Parent of the Universe, nor safe to discover him to the vulgar, when found."

Augustine blames the philosophers (see Estius, De Vera Relig. c. 5) because they practiced the most abominable idolatries with the vulgar, although in their schools they delivered doctrines concerning the nature of the gods, inconsistent with the established worship. They did not, as verse 21 asserts, "glorify Him as God" even though they knew Him as such. Let us examine Rom. i. 23 once more. "Changed." The word occurs but six times in the N.T. so that it will be well to have the references before us.

> "Shall change the customs" (Acts vi. 14).
> "Changed the glory" (Rom. i. 23).
> "We shall be changed" (I Cor. xv. 51, 52).
> "Change my voice" (Gal. iv. 20).
> "They shall be changed" (Heb. i. 12).

Instead of attempting an explanation of our own, we direct the reader's attention to the Divine comment in Rom. i. 25:

> "Who changed the truth of God into a lie, and worshipped and served the creature more than the Creator, Who is blessed for ever, Amen."

Here, metallasso the stronger word is used, where allasso is found in verse 23. There is but one other occurrence of this word, and that is in Rom. i. 26.

Truth was exchanged for 'the lie' when man began to worship idols. So interrelated is the purpose of God with His Own attributes and with man's creation, that it is impossible for man to entertain degrading thoughts of the incorruptible God, without bringing about an immediate repercussion, and degrading himself. This is the tragic story of Rom. i.

> "Wherefore God also gave them up to uncleanness . . . . . to dishonour their own bodies" (Rom. i. 24).

This 'change' therefore, of verse 23, is not only explained in verse 25 as the exchange of the truth for the lie, but as a "giving up" by man, of God, otherwise the "also" in verse 24 would have no place. "God also gave them up." The man who wrote this terrible indictment of Gentile degradation knew that his own people Israel, with greater advantages than the Gentiles possessed, had gone the same evil way. In fact Psa. cvi. contains the very expression found in Rom. i. 23, together with several parallels with the rest of Rom. i.

> "They made a calf in Horeb, and worshipped the molten image. Thus they changed their (correct reading is 'My') glory into the similitude of an ox that eateth grass. They forgat God their Saviour . . . . . they joined themselves also unto Baal-peor, and ate the sacrifices of the dead. Thus they provoked Him to anger with their inventions: and the plague brake in upon them" (Psa. cvi. 19-29).

The argument of Rom. i. follows the same sequence:

> "They changed the glory . . . . . dishonoured their own bodies . . . . . inventors of evil things" (Rom. i. 23, 24, 30).

To tabulate the prohibitions to idolatry contained in the law, or the repeated lapses of which the history of Israel is replete, would make more demands on our limited space than we can afford. The reader however can supplement the above notes by his own reading. We are not at the moment writing a discourse upon idolatry, we are concerned with the subject as it is associated with the goal of God which has the restoration of the image and likeness of God in man in view. There is however a more serious view presented by the Scriptures, than that idolatry degrades the worshipper who was made in the image of God. Idolatry is a cunningly disguised attack upon the supreme office of Christ. The exchange, we read, was the exchange of "the truth" for "the lie". Satan originates nothing. He imitates, substitutes, counterfeits. He takes a truth and distorts it to his own evil ends.

God is invisible, God is Spirit, God is omnipotent. Man by his very constitution needs imagery. The 'Invisible things' of the Creator are 'clearly seen' by those who intelligently behold the works of His hands. "The heavens declare the glory of God." When God uses human speech He stoops from the realm of pure thought to the world of imagery. Every attribute revealed is revealed in human terms. This essential need of human nature is fully met by Christ. He is the Word, the Form, the Image of the Invisible God. They that have seen Him have seen the Father. They that come to God, Who is Invisible and Spirit, come to the Father through Christ. Idolatry taking advantage of the basic need of human nature for an Image to interpret the Invisible, foisted upon man the crude and licentious imagery of idolatry, 'the lie' thereby occupying the place that alone belongs to Christ, the Image of the Invisible God, Who is Himself "The Truth". There are two agents through which the 'Invisible' God may be 'seen' by man. The one is Creation, the things that are made, as Rom. i. 18-22 makes clear, the other is Christ the only begotten Son, Who 'declares' Him (John i. 18).

"The one object of the incarnation was to satisfy the natural desire for a sensible representation of the Divine Being" (Webster and Wilkinson). Even though we might feel obliged to correct this statement, and say that "one of the objects of the incarnation" instead of "The one object of the incarnation", it is sufficiently true to enable us to see that all idolatry is necessarily of the spirit of Antichrist, that it did not originate in man's ignorance, but comes from the same source as the original temptation of man "Ye shall be as God", and betrays an appreciation by the Evil One of the original purpose of God in the creation of man in His Own image and which shows how vital that truth of the 'image' is to the ultimate purpose of God and how near this conception of the 'image' must be to the attainment of the goal of the ages.

Let us look very briefly at the references to idolatry that are found in the epistles. In I Cor. x. 14, the Apostle urges the believer to "flee from idolatry", in Gal. v. 20 it is included in the "works of the flesh". Conversion is described as "turning to God from idols" (I Thess. i. 9). John writing to his believing children says "Little children, keep yourselves from idols" (I John v. 21), but it is in the epistles of the mystery that light is shed upon the essential nature of idolatry.

> "A covetous man, who is an idolator" (Eph. v. 5).
> "Covetousness, which is idolatry" (Col. iii. 5).

The moment we read these revealing words, can we not see that He Who framed the ten commandments, fully understood this fact? The law opens with the commandment to have 'no other gods' before the Lord, nor to make graven images, while the commandments close with the words "Thou shalt not covet".

The composition of the word idolatry shows that it means "The service of that which is seen", and anything, be it money, business or brains, anything that becomes a substitute for simple faith in God, be it bowing to "stocks and stones", or to "stocks and shares" is incipient idolatry. Thus we see that God made man to be the shadow of His Own glory, to set forth in miniature the purpose of the ages, and that the 'likeness' after which he was created, was nothing less than that of the Person of Christ "Who is the Image of the Invisible God". We shall be obliged to give a fuller consideration to this aspect of the subject when we are able to assemble what is said under the word 'Likeness". For the moment we must pursue our study of the several aspects of the word 'image' that still await investigation. Our next study being the references to the 'earthly' and the 'heavenly' image as taught in I Cor. xv.

No.13. "Satisfied . . . . . with Thy likeness."
pp. 221 - 223

We have devoted a number of pages to the references found in the Scripture to the "Image". These studies would however lack completeness if we did not give some consideration to the word 'likeness'. This must therefore occupy our attention.

D'muth 'likeness' occurs more times in the prophet Ezekiel than in the rest of the O.T. Apart from the references to Adam in Genesis, the references in the remainder of the O.T. do not contribute anything to our special theme except the one found in Daniel. We will, however, supply the reader with these references in order that he may "see whether these things are so". They are II Kings xvi. 10; II Chron. iv. 3; Psa. lviii. 4; Isa. xiii. 4; and xl. 18.

It is our boast that the reader of this magazine manifests the true Berean spirit, and we hope that some at least are ready to interpose with a question "What of the passages which forbid the making of the likeness of anything; these are found in the law and you have not given the references". The answer is that beside d'muth there are two other Hebrew words that are translated "likeness", t'moonah "the likeness of anything" (Exod. xx. 4), and tavneeth "the likeness of male or female" (Deut. iv. 16).

Gesenius is of the opinion that t'moonah is from a root that means 'pretence' and tavneeth is from the root which means 'to build', and so this word is often rendered 'pattern' as in Exod. xxv. 9; I Chron. xxviii. 11, etc. One occurrence of t'moonah must inevitably come into our study at the close, and that is Psa. xvii. 15. We must however adhere to the Divine choice of word in Genesis and seek the teaching associated with that word first.

Commenting on damah Parkhurst says:

> "The general idea of this difficult and extensive root seems to be equable, even, level, uniform, conform . . . . . Symmachus (Greek version of the O.T. similar to the LXX) appears to have given nearly the ideal meaning of it, Psa. lxxxix. 7, where he renders it exisasei, shall equal."

In Isa. xlvi. 5 this approach to the idea of being equal is clearly seen:

> "To whom will ye liken Me, and make Me equal, and compare Me, that we may be like?"

Parkhurst's translation is:

> "To whom will ye equal Me (or make Me equivalent), or liken Me that we may be equal (or conform)?"

It must not be assumed that by so understanding the word translated 'likeness' in Gen. i. 26, that there is imported into the record an unholy suggestion at 'equality' with

God. It simply indicates that this was a 'likeness' whose parts are equable and conform to its archetype. By the use of the word 'image' we learned that Adam was 'a shadow', and by the word 'likeness' we learn that he did set forth in some measure of correspondence, the glory of Him Whose title is "The Image of the Invisible God". Further, in some forms of the verb, the dominant idea is that of an image in the mind:

> "I thought" (Numb. xxxiii. 56); "I have compared" (Song i. 9);
> "He meaneth not so" (Isa. x. 7).

Here it is 'an image, or idea of a thing in the mind' that is uppermost, and that is by no means absent from the intention of Gen. i. 26. In the nature of things, it is manifest that the creature, innocent and perfect though he was when he came from the hand of his Maker, could never carry the awful burden involved in the fact that he was made in the image and likeness of the Creator. In its full sense Adam was made in the image of God that he might be as it were, "God made manifest" on the earth, but it was as a shadow only of that full and glorious manifestation that was alone possible to Him Who is "The Image of the Invisible God".

Further light is found on the meaning of the word 'likeness' where, following the statement repeated from Gen. i. 26, the record of Gen. v. 3 adds:

> "And Adam lived an hundred and thirty years, and begat a son in his own likeness, after his image, and called his name Seth."

While, in this case physical likeness must be included, whereas it is impossible to so read it in Gen. i. 26; the impression which Gen. v. 1-3 leaves in the mind is that the image and likeness of Gen. i. 26 is very real and must not be explained away because of its manifest difficulties.

We pass from these references, to the New Testament, to consider those passages where homoios 'like', homoioo 'made like', homoioma 'likeness' and homoiosis 'similitude' occur. First of all we establish the connection between the N.T. words and the passages we have been considering in the O.T. James speaks of men who are "made after the similitude of God" (James iii. 9) and uses the word homoiosis. In the first epistle of John, the glorious restoration which has already been seen recorded in I Cor. xv. and Rom. viii. (the exchange of the earthly for the heavenly image, and the conformity to the image of God's Son) is spoken of in terms of 'likeness' homoios.

> "When He shall appear, we shall be like Him" (I John iii. 2).

In Heb. ii. 17 in bringing many sons to glory, we learn that it behoved Him "to be made like unto His brethren", and this is more fully stated in Heb. iv. 15, where we read that He was "in all points tempted like as we are". The significant addition "yet without sin" is given emphasis in Rom. viii. 3 where it is written that God sent His Own Son "in the likeness of sinful flesh", and Phil. ii. 7 declares that "He was made in the likeness of men". The O.T. references point ever upward, but many of the N.T. references point downward, speaking of humiliation and descent from glory. This coming of the Saviour down to where His people were completed the 'likeness' from every aspect. Christ is like God, Christ is like man; conversely God is fully revealed in Christ Who is His likeness, and man is fully prepared for glory in Christ whose likeness he must one day bear.

The Psalmist said:

> "I shall be satisfied, when I awake, with Thy likeness" (Psa. xvii. 15).

The primary meaning of the word translated 'satisfied' is 'to be filled'. It occurs with such a meaning in the same Psalm, in verse 14 'full of children', which is placed in strong contrast with 'satisfied' or 'filled' in resurrection glory.

The goal of God thus expressed is seen in the climax prayer of Eph. iii.:

> "That ye might be filled up to all the fullness of God" (Eph. iii. 19).

There is no burning desire expressed in prophecy, that does not find its satisfaction in the blessed doctrine of 'likeness'. There is no glorious doctrine of the Gospel of grace that does not look directly to this same element of 'likeness'. Sin is the very opposite of the likeness of God; righteousness, sanctification, glory and peace are but phases of the Divine Image. When the likeness is complete, then, and then only will the goal of God be realized, and God will be "All in all" to His moral world even as He is already in the world of things.

At some other time we may be permitted to pursue this theme along the practical path, learning the necessary lesson, that they who hope one day to be like Him in glory, should at least seek grace to be somewhat like Him during their pilgrimage here below. We can but leave the suggestion with our reader and pray that we all may desire to "adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour in all things",

"That God may be all in all".

HEBREWS

Perfection or Perdition

No.52. The Author and Finisher of Faith (xii. 1 - 4).

pp. 1 - 5

The long list of witnesses to faith having been written, "the better thing" emphasized, a giving up and a patient endurance on the part of the faithful pointed out, the apostle turns to the Hebrews to apply the lesson.

Chapter xi. may be looked upon as a great parenthesis; chapter xii., fortified with chapter xi., reverts to the close of chapter x., and gives a fresh application of its truth. Let us refresh our memories by a revisal of x. 32-39. We are in an atmosphere of suffering, yet a suffering illuminated by the prospect of future joys: "knowing that ye have in heaven a better and an enduring substance. Cast not away therefore your confidence, which hath great recompense of reward. For ye have need of patience . . .". The immediate danger that beset these Hebrews was that of "drawing back", growing weary, and to encourage them the apostle puts forward three items:

(1) The Second Coming of the Lord. "Yet a little while" (x. 37).
(2) The examples of faith taken from the Old Testament (xi.).
(3) The example of Christ Himself (xii. 1-4).

It is this third feature which is now before us. Words are used in this passage which demand careful consideration, and it may be well, before attempting the whole passage, to be a little more certain of the words that are employed here.

WITNESSES (Greek martus). This word does not mean spectator. It means one who bears witness, even to the length of suffering martyrdom for it. The English word martyr is the Greek word for witness, and surely no martyr was a mere spectator. We find the word in Heb. x. 28, "two or three witnesses". Rev. i. 5 speaks of "Jesus Christ . . . . . the faithful Witness"; and Rev. ii. 13 uses the same words of "Antipas, My faithful martyr". Heb. x. 15 says, "the Holy Ghost is a witness", and xi. 4 tells us that Abel "obtained witness".

It may be of service if we give all the occurrences of martus, martureo and marturion in the epistle to the Hebrews.

"For a testimony of those things" (iii. 5).
"Of whom it is witnessed that he liveth" (vii. 8).
"For He testifieth, Thou art a priest" (vii. 17).
"The Holy Ghost also is a witness to us" (x. 15).
"Died . . . . . under two or three witnesses" (x. 28).
"The elders obtained a good report" (xi. 2).
"He obtained witness that he was righteous" (xi. 4).
"God testifying of his gifts" (xi. 4).

"He had this testimony" (xi. 5).
"These all, having obtained a good report" (xi. 39).
"So great a cloud of witnesses" (xii. 1).

CLOUD (nephos). The word does not occur elsewhere in Scripture, the usual word for cloud being the related nephele. It is a word in use among Greek writers for a great company. Homer, in the Iliad, has the line: "With him followed a cloud of foot-men." So Herodotus, Euripides and others. The figure was used likewise by Latin writers: Livy has the line peditum equitumque nubes, "a cloud of horse and foot".

PATIENCE (hupomone). The only occurrences of this word in Hebrews are x. 36 and xii. 1. The word literally means "to remain under". We take note of it here because of its cognates that are not so obvious in the English translation. The verbal form (hupomeno) comes in Heb. x. 32, "Ye endured"; xii. 2, "He endured the cross"; xii. 3, "endured such contradiction"; xii. 7, "If ye endure chastening".

Closely allied, and having a very definite bearing upon the theme, is the simple form meno, "to remain". It occurs six times in Hebrews:

"Abideth a priest continually" (vii. 3).
"He continueth ever" (vii. 24).
"An enduring substance" (x. 34).
"Those things which cannot be shaken may remain" (xii. 27).
"Let brotherly love continue" (xiii. 1).
"For here have we no continuing city" (xiii. 14).

RACE (agon). The word means a contest, a race, a conflict, and the accompanying imagery is borrowed from the Greek games.

"So run, that ye may obtain . . . . . every man that striveth for the mastery is temperate . . . . . they do it to obtain a corruptible crown" (I Cor. ix. 24, 25).
"I have fought a good fight . . . . . henceforth . . . . . a crown" (II Tim. iv. 7, 8).

A connection hidden from the English reader is found in Heb. xii. 4 "Striving against" is antagonizomai, just the verbal form of agon as used in I Cor. ix. 25, with the prefix anti, against.

The consideration of these words has of itself created the true atmosphere of the passage. It is a race, calling for endurance, beset with peculiar difficulties, having a prize ahead, and a glorious Example. We are now ready for the structure, and can then pass on to the argument itself.

Hebrews xii. 1 - 4

A1 | 1. ENDURANCE (hupomone).
Race (agon) set before us.
Entangling sin (hamartia).
B | 2-. | a | Looking away to Jesus (apo).
b | Captain and Perfecter of faith.
A2 | -2-. ENDURANCE (hupomeno).
Joy set before Him.
B | -2, 3-. b | The right hand of the throne of God.
a | Consider Him (analogizomai).
A3 | -3, 4. ENDURANCE (hupomeno).
Opposition (antagonizo).
Sinners (hamartolos).

With so great a cloud of witnesses as is found in the Scriptures ever with us, we are exhorted to take heart and run with patience or endurance the race set before us. Two things are enjoined, viz. (1) "Lay aside every weight" and (2) "Lay aside the easily entangling sin". He who would go on unto perfection must bear in mind the two sources of hindrance, (1) Weight, (2) Sin. The first is not of itself sinful. To one it will be riches, to another home ties, to another health, to another liberty. Each will know best what it is that hinders in the race. The second is sin in one of its many aspects, "easily entangling". It is not so much external "sins" that are in view, but the old man, the old nature, the flesh. A reference to I Cor. ix. 24-27 plainly shows this:

> "Know ye not that they which run in a race run all, but one receiveth the prize? So run, that ye may obtain. And every man that striveth for the mastery is temperate in all things. Now they do it to obtain a corruptible crown; but we an incorruptible. I therefore so run, not as uncertainly; so fight I, not as one that beateth the air: but I keep under my body, and bring it into subjection: lest that by any means, when I have preached to others, I myself should be a castaway (disapproved)."

Then follows a passage dealing with Israel and the temptations in the wilderness; this is parallel with Heb. iii. and iv. The passage, "I keep under my body", recalls the opposite walk of those "whose end is perdition", "whose God is their belly"; (Phil. iii.)—another passage dealing with a prize.

The greatest encouragement however is found not by looking at the great chain of witnesses, and certainly not by contemplating impediments and entanglements, but by the gaze being directed away to the Lord. In Heb. x. 37 the soon-returning Lord was the encouragement to endure. In Heb. xii. 2 the victorious Leader at the right hand of God is the attractive power. The word "looking" is really "looking away", looking away from all lesser patterns, even those of Heb. xi., and from all the weaknesses and hindrances found in self, looking away to the Lord Jesus.

He has two titles here that are suggestive. "The Author and Finisher of faith". Author is archegos, and we have the word already in Heb. ii. 10 translated "Captain", and in close association with the next title, "Finisher" for that is really "Perfecter". "It became Him . . . . . in bringing many sons unto glory, to make the Captain (archegos) of their salvation perfect (teleioo) through sufferings".

We are back again therefore in Heb. xii. to the original theme: the need to go on unto perfection, the suffering that is associated with it, and the example of those who drew back unto perdition (Heb. iii. and iv.).

"Who for the joy that was set before Him." The word "for" here is anti, which sometimes bears the meaning "instead of". This has given rise to an interpretation of the passage to the effect that the Lord gave up the joy that was before Him, and in its stead endured the cross. This, however, does not fit the context. The whole tenor of the epistle in general, and the particular example here is that, because of the joy that lies ahead, we can endure the suffering now.

That is the character of the example of Abraham and Moses, given at length in chapter xi. For the joy set before Abraham he was content to live a pilgrim and a stranger. For the joy set before Moses he turned his back on the treasures of Egypt. For the joy ahead of these Hebrew believers they were exhorted to endure. In this sense the sentence should be translated. Over and over again our problems would be solved if we allowed the Word more way with us. If instead of giving time to speculation concerning this word anti we were to read on a few verses we should have our answer.

"Esau, who for (anti) one morsel of meat sold his birthright." Here we have contrast. Esau exchanged the future blessing for the present, whereas we are to follow the example of Moses who exchanged present immunity from suffering for pleasures at the right hand of God which are for evermore.

Apart from the passage "crucify to themselves" in Heb. vi. 6, this is the only occurrence of the cross in Hebrews. As in the parallel epistle, Philippians, the reference is to endurance in view of the crown or prize (Phil. ii. 8; iii. 18). In neither of these epistles is the cross mentioned in connection with redemption or atonement. The usage is similar to the earlier references like those of Matt. x. 38 and xvi. 24. The saying, "No cross, no crown" exactly fits its usage. The cross is prominent in the epistle to the Corinthians, for they were carnal. The cross is prominent in the epistle to the Galatians, because they were being moved away from the faith. The only allusion to the cross in Romans is in Rom. vi. 6 where the old man is dealt with. The argument of Heb. xii. is, surely, that just as He endured the cross, despising the shame, and is now seated at the right hand of God, so may the believer endure his cross, despise its shame (not "glory in their shame" as Phil. iii. 19), and in God's good time enter into that better thing, by that better resurrection, to enjoy that better and enduring substance connected with the heavenly city, Jerusalem.

We are bid to "consider" Him Who endured such contradiction of sinners against Himself, lest we be weary and faint. Analogia from which "consider" is taken, is translated "proportion" (Rom. xii. 6), and here implies the act of weighing and balancing one thing with another. It would mean considering the pros and cons of gaining the whole world and losing one's own soul. It would mean estimating aright the actions of Esau (Heb. xii. 16) and Moses (xi. 24-26), for just as loss now means the gaining of the soul in that day according to Matt. xvi., so does it according to Heb. x. 39.

We are now brought face to face with another cause of stumbling, "the contradiction of sinners", producing weariness. Earlier we had the entangling nature of "sin", now the "contradiction of sinners". Antilogia is translated "strife" in Heb. vi. 16; "contradiction" (vii. 7; xii. 3) and "gainsaying" of Korah (Jude 11).

This last reference bears rather pointedly upon the teaching of Hebrews concerning the One Priest. The four occurrences of antilego in Acts (xiii. 45 and xxviii. 19, 22) give further light upon the special "contradiction" that the Hebrews would be likely to meet. Each occurrence has to do with Jewish opposition to the ministry of Paul. The occurrences are confined to the beginning and the end of his Acts ministry. The only other reference during the Acts period speaks of Israel as "a disobedient and gainsaying people" (Rom. x. 21).

Perhaps it is hardly necessary to explain to our readers that "contradiction" is connected, too, with our own blessed calling, contradiction from those, who, like gainsaying Israel, "have a zeal of God but not according to knowledge", and who, totally misunderstanding our witness, speak of ultradispensationalism! Let us not be weary and faint, even though undoubted men of God call us hard names, thinking they are serving God. This careful and proportionate consideration of what Christ endured will enable us to take up our cross, for none of us can suffer anything comparable with the sufferings of Christ.

"Ye have not yet resisted unto blood, striving against sin." When we see that the "striving" here includes the word agon—race (see the structure above), we realize that the figure of the contest is still maintained.

Let us "consider Him", the great Prince-Leader and Perfecter of faith, and see how He embraces all the qualities exhibited in Heb. xi.

> His offering "speaketh better things than that of ABEL".
> He was the beloved Son of Go d in Whom God was "well pleased" (ENOCH).
> He saves in a sense that was impossible to NOAH.
> He was more intimate than even the "friend of God" could be (ABRAHAM).
> He was "The only Begotten Son" offered by the Father (ISAAC).
> He was One Who indeed blessed regarding things to come (JACOB).
> He will be the great Ruler and Restorer (JOSEPH).
> He is the Prophet greater than MOSES.
> He embraces all the heroic acts of GIDEON, DAVID and others.
> He endured as none else endure, refusing deliverance, refusing to save Himself, and finally attained unto that better resurrection to glory, where He waits the day of His return.

He is indeed the altogether lovely One, the chiefest among ten thousand. Here, as in Col. iii., "Christ is ALL".

No.53. Sonship and Birthright (xii. 5 - 25).
pp. 21 - 28

Heb. xii. 5-24 is occupied with a two-fold theme: 5-14, sons; 15-24, firstborn.

The first section, sons, speaks of that of which all are partakers if they are true children. The second, of that which only the firstborn attain, but of which the Esaus fail.

The structure of xii. 5-14 is simple in its broad outlines, though involved when we approach the detail.

Hebrews xii. 5 - 14

A | 5-10-. Mark of sonship. Discipline received.
B | -10. The end. Partakers of His holiness.
A | 11-13. Fruit of righteousness. Discipline exercised.
B | 14. The pursuit. Peace and holiness.

The opening verse of Heb. xi. is twofold in its aspect, viz., (1) faith is the substance of things hoped for; this is the theme of Chapter xi.: (2) The elengchos of things not seen; this is the theme of Heb. xii. 5-14.

Elengchos is balanced by elengcho in Heb. xii. 5, where it is translated "rebuked". Now the quotation, "the just shall live by faith" in Heb. x. 38, takes us back to the same word, for in Habk. ii. 1 we find it in the word "reproved" as we have already seen. In Heb. xii. the apostle quotes Prov. iii. 11, 12, where in the LXX translation, we find elengchos as "correction". This "rebuke", "correction", "discipline", is an essential accompaniment of sonship and growth.

Let us now look at one or two passages that illuminate the purpose and instruments of chastening:

> "Thou shalt remember all the way which the LORD thy God led thee these forty years in the wilderness, to humble thee, and to prove thee, to know what was in thine heart, whether thou wouldst keep His commandments, or no. And He humbled thee, and suffered thee to hunger, and fed thee with manna, which thou knewest not, neither did thy fathers know; that He might make thee know that man doth not live by bread only, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of the LORD doth man live. Thy raiment waxed not old upon thee, neither did thy foot swell, these forty years. Thou shalt also consider in thine heart, that, as a man chasteneth his son, so the LORD thy God chasteneth thee" (Deut. viii. 2-5).

We are apt to fix our minds upon the painful side of chastening, and, by reason of our folly, there is often a need for that phase, but it is good also to notice that a part of this discipline or chastening was the provision of the daily manna, the marvelous preservation of clothing, and the care of the wanderers" feet.

> "The LORD knoweth the thoughts of man, that they are vanity. Blessed is the man whom Thou chastenest, O LORD, and teachest him out of Thy law" (Psa. xciv. 11, 12).
> "We are chastened of the Lord, that we should not be condemned with the world" (I Cor. xi. 32).

Here is another comfort: chastening is not condemnation. Chastening is for sons, condemnation for the unbelieving world. Man's thoughts are vain; he needs a two-fold treatment, chastening to remove folly, teaching to supply the needed instruction.

Chastening is not only the work of the Father, for Christ Himself says to the Laodicean church: "As many as I love, I rebuke and chasten: be zealous therefore, and repent" (Rev. iii. 19).

The apostle puts the matter of this chastening before the reader in a variety of ways. First, the attitude of mind toward it. Do not despise it. Do not faint when rebuked. Perhaps "despise" is too strong a word. Rather, what is meant is to hold lightly, to have very little concern about it. That is one attitude to be avoided. There is the opposite extreme, however, that is, of magnifying the chastening endured, and so "fainting" at the rebuke. This also is wrong. We have to remember that the chastening has to do with us "as sons" (Heb. xii. 5-7). It comes to us from One Who loves us (Heb. xii. 6). To be without chastening is to be without proof of sonship. The little gutter child, unkempt, uncorrected, uncared for, is free from the discipline, restraint, training, care and correction that loving fatherhood imposes, but who, knowing the truth, would exchange the "discipline" of the one for the "liberty" of the other?

The apostle proceeds to reason from the lesser to the greater. We have had fathers in this life whose discipline was brief, and, as far as they knew, right. But it was sometimes in error, yet we held them in respect. God is the Father of our spirits; His discipline is never at fault, and it tends to life. Shall we not then much rather render submission to Him?

The object that the Lord has in view all this time is revealed in Heb. xii. 10: "That we might be partakers of His holiness." Holiness is the atmosphere of Hebrews, as righteousness is of Romans. The sanctification of believers is entirely outside their own deeds or endeavours. They are sanctified by the blood of Him Who suffered "without the gate" (Heb. xiii. 12). If they are called upon to go unto Him without the camp, bearing His reproach (Heb. xiii. 13), it is but manifesting in act and character what has been already accomplished. The going without the camp will never sanctify, but it may manifest sanctification.

> "By the which will we are sanctified through the offering of the body of Jesus Christ once for all" (Heb. x. 10).
> "For by one offering He hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified" (Heb. x. 14).

This "perfecting for ever" is in nowise altered or minimized because the epistle proceeds to urge each to "go on unto perfection", or because it associates perfecting with suffering and obedience. When therefore we read that this discipline has in view the partaking of His holiness, we do not understand that any amount of scourging can sanctify, but that the believer, already perfectly sanctified in Christ, is now trained and encouraged to walk in harmony with such a blessed position. This is practical sanctification.

While the apostle urged the believer to treat with all due reverence the chastening of the Lord, he assumed no stoic indifference. There is something intensely human in the admission: "Now no chastening for the present seemeth to be joyous, but grievous: nevertheless afterward it yieldeth the peaceable fruit of righteousness unto them which are exercised thereby" (Heb. xii. 11).

Three items in this verse demand attention. First, the words "nevertheless afterward". While mother-love is immediate and protective, father-love is concerned with the future. The one sees the babe that is now; the other visualizes the man that is to be. The underlying thought is very close to that of II Cor. iv. 16-18 which hinges upon the words, "while we look not at the things which are seen".

Then there is the Greek expression translated "the peaceable fruit of righteousness". We understand this to mean in English, "the peaceable fruit, namely, righteousness". Holiness in Christ is manifested, and imputed righteousness has produced its peaceable fruit. The chastening and the discipline has had the effect of pruning; it has produced fruitfulness. Here is a parallel with Phil. i. 11 which speaks of bringing forth the fruits of righteousness.

All, however, turns upon the third expression: "To them which are exercised thereby", just as the prayer in Philippians urges the need for discernment and trying the things that differ.

Watch the effect of discipline upon two of the Lord's children. One becomes mellow, the other hard and sour. The one is going on unto perfection, the other drawing back unto perdition. Look at Israel in the wilderness. After their first experience at Marah one would have thought that the next problem concerning water would, at once, have thrown them back on the memory of the Lord's earlier intervention on their behalf, and that they would have trusted in quiet confidence. But no, so far as they were concerned, the discipline of Marah was wasted upon them; they were not "exercised thereby". Let us not pass through trials and reap no benefit! Let us ever seek to be "exercised" by the discipline of our pathway, and then it will turn to our profit and the Lord's glory. This exercise is the mark of the "perfect" or mature: "But strong meat belongeth to them that are perfect, even those who by reason of use have their senses exercised to discern both good and evil" (Heb. v. 14). A baby has senses, a man has senses exercised. A true son of God is exercised by the chastening of the Lord; he is unworthy of the Name if he is indifferent or hardened.

It is not without bearing upon the theme of Heb. xii. that the word "exercise" is gumnazo. The word actually means "to be naked" because in the Greek sports the competitors were stripped. So we have gumnos translated "naked" in Matt. xxv. 36; II Cor. v. 3; Heb. iv. 13 and other places. Coming, as it does, after the exhortation to "lay aside every weight and the easily-entangling sin, and run with patience the race set before us", this word gumnazo is very apt.

Seeing then that chastening, though unpleasant, is fruitful, we are exhorted to: "Lift up the hands which hang down, and the feeble knees; and make straight paths for your feet, lest that which is lame be dislocated; but let it rather be healed. Follow peace with all men" (Heb. xii. 12-14). In other words, we are not to seek martyrdom; we are not to pose as sufferers; we are not to pick the roughest tracks and run the thorniest way. Rather are we to gird up the loins and hope to the end; make the place for our feet as level as we can, not aggravate the lame ankle, but rather get it well, that we may finish our course with joy. Further, we are to follow peace with all men. Our discipline will sometimes come through the permitted oppression of man, and when it does we must bow before the Father's good pleasure. On the other hand we should not go out of our way to irritate our fellows or ask for trouble, but as far as in us lies, we are to make peace. The word "safe" in Phil. iii. 1 is the Greek asphales, a grip for the feet of a runner, our modern asphalt. Here is another parallel between Philippians and Hebrews.

Another line of exhortation is discovered here by observing a parallel with Phil. iii. 19, where the believer is urged to mark those who so walk that their end is perdition or loss. So here, those who were running the race are told to make a firm track so that others not so strong or fleet of foot would be encouraged to continue.

> "And holiness, without which no man shall see the Lord" (Heb. xii. 14).

This will cause us to run up against the elements of the world and the tradition of men, and will probably provide all the chastisement that we can endure, but without it, we are warned that "no man shall see the Lord".

The two words that should be emphasized in the whole passage under consideration are "endure" and "exercise":

> "If ye endure chastening, God dealeth with you as with sons" (Heb. xii. 7).
> "Nevertheless afterward it yieldeth the peaceable fruit of righteousness unto them that are exercised thereby" (Heb. xii. 11).

We now pass from that which is common to all sons to that which is peculiar to the firstborn, namely, the birthright. It will help us in the approach to this section to see the structure first:

Hebrews xii. 15 - 25.

A | 15. | a | Looking diligently.
b | Lest any man fall from or fail.
B | 16, 17. The birthright bartered (Prototokia).
C | 18-21. Ye are not come. Six "ands". SINAI.
C | 22, 23. But ye are come. Seven "ands". SION.
B | 23, 24. The birthright enjoyed (Prototokos).
A | 25. | a | See.
b | Lest ye refuse.

The section opens with a warning: "Looking diligently lest any man fail of the grace of God". It does not say "fall from the grace of God", but "fail of the grace of God". Hustereo, "to come short", occurs in Heb. iv. 1, and that passage partially explains what we are considering here: "Let us therefore fear, lest, a promise being left us of entering into His rest, any of you should seem to come short of it". The context speaks of Israel's forty years" wandering in the wilderness, and their failure, though redeemed to "go on unto perfection". We are not dealing with sonship, but with birthright; not salvation, but possession; not deliverance from Egypt, but entry into Canaan. The warning is threefold:

(1) Lest any fail (come short) of the grace of God.
(2) Lest any root of bitterness spring up.
(3) Lest there be any fornicator or profane person as Esau.

What is this root of bitterness? The apostle is quoting from Deut. xxix. and a reference to that passage will show his meaning clearly. Moses is addressing the people of Israel before his death, at the close of forty years" wandering in the wilderness, and in verse 18 says:

> "Lest there should be among you man, or woman, or family, or tribe, whose heart turneth away this day from the LORD our God, to go and serve the gods of these nations; lest there should be among you a root that beareth gall and wormwood" (Deut. xxix. 18).

Here is the "root of bitterness", a heart that turns away from God, or, in the language of Heb. iii. 12:

> "Take heed, brethren, lest there be in any of you an evil heart of unbelief, in departing from the living God."

The words of Amos vi. 12 seem to have some reflection upon the "peaceable fruit of righteousness" and the "root of bitterness": "Ye have turned judgment into gall, and the fruit of righteousness into hemlock". The effect of this root of bitterness is trouble and defilement. A reference to John xviii. 28 will show the nature of the defilement—something that was profane, something from which a Jew would shrink.

We have next to learn in what sense Esau was a fornicator, and what bearing it has upon the teaching of this passage. There are two outstanding events in Esau's history that are recorded against him. One is the selling of his birthright for a mess of pottage; the other his marriage with women outside the covenant:

> "And Rebekah said to Isaac, I am weary of my life because of the daughters of Heth: if Jacob take a wife of the daughters of Heth, such as these which are of the daughters of the land, what good shall my life do me?" (Gen. xxvii. 46).

The word "fornicator" is not to be taken literally, but is rather explained by the apostle to refer to "a profane person". Now this word profane (bebelos) is made up of the particle be, denoting privation, and belos, a threshold of a temple; hence one who was debarred from entry into a holy place. In the same way the Latin word profanes means one who stands pro fano—at a distance from a temple; hence too, our English word "fane", a church. Esau had no appreciation of either his birthright or the holy nature of the Covenant of God. He becomes a warning to the Hebrews who were being tempted to cast away the precious and enduring substance of their heavenly birthright for the mess of pottage of present earthly ease.

Verse 17 is a complete explanation of the difficult passage in Heb. vi. There the exhortation is to go on unto perfection. "But", says the writer, "It is impossible for those who were once enlightened . . . . . if they shall fall away, to renew them again unto repentance". So, of Esau it is written: "For ye know how that afterward, when he would have inherited the blessing, he was rejected: for he found no place of repentance, though he sought it carefully with tears". Esau and his example stand out in the closing portion of Hebrews, as the children of Israel in the wilderness stand out in the opening section (chapters iii. and iv.). The warning is for the Hebrews who, like their fathers and like Esau, were in danger of drawing back, turning aside, losing the heavenly for the sake of the earthly. Heb. viii. 7 continues "Then should no place have been sought for the second", showing that the two Covenants are here in view. The apostle now brings before the mind the two mountains, Sinai and Sion, which are explained in Gal. iv. as representing the two Covenants, Sinai standing for "Jerusalem which now is, and is in bondage with her children", and Sion for "Jerusalem which is above is free, which is our mother" (R.V.) (Gal. iv. 24-26).

We have in Heb. xii. 18-21 Moses, the mediator of the old Covenant, and in Heb. xii. 22-24 Jesus, the Mediator of the New Covenant, and it is under the New Covenant and not under the old, that the birthright can be enjoyed.

The figure called Polysyndeton (or "many ands") is employed in the description of both covenants. Let us notice it:

> "For ye are not come unto the mount that might be touched, AND that burned with fire, AND (nor? JP) unto blackness, AND darkness, AND tempest, AND the sound of a trumpet, AND the voice of words . . .".
>
> "But ye are come unto mount Sion, AND unto the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem, AND to myriads of angels, a full assembly, AND to a church of firstborn ones, having been enrolled in heaven, AND to God the Judge of all, AND to the spirits of righteous ones having been perfected, AND to the Mediator of the new covenant—Jesus, AND to the blood of sprinkling that speaketh better things than that of Abel."

It will be seen that a due observation of these "ands" will help us to keep each feature in its place.

The A.V. leads one to read: "To the general assembly and church of the firstborn", as though it were one company. Paneguris, the word translated "general assembly", means an assembly met together for some festal or joyful occasion, and the construction of the passage necessitates the translation: "And to myriads, a festal assembly of angels".

We learn that myriads of angels were associated with Sinai and the giving of the law: "The chariots of God are twenty thousand, even thousands of angels: The Lord is among them, as in Sinai, in the holy place" (Psa. lxviii. 17; see also Deut. xxxiii. 2). If these angels were at mount Sinai, they shall also be at Mount Sion, and there they will be a "festal assembly", for "the marriage of the Lamb" will have come.

This church is the church of the firstborn, a special company, those who did not despise their birthright, nor barter it away for a morsel of meat. This same company is referred to as: "The spirits of just men made perfect", each expression having been used in the context of chapters xi. and xii. In xii. 9 we read of "The Father of spirits"; in chapter xi. "the righteous" are in view (x. 38; xi. 4, 7, 8), and in xi. 40 it is the perfecting: "God having provided some better thing for us, that they without us should not be perfected".

The close association of the "better thing", the "better country" and the "better resurrection" with this perfecting shows that here in Heb. xii. we are taken to that time when this church of the firstborn shall be complete and enter into its inheritance and become the Bride, the Lamb's wife. Here Abraham will set foot in that city for which he looked; Moses will receive that reward unto which he had respect; all who believed, yet died, not having received the promise, will enter into their birthright. The mediator is not Moses, neither is the blood the blood of bulls and goats: "Jesus" is the Mediator of the New Covenant, and this blood of sprinkling speaks better things than that of Abel.

This heavenly Sion is before the apostle right through the epistle. The "so great salvation" of ii. 3 is connected with the "age to come" of which he wrote in ii. 5, and the "glory" unto which the Captain of salvation was leading (ii. 10). The words: "He is not ashamed to call them brethren" (ii. 11), the thought of the Captain being "perfected" through sufferings (ii. 10), find their echo in the word: "God is not ashamed to be called their God: for He hath prepared for them a city" (xi. 16), and the "perfecting" of the spirits of just men in xii. 23.

It was toward this goal that the apostle urged the Hebrew believers to "go unto the goal (perfection)". The weights which they were counseled to lay aside would include those things mentioned in vi. 2, a passage we have already seen in close connection with Esau and his vain seeking for repentance (vi. 4-6; xii. 16, 17).

The section closes with a word of warning, very similar to the warning that precedes chapter xi. In the structure we show it thus:

C | x. 26-31. He that despised Moses' law died without mercy, how much more . . . . .
C | xii. 25. They escaped not who refused Him that spake on earth, much more . . . . .

Here we return to the teaching of chapter ii. In that passage the comparison is between the words spoken by angels and the words spoken by the Lord, and the question is put: "How shall we escape if we neglect so great a salvation?" In the other passage the angels are omitted, and the comparison is made between the seriousness of refusing him who spoke on earth, namely, Moses, the servant, and of refusing the Son Who has since spoken from heaven.

The epistle opens with the fact that God has spoken, and that He has spoken in two ways; once through His servants, and now in His Son. The Hebrews were in danger of minimizing the sin of refusing to hear what the Lord had said. The epistle as it continues leads away from the ministry of angels, the mediatorship of Moses, the captaincy of Joshua, the priesthood of Aaron, and the blood of bulls and goats, and focuses all its light upon the Lord Jesus, Who sums up and outshines them all. He has now spoken from heaven. He is there at the right hand of God. There He ever liveth. There He sits "henceforth expecting".

There are "much mores" of mercy, but Heb. x. 26-31 and xii. 25 contain "much mores" of warning and judgment.

The concluding passage, Heb. xii. 25 - xiii. 25, awaits us. This we hope to consider in our next paper, and our survey of this wonderful epistle then comes to a conclusion.

No.54. Outside the Camp (xii. 25 - xiii. 17).
pp. 41 - 45

The epistle now draws to its conclusion. Much that these Hebrews had prized and valued as permanent had been shattered and was passing away. This element is introduced in the opening chapter. Speaking of the creation, the works of the Lord's hands, it says: "They shall perish; but Thou remainest" (Heb. i. 10, 11). This finds its echo in Heb. xii. 27: "The removing of those things that are shaken, as of things that are made, that those things that are not shaken may remain".

All through the epistle there is the exchange of the passing for the permanent. The law concerning the Aaronic priesthood is disannulled and gives place to Christ, the Priest after the power of an endless life (Heb. vii. 16-18). The Tabernacle made with hands gives place to the true Tabernacle not made with hands, which the Lord pitched and not man (Heb. viii. 1, 2; ix. 24). The old Covenant is not found faultless, and is ready to vanish away, giving place to the New Covenant of which the Lord is the Mediator (Heb. viii. 7-13; x. 16). The sacrifices and offerings of the old system pass away in the presence of that one Sacrifice offered once for all (Heb. x. 1-14). The Hebrews were to learn that the Mosaic law was transient, and that the kingdom that remains and which cannot be moved is found alone under the sway of the true King-Priest of the order of Melchisedec, Jesus Christ, the Son of God.

Flowing from the contemplation of these solemn issues comes a series of practical exhortations. The first is: "Let us have grace, whereby we may serve God acceptably with reverence and godly fear; for our God is a consuming fire" (Heb. xii. 28, 29). The words: "for our God is a consuming fire" are taken from Deut. iv. 24, and come in a context of deepest solemnity. Chapter iv. opens with a warning concerning adding to or diminishing from the Word of God, and then refers to the evil of Baal-Peor. What took place there is described in Numb. xxv. The close relationship between idolatry and immoral practices will explain the sudden reference to marriage etc., in chapter xiii. of Hebrews. In Deut. iv. 11, 12 also is the reference to the mountain that burned with fire and "the voice of the words".

The Hebrews would be warned that the service of God was not something within the authority of man to arrange. God Himself had set aside the visible, external and typical; let them therefore remember that acceptable worship would now be concerned with the heavenly, the true and antitypical. The word "acceptably" is euarestos. It occurs as follows in Chapter xiii.

> "With such sacrifices God is well pleased" (Heb. xiii. 16).
> "Working in you that which is well-pleasing" (Heb. xiii. 21).

These references look back to the example of Enoch, and to the divine comment: "Without faith it is impossible to please Him".

In close and startling proximity to the need for acceptable service and the fact that God is a consuming fire come the words:

> "Let brotherly love continue (remain)" (Heb. xiii. 1).
> "Be not forgetful to entertain strangers" (Heb. xiii. 2).
> "Remember them that are in bonds" (Heb. xiii. 3).
> "Marriage is honourable in all" (Heb. xiii. 4).

When we remember that the glorious doctrine of Ephesians is linked by the apostle with its practical outworking expressed in the relationship of husband and wife, parent and child, master and servant, and that similar warnings concerning immoral acts are included (see Eph. v. and vi.), we are the more prepared to learn that our whole life, with its complete circle of outgoings, is involved in this blessed and glorious service. Carnal ordinances, baptisms, fasts, feasts and ceremonies have given place to hearts sprinkled from an evil conscience, bodies washed with pure water, and heart-service in every sphere of life.

Brotherly love and the entertaining of strangers are a part of acceptable service to God. This is seen by a further reference to xiii. 15, 16: "By Him therefore let us offer the sacrifice of praise to God continually, that is, the fruit of our lips giving thanks to His name". If we stop here, however, we are not rendering acceptable service. Brotherly love and hospitality must be added; therefore the passage continues: "But to do good and to have fellowship, forget not". The words "forget not" are the structural link with Heb. xiii. 1, 2:

> "Be not forgetful" (verse 2).
> "For with SUCH sacrifices God is well pleased" (verse 16).

This close connection between God and the brotherhood in service has been expressed in Heb. x. 22-24:

> "Let us draw near . . . . . Let us hold fast . . . . . Let us consider one another."

While we have no room for humanism, we are also sure that a mere doctrinal exactness is not acceptable with God. The true service embraces the Lord and His people, and is sound both in doctrine and practice. So the third reference to "acceptable" stresses "doing":

> "Now the God of peace (literally "of the peace", something already mentioned and understood, Heb. vii. 2; xii. 11, 14), that brought again from the dead our Lord Jesus, that great Shepherd of the sheep, through the blood of the everlasting (age-abiding) covenant, make you perfect in every good work to do His will, working (doing) in you that which is well-pleasing in His sight, through Jesus Christ" (Heb. xiii. 20, 21).

Philippians, the parallel epistle in the dispensation of the Mystery, has the same emphasis:

> "It is God which worketh in you both to will and to do."
> "Those things, which ye have both learned, and received, and heard, and seen in me, DO: and the God of peace shall be with you" (Phil. ii. 13; iv. 9).

Hospitality (philoxenia), "the entertaining of strangers", is urged upon the believer more than once in the epistles. Rom. xii. 10 and 13 unite "brotherly love" with "hospitality" as does Heb. xiii. 1, 2. One of the qualifications of the bishop was that he should be "given to hospitality" (I Tim. iii. 2; Titus i. 8), and I Pet. iv. 9 says: "Use hospitality one to another without grudging", for an element of unwillingness blights service to the Lord. The onus of hospitality in our present mode of life often falls upon the woman. Here is an act of acceptable service which can be truly rendered to God as the prayer, praise and pulpit utterance of her husband. Indeed, Heb. xiii. 15, 16 shows that worship in the assembly may be vitiated by the lack of consideration for others afterwards. The times for true acceptable service are not only Sundays at 11a.m. and 6.30p.m., but they may have as much to do with clean sheets as with robes of righteousness, and in dispensing the bread that perisheth as with the Word of truth.

We have had brotherly love and love of strangers (philadelphia and philoxenia). We are now reminded of love that goes out to those who, though not present with us, need our sympathy: "Remember them which are bound" (Heb. xiii. 3). God is ever "mindful"

(same word) of man "and visited him" (Heb. ii. 6). We are neither to forget hospitality nor to omit sympathy, for the full quotation of verse 3 is much beyond mere remembrance.

> "Remember them which are in bonds (bound), AS BOUND WITH THEM, and them which suffer adversity, AS BEING YOURSELVES ALSO IN THE BODY."

This sympathy has been spoken of earlier: "becoming partakers with them that were so used. For ye had compassion on them that were in bonds" (Heb. x. 33, 34 R.V.). The intimate relationship between believers has been expressed in I Cor. xii. 13, 14, 26: "Whether one member suffer, all the members suffer with it". So sympathy goes out to those in bonds, as bound with them, and to those in adversity, as being equally in the body. There is much to be said for the interpretation that makes the passage equivalent to, "For you also are still in the flesh, and liable at any moment to similar adversity".

The statement in verse 4 that marriage is honourable, and its most intimate relationships undefiled, seems to have been necessitated by the presence of those who, like the Essenes, taught that marriage should be shunned. The word "undefiled" in this particular is noteworthy, for it occurs in but one other place in Hebrews, namely vii. 26, where it speaks of our "undefiled" High Priest. This is a sufficient answer to those who would impose celibacy upon God's ministers, and is a word in season for us on whom the night of I Tim. iv. 1-3 is fast descending. The danger is all the other way. The decrying of marriage cannot but lead many into the paths of Baal-Peor, the doctrine of Balaam and the teaching of that woman Jezebel. George Bernard Shaw writes in John O'London's Weekly under the heading The Right to Motherhood:

> "No political constitution will ever succeed unless it includes the recognition of an absolute right to sexual experience and is untainted by the Pauline or romantic view of such experience as simple in itself . . . . . legalizing polygamy, because there are more adult women in the country than men."

Over against this insidious propaganda that fills the columns of certain periodicals, we must place with the utmost resolution the words of Holy Scripture, remembering that Heb. xiii. 4 is not "Pauline", but "given by inspiration of God". And however the evils that are advocated may be glossed under the titles "free love", "liberty of the sexes" etc., it still stands written: "Whoremongers and adulterers God will judge". We are still in sight of the heavenly city, the new Jerusalem, and there, we have already seen, is "God, the Judge of all". And of that city it is written:

> "The fearful, and unbelieving, and the abominable, and murderers, and whoremongers, and sorcerers, and idolators, and all liars, shall have their part in the lake which burneth with fire and brimstone: which is the second death . . . . . And there shall in no wise enter into it anything that defileth . . . . . but they which are written in the Lamb's book of life" (Rev. xxi. 8, 27).
>
> "The church of the firstborn, whose names are written in heaven" (Heb. xii. 23).
>
> "Our God is a consuming fire" (Heb. xii. 29).

For certain purposes we speak of some sins as social sins. Some acts are crimes, some are civil offences, but for the believer (as in the case of David) murder and adultery become sins against heaven and against God (Psa. li. 4). This but anticipates the kingdom of God on earth, when God's will shall then be law, as it is in heaven.

We drew attention earlier to Deut. iv. with its two-fold sin, and we have seen that marriage and its travesty are brought before us in Hebrews chapter xiii. Where is idolatry? Were the Hebrews warned against that sin? And were they in any real danger of falling into it? The answer is that idolatry is mentioned, and the Hebrews were in danger of committing it.

> "Let your conversation be without covetousness; and be content with such things as ye have" (Heb. xiii. 5).

"Without covetousness" is aphilarguros = "not loving silver". We have, therefore, philadelphia, philoxenia, and philarguros in sequence, with true married love implied in verse 4. True service turns on love, and love out of place or spent on the wrong object is at the bottom of all evil. "The love of money (philarguria) is a root of all evil" (I Tim. vi. 10).

"Men shall be lovers of their own selves	philautoi.
Covetous	philarguroi.
Haters of good men	aphilagathoi.
Lovers of pleasures	philedonoi.
Rather than lovers of God	philotheoi" (II Tim. iii. 2-4).

This catalogue of the evils that shall characterize the "last days" and the "perilous times" begins and ends with false love, and has at its centre lack of love for the good.

Now this covetousness under the form of pleonexia ("the wish to have more") is condemned as "idolatry" (Eph. v. 5; Col. iii. 5). The corrective for "the wish to have more" and for "covetousness" and "the love of money" is the conscious presence of the Lord:

> "Be content with such things as ye have: for He hath said, I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee. So that we may boldly say, The Lord is my helper, and I will not fear what man shall do unto me" (Heb. xiii. 5, 6).

At the risk of wearying the reader with the truth that "Philippians is parallel with Hebrews", we draw attention once more to the teaching of Phil. iv.:

> "Let your moderation be known unto all men. The Lord is at hand (near) . . . . . I have learned, in whatsoever state I am, to be content . . . . . Ye have well done, that ye did communicate with my affliction" (Phil. iv. 5, 11, 14).

Covetousness and contentment cannot thrive together. Phil. ii. 13, 14 makes the inworking of God parallel with Heb. xiii. 21, and absence of murmuring parallel with the contentment of verse 5.

Murmuring, fornication and idolatry are brought together in I Cor. x. 7-10, which, together with tempting the Lord in the wilderness, is similar teaching to chaps. iii. & iv.

of Hebrews and also to the theme of the book. Further, I Cor. ix. 24; x. 1-14; Phil. iii., and Hebrews as a whole, all dealing with running for a prize, being perfected, becoming a "castaway" or disqualified by drawing back to "perdition" or "destruction", and the citizenship, the heavenly city, and inter-related themes, are a stronger witness to the peculiar teaching and purpose of these epistles than any criticism can overthrow.

We give the structure of the section so that what has been seen, and what is yet to be studied, may be kept in their right relationship:

Hebrews xii. 25 - xiii. 21.

A | xii. 25 - xiii. 4. | a | Things that remain.
b | Acceptable service (euarestos).
c | Forget not hospitality (epilanthanomai).
B | xiii. 5-8. | d | Conversation (tropos, manner of life).
e | Remember them that have the rule over you.
C | 9-13. | f | Established with grace, not meats.
g | His own blood.
h | Bearing His reproach.
A | 14-16. | a | No remaining city.
c | Forget not to have fellowship (epilanthanomai).
b | Acceptable sacrifice (euaresteo).
B | 17-19. | e | Obey them that have the rule over you.
d | Live honestly (anastrepho).
C | 20, 21. | g | Through the blood of the aionian covenant.
f | Perfect you.
h | Doing that which is well pleasing (euarestos).

No.55. Outside the Camp, contd. (xii. 25 - xiii. 17).
pp. 61 - 65

There are three passages of the O.T. in which appears the promise quoted in Heb. xiii. 5: "I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee". The first is Deut. xxxi. 6; the second, Josh. i. 5; the third I Chron. xxviii. 20. In the first Moses is addressing the children of Israel, saying:

> "The Lord thy God, He will go over before thee, and He will destroy these nations from before thee, and thou shalt possess them; and Joshua, he shall go over before thee, as the Lord hath said . . . . . Be strong and of a good courage, fear not, nor be afraid of them; for the Lord thy God, He it is that doth go with thee; He will not fail thee, nor forsake thee" (Deut. xxxi. 3-6).

This is exactly in line with the theme of Hebrews, the pressing on into the land of promise, and triumph over opposing forces, encouraged by the presence of the Lord (Joshua here is a type of Christ, the true Captain of salvation).

The third passage deals with the building of the Temple by Solomon:

> "And David said to Solomon his son, Be strong and of good courage, and do it: fear not, nor be dismayed: for the LORD God, even my God, will be with thee; He will not fail thee, nor forsake thee, until thou hast finished all the work for the service of the house of the LORD" (I Chron. xxviii. 20).

This typifies the house built by Christ, "the Son", as contrasted with that in which Moses was a servant (Heb. iii. 5, 6).

The reader may remember the line of the hymn: "I'll never, no never, no never, forsake". This iteration and reiteration of negatives may be employed merely to meet the demands of metre and rhythm, but even so, it is but an echo of the passage, "I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee", which contains in the original, no less than five negatives. Literally rendered it reads:

> "No. I will not leave thee; nor yet not by no means will I forsake thee."

This is the ground of contentment, the antidote for covetousness, the secret of perseverance.

The great Leader (archegos, ii. 10; and xii. 2), the true Joshua, appointed others as subordinates, who also are called "leaders", for the words "them which have the rule over you" are literally "your leaders", in both verses 7 and 17 of Chapter xiii. Let us observe what is said of the leaders:

> "Remember them which are your leaders, who have spoken unto you the Word of God; whose faith follow, considering the end of their conversation, Jesus Christ the same yesterday, and today, and unto the ages" (literally).

> "Obey them that have the rule over you (are your leaders), and submit yourselves: for they watch for your souls, as they that must give account, that they may do it with joy, and not with grief: for that is unprofitable for you."

Some very important characteristics of the true leader are given here:

(1) They speak the Word of God.
(2) Their faith is such that it is worth imitating.
(3) The issue of their conversation is Christ.
(4) They watch on behalf of your souls.
(5) They will have to render an account.

The reference to "imitating" makes one think of Phil. iii. 17-19: "Be joint-imitators of me, and mark those who walk . . . . . whose end is perdition".

A great variety of opinion has been expressed by writers on the meaning of the word "end" in Heb. xiii. 7. Some take it to refer to the martyrdom or death of these leaders. The word is ekbasis, and occurs in but one other place in the N.T., namely, I Cor. x. 13, where the A.V. translates it "a way to escape". Has it ever struck the reader that it is somewhat strange to read of "a way of escape" being provided, "that ye may be able to bear it"? If we escape the temptation, how do we bear it? A more accurate rendering and one which seems to give the apostle's meaning is, "God . . . . . will not suffer you to be tempted above that ye are able, but will with the temptation also make the issue, that ye may be able to bear it".

This verse in I Cor. x. is in a context exactly parallel with Heb. iii. and iv. Just as the trial of the Corinthians was bearable because they knew that God held the issues in His hand, because the trials had an object and a purpose of which they had been made aware, so in Heb. xiii. 7 we hear once again the words of xii. 11, "nevertheless afterward".

In chapter xiii. 17 the Hebrew believers are exhorted to obey their leaders. Hegeomai, the word for a leader, means to think or esteem, then to lead and to rule. We read in Acts xv. 22 that Judas and Silas were "chief" men among the brethren. In Acts xiv. 12 Paul was reckoned the "chief" speaker. The apostle enjoined a ready obedience and submission to any who were Scripturally qualified to lead, and this would be readily yielded by a believer to any who manifested the mark of the true pastor. "They watch for your souls, as they that must give account". The leader who answers to this description has no sinecure. He has a position of utmost responsibility and is accountable to the Lord. He must continually act in the light of this: "that they may do it with joy, and not with grief: for that is unprofitable for you".

Some connect the words, "that they may do it", with the rendering of an account at the judgment seat of Christ. Others connect the words with the present watching. Possibly the double thought is intended, for whatever is true here has its counterpart when the account is given: "Look to yourselves, that ye destroy not the things which ye have wrought, but that ye receive a full reward" (II John 8, R.V. margin). This reference in II John 8 is followed by a warning concerning the doctrine of Christ.

In Heb. xiii. 8, immediately following the reference to the leaders, and immediately before the warning not to be carried away with divers and strange doctrines, comes the glorious passage "Jesus Christ the same yesterday, and today, and unto the ages". The same truth lies at the threshold of the epistle: "They shall be changed, but Thou art the same" (Heb. i. 11, 12). Through all the changes in this creation, both past and future, the Lord remains unchanged; throughout all changes in the dealings of God with men, the decaying and waning of the old Covenant, as well as of the old creation, there is One Who remains the same. This is the bedrock of our faith. This was the issue of the manner of life of the leaders whose faith was to be followed. It was the corrective against the divers and strange doctrines which they were to avoid.

These words "yesterday and today and for the ages" are parallel with the titles "Alpha and Omega", or "Which was and which is, and which is to come". In the "yesterday" we know that Abraham saw the day of Christ; that Moses esteemed the reproach of Christ greater riches than the treasures of Egypt; in the "today" He is still the same. He is still the one great counter-attraction that more than compensates for all reproach or loss, and this will remain unalterably true throughout the ages.

The divers and strange doctrines that were likely to "carry these believers about" as by adverse currents, were evidently closely connected with "meats", and these can but refer to all those things that had been left behind:

> "Which was a figure for the time then present, in which were offered both gifts and sacrifices, that could not make him that did the service perfect, as pertaining to the conscience; which stood only in meats and drinks, and divers washings (baptisms), and carnal ordinances, imposed on them until the time of reformation" (Heb. ix. 9, 10).

The glorious standing given to the believer in Christ by the gospel has no room for the shadowy sanctity pertaining to "meats":

> "But meat commendeth us not to God: for neither, if we eat, are we the better; neither, if we eat not, are we the worse" (I Cor. viii. 8).

These things of the past are on the same level as circumcision:

> "Circumcision is nothing, and uncircumcision is nothing, but the keeping of the commandments of God" (I Cor. vii. 19).
>
> "For the kingdom of God is not meat and drink; but righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost. For he that in these things serveth Christ is acceptable to God, and approved of men" (Rom. xiv. 17, 18).

We have seen before that the thought of "acceptable service" runs through the closing chapter of Hebrews, and this passage from Romans follows the same theme.

To us at the present time, this scruple regarding "meats" (food) seems to have no parallel. We are not concerned about food having been offered to idols, neither are we under any law that divides foods into clean and unclean. At the same time it will not take us long to discover that a great deal passes as "holiness" and "privilege", which rests not upon Christ, but upon accessories that have their basis in the flesh. Let us have none of them. All such have been buried in the tomb, and in the new creation they cannot exist:

> "We have an altar, whereof they have no right to eat which serve the tabernacle. For the bodies of those beasts, whose blood is brought into the sanctuary by the high priest for sin, are burned without the camp. Wherefore Jesus also, that He might sanctify the people with His own blood, suffered without the gate. Let us go forth therefore unto Him without the camp, bearing His reproach. For here have we no continuing city, but we seek one to come" (Heb. xiii. 10-14).

We may be assisted in the understanding of this passage by the following subdivision:

A | Grace not meats. We have an altar.
B | Bodies . . . . . blood . . . . . without the camp.
A | Jesus, that He might sanctify.
B | His own blood, suffered without the gate.
A | Let us go forth unto Him.
B | Without the camp.
A | His reproach bearing.
B | We have no continuing city.

We have here two alternating themes, one dealing with sanctification, the other pointing outside the camp or gate. Sanctification is dealt with as something beyond the ceremonial and typical separation involved in "meats": it has to do with "grace", and an altar totally distinct from Israel after the flesh. Some have taught that the words, "we have an altar", refer to the Lord's Supper, a doctrine so foreign to the context that there is no need to waste space in confuting it. Others teach that our altar is the cross. The cross throughout the New Testament is spoken of as a symbol of shame, and in Gal. iii. 13 the death on the tree is a death under the curse of the law. Matt. xxiii. 19 declares that the altar is greater than the gift upon it, and that the altar sanctifies the gift. We never read that the cross was greater than the glorious offering of Christ, neither is there the remotest suggestion that the cross sanctified the sacrifice of Christ. Full well we know the reverse is the case.

When we read the Old Testament directions concerning the altar and its treatment, we are not left in doubt as to the altar that "we have". The altar built of stone had to be left untouched by the tool of man, for that would pollute it (Exod. xx. 25). The altar was cleansed, atoned for, anointed and sanctified, and it was most holy (Exod. xxix. 36, 37). There is no difficulty to faith in believing that the Lord, in the offering of that one Sacrifice, became both the redeeming Passover Lamb, the whole Burnt Offering for acceptance, and the Sin Offering under the curse, and, not only so, but that He, at once the Sacrifice and Sin Bearer, was at the same time High Priest, Altar and Mercy Seat, combining the Sin Offering, burnt to ashes without the camp, with the blood of atonement taken within the veil.

The apostle here in Heb. xiii. 11, refers to the offering on the Day of Atonement, which also figures in Heb. ix., and he quotes Lev. xvi. 27. The actual law upon which he builds his argument is expressed in Lev. vi. 30. "And no sin offering, whereof any of the blood is brought into the tabernacle of the congregation to reconcile withal in the holy place, shall be eaten: it shall be burnt in the fire".

The position "without the camp" and "without the gate" puts an end to Judaism and the old Covenant. Those who have "boldness to enter into the holiest by the blood of Jesus" (Heb. x. 19), will also have grace given to go to Him without the camp, leaving behind the types and shadows that could never bring to maturity nor touch the conscience.

There is a word of warning here that it may not be unprofitable to give and to heed. Heb. xiii. 13 does not say: "Let us go forth without the camp". There are many who, by temperament, are "separatists". Three clauses need to be added to the above quotation to make it true:

(1) The addition of "therefore".
(2) The placing of "unto Him" before "without the camp".
(3) The closing phrase, "bearing His reproach".

"Therefore." Our removal from "the camp" or organized and carnal religion must be based upon the work of Christ, and not upon our own inclinations. Further, we go out "unto Him"; if He is rejected and outside the camp, then we go there too; but in itself, the position of being "outside" has no attractions for us. We go there because it is "unto Him". Then, the added clause, "bearing His reproach", teaches us that we are not dealing with words, but realities, and Heb. xi. 24-27 reveals the seriousness of the step. The experiences of Heb. x. 32-35 are the experiences of His "reproach", and are not to be entered upon lightly.

The statement in verse 14: "For here we have no continuing city, but we seek one to come" turns us back to xi. 8-16, where Abraham and his seed, though heirs of God, voluntarily became strangers and pilgrims on the earth, declaring plainly by their withdrawal outside the camp "that they seek a country, wherefore God hath prepared for them a city". This is true separation and sanctity, and is set over against the "meats and drinks, and divers baptisms, and carnal ordinances" that obtained during the time of type and shadow. "Christ being come" (Heb. ix. 11) has made the difference. Christ has suffered without the gate and has ascended to the right hand of God. These facts give us our two-fold position: "Let us draw near!" "Let us go forth!" Hebrews recognizes no middle course.

"Outside the camp" and "within the veil" find their equivalent in the prison epistles where we are seated together in the heavenlies. We find our citizenship in heaven, counting all things but loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ, having no room for the elements of the world, or for its attempts at sanctity. We, too, shall find that, as we set our minds on things above where Christ sitteth at the right hand of God, there will be a corresponding mortifying of the members that are on the earth.

No.56. The Great Shepherd (xiii. 18 - 25).
pp. 81 - 84

We now consider the closing portion of this wonderful epistle: "Pray for us; for we trust we have a good conscience, in all things willing to live honestly. But I beseech you the rather to do this, that I may be restored to you the sooner". Paul continually expressed a desire for the prayers of the saints on his behalf. The following may be taken as samples:

> "Ye also helping together by prayer" (II Cor. i. 11).
> "Praying . . . . . for all saints; and for me" (Eph. vi. 18, 19).
> "Finally, brethren, pray for us" (II Thess. iii. 1).

His reference to a "good conscience" is also quite characteristic, and especially when he has been touching upon the passing of the faith of his fathers:

> "Men and brethren, I have lived in all good conscience before God until this day" (Acts xxiii. 1).
> "But this I confess unto thee, that after the way which they call heresy, so worship I the God of my fathers . . . . . I exercise myself, to have always a conscience void of offence toward God, and toward men" (Acts xxiv. 14-16).

Paul has much to say concerning the conscience, but this is better dealt with as a separate subject.

His request is that these Hebrews should pray for him that he might be restored the sooner, and the reference to Timothy being "set at liberty", or "dismissed", show that those to whom the epistle was written knew who the writer was and the circumstances in which he was then placed. We do not, and it is evident that such knowledge is unnecessary for the understanding of the epistle.

The writer of the epistle calls it a "word of exhortation" and "a letter in a few words". Whether the word apoluo should be interpreted as "set at liberty", as from prison, or "dismissed" in the sense of being sent on a journey, we cannot decide. The salutation from those "of Italy" (verse 24) would express the desire for unity between those who were Jews by nature and those who were Gentiles, but whether the writer was actually in Italy at the time of writing cannot be decided from these words.

We now give our attention, in closing, to the prayer of the apostle for the Hebrews to whom he had written this word of exhortation:

> "Now the God of peace, that brought again from the dead our Lord Jesus, that great Shepherd of the sheep, through the blood of the aionian covenant, make you perfect in every good work to do His will, working in you that which is well-pleasing in His sight, through Jesus Christ; to Whom be glory for ever and ever (unto the ages of the ages). Amen" (Heb. xiii. 20, 21).

The apostle often speaks of the God of peace toward the close of an epistle:

> "Now the God of peace be with you all. Amen" (Rom. xv. 33).
> "And the God of peace shall bruise Satan under your feet shortly" (Rom. xvi. 20).
> "Be perfect, be of good comfort, be of one mind, live in peace: and the God of love and peace shall be with you" (II Cor. xiii. 11).
> "Those things, which ye have both learned, and received, and heard, and seen in me, do: and the God of peace shall be with you" (Phil. iv. 9).
> "And the very God of peace sanctify you wholly" (I Thess. v. 23)
> "Now the Lord of peace Himself give you peace always by all means" (II Thess. iii. 16).

It was the lot of the apostle Paul continually to stir up strife. He likens his whole life's ministry to a conflict, yet he ever desired, and hoped for peace.

The emphasis here in Heb. xiii. 20 is upon the resurrection, "that brought again from the dead our Lord Jesus". This is the only place in the epistle where the resurrection of Christ is specifically mentioned. In Romans the resurrection is prominent, and this is so in I and II Corinthians, Ephesians and Colossians, but in Hebrews the emphasis is upon the ascension; the seated Priest Who has passed through the heavens to the right hand of God. That there should be no occasion to say that the epistle to the Hebrews takes no cognizance of the resurrection however, this passage stands written. That resurrection is acknowledged and essential to the doctrine of the epistle, a reference to Heb. vii. 16, 23, 24 and 28 will show, and its presence in the great examples of faith (xi. 19, 22 and 35) confirms its place in the scheme of the epistle.

Christ is here called "that great Shepherd of the sheep". This, it is suggested, is an allusion to Moses: "Then He remembered the days of old, Moses, and his people, saying, Where is He that brought them up out of the sea with the shepherd of his flock?" (Isa. lxiii. 11). Moses was the shepherd of the sheep, Christ the great Shepherd of the sheep. Moses was brought up out of the sea, Christ was brought up again from the dead.

As the Shepherd, Christ is presented to us in a three-fold capacity in the New Testament. As the good Shepherd He gives His life for the sheep (John x. 11). (The word "life" being strictly "soul" has reference to the shedding of blood). As the chief Shepherd He is yet to appear and give a crown of glory to the faithful under-shepherds left in charge of the flock of God (I Pet. v. 2-4). These three titles correspond with the three "appearings" of Heb. ix. 23-28, the order of the first two being changed.

The word "great" of Heb. xiii. 20 may read with the clause, "through the blood of the aionian Covenant", i.e., He was great through the blood etc., or it may indicate that Christ, as the great Shepherd, was raised from the dead because the blood of the Covenant had been shed, and all things pertaining to sin and salvation had been dealt with.

"Make you perfect" (katartizo) has in it the idea of adjusting to new circumstances. For example, it is used for "mending" nets (Matt. iv. 21). It is rendered, "perfectly joined together", in connection with "divisions", in I Cor. i. 10. Gal. vi. 1 renders it "restore" where a fall or rupture had occurred. Katartismos is the word used in Eph. iv. 12 to explain the work of the new ministry given after the great change of Acts xxviii. This is the intention in Heb. xi. 3, where the "ages were adjusted", and in Heb. x. 5, "the body prepared" for the Lord, when the time came for the setting aside of sacrifices and offerings. To offer acceptable service these Hebrew believers were under the necessity of being "fitted", "mended", "restored", or "adjusted" to the new dispensation and to the terms of the New Covenant. This is also true of ourselves. If we are members of the One Body, blessed under the terms of the Mystery, we must be adjusted or fitted to our new calling before we shall be acceptable. Hence the prayers of Eph. i. and Col. i. with this in view. Hence, also, the special ministry of Eph. iv.

This acceptable service is summed up in the words of Heb. xiii. 21, "to do His will", and this is true for every dispensation and phase of the divine plan. It is true of the kingdom of heaven (Matt. vi. 10), as well as of the Mystery (Eph. i. 9). It is the goal of all prayer (Col. i. 9; iv. 12). The will of God comprises the whole work for which Christ came, lived and died (Heb. x. 7, 9, 10). The will of God sums up all service (Heb. x. 36; xiii. 21).

All is "through Jesus Christ, to Whom be glory unto the ages of the ages, Amen". Here is the purging of the conscience from dead works in order that service to the living God may begin (Heb. ix. 14). This alone makes service acceptable. Throughout the epistle there has been one movement, away from all else to Christ, and it will refresh us to go over the epistle with this in mind before we finish.

(1) SPEAKING OF THE WORD HE SAITH:

"God, Who at sundry times . . . . . spake in time past . . . . . by the prophets, hath in these last days spoken unto us in Son" (Heb. i. 1, 2).

(2) SPEAKING OF ANGELS HE SAITH:

"Unto which of the angels said He at any time, Thou art My Son, this day have I begotten Thee?" (Heb. i. 5).

"Of the angels He saith, Who maketh His angels spirits . . . . . But unto the Son He saith, Thy throne, O God, is for ever and ever" (Heb. i. 7, 8).

(3) SPEAKING OF CREATION HE SAITH:

"They shall perish; but Thou remainest . . . . . They shall be changed: but Thou art the same" (Heb. i. 11, 12).

(4) SPEAKING OF ADAM HE SAITH:

"But now we see not yet all things put under him. But we see Jesus . . . . . crowned with glory and honour" (Heb. ii. 8, 9).

(5) SPEAKING OF MOSES HE SAITH:

"Moses verily was faithful . . . . . as a servant . . . . . But Christ as a Son over His own house" (Heb. iii. 5, 6).

(6) SPEAKING OF JOSHUA HE SAITH:

"For if Jesus (Joshua) had given them rest, then would He not afterward have spoken of another day" (Heb. iv. 8).

(7) SPEAKING OF THE LEVITICAL PRIESTHOOD HE SAITH:

"They truly were many priests, because they were not suffered to continue by reason of death: but this Man, because He continueth ever, hath an unchangeable priesthood" (Heb. vii. 23, 24).

(8) SPEAKING OF THE HIGH PRIEST "S WORK HE SAITH:

"Into the second (tabernacle) went the high priest alone once every year, not without blood, which he offered for himself, and for the errors of the people."

"But Christ being come an High Priest of good things to come, by a greater and more perfect tabernacle, not made with hands, that is to say, not of this building; neither by the blood of goats and calves, but by His own blood He entered in once into the holy place, having obtained (found) aionian redemption for us" (Heb. ix. 7-12).

(9) SPEAKING OF THE SACRIFICES HE SAITH:

"Sacrifice and offering thou wouldest not, but a body hast Thou prepared Me . . . . . we are sanctified through (by) the offering of the body of Jesus Christ once for all" (Heb. x. 5-10).

(10) SPEAKING OF FAITH HE SAITH:

"By faith Abel, Enoch, Noah", etc.

"Looking off unto Jesus the Captain and Perfecter of faith" (Heb. xi. and xii.).

(11) SPEAKING OF THE MEDIATOR HE SAITH:

Israel "entreated that the Word should not be spoken to them any more (through Moses the mediator)."

"But ye are come . . . . . to Jesus the Mediator of the new covenant" (Heb. xii. 19-24).

(12) SPEAKING OF THE LEADERS HE SAITH:

"Remember your leaders. Obey your leaders."

"The Lord Jesus that great Shepherd of the sheep" (Heb. xiii. 7-21).

Shadow gives place to substance, the transient to the abiding, the old to the new, and throughout, CHRIST IS ALL.

Throughout this series we have given structures in fairly full detail. We now repeat, in barest outline, the structure of the epistle as a whole, the details of which can be pieced together by the reader from the chapters dealing with the passages themselves:

HEBREWS AS A WHOLE

A	i. & ii. THE WORD SPOKEN.	Thou remainest. Thou art the same. How escape, if neglect? Bring in again the First Begotten.
B	iii. - vi. ON TO PERFECTION.	Let us come boldly. Example of unbelief. Perfect v. babes. No renewal unto repentance. Senses exercised. Crucify afresh the Son.
C	vii. - x.18. PERFECTION WHERE FOUND	But this Man. No perfection in priesthood No perfection in law. No perfection in ordinances No perfection in sacrifices But this Man.
B	x. 19 - xii. 25-. BACK TO PERDITION	Let us draw near. Examples of faith. Sons v. firstborn. Found no place for repentance. Discipline exercised. Trod underfoot the Son.
A	xii. -25 - xiii. HIM THAT SPEAKETH.	Things that remain. Jesus Christ the same. Not escape if refuse. Brought again from the dead.

"The House of Jacob shall Possess their Possessions"

No.8. Peace as a result of Righteousness, and its realization. pp. 89, 90

We have considered the meaning of the word 'possess' and seen the symbolism intended in the 'treading with the sole of the foot'. Let us now take a survey of our blessings, and see how far we have 'possessed' them. Before leaving the picturesque background of O.T. story and of the Hebrew language for the more precise doctrinal language of the N.T. and the Greek, we may profit by pondering one or two passages which illustrate or demand the application of the principle we are examining.

In Isa. xxxii. we read:

> "And My people shall dwell in a peaceable habitation, and in sure dwellings, and in quiet resting places" (Isa. xxxii. 18).

What a delightful prospect these words bring before the mind, especially today when we see the awful results of unrest all around us. The dwelling here contemplated is not the temporary and transitory life in tent or caravan that is indicated by shaken, it is rather that dwelling, which is indicated by the Hebrew yashab, which means primarily 'to sit'.

> "They shall not build, and another inhabit (yashab) . . . . . Mine elect shall long enjoy the work of their hands" (Isa. lxv. 22).

In one form of the verb, yashab is translated 'inhabitant' 25 times in Isaiah alone.

These 'habitations' are not only peaceable, they are 'sure'. The word thus translated comes from batach which means 'to confide', 'to have confidence'. Batach is translated 'trust' more frequently than by any other word, and we give the following references in Isaiah as examples (Isa. xxvi. 4-7; xxvi. 3, 4; xii. 2; l. 10). Betach the substantive occurs in three passages in Isaiah:

> "The needy shall lie down in safety" (xiv. 30).
> "Quietness and assurance for ever" (xxxii. 17).
> "Thou that . . . . . dwellest carelessly" (xlvii. 8).

In the third place, these peaceable dwellings are called "Quiet resting places". The word here translated 'resting place' is menuchah, and is a word full of meaning.

It is the word used in Numb. x. 33 where we read how the Ark of the covenant went before Israel in the 'three days' journey (suggestive of resurrection) "to search out a resting place for them". It was the word used by Naomi in her advice to Ruth to return to Moab, marry and find a home (Ruth i. 9). It provides us with the "still" waters of Psa. xxiii. (margin waters of quietness). Such are some of the blessed attributes of this 'peaceable dwelling'. The reader may, however, be moved to ask how all this, good as it may be, finds a place in a series confessedly devoted to the idea of 'possessing our possessions'. A glance at Isa. xxxii. 17 will show that what we have been considering in verse 18 is the 'possessing' of possessions which are there described.

> "And the work of righteousness shall be peace; and the effect of righteousness, quietness and assurance for ever" (Isa. xxxii. 17).

Peace, and all its association, is the outcome of righteousness. Without a righteous basis there can be no true peace; there will be a compromise at the best which will break at the smallest strain. This is universally true; as true for the nations today as for Israel of old, and true for the Church for all time. The N.T. speaks of "The peaceable fruit of righteousness" (Heb. xii. 11).

> "Therefore being justified by faith, we have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ" (Rom. v. 1).

With Isa. xxxii. 17, 18 before us, we might well ask ourselves how far we have 'taken possession' of this gift of grace. Peace, assurance, sure dwelling places, quiet resting places, all are ours, for Christ is our righteousness, and "the work of righteousness shall be peace, and the effect of righteousness, quietness and assurance for ever". Do we, in particular, possess our possessions? Is our abiding place characterized by quietness and assurance? Has the work and the effect of righteousness been realized in our own experiences?

The Interpretation of the Scriptures.

No.4. The Principle of Induction.
pp. 6 - 10

Continuing our investigation into this most important subject, and putting into practice the important principle of settling the interpretation of a passage first, we should attempt to discover its real and basic meaning, and not attribute one to it that appeals to us. If we do this we are only reading our own ideas, or those of other people into it, and this is always destructive of truth. Luther wrote: "The best teacher is the one who does not bring his meaning into Scripture, but brings it out of Scripture". Wise words indeed! Happy is the person who can approach the Bible relatively free from personal prejudices, bias and pre-conceived notions. Too frequently God's Word is marred by traditional ideas, or is cited merely to support some peculiar concept that appeals to the person concerned or the denomination to which he or she belongs.

The Lord Jesus warned the religious leaders of His day in Mark vii. 13 that they made "the Word of God of none effect through their tradition". They emptied it of its real meaning so that they could keep their own ideas (vii. 9), and there is scarcely anything more spiritually blinding than human tradition. The task of the interpreter is to discover the true meaning of Holy Scripture, not to verify his prejudices or to try to bolster up the peculiar tenets of the sect to which he belongs. God's Word must not be used as a peg on which to hang religious opinions.

The Preference for the Clearest Interpretation.

Sometimes the searcher for truth is confronted with two or possibly more probable interpretations as far as grammatical rules permit. The rule then is to choose the clear rather than the obscure and the one that fits in best with the context and the general teaching of Scripture. Obscure passages must give right of way to clear passages. We can be thankful that everything essential to salvation and man's basic needs is clearly revealed in the Word of God. Essential truth is not tucked away among incidental remarks, nor is it contained in passages whose meanings are not yet understood. Furthermore, obscure and difficult portions of Scripture should not be used as a sole basis for doctrine. This betrays weakness. For instance, our conception of future punishment should not be based on the book of Revelation alone. This part of Scripture is universally admitted to be difficult of interpretation. When this sort of thing is done it nearly always is an indication that the Scripture is being used to support preconceived ideas and is therefore suspect.

Scripture interprets Scripture.

The next guiding principle for us to observe is that Scripture interprets Scripture. The apostle Paul expresses it in this way:

". . . . we speak, not in the words which man's wisdom teacheth, but which the Holy Ghost teacheth; comparing spiritual things with spiritual" (I Cor. ii. 13).

The spiritual things we are to compare are the words of the Holy Scriptures, the words of God the Holy Spirit. We can only do this effectively by using a good concordance like Young's Analytical Concordance. This enables us to dig into the treasury of God's Word with all its riches. If we have difficulty in understanding a Biblical word, we should open the concordance and note its occurrences, or the way God has used it and, more often than not, the problem will be solved in another passage. Any interpretation that is forced to go entirely outside the Bible should be suspect. If we keep within the covers of God's Book and let Scripture interpret Scripture we are safe. This does not mean that we shall never use Bible dictionaries or commentaries, or read books of exposition, but these must never be exalted in importance to the Scriptures themselves.

The Principle of Grammatical Interpretation.

Words are the bricks, as it were, of thought, and a sentence is a unit of thought. The many shades of thought can only be expressed in sentences. Grammar states the principles that arrange the formation of words into sentences that clearly express meaning. Some of us may look back to our school days with distaste when we think of lessons in grammar, but these need not be dry and uninteresting. It all depends on the way the subject is taught. God has conveyed His truth in words and sentences, and the more we know of these and their construction, the better we shall understand the truth they seek to reveal. Nothing should be extracted from Scripture as interpretation but what is yielded by its grammatical sense. This can scarcely be overstressed. When this is not observed, fallible human thought is bound to creep in. There is great value in paying attention to grammatical details. When dealing with a word of action or being, which is called a verb, it is obviously important to notice its time value, whether past, present or future. If we do not do this we shall confuse past truth, present truth and future truth.

There are little words called prepositions which are used hundreds of times a day in conversation and writing, e.g., by, through, in, towards, up, down, and so on. These have a theology all their own; for instance the word "believe" either as a verb or a noun occurs many times in the New Testament chiefly in the Gospel of John. It can be used with what the grammarians call the dative case after it, when it means to acknowledge mentally a fact, such as two plus two equals four. But very often the Greek reads literally "to believe into a person". The Lord Jesus said: "He that believeth in Me hath everlasting life", but the original reads: ". . . . . he that believeth into Me . . . . .". The preposition "into" conveys the thought of close association with Christ and to believe into Him means to completely commit oneself to Him and to rely absolutely on Him for everything, a very personal and intimate relationship, and a very different thing from believing as a fact that Jesus Christ was an historic personage. One can believe the latter without any spiritual benefit whatsoever. The little word "into" makes all the difference. Many claim to be believers who have never really believed "into" Christ and this is the only belief or faith that the New Testament recognizes, and it is the only faith that saves.

Observing grammatical sense will also take note of idioms, that is, terms of phrase peculiar to a language. For instance "the breaking of bread" is a Jewish idiom for eating a meal. The flat round Jewish loaves were not cut, but broken before they could be eaten, hence the expression came to mean the partaking of any meal. To restrict it to the "Lord's Supper", as some do, is erroneous and fails to recognize this idiom. When the Lord Jesus fed the four thousand He broke bread (Mark viii. 6-9), and the disciples distributed it; so also after His resurrection (Luke xxiv. 30) He broke bread and joined in a meal with the eleven. In neither case was He celebrating what afterwards was known as the Lord's Supper. Likewise in Acts ii. 44-46, the apostles' doctrine included having all things common or shared, and this included their possessions, goods and meals:

> "And they, continuing daily with one accord in the temple, and breaking bread from house to house, did eat their meat (food) with gladness and singleness of heart/"

Here "breaking bread" is explained as "eating their food" and does not refer to taking communion in the modern sense of the phrase; those who insist on this fail to recognize a common Jewish idiom and read into the passage what is not there.

The Principle of Contextual Interpretation.

The Bible is not a collection of verses put together without any relation to one another. Something goes before every verse and something follows it. If we recognize the flow of thought leading to a passage and away from it, we can know with some certainty the flow thought within it. This should be obvious, but it is surprising how often the obvious is missed in Biblical interpretation. Had this principle been put into practice consistently, many false doctrines and sects could never have arisen. One writer puts it this way:

> "To interpret without regard to the context is to interpret at random; to interpret contrary to the context is to teach falsehood for truth" (Companion to the Bible. Barrows).

It is always dangerous to separate a verse from its context. The practice of putting texts on calendars and making wall texts, and collecting favourite texts together, though often attractive, can be misleading, for the all-important context is missing.

Figures of Speech.

There is scarcely a subject of more importance to the earnest seeker after truth than that of figures of speech. Figures of speech wrongly handled, or a failure to recognize them in the Scriptures can lead to doctrinal aberrations and error. They have been used in speech and writing from time immemorial. Writing or speech without figures would be very prosaic and dull. Figurative language is used to make these vivid and interesting. They are a departure from the fixed laws of grammar to arrest attention and emphasize, being true to feeling, if not to fact. It is most important to note that behind them is always literality. If this was not so, we could never understand them. If someone states "the ground is dry", this is a plain statement of fact. If, however, he says "the ground is thirsty", a figure of speech is employed, because it is impossible actually for the inert ground to experience feeling. But how much more arresting is the latter statement!

There are over two hundred figures of speech. The Greeks and Romans reduced them to an exact science. If anyone asks how they can be recognized, two facts must be borne in mind:

(1) When rules of grammar are departed from.
(2) When a statement is contrary to known fact, or the revealed truth of the Scriptures.

No one has a right to assert a passage is figurative unless he can point to the figure and give reasons for its usage. Figurative language is not a convenience that can be turned to an argument in order to escape the literal implication of a passage. Let us take three well-known figures which are linked together:

(1) Simile or Resemblance.
(2) Metaphor or Representation.
(3) Hypocatastasis or Implication.

(1) Simile is comparison stated; one thing is said to be like or as something else, e.g. "All we like sheep have gone astray" (Isa. liii. 6). "One day is with the Lord as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day" (II Pet. iii. 8).

"All flesh is as grass" (I Pet. i. 24).

There are hundreds of examples of this figure in the Bible.

(2) Metaphor or Representation. This is comparison substituted. The figure lies in the verb "to be", while the nouns on either side are literal.

"All flesh is grass" (Isa. xl. 6).

Metaphor is from the Greek metaphero "to carry across". The likeness is carried across, the verb "to be" then having the meaning of "represent". We may point to a photograph and say: "This is my father". What we really mean is the photograph is a representation of our father. Or, pointing to a map, we can say: "This is Great Britain", meaning this map represents Great Britain, or is a likeness of Great Britain. The figure Metaphor resides entirely in the verb "to be": "Ye are the salt of the earth" (Matt. v. 13); "the seven stars are the angels of the seven churches" (Rev. i. 20); "He that soweth the good seed is the Son of Man; The field is the world; the good seed are the children of the kingdom; but the tares are the children of the wicked one" (Matt. xiii. 37, 38). In each case the verb "to be" could be rendered "represents", and so we have likeness by representation.

Metaphor is a distinct figure of speech and not a covering term for all figures. Sometimes great issues hang upon the recognition of a figure and false doctrines can be built upon the failure to distinguish them. "This (broken bread) is My Body" (Matt. xxvi. 26). The Roman Catholic insists that the consecrated bread is literally Christ's body. But in the Greek the grammar is deliberately broken to arrest attention and to show that the figure Metaphor is being used. "This" is made to agree with the word "body" instead of its antecedent, the word "bread", and so through failure to recognize the figure, the deception of the Roman Mass has been perpetuated through the centuries, misleading millions and holding them in bondage.

pp. 35 - 39

The third figure of speech in the group we are considering is Hypocatastasis or Implication. Hypocatastasis is a Greek word which literally means that something is "put down under" or wrapped up. The likeness in this case is only implied.

> ". . . . . dogs have compassed me: the assembly of the wicked have enclosed me" (Psa. xxii. 16).

If the Psalmist had said that the assembly of the wicked were like dogs this would have used Simile. Had he said the wicked are dogs, he would have used Metaphor. But in this verse he wraps up, as it were, his illustration of the wicked by simply using the word "dogs".

In the New Testament we have another example:

> "Then Jesus said unto them, Take heed and beware of the leaven of the Pharisees and of the Sadducees" (Matt. xvi. 6).

Here the disciples completely misunderstood the Lord, as the context shows. "And they reasoned among themselves, saying, It is because we have taken no bread" (verse 7). They took His statement literally, not realizing He was using the figure Hypocatastasis. He did not say the wrong doctrine of the Pharisees was either like leaven, or was leaven, but strongly implied it by using the word leaven by itself, which both in the Old Testament and New Testament is symbolic of evil. In verses 11 and 12 the disciples are made to understand that the Lord was not referring to literal leaven, but to the doctrine of the Pharisees and Sadducees. There is another occasion where the Lord Jesus used the same figure of Implication and was similarly misunderstood.

> "Jesus answered and said unto them (the Jews), Destroy this temple, and in three days I will raise it up" (John ii. 19).

Once again His hearers took literally what was a figure of speech:

> "Then said the Jews, Forty and six years was this temple in building, and wilt thou rear it up in three days? But He spake of the temple of His body" (John ii. 20, 21).

Another common figure used in the Scriptures is Hendiadys or Two for One, that is, two things are expressed, but only one thing is meant. In England we speak of a piece of bread and butter, which is not bread and butter considered separately, but a piece of buttered bread. We will give one or two examples from the New Testament:

> "For the law was given by Moses, but grace and truth came by Jesus Christ" (John i. 17).

While it would be perfectly true to consider grace and truth, taken by themselves, to be resident in Christ, here the apostle John is contrasting the law, with its types and shadows, with the reality that is found alone in the Lord Jesus. There was a measure of grace in the Divine picture book of the Old Testament, but this only looked forward to the coming of the Saviour in Whom is the true grace, the perfect thing. In connection with the filling of Judas' place, the early disciples prayed concerning the Lord's chosen:

> "That he may take part of this ministry and apostleship, from which Judas by transgression fell . . . . ." (Acts i. 25).

Ministry and apostleship were not two separate forms of service. It would have been better to recognize the figure Hendiadys and translate it apostolic ministry.

In Acts xiv. 13 we have another example:

> "Then the priest of Jupiter, which was before their city, brought oxen and garlands unto the gates, and would have done sacrifice with the people."

The Authorized Version (A.V.) leads one to think that the oxen and garlands were brought separately to the gates. But not so; it was the heathen custom to put garlands upon the animals to be sacrificed, and so the phrase should be "garlanded oxen", two things expressed, but only one thing meant. Likewise in Rev. v. 10, "kings and priests" would be better translated "a priestly kingdom". Sometimes we have an idea represented by three words and then we have Hendiatris:

> ". . . . . I am the Way, the Truth, and the Life: no man cometh unto the Father, but by Me" (John xiv. 6).

While it is perfectly true that the Lord can be considered as the Way, Truth and Life separately, yet what He really meant was: "I am the True and Living Way", so recognizing the figure Hendiatris, Weymouth renders it thus in his version.

Another frequently used figure is Metonymy or Change of Noun, where one thing is put for another, frequently for emphasis. In I Thess. v. 19, 20 we have:

> "Quench not the Spirit. Despise not prophesyings."

When the word 'spirit" stands by itself, it is difficult to know whether God the Holy Spirit is intended, or the gift that He gives. I Thessalonians is an epistle written early in the Acts period when evidential gifts were abundant. The reference to prophesyings, prophecy being one of these gifts (I Cor. xii. 10), shows us that the word 'spirit" refers not to God, but to His gift. In any case it is beyond the power of any human being to extinguish God. But His gifts can be so treated and this context gives this warning.

We have another example of Metonymy in Rev. vi. 9 :

> ". . . . . I saw under the altar the souls of them that were slain for the word of God."

Whatever ideas may be held concerning the meaning of the soul in the Bible, it will be generally agreed that it cannot be seen by the eyes. Consequently a figure of speech must be used here. "Soul" is put by Metonymy for "person", just as we talk of 'souls on board a ship", meaning people. This verse in Revelation has sometimes been used to bolster up unscriptural ideas concerning the life after death. Had this figure been recognized, such ideas would have been prevented. In Psa. xvi. 6 the Psalmist says:

> "The lines are fallen unto me in pleasant places; yea, I have a goodly heritage."

Here the measuring line is put for the land marked out, as the second statement makes clear. This inheritance was allocated by lot. Jeremiah's enemies said concerning him, "Come, and let us smite him with the tongue"; obviously impossible literally, but the tongue is put for bitter and unjust words (Jer. xviii. 18).

We give one more example which is important doctrinally:

> "We have an altar, whereof they have no right to eat which serve the tabernacle" (Heb. xiii. 10).

Again, it is clear that the first statement cannot be taken literally, for altars cannot be eaten. But the word "altar" is put by Metonymy for the sacrifice offered on it. In this case we have a double figure, for the writer is not referring to literal sacrifices, but to the great Antitype, the Lord Himself, upon Whom we feast by faith, and to Whom we are urged to go forth without the camp, bearing His reproach (Heb. xiii. 13).

We have already considered the anthropomorphic element in the Bible where the figure Anthropopatheia or Condescension is used. The references to the hands, eyes, ears, nostrils, and arms of God, His remembering or forgetting, or His repentance are all illustrations of this and are a wonderful example of the God of all grace stooping to our level to make Himself and His ways known to us.

In concluding this section we will consider the figure Ellipsis where words are left out of the original Hebrew and Greek and must be supplied in English to make sense. In Psa. lxxxiv. 3 we have:

> "Yea, the sparrow hath found an house, and the swallow a nest for herself, where she may lay her young, even thine altars, O LORD of Hosts, my King and my God."

The word "even" in the A.V. is in italics, the translation supplying the ellipsis to make sense. But it is wrongly supplied, leading one to think that swallows made nests in the altars. The words "so have I found" should be supplied instead of the word " even" and then we have good sense.

When the Lord declares that the mustard seed is the least of all seeds (Matt. xiii. 32), it should be obvious that He is not saying that the mustard seed is the smallest in existence, but the smallest of seeds sown in a field as the context shows, and the ellipsis could have been supplied in verse 32.

Sometimes we have false ellipsis, that is, words are supplied which are unnecessary.

> "Paul, a servant of Jesus Christ, called to be an apostle . . . . ." (Rom. i. 1).

The words "to be" are in italics, showing they are not in the original Greek. They are not needed. Paul was a "called apostle", saved and called by the risen Christ.

Again in Phil. iii. 15 we read:

> "Let us therefore, as many as be perfect, be thus minded."

But the apostle has stated that he himself was not at this stage perfect or mature, nor had reached the goal in the race in which he found himself, pressing forward for the "prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus" (iii. 14). This being so, it was very unlikely indeed that any believer in the Philippian church had outstripped him in experience. The Greek reads literally: "as many as perfect therefore" showing that the figure ellipsis is here. We must therefore supply the words "would be" or "wish to be". Paul is setting the example for all who desire, not only to run the heavenly race, but to reach the goal and attain the prize. In I Cor. xv. 29 we have one of the problematic verses of the New Testament:

> "Else what shall they do which are baptized for the dead, if the dead rise not at all? why are they then baptized for the dead?"

Many have been the interpretations put on this verse. The Mormons use this to bolster up their idea of baptism, vicariously on behalf of someone who has died, though what is this supposed to achieve, expressed in New Testament terms? The New Testament knows nothing of such a practice and it was not heard of until the second century and then among the heretics. Some have thought it means that the apostle refers to those who were baptized on the basis of the testimony of some who had died. Others that the verse refers to young converts who took the place in the church of older believers who had passed away, and yet again Paul was thinking of baptism as a symbol of death and is not referring to those who have died physically.

We believe the best explanation has been given by Dr E.W. Bullinger in his Figures of Speech. Re-punctuating the verse and supplying the ellipsis he translates:

> "What shall they do who are being baptized? [It is] for dead bodies, if the dead rise not at all."

That is to say, water baptism has no meaning apart from resurrection, and to this chapter vi. of Romans plainly testifies and moreover it fits in to the context in chapter xv.

The afore-going will give some idea of the great importance of figures of speech as used in the Scriptures. All sorts of wrong ideas and false doctrines can arise where these are not recognized and understood. We would strongly advise the reader to obtain a copy of Dr. Bullinger's monumental work referred to above. Unfortunately it is out of print, but occasionally may be obtained through a second-hand bookseller.

No.6. The Interpretation of Types.
pp. 45 - 49

The relationship which the Old Testament sustains to the New, forms the basis for the consideration of types. The fact that the Old Testament has a pronounced prophetic element links it indissolubly with the New, and typological teaching is a form of prophecy. On the Lord's own authority He is to be found in the Old Testament. To the disciples on the road to Emmaus He expounded the Old Testament Scriptures:

> "And beginning at Moses and all the prophets, He expounded unto them in all the Scriptures the things concerning Himself" (Luke xxiv. 27).

And to the disciples He said:

> ". . . . . These are the words which I spake unto you, while I was yet with you, that all things must be fulfilled, which were written in the law of Moses, and in the prophets, and in the psalms, concerning Me" (Luke xxiv. 44).

In John v. 39, the Lord Jesus said to the Jews: "Search (or ye search) the Scriptures; for in them ye think ye have eternal life: and they are they which testify of Me". There can be therefore no doubt whatsoever that Christ is prefigured by type and shadow in the Old Testament, and that this is a separate study in itself.

There are several Greek words used in the New Testament, which point back to the nature of the Old. Hupodeigma means a representation, a copy, an example and occurs six times. "Let us labour . . . . . lest any man fall after the same example of unbelief" (Heb. iv. 11). As chapters iii. and iv. of Hebrews make clear, the journey of the Israelites through the wilderness has a typical meaning, which this verse reinforces: ". . . . . there are priests that offer gifts according to the law: who serve unto the example and shadow of heavenly things . . . . ." (Heb. viii. 4, 5). Here the earthly priesthood is typical of heavenly realities.

Tupos and tupikos come from the verb tupto "to strike", and mean the impression formed by a blow, a pattern and then a type.

> "Now all these things happened unto them (Israel) for ensamples (types): and they are written for our admonition . . . . ." (I Cor. x. 11).

Once again the behaviour of Israel in the wilderness with their sin and rebellion is looked upon, not just as an historical event, but something that was typical and pointed forward to the Christian era. Skia means a shadow, sketch or outline. "For the law having a shadow of good things to come, and not the very image of the things . . . . ." (Heb. x. 1 and viii. 5). "Let no man therefore judge you in meat, or in drink, or in respect of an holyday, or of the new moon, or of the sabbath days: which are a shadow of things to come . . . . ." (Col. ii. 16, 17). These verses show that the ceremonial law was a shadowing forth in type of New Testament realities. Antitupos means a figure or likeness.

"For Christ is not entered into the holy places made with hands, which are the figures of the true" (Heb. ix. 24). The Tabernacle was a type or figure of realities in the heavens (Heb. viii. 5).

These words establish beyond doubt the typical character of much of the Old Testament, and the whole of the epistle to the Hebrews revolves around these types and adumbrations, without which it could not be understood. There is no doubt therefore that the doctrine of the types is Scriptural and important to the student of the Scriptures and the seeker after truth. The fact that typical teaching has been abused does not invalidate its truth. The early church fathers doubtless erred in this respect, as have many Roman Catholic theologians, realizing that such teaching could strengthen Romish doctrines. But the Protestant has not been guiltless either, for some, in order to support devotional ideas, have pressed typological teaching beyond its proper limits.

So we ask ourselves, have we any Biblical guiding principle to lift us above mere human opinion and the doctrines of men? The answer is, yes, and it is this: a character or event in the Old Testament is a type, if the New Testament specifically designates it to be such. This may be too narrow for some interpreters, but at least we are on sure ground when we put it into practice. It may be true that there are inferred types, but we need to be careful here and make certain that the immediate or the remote context justifies them. That Adam was in some respects a type of Christ Rom. v. 14 makes clear:

> "Nevertheless death reigned from Adam to Moses, even over them that had not sinned after the similitude of Adam's transgression, who is the figure (type) of Him that was to come."

Melchizedek, who appears suddenly in the narrative of Gen. xiv. and disappears mysteriously, is typical of the Priesthood of the Lord Jesus. This is expressly stated in Heb. vii. 3, 15-17. Moses the Prophet, the mouthpiece of God, is a picture of the greatest of all prophets, Christ Himself (Deut. xviii. 15-19; Acts iii. 22-23). The sacrificial lambs of the Old Testament were all foreshadowing the Saviour (John i. 29; I Cor. v. 7). The manna in the wilderness finds its fulfillment in Christ (John vi. 30-35). The brazen serpent of the Old Testament was likewise a type of Christ, (John iii. 14, 15). The veil of the Tabernacle was a picture of the Lord's humanity (Heb. x. 20). The smitten rock (see Exod. xvii. 6; Numb. xx. 11) typified the Lord Jesus Christ as I Cor. x. 4 asserts, ". . . . . for they drank of that spiritual Rock that followed them: and that Rock was Christ". Joshua, the captain of Israel and leader into the promised land, prefigured Christ, and we should remember that Jesus is the Greek equivalent for Joshua (Heb. ii. 10; iv. 8, and note the margin).

And so we might go on. A rich field for study is opened here, and when we have the controlling guide of the New Testament we are delivered from interpretive schools, and many fanciful ideas and the opinions of men. Some students of Scripture identify typology with allegory, but this is a mistake, for, as we have seen, allegory is a figure of speech, a continued metaphor, whereby one story or aspect of truth is given in terms of another, not necessarily that of the New Testament, whereas true typology is based on the unity of Old Testament and New whereby something in the Old foreshadows something in the New. In dealing with types we must be careful to note dissimilarity as well as similarity. As well as there being points of similarity between Christ and Adam, or Christ and Moses, there are many points of dissimilarity, especially when we consider the sin and weaknesses of both Adam and Moses. One of the errors that can arise is to make typical the elements of dissimilarity in a type, but this is guarded against if we carefully note how the New Testament comments upon the types of the Old.

True typology is a species of prophecy, and in the Old Testament we have some of the major and basic doctrines of the New Testament set forth in picture form, such as redemption, justification and atonement. We should take care in typical study to avoid extremes and flights of fancy. Some have been put off such study because of the extremes to which certain expositors have gone. The doctrine lying behind the Tabernacle needs care. A spiritual equivalent cannot be found for every single detail, and to try and produce this is not a mark of spirituality, nor is it sound. Another important thing to remember is that we should never seek to prove doctrine from types unless there is New Testament authority. There are at least six kinds of types in the Word of God:

(1) Persons, as we have seen, (2) Institutions such as Old Testament sacrifices, (3) Offices, Moses as prophet, Melchizedek as Priest-King, (4) Events, The wilderness wanderings, (5) Actions, The lifting up of the brazen serpent in the wilderness, (6) Things, such as the Tabernacle and its furnishings.

Symbols.

Linked with types, yet separate from them, are symbols. One difference between them is the time element, a type being essentially a prefiguring of something future, whereas a symbol has no definite reference to time. In a symbol there are two elements: the idea which is mental, and the concrete image which represents it. It is well known that the prophetical books of the Bible are full of symbols and it is largely because of this fact that they are difficult to interpret. Here again, unless we have some guiding principle, the door is wide open to fancy, speculation and ridiculous extremes. We will confine ourselves to Scriptural symbols and consider the interpretation of prophecy later on.

When we seek to understand a symbol in the Bible we should have a concordance by us and be prepared to search and note every context where such a symbol is used, in other words, compare Scripture with Scripture, which we have seen is fundamental to the true interpretation of God's Word. We should carefully note if the symbol in question is explained by another passage of Scripture, and if so, we must accept this and not force upon it another meaning which is contradictory. Thus the wild animals of Daniel's prophecy stand for nations under human rule and energized by Satan. We should be helped by this when we come to interpret the wild beasts of the book of Revelation which have a similar meaning, and refer to the heads or rulers of these nations.

We must note that there is sometimes double imagery in symbols. The Lord Jesus is called "the lion of the tribe of Judah" (Rev. v. 5), and Satan too is likened to a "lion . . . . .

seeking whom he may devour" (I Pet. v. 8), showing that sometimes a symbol can be used in more than one way; only the context and usage can decide. In consideration of symbols used in the Bible, there is no doubt that numbers are sometimes used symbolically, though here, once again, we need to take great care, for some have gone to great lengths in lack of wisdom and flights of fancy, especially those who are mathematically minded. Not every number in the Bible has spiritual significance, and to try and deduce all sorts of doctrines from numbers and gematria can be most misleading and also lead to error and division. It hardly needs stressing that seven is an important number in God's purpose. The creation in seven days (however we interpret the days); the religious life of Israel revolving around seven, seven weeks from Passover to Pentecost, seven years with its Sabbatical year, seven times seven years with the Jubilee; the seventy sevens of Daniel's prophecy, and the book of the Revelation is just full of sevens, not only the figure, but in the occurrence of words and phrases as well.

Six is man's number. He was created on the sixth day and so comes short of seven, God's perfect standard, and it is noteworthy that some of the enemies of God, such as Goliath, for instance, are stamped with six, and the superman of the end time is linked with a triple six (Rev. xiii. 18). Four is linked with the earth (the four quarters), forty with testing (Israel in the wilderness and the Lord Jesus likewise). Thirteen (ominous number for some) is linked with Satan. For a Scriptural exposition of this subject we recommend Dr. E.W. Bullinger's Number in Scripture.

There is also symbolism in colour, even though the colours of the Bible may be difficult to determine exactly. While there is room for differences of opinion here, scarlet seems to be linked with sacrifice. Blue is the heavenly colour. Purple, having been worn by kings and high dignitaries, is the colour of royalty, whereas white suggests purity or righteousness. It is significant that in the last book of the Bible, where a spotless creation is finally reached, there are more references to white than in any other book in the New Testament.

Metals have a significance too. Silver was connected to the atonement money (Exod. xxx. 12-16), and therefore linked with redemption and atonement. Gold stands for the highest and holiest and can therefore in some contexts represent Deity. The brass of the Bible is not the same as the metal we know today, being composed of copper and tin, whereas the modern metal consists of copper and zinc. Bronze or copper would be nearer the mark than brass. Its use in connection with the brazen altar, upon which all the sacrifices for sin were made, the brazen serpent in the wilderness and the brazen feet of Christ in glory, about to return in power and glory (Rev. i. 15), link this metal with judgment.

Needless to say, a fixed meaning cannot be made for every occurrence of a metal or a colour in the Scriptures. Wisdom and balance must obtain here, as in all our dealings with the Word of God.

No.7. The Interpretation of Prophecy.
pp. 66 - 69

When we come to consider prophecy and its interpretation we realize we are face to face with a difficult subject, and one where a great cleavage of opinion exists among believers. Is this really necessary? Prophecy, we are told, is a light that shines in a dark place, to which we should take heed (II Pet. i. 19), but if we cannot know for certain what it means, it ceases to be either a light or a guide; neither can we take heed to something of which we cannot be sure. It is evident that, from the stand-point of the Scriptures, prophecy was not given to puzzle or confuse, but to guide and direct the Christian, especially in times of darkness and declension, and to hide future truth from the enemies of God and the merely curious. It is in such times as these that we should be able to approach Biblical prophecy, which is only God writing history in advance, and see the glorious goal that He has planned and will most assuredly attain, and this can give us confidence, strength and full assurance of hope. The interpretation of prophecy is confessedly difficult even if every sound guiding principle is kept. Yet we cannot help feeling that this subject has been clouded and confused by the various schools of interpretation, by tradition, by fanciful and grotesque ideas, for nowhere can the imagination more run riot and go to greater extremes than in the consideration of prophecy.

We believe we can be greatly helped by putting into practice the guiding principles of historico-grammatical interpretation which we have already considered. Some evangelical expositors use these principles till they come to the study of prophecy and then they throw them away. Why? Because they are not convenient to their views? These principles are not just relevant to a part of the Bible, but to the whole of it, and we are convinced that if they are carried out with relation to prophecy, quite a number of the difficulties vanish. To get a correct understanding of a prophetical passage, we must take note of:

a. the context, near and remote,
b. note figurative and symbolic elements, and ascertain if these are explained in the passage or in other parallel parts of Scripture. For instance, a number of the symbols in the Revelation are explained (Rev. i. 20), and we must be ready to accept these as Divine explanations and not seek to re-interpret them according to our ideas,
c. the historical background of the passage should be ascertained, noting of whom and to whom the prophecy relates. Is it Gentile nations or the people of Israel, or the Messiah Himself?
d. Scripture must be compared with Scripture. The book of the Revelation has well over 200 references to the Old Testament, which fact makes it very evident that the last book in the Bible can never be understood apart from a knowledge of the Old Testament Scriptures, in fact it is an insult to the Divine Author to try and interpret it with the Old Testament shut. While the Revelation is a New Testament Book, it is Old Testament in much of its outlook. In fact, if we found it in our Bibles next to the prophecy of Daniel it would not be incongruous.

e. We must decide whether the prophetical passage we are considering is conditional or unconditional and,

f. whether it has been fulfilled or not, bearing in mind there is such a thing as multiple or double fulfillment which is not the same as multiple sense; the prophecy may be fulfilled in more than one stage.

g. As we stressed before, we must take the literal meaning of the prophecy as a controlling guide. This does not mean a dry, wooden, excessive literalism, which disregards poetic imagery, figures of speech and symbols. In the Old Testament we have prophecies relating to Messiah's first coming and also to His second coming. As far as the Old Testament is concerned, both of these events were future, but for us those relating to the first coming are now history, while only those looking forward to His Second Advent are future. In other words, in the Scriptures we have examples of definite predictions which have been fulfilled, and as we study them, we can see without a shadow of doubt how they have been fulfilled, that is, whether literally or spiritually.

Let us consider the Old Testament foreview of the events centering around the Crucifixion (This is treated in the author's "The Unfolding Purpose of God" pp. 10-14); there were at least fourteen prophecies fulfilled at this time.

(1) The Lord's disciples were to forsake Him (Zech. xiii. 7; Mark xiv. 27);
(2) He was to be dumb before His accusers (Isa. liii. 7; Matt. xxvii. 12-14);
(3) He was to be wounded and bruised (Isa. liii. 5; Matt. xxvii. 26, 30);
(4) His hands and feet were to be pierced (Psa. xxii. 16; Luke xxiii. 33);
(5) Yet none of His bones would be broken (Exod. xii. 46; John xix. 31-36);
(6) He was to be crucified with thieves (Isa. liii. 12; Mark xv. 27, 28);
(7) He was to pray for His persecutors (Isa. liii. 12; Luke xxiii. 34);
(8) The people were to ridicule Him (Psa. xxii. 7, 8; Matt. xxvii. 41-43);
(9) His garments were to be parted and lots cast for His vesture (Psa. xxii. 18; John xix. 23, 24);
(10) The cry from the cross (Psa. xxii. 1; Matt. xxvii. 46);
(11) They were to give Him gall and vinegar to drink (Psa. lxix. 21; Matt. xxvii. 34);
(12) His body was to be pierced (Zech. xii. 10; John xix. 34-37);
(13) His heart was to be broken (Psa. xxii. 14; John xix. 34);
(14) He was to be buried in a rich man's grave (Isa. liii. 9; Matt. xxvii. 57-60).

If any spiritualizers existed when these Old Testament Scriptures were written, we can well imagine that they would have dubbed any literal fulfillment as "unspiritual or carnal", but they would have been wrong, for every one of these fourteen prophecies was definitely and literally fulfilled within twenty-four hours. To these we can add others, such as the prediction of Bethlehem as Messiah's birthplace (Micah v. 2; Matt. ii. 4-6), His virgin birth (Isa. vii. 14; Matt. i. 23), and His riding into Jerusalem on a colt (Zech. ix. 9; Matt. xxi. 4, 5). The meaning of these would have been completely missed had any attempt been made to spiritualize them. Is there not a lesson that we can learn regarding prophetic interpretation from all this? We believe there is. If so many prophecies concerning the Lord's first coming were fulfilled literally, is not God teaching us that this is the way we should seek to interpret the yet future prophecies of His second coming?

By what sound system of interpretation are we to regard prophecies relating to His first Advent as literal, but the second Advent as spiritual? If the principles of historico-grammatical interpretation cannot be applied to prophecy, then a large portion of the Bible must be exempted, for prophecy extends from Genesis to Revelation, and if so, of what use can such a principle be? We therefore believe as a guiding principle, prophecy should be interpreted literally, unless the plain teaching of the New Testament in dealing with the passage or material in question is against this.

Davidson, in his Old Testament Prophecy, writes:

> "I consider the first principle in prophetic interpretation is to assume that the literal meaning is his (the writer's) meaning—that he is moving among realities, not symbols, among concrete things like people, not among abstractions like our church, world, etc.".

He reprimands expositors who make Zion the church; the Canaanite the enemy of the church, the land of Canaan the promises to the church, and so on. There is no doubt that to the Jew, to whom much of prophecy was first given, Jerusalem meant Jerusalem and Canaan the literal Canaan. Once this is departed from, the door is wide open to human opinion and error. If God does not mean what He says when He inspires prophecy, how can it be a light to guide us in the darkness and how can we ever understand it?

h. We believe a comprehension of the Divine purpose for the nation of Israel to be essential for the proper understanding of prophecy. If we err here, it is unlikely that we shall ever grasp what the Divine plan for the future is, nor shall we ever get the proper position of the Church, the Body of Christ, in this great plan. We must get clearly in our minds the teaching of Romans chapters ix.-xi., relating to Israel according to the flesh, and chapter xi. must not be interpreted or divorced from chapters ix. and x., which are an integral part of this section. The "all Israel" of xi. 26, who are in the future to be saved, have already been explained by the "all Israel" of ix. 6, 7, and in neither case can these refer to the Church, but are Paul's "kinsmen according to the flesh" (ix. 3-5).

The weighty statement of Rom. xi. 29 must ever be kept in mind, "For the gifts and calling of God are without repentance (or change of mind)". This statement alone should be sufficient to prevent us from making the mistake of many spiritualizers, namely that Israel has been finally cast off by God, and the Church has inherited their blessings. If this is true, then God has changed His mind and altered the thing that has gone out of His lips, the very thing that He has stated He will never do (Psa. lxxxix. 34-37; Jer. xxxi. 35-37). If God has broken His Word regarding the nation of Israel, away goes all Christian assurance, for how can we be sure that He will not do so in connection with the Church? Moreover, the future restoration of Israel rests upon the New Covenant of grace (Jer. xxxi. 31-37), and this has been sealed by the precious blood of Christ (Matt. 26:28).

This restoration has no regard for personal merit or demerit. Israel are "enemies" of God so far as the gospel is concerned, but they are "beloved" by God, in spite of this, "for the fathers' sake" (Rom. xi. 28). Their present opposition, blindness and failure cannot invalidate God's unconditional promises to Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, or alter His eternal love to their descendants. They are yet to "look on Him Whom they have pierced" (Zech. xii. 10) when He returns to the mount of Olives, and at this Second Advent Christ will turn away "ungodliness from Jacob" (Rom. xi. 26). In no sense can "Jacob" be the Body of Christ, and there is certainly no ungodliness of this Church to be turned away or dealt with at the Lord's Second Coming, for they already rejoice in the forgiveness of all trespasses (Col. ii. 13; Eph. i. 7; iv. 32). Once the true Scriptural position of Israel, past and future, is understood, the rest of the Bible falls into place. But this can never be realized, unless the guiding principles we have enunciated are carried into effect. Nothing is more destructive of true understanding of the purpose of the ages in Christ Jesus (Eph. iii. 11) than the acceptance of allegorizing or spiritualizing as a method of interpretation as is done by the amillennialist. Not only this, but as H. L. Payne has stated:

> "It does not seem too much to say that the great strength of modern liberalism had its spring and finds its support in the post- and amillennial circles. This is due in large measure to the fact that the literal interpretation of the Scripture has been set aside, and thus the door has been thrown open to all other error."

Further, if the spiritualizing principle be admitted into all realms of Christian doctrine, every orthodox doctrine would be eliminated. Amillennialism then is the friend of destructive modernism and Romanism, for spiritualizing has always characterized Roman Catholic doctrine. If we want to let the Word of God speak for itself with all its authority, then such a system must be avoided at all costs, for not in this way can the opinions of men be eliminated in handling the Word.

i. The Lord Jesus Christ as the central theme must be constantly kept in mind in all prophetic interpretation. "The testimony of Jesus is the spirit of prophecy" (Rev. xix. 10). To miss our way here is to miss our way everywhere. The whole of God's purposes for a new heaven and earth wherein dwelleth righteousness is centred in the Saviour. Not one of them can be understood or come to fruition apart from Him. To be taken up with prophetic details and to miss Christ is tragic, being on a par with the Pharisees of old, who searched the Scriptures and missed the Messiah of Scripture, in spite of the fact that the Old Testament testified of Him on His Own authority (John v. 39, 40).

We believe that adherence to historico-grammatical principles will clear away quite a number of prophetical difficulties, many of which are man-made and not in the text at all. Prophecy is hard enough to expound without adding weights of man's devising, and wise are we if we avoid these pitfalls and endeavour to approach prophecy apart from schools of interpretation, whether preterist*, historicist or futurist.

[*Preterist -- one who holds that the prophecies of the Apocalypse have already been fulfilled.]

No.8. The Interpretation of the Parables.
pp. 85 - 89

The root meaning of the word "parable" is "a placing alongside" for the purpose of comparison, and basically it is therefore a method of illustration. It is important to note when parables are introduced into the Gospel records, and the reason for them, which we shall find is very different from the average Christian conception. In Matthew's Gospel, parables are not introduced until the thirteenth chapter. It is quite wrong to think that parabolic teaching characterized Christ's ministry from the start. It is evident from chapter xi. onwards that events were moving to a climax:

> "Then began He to upbraid the cities wherein most of His mighty works were done, because they repented not" (Matt. xi. 20).

In chapter xii. the Lord is presented as greater than the Temple and its priesthood (verse 6), greater than Jonah the prophet (verse 41), and greater than Solomon the king (verse 42). He had come to His earthly people Israel as Prophet, Priest and King, and the majority manifested that they were not going to receive Him as such. Chapter xiii. immediately follows with the account of Christ beginning to teach in parables and we are left in no doubt as to the reason. "And the disciples came, and said unto Him, Why speakest Thou unto them in parables? He answered and said unto them, Because it is given unto you to know the mysteries (secrets) of the kingdom of heaven, but to them it is not given . . . . . Therefore speak I to them in parables: because they seeing see not; and hearing they hear not, neither do they understand" (Matt. xiii. 10, 11, 13). Then He went on to quote Isa. vi. 9, 10, which predicted the very state of the people to whom He was speaking, with blinded eyes, deafened ears, and a hard, non-understanding heart or mind, which was going to be repeated in the generation that followed, during the Acts period, when at the end, this prophecy is quoted for the third and last time. This terrible condition has characterized the Jew, as a race, ever since. It is evident that in parabolic teaching the Lord was veiling the truth not making it simple to understand, very different from the usual idea that a parable is a simple earthly story with a heavenly meaning, suitable for children in a Sunday school. The very reverse is true. The Lord is wrapping up the truth, as it were, and making it more difficult to understand to those who were rejecting Him. To those who were willing and responsive to learn, as the disciples, He said: "But blessed are your eyes, for they see: and your ears, for they hear" (Matt. xiii. 16; cf. Luke viii. 8). We must be prepared, therefore, to face the fact that the interpretation of parables is not easy. There are four points at least to consider:

(1) A parable is some well known earthly event or custom.
(2) Behind the earthly illustration is the spiritual lesson or truth which the parable sets forth.
(3) The earthly picture bears a relationship by analogy to the spiritual truth behind it.
(4) Because every parable has two meanings they all stand in need of interpretation.

To do this adequately we must remember (1) that the Lord linked these first parables with the kingdom of heaven (Matt. xiii. 24, 31, 33, 45, 47, 52). We must therefore have a Scriptural conception of the kingdom of heaven before we can interpret the parables correctly. (2) As the parables are largely drawn from the agriculture of Palestine of the Lord's time, a knowledge of this is obviously helpful. (3) As some details of the parables are interpreted by the Lord Himself, we must give first place to this fact and not re-interpret them in any way. (4) The context, as always, must be carefully considered. Luke xv. records the three parables of the lost sheep, the lost coin and the lost son. The context gives the setting and the reason for the parables:

> "Then drew near unto Him all the publicans and sinners for to hear Him. And the Pharisees and Scribes murmured, saying, This man receiveth sinners and eateth with them" (Luke xv. 1, 2).

The following parables therefore concern publicans and sinners and the heart of God towards them, and are a rebuke to the Scribes and Pharisees. This setting carries over into chapter xvi. with the parable of the unjust steward, at the end of which we read: "And the Pharisees also, who were covetous, heard all these things: and they derided Him" (Luke xvi. 14). The Lord continued to speak to them in the next verses "And He said unto them, Ye are they which justify yourselves before men . . . . ." and He ended up by speaking to them the parable of the rich man and Lazarus.

It may be objected that this is not stated to be a parable and therefore cannot be treated as such, but this cannot be maintained because several are given without any such introduction and are obviously parabolic, e.g., the prodigal son (xv. 11). We should seek to discover the central truth of any parable and not try to fix a doctrinal significance to all the details, which will only side-track from the main teaching. The issue to get clear is: what did it first mean to those to whom the Lord gave it? It is possible that more truth resided in the parable than they could apprehend. Even so, this must square with the teaching of the Lord as a whole and the remoter context of the rest of the New Testament. It is unwise to base fundamental truths upon parables or symbolic prophetical Scriptures, such as the book of Revelation. This generally shows a weakness; if such truths are really basic and foundational, they will be treated as plain doctrine in other parts of Scripture.

The most important thing is to get a Scriptural conception of that aspect of the kingdom to which the Gospel parables pertain. In the New Testament we have several phrases embodying the word kingdom: the kingdom of heaven, the kingdom of God, the kingdom of the Father, the kingdom of His beloved Son, and variants of these. We have to decide whether all these are synonymous, or have they differences of meaning? The kingdom of God occurs throughout the New Testament from Matthew to Revelation. It is found in Paul's earlier epistles written during the Acts and in those written afterwards from prison. It must therefore be all-embracive, including things in heaven as well as things on earth, the whole of God's mighty redemptive plan in Christ being envisaged in it. There can be nothing that pertains to God outside this universal sovereignty. The kingdom of heaven occurs thirty-two times in Matthew's Gospel and nowhere else. This phase of the kingdom must therefore be restricted to the scope and purpose of this Gospel which is peculiarly related to the people of Israel and God's purpose for them as made known in the Old Testament. Here, Christ's ministry and that of the twelve was exclusively to Israel (Matt. xv. 24; x. 5, 6), which is the central channel, from a human standpoint, through which God planned to bring in His kingdom the world over, taking the knowledge and light of the Gospel to the ends of the earth, so fulfilling His original promise to Abraham, Isaac and Jacob. It is aptly expressed in the Lord's prayer of the Sermon on the Mount. ". . . . . Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done in earth, as it is in heaven . . . . ." (Matt. vi. 10), or as Moses expressed it centuries before: ". . . . . as the days of heaven upon the earth" (Deut. xi. 21). After the forty days instruction by the Lord after His resurrection, the disciples do not hesitate to ask: ". . . . . wilt Thou at this time restore again the kingdom to Israel?" (Acts i. 6), showing clearly that this earthly aspect of the kingdom is linked with the people of Israel and not the Church.

The occurrences of the kingdom of God in the Gospels are parallel to this, as a comparison of Matthew xi. 11 with Luke vii. 28 shows, but we must not infer from this that these expressions are synonymous, but as the lesser is included in the greater, the two can now be parallel as far as the Divine purpose is expressed in the Gospel records. The final realization of God's kingdom upon the earth awaits the return of the King of kings and Lord of lords (Rev. xix. 11-16; Matt. xxiv. 29-31). At that time, the kingdoms of this world will become the kingdoms of our Lord and of His Christ, and He shall reign for ever and ever (Rev. xi. 15).

What is the character of this kingdom? Is it spiritual or literal and visible, or a combination of both? That it starts in a spiritual sense is made clear by such passages as Matt. xxi. 31, where Christ declared to the chief priests that publicans and harlots were entering the kingdom before them. If God's kingdom is ever to be realized on earth or in heaven, then its subjects must have changed hearts and minds and God always begins with the inward and works outwards. Consequently the kingdom of God begins with the new birth (John iii. 3), and basically the "kingdom of God is not meat and drink; but righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost" (Rom. xiv. 17). Here the spiritualizer and amillennialist will heartily agree, but Scripture makes it plain that this, of itself, is not the complete fulfilling of the kingdom; it is only its beginning. A moment's reflection will surely make clear that if every inhabitant of, say, a large city were saved and practically exhibiting the Christian life, there would be sure to be a practical effect on the outward conditions of that city. Going wider, if a whole nation became truly saved believers in Christ, it would be sure to have an overwhelming effect upon that nation and its daily life, and also upon every nation who had any contact with it. Going wider still, when the knowledge of God shall cover the earth, "as the waters cover the sea" (Hab. ii. 14), the effect on the world in its actions and practical business relationships will be tremendous. It will be nothing less than a colossal revolution. Such a kingdom could not possibly be confined to the mind and heart alone. The final realization of the kingdom of heaven upon earth is therefore both inward and spiritual, outward and literal, and to see anything less than this is to fall short of the Biblical conception.

However, the kingdom as used in relationship to the Church which is Christ's Body is in the spiritual realm entirely. This church has a homeland which exists not on earth, but in heaven (Phil. iii. 20). It is urged not to set its mind on earthly things (Phil. iii. 19), but on those things above where Christ sitteth on the right hand of God (Col. iii. 1, 2) and where, in Christ Jesus, they are potentially seated (Eph. ii. 5, 6). All such have already been "translated into the kingdom of the Son of His love" (Col. i. 13). The apostle Paul speaks of the future hope of this church as at the Lord's appearing and His kingdom, and looks to being preserved unto His heavenly kingdom (II Tim. iv. 1, 18). There is a present realization, and because of this and its heavenly sphere of blessing, it must not be confused with the earthly sphere of the kingdom that we have been considering, which is yet to come to pass when the Son of Man comes in His kingdom (Matt. xvi. 28). There is a heavenly aspect of the kingdom of God (Col. iv. 11) relating to the out-calling and building up of the Body of Christ, and an earthly aspect of this kingdom where the nation of Israel largely figure and these must be distinguished, although both find their centre in the Lord Jesus Christ. The subjects of the earthly kingdom are spoken of as "inheriting" or being "heirs of the kingdom", "receiving the kingdom" and "sons of the kingdom", but we never read in the New Testament of receiving the church, or being heirs or sons of the church. We must remember, too, that the kingdom of heaven, when the will of God will be done on earth as it is in heaven, is the subject of Old Testament prophecy, whereas the Body of Christ was a secret "hid in God" from past ages and generations of people (Eph. iii. 9; Col. i. 24-27), and therefore unknown till God chose to reveal it.

There are some who, seeing this, and realizing the need of not confusing these two aspects of God's redemptive purpose, speak of distinguishing between the Kingdom and the Church, as though the word Kingdom is kept in the New Testament to Israel and the earth, and never used concerning the Church the Body of Christ. This is not so, and such language is not accurate and precise enough. We should distinguish, most certainly, between the earthly phase of the kingdom and its subjects and the heavenly phase of the Body of Christ with its citizenship in heaven (Phil. iii. 20), always remembering that finally these will be linked under the Headship of Christ in the dispensation of the fullness of the seasons, when all things in heaven and earth will be gathered under Him (Eph. i. 9, 10) by reason of His mighty redemptive work on the cross.

From what we have seen therefore, the interpretation of the parables of the kingdom of heaven relates to the earthly aspect of God's kingdom, of which the redeemed people of Israel are the Divine channel. To try and force the heavenly people in here, the Body of Christ as an interpretation, is to confuse "the things that differ", and mix up God's earthly plan with the heavenly aspect of it. There are no parables, or hiding of the truth in the Pauline letters which relate to the Body of Christ, but the very reverse. In Col. i. 24-27, the apostle links his special ministry given to him by the ascended Christ with the Church, the Lord's Body, likening it to a dispensation or stewardship which God had given him, to unfold the great Secret concerning this church, which up till now had been hidden in God (Eph. iii. 9; Col. i. 26) but now is made manifest to His saints. To whom God wishes to make known what is the riches of the glory of this secret, which is Christ among you (Gentiles), the hope of glory (Col. i. 27).

pp. 104 - 109

At the beginning the question was asked: "Is there some way of interpreting the Word of God, so that human opinion is ruled out, and Divine understanding given? We believe that the practical application of the guiding principles previously indicated will do this as far as it is humanly possible; moreover, these principles are a basis upon which all evangelicals who honour the Bible as the inspired Word of God should be able to agree. Only when treated in this way can the Holy Scriptures speak with authority and say: "Thus saith the Lord."

Not only this, but such a method of interpreting the Word is a great bulwark against error. The various false cults which surround us today could not have come into existence had they kept to historico-grammatical principles, and every one of them violates these in some way or another. The whole set-up of Christendom with its sects and divisions could not have developed as it has done had Christians from century one onwards handled the Scriptures along these lines; likewise the differences among evangelicals, especially on prophecy, could largely have been avoided by adherence to these rules of interpretation. There can only be one true interpretation of any passage of Scripture, although after this has been settled, applications may be made as long as they are consistent with the truth governing this age of grace in which we live. The result of such interpretation will be to distinguish in Scriptural truth (1) that which is permanently true for all time and (2) that which is true only for a limited period. In (1) we should class sin and the Divine remedy for it, salvation in Christ and its attendant doctrines of redemption, atonement and sanctification. In (2) we should put, among other things, the law given through Moses with its ceremonial, and the constitution of the people of Israel. There was a time when the rite of circumcision was truth; so much so, that of any who disobeyed it, God said: ". . . . . that soul shall be cut off from his people; he hath broken My covenant" (Gen. xvii. 14). This was a Divine command and could not be broken with impunity. Yet when we come to the epistle to the Galatians we read:

> "Stand fast therefore in the liberty wherewith Christ hath made us free, and be not entangled again with the yoke of bondage. Behold, I Paul say unto you, that if ye be circumcised, Christ shall profit you nothing" (Gal. v. 1-2).

No believer today brings an animal sacrifice to God when he has been overtaken in a fault, but there was a time when failure to do this would have been disobedience, which would have been directly punished by God. It was truth in Old Testament times, but it is not true today.

Clause (1) may be termed basic or fundamental truth, and clause (2) dispensational truth. Some need to be reminded that the word dispensation oikonomia is a Scriptural word which occurs eight times in the New Testament. It is not a human invention. It is often confused with the word "age" and treated as though it is a period of time. Some have taught that there are seven dispensations which they equate with time divided up into seven periods. This is a mistake, as time, basically, does not enter into this word. Three times it is translated "stewardship" in Luke xvi. 2, 3, 4, & "edifying" in I Tim. i. 4, and the root idea is of one who is put in charge of the administration of a household, an overseer or bailiff. Twice the apostle Paul declares that he had been given a dispensation (Eph. iii. 2; Col. i. 25). No period of time had been entrusted to him, but a body of truth connected with the Church, the Body of Christ, had been committed to him by the risen and ascended Christ Jesus, and for this he was its steward or minister, as these verses testify.

Because some have misunderstood or abused the word dispensation, this does not justify the rejection of dispensational truth as error. In every class and society there are those who act in an unbalanced way. One might as well reject Christianity because some have been such poor practical exponents of it. It should surely be obvious that these two aspects of Scriptural truth must be distinguished or confusion is bound to result. Nor must one be stressed and the other forgotten, otherwise an erroneous conception of God's Word will dominate the mind. In practice, every one who accepts the Bible as the Word of God and the regulator of their daily life is bound to be a dispensationalist. The very fact that such do not make any attempt to carry out animal sacrifices for sin, as mentioned before, shows that they regard such regulations as not being truth for today, however much they believe the Bible, and however true these commands were in the Old Testament times. The Mosaic ritual of the law was a dispensation, or administration of Divine truth, for a limited period only, and Moses was its steward. It was not basic for all time and has been superseded since the coming of the great Antitype, the Lord Jesus Christ, Who has fulfilled the type and shadow of the ceremonial law.

A practical following out of the historico-grammatical system of interpretation will assuredly lead to a distinguishing between these two most important aspects of revealed Truth, leading to a greater clarification and understanding of the great redemptive purpose of God. In fact it will lead to a practical realization of what the apostle Paul prayed for the Philippian believers, a spiritual perception enabling such to "try the things that differ" (i. 10, margin) or as the main text "approve things that are excellent". When things differ, they do so not only in external ways, such as shape and size, but in internal quality, and it is only by recognizing and distinguishing these that we can get the best. Abraham was a practical example of this attitude of mind. God had unconditionally given him and his posterity an earthly inheritance (Gen. xiii. 14-17; xv. 12-18). The Epistle to the Hebrews records by inspiration what the Old Testament leaves out, namely that to Abraham God gave a vision of the heavenly Jerusalem, very much as the apostle John received in Rev. xxi. Chapter xi. of Hebrews describes this as a "better country" (xi. 16), and a city which God has built (verse 10). Abraham "tried the things that differ" and found what was "more excellent". "Better" is one of the key words of Hebrews; there are seven things described by God as "better" (Heb. i. 4; vii. 7, 19; viii. 6; ix. 23; x. 34; xi. 35). If we want the best, then we shall have to consider carefully and prayerfully the Epistles to the Ephesians and Colossians where the high-water mark of revelation is reached.

If Abraham had been like many Christians today, he would have failed to distinguish between earthly and heavenly revelation, and would have missed the better things God had in view for him.

To many, the meek who shall inherit the earth (Matt. v. 5), and the citizenship that now exists in the heavens (Phil. iii. 20), are all one and the same thing. The spirit of discrimination that Abraham exercised is completely lacking in them. If this sort of attitude is right, then we might as well give up all serious Bible study, for words have no meaning. Others see the part and imagine it is the whole. There are systems of Bible interpretation that envisage all the redeemed being blessed in future on the earth, while another interpretation finally puts all the redeemed in heaven and has no place for an earthly kingdom. Both are wrong and have only a part of the Divine picture. What they need, and what we all need, is to have our minds stretched and enlarged to grasp more of the fullness of God's mighty plan of redemption and reconciliation that touches the highest heavens as well as the earth beneath (Col. i. 20), finding its final fulfillment in "new heavens and a new earth wherein dwelleth righteousness" (II Pet. iii. 13). The understanding of many of us is clouded because of our poverty of conception. We have a God that is too small, and a divine purpose that is little more than parochial.

When Paul urged Timothy to keep in the forefront of his mind the object of receiving God's approval, he was told this was bound up with "rightly dividing the Word of Truth" (II Tim. ii. 15), showing that the way we handle and interpret the Word of God is of supreme importance, and God's future assessment of our Christian testimony and whether we meet Him with joy or shame, depends upon our obedience to this command. We believe that if we carry out the guiding principles before enunciated, we shall be doing just this, and in doing so, we are allowing God's Word to mean exactly what it says, and every statement of Scripture can be taken in the setting in which we find it without alteration, addition or subtraction. It then ceases to be the word of man, but is in truth the Word of God. The critic may say that such a system is "divisive", that it "chops the Bible up into unrelated parts" and destroys the organic unity of Scripture. But rightly applied, this is not true. One could retort that the critic who recognizes the division of the Old and New Testaments, has chopped the Bible into halves. When we "rightly divide the Word", we shall recognize the basic doctrine of redemption and the final Headship of Christ that binds together the callings of the redeemed and the spheres of blessing, as well as noting the distinctions that God has made. Eph. i. 10 looks forward to a future dispensation of the fullness of the seasons when all heaven and earth are gathered under the headship of Christ, expressing a unity that will be unbreakable and eternal. "United yet divided" expresses the position, and to ignore one and hold to the other is unscriptural and can only lead to imbalance, and a partial or clouded view of God's great goal. It is quite pathetic to see how some expositors in their over-anxiety to overthrow "dispensationalism", erect a great man of straw, someone's particular brand of dispensational teaching, and then proceed with great show to knock it down, and imagine when they have done this that the dispensational approach to the Scriptures has been proved erroneous and overthrown. This is usually the attitude of the amillennialist, but amillennialism is a denial of the historico-grammatical system of exposition, at least as far as prophecy is concerned and, as such, it is an unsound and inconsistent method of study, with its allegorization, opening the door wide to human opinion and error. A further example of this can be seen in the amillennial treatment of the two resurrections of Rev. xx. The first is held to be spiritual, taking place at the salvation of the sinner; the second, the general physical resurrection of all the dead of all time. It is well to note the comments by Dean Alford on this passage in his Greek New Testament, and he had no leanings toward the dispensational viewpoint:

> "It will have been long ago anticipated by the readers of this commentary, that I cannot consent to distort its words (that of the passage) from their plain sense and chronological place in the prophecy, on account of any consideration of difficulty, or any risk of abuse which the doctrine of the millennium may bring with it. Those who lived next to the apostles, and the whole church for 300 years, understood them in the plain, literal sense, and it is a strange sight in these days to see expositors who are among the first in reverence of antiquity, complacently casting aside the most cogent instance of consensus which primitive antiquity presents. As regards the text itself, no legitimate treatment of it will extort what is known as the spiritual interpretation now in fashion. If, in a passage where two resurrections are mentioned, where certain psuchai ezesan at the first, and the rest of the nekroi ezesan only at the end of a specified period after the first—if in such a passage the first resurrection may be understood to mean spiritual rising with Christ, while the second means literal rising from the grave—then, there is an end of all significance in language, and Scripture is wiped out as a definite testimony to anything. If the first resurrection is spiritual, then so is the second, which I suppose none will be hardy enough to maintain; but if the second is literal, then so is the first, which in common with the whole primitive church and many of the best modern expositors, I do maintain, and receive as an article of faith and hope" (The Greek New Testament in loco).

These are sane and weighty words, and there is no doubt that Dean Alford has the majority of sound scholars with him. Hardly anywhere else is the futility of amillennial interpretation shown up more than in its handling of Rev. xx.

The amillennialist may call the pre-millennialist's views of the future "carnal" and "unscriptural", but he needs reminding that spiritual things are not necessarily better than the material. There is such a thing as spiritual wickedness (Eph. vi. 12). When God put Adam and Eve into the garden of Eden, was this carnal because it was material and on the earth? And when the earthly part of God's kingdom is realized and becomes like Eden again, is this to be dubbed carnal? The literal material and earthly is not to be avoided per se for this savours of the Gnostic abhorrence of the material, and any approach to this Satanic system of error, so prevalent in the early centuries of Christianity, must be avoided at all costs. The basic and dispensational approach to the Scriptures, keeping these in balance, will save us from this. Such a method of interpretation is sane and reverent, honours the Word of God and allows it to speak with all its authority, and is in no sense a system foisted upon it.

We return to a point we have already stressed, because of its extreme importance. All Scriptural interpretation must finally be Christological, in other words, the Lord Jesus Christ must be the centre and circumference of it all. To get bogged down with interpretive, doctrinal or dispensational details and to miss Him is to miss everything. The great redemptive purpose of the ages is centred in Him (Eph. iii. 11), and the time is yet to be when every being in heaven, and earth and under the earth will give Him His rightful place and acknowledge Him as Jehovah and Lord (Phil. ii. 9-11). Our main task is to preach Him (Gal. i. 15, 16) as the only remedy for the needs of the individual, the world and creation at large. We can only do this effectively when we handle the Word of God aright and have it richly within us (Col. iii. 16), and in His strength, grace and wisdom seek to make it known. A partial or faulty understanding of the written Word can only lead to an imperfect knowledge of the living Word. That is why hermeneutics, or the science of interpreting the Holy Scriptures, is of such great importance to every believer, whether a leader or teacher or otherwise. We should not count it a labour, a bore, or as being too difficult to get to know the principles which govern correct interpretation. Rather this should be something that is eagerly sought after, and we trust that this study, in some measure, has helped towards this goal.

In conclusion, the honest interpreter will always keep a supreme regard for truth at all costs. Nor will he forget the words of the Saviour: ". . . . . Sanctify them through Thy Truth: Thy Word is Truth" (John xvii. 17), nor His constant reverence for the Holy Scriptures (Matt. v. 17, 18; John v. 46, 47; Luke x. 25-28; Matt. xxii. 29) whose primary aim is to "make wise unto salvation through faith which is in Christ Jesus" (II Tim. iii. 15). To interpret the Scriptures is a high and holy task. God will not hold guiltless any who carelessly handle or tamper with His Word, substituting the folly and error of man for His wisdom and His Truth.

The Plan of God.

No.13. pp. 15 - 18

We have considered the wise practice of the believers at Berea in checking with the O.T. all they heard put forward as truth. We can scarcely over-estimate the importance of this. Truth then becomes first-hand, not second-hand, and the possibility of error is greatly reduced.

Now we are going to take bigger steps, otherwise we shall not reach our goal. You will find that in chapter xvii. the Apostle, in his travels, comes to Athens. Now Athens was the centre of the world's wisdom; there resided the great minds, the philosophers, the deep thinkers. We can read their writings today, and we see what great intellects these men had! Yet, strange to say, as he came to the centre of the world's learning, we are told that "his spirit was stirred within him" (verse 16). Why? "When he saw the city wholly given to idolatry". What a commentary on the human mind! You see what sin has done? It has so spoiled man's thinking, that when he comes to the things of God, he is just floundering helplessly in a deep ocean. This cleverness of intellect did not save these men from being idolators, worshipping images of stone and wood. How it stirred up this man who had the Spirit of Christ!

You will notice that, as his habit was, he goes straight to the Jew first (verse 17). We have seen why, because in the great plan of God for world blessing and enlightenment, they are to be the Divine Channel as stated in Gen. xii. One thing we should note is that the Apostle does not quote the O.T. Scriptures, as he usually does. Why? He was dealing with people who had no special regard for them. So he finds his point of contact in something one of their own poets wrote (verse 28), "for certain of your own poets have said, We also are his off-spring", and he made this statement the centre of his address. He said, in effect, "if that is true, surely we should not be so foolish as to make images of the Godhead and worship them!" Then he is able to bring in the great message of the Gospel. He commands all men (verse 30) everywhere to repent.

After this he moves on to Corinth. Corinth was a well-known port and centre of much business and it had a very bad reputation. It was a sink of iniquity. Even the ordinary pagan writers at this time spoke of the sin of Corinth. To "act the Corinthian" was to sink low indeed. One would hardly think that the grace of God could make any headway in a place like Corinth, but it did, showing that God's grace can save even the very worst of sinners! Paul comes to this place, and in just the same way, goes to the Jew first (vs. 4): "He reasoned in the synagogue every sabbath and persuaded the Jews and the Greeks (end of verse 5) that Jesus was the Christ". The word "Christ" is simply the Greek equivalent of the Hebrew "Messiah". He is seeking to convince these Jews that the Lord Jesus was their Messiah, going right to the heart of things with them. Notice again the continual opposition. It is evident that they will not believe, they will not receive the gospel with all the special promises to them consequent upon its reception. They hardened their hearts, they made their ears deaf to the message. What a terrible thing is this will of man when it turns against God! But God still waits in longsuffering. How wonderful is God's patience with His people! We are told (verse 6) they opposed and blasphemed; that was their answer to God's long-suffering and grace, so Paul "shook his raiment and said unto them, Your blood be upon your own heads; I am clean". He had discharged his responsibility in making known the good news, "from henceforth I will go unto the Gentiles". Now he had already said that, you remember, at Antioch, when he had received the same treatment there from the Jews. "It was necessary that the word of God should first have been spoken to you, but seeing ye put it from you and judge yourselves unworthy of everlasting life, lo, we turn to the Gentiles" (xiii. 46). That was only a local turning away from the Jew because, at the very next place he visits, he goes straight to the synagogue. The same thing happened here; he turns away from the Jews at Corinth; but when he comes to Ephesus, he still goes to the synagogue, to the chosen people and puts them first.

"And he came to Ephesus and left them there but he himself entered into the synagogue" (xviii. 19). So once more he is with the Jew. It was only another local turning away as before in Corinth. Then he goes down to Antioch (verse 22) and there is a very interesting episode brought before us in connection with a Jewish believer whose name was Apollos (verse 24), and Luke tells us that he was a man who was 'mighty in the Scriptures'. Note he does not say he was mighty in strength, or mighty in wisdom, but that he was mighty in the Scriptures! This is the secret for finding and progressing in truth and the knowledge of the Lord. It is because so many have no acquaintance with God's Book, that they have no knowledge of Him and His ways and so often go wrong. The Lord Jesus said to some in the days of His flesh, "Ye do err, not knowing the Scriptures". A sound knowledge of the Word of God is a sure preventative against wrong ideas and declension.

Apollos was 'mighty in the Scriptures', but there was further truth lying ahead of him. We are told (verse 25) that 'he spake and taught diligently (accurately) the things of the Lord' but he only knew up to the baptism of John. Accurate study is essential for getting truth, and this man was an accurate student as far as he went. But then there were two other believers who, knowing the truth given through Paul's ministry, were able to help this man [grow] on further. Their names were Aquila and Priscilla; and in verse 26 we are told that "When Priscilla and Aquila had heard, they took him unto them and expounded unto him the way of God more perfectly". This word "perfectly" is the same as the word 'diligently', literally, more accurately. Apollos was an accurate student of the truth but these believers were able to lead him on to a more accurate knowledge of it. This is a wonderful ministry, when we get to know the Scriptures, that is what we shall be able to do as God gives us opportunities. When we have got the Word of God treasured in our hearts and minds we shall be able to lead others on, just like Priscilla and Aquila did.

And so (verse 27), Apollos "helped them much which had believed through grace: For he mightily convinced the Jews shewing by the Scriptures that Jesus was the Christ".

We now go on further and find in chapter xix. that Paul comes back to Ephesus again, and a little further on we read this (verses 11-12): "And God wrought special miracles by the hands of Paul: So that from his body were brought unto the sick, handkerchiefs or aprons, and the diseases departed from them, and the evil spirits went out of them". When we get to the close of the Acts we shall find that miraculous and instantaneous healing still takes place. In this case, it was not necessary for Paul to be present! If only a piece of clothing that had touched his body was sent at a distance, it was quite sufficient to heal! Note these are special miracles and they run like a thread through the book of the Acts and then stop: We will note the importance of this later.

We now pass on to the twentieth chapter; here we find the Apostle Paul calling together the elders of the church at Ephesus (verse 17) "And from Miletus he sent and called for the elders of the chapter, we cannot help feeling that this phase of Paul's ministry was coming to a close. Twice he tells them that they are never going to see him again, and that greatly upsets them because they had such affection for him. He had helped them so much. Look at verse 25; Paul says "behold, I know that ye all, among whom I have gone preaching the kingdom of God, shall see my face no more". Verse 37: "And they all wept sore, and fell on Paul's neck and kissed him, sorrowing most of all for the word which he spake, that they should see his face no more". He continues (verse 22) "And now, behold I go bound in the spirit to Jerusalem, not knowing the things that shall befall me there: save that bonds and afflictions abide me", or, as the margin says, "wait for me". Prison lay ahead for him, God the Holy Spirit had shown him that, but he was willing and ready for it. Is it not grand to hear him saying (verse 24): "But none of these things move me"? Strengthened by the grace of God, that is what you and I can say whatever problems lie ahead. Paul later on when he wrote to the church at Philippi said: "I can do all things through Christ who strengthened me". It is a wonderful thing to know where the source of our strength lies. He knew, and surely we can know too.

Then follow two things which, we believe, sum up all faithful ministry and faithful service for the Lord Jesus. He says to them (verse 20), "how I kept back nothing that was profitable to you". (Verse 27), "I have not shunned to declare unto you all the counsel of God". I have kept back nothing; I have made known everything. This is the hall-mark of faithful Christian witness. Nothing held back because it may be unpopular, but everything the Lord has entrusted to us fully made known. If we can truthfully say this at the end of our lives, we shall be happy indeed!

When we come to chapter xxi. we find this prediction of imprisonment stressed. There was a prophet called Agabus (verse 10) and in verse 11 "when he was come unto us he took Paul's girdle and bound his own hands and feet, and said, Thus saith the Holy Ghost, so shall the Jews at Jerusalem bind the man that owneth this girdle and shall deliver him into the hands of the Gentiles". Again, God is speaking through this prophet and he is telling Paul that there is imprisonment ahead for him. Some have gone as far as to say that the Apostle Paul made a mistake; he should have avoided going to Jerusalem or Rome and so escaped imprisonment. But when we come to chapter xxiii. we are told (verse 11), "And the night following the Lord stood by him and said, Be of good cheer, Paul; for as thou hast testified of me in Jerusalem, so must thou bear witness also at Rome."

Paul may not have fully known what this future imprisonment was going to involve, but whatever it cost him, there was nothing but tremendous blessing coming through it for Gentile believers, who by nature were aliens and far off from God and all the blessings given to the covenant people Israel. This we trust, we shall get to know for ourselves as we proceed with our study and see how the riches of God's truth unfold.

We have seen how the Apostle Paul is taking the message as he goes on his missionary journeys, spreading the truth of the Gospel, but going to the chosen people first because they were still in covenant relation to God and His plan to reach the earth through the chosen people of Israel, Abraham's seed, was still a possibility.

Now we open the Book then at the twenty-sixth chapter of Acts, and we find now that, in the providence of God, Paul has come before King Agrippa and he is making his defence before this king. He says (verse 2): "I think myself happy, King Agrippa, because I shall answer for myself this day before thee touching all the things whereof I am accused of the Jews . . . . . And now I stand and am judged for the hope of the promise made of God unto our fathers". God made certain promises to Abraham, and confirmed them to Isaac and to Jacob as we have seen. These concerned their posterity, Israel, and what God was prepared to do through them for world blessing. At this point He was waiting for their repentance and trust in the Lord Jesus as their Messiah and Priest-King.

Verse 7: "Unto which promise our twelve tribes, instantly serving God day and night hope to come". Now what about those who teach that Israel was cast off by God at the Cross because they rejected the Lord Jesus? It is quite evident that the Apostle Paul did not believe that. The twelve tribes have still their hope, and there is still a possibility of it being fulfilled! No one knew but what, at the last moment, this nation might turn and repent and then God would have been as good as His Word; He would have sent back the Lord Jesus to them and the earthly Kingdom could have been realized (Acts iii. 19-26). We must keep the possibility of this still in our minds. We know that Israel did not repent and so it did not take place then. We must not look at things as we see them 2,000 years later, but try and put ourselves in the position of believers at this time. So there is a possibility of the hope of the promise that God gave to Abraham being fulfilled as late as Acts xxvi., otherwise words do not mean anything.

And will you notice too, that Paul does not say Judah only, the two tribes. He says twelve tribes; so the people who tell you ten tribes are lost are obviously wrong. Paul knew nothing about their beings lost. He speaks of twelve tribes who are waiting for their hope.

Now I want you to notice another thing which he says. He gives an account—this is the third account we have in the Acts—of his conversion; and it is not just needless repetition, because every time we have added details given us. We have it in Acts ix., in Acts xxii. and now in the twenty-sixth chapter. So, if we want the whole story, we must read these three chapters. There is one thing in this account in chapter xxvi. which we do not find in the other two. The Lord speaks to him and he asks Him first of all (verse 5) "Who art thou, Lord? And He said, I am Jesus whom thou persecutest. But rise and stand upon thy feet, for I have appeared to thee for this purpose, to make thee a minister and a witness both of those things which thou hast seen, and of those things in the which I will appear unto thee". Now let us try to be very simple. 'Both' must speak of two things. Two things mentioned here: (1) the things that had been shown to the Apostle by the Lord; (2) the things that would be shown to the Apostle by the Lord at some time in the future. So, clearly, there is a two-fold revelation given to Paul by Christ; once, at his conversion, and [another], at some unspecified date later on. Can we, when we look at Paul's ministry, find another time when the Lord gave to him an additional revelation to make known? The answer is yes. In the very next letter that Paul writes after the completion of the Acts he tells us this very thing.

So, anticipating just a little, let us go to this letter, the Epistle to the Ephesians. We will open it at chapter iii. He says (verse 1) "For this cause I Paul, the prisoner of Jesus Christ for you Gentiles, if ye have heard of the dispensation of the grace of God which is given me to you-ward: how that by revelation He made known unto me the mystery". Now he has not said anything about this in his earlier ministry for the simple reason it had not been revealed to anyone, being hid in God up to this point. This secret, for that is the meaning of the word 'mystery'—is concerning a newly created company which is called 'one new man' (ii. 15) and his aim now (verse 9) is "to make all men see what is the fellowship (or as the R.V. reads—the dispensation) of the mystery—the dispensation of the secret which from the beginning of the world hath been hid in God who created all things by Jesus Christ". After the Acts, when he ends up in Rome as a prisoner, the Lord had already appeared to him and now gives him the commission to make known the new revelation, and he does it in the first letter written afterwards, that to the Ephesians. We repeat that it was something that had been kept hidden by God Himself, and when God hides anything can anybody find it? The obvious answer is—"No". It is surely unbelief to try and find it in any place until God reveals it! But He does reveal it at this juncture; it is a secret no longer, He also refers to it when he writes to the believers at Colosse and he makes the tremendous statement that, God wants to make it known; God wills to make known what is this secret among the Gentiles. God wants to make it known! (Col. i. 27). Do you want to hear? He wants to tell it! Do you want to listen? We pray that each of us may have this desire, because in this secret we have the highest and the most wonderful revelation that God has ever given, and if we miss this, we shall miss the best.

We have seen that the Apostle Paul, in the twenty-sixth chapter of the Acts, brings forward the two-fold ministry given to him at his conversion by the Lord Jesus. Also, before we finish this chapter, he sums up his past ministry, and this is helpful to us. He says (verse 22) "Having therefore obtained help of God, I continue unto this day, those which the prophets and Moses did says should come. That Christ should suffer, and that he should be the first that should rise from the dead, and should show light unto the people (the Jew) and to the Gentiles". In other words, his ministry had gone no further than Moses and the O.T. In which case no revelation of the Body of Christ could have been given up to this point, as this was a secret, hid by God in Himself and not revealed and publicly proclaimed until Paul became the prisoner of Christ Jesus at Rome (Acts xxviii.). The well-known idea that the Body began at Pentecost is shown to be erroneous by this explicit statement of Paul's, and not until we can find this church clearly revealed in the Pentateuch, can we subscribe to such teaching, however popular it may be.

Now we come to the last chapter which is one of great importance. Paul has been traveling on his way to Rome to appear before Caesar. In his sea journey he has been shipwrecked, having passed through a terrific storm. If you want a vivid piece of narrative read Acts xxvii. Some people like reading thrilling adventure stories—well, here is one! We must pass over this and come to the last chapter. Paul arrives at the island we now call Malta; it is called here 'Melita'. We are told (verse 2) "The barbarous people showed us no little kindness; for they kindled a fire, and received us every one, because of the present rain, and because of the cold. And when Paul had gathered a bundle of sticks, and laid them on the fire, there came a viper out of the heat, and fastened on his hand." Now they noted this and said among themselves, obviously this is divine judgment on this man. He is wicked, so the gods have allowed a snake to bite him and he will surely die.

But let us read verse 4 and see what actually did happen. "They said among themselves, No doubt this man is a murderer, whom, though he hath escaped the sea, yet vengeance suffereth not to live." And then, to their surprise "he shook off the beast into the fire, and felt no harm". That must have been an anti-climax surely! Expecting him to fall dead they note that the poisonous snake bite does not have the slightest effect on Paul. So their attitude now changes. He must be a god, then—there must be something divine about this man. "Howbeit they looked when he should have swollen, or fallen down dead suddenly; but after they had looked a great while and saw no harm come to him, they changed their minds, and said that he was a god."

There must be some good reason why this incident happened and is recorded here, and it should take our minds back to a promise that the Lord Jesus made, in ascension, to the eleven. In Mark xvi. 17 the Lord said "And these signs shall follow them that believe". If this promise is true—and we may be assured that every promise of the Lord is true—then there is no doubt about it that these signs will follow every true believer. "In my Name they shall cast out devils (or demons), they shall speak with new tongues"; this they did, on the day of Pentecost and onwards. Now note: "They shall take up serpents" (Paul had done this very thing), "and if they drink any deadly thing, it shall not hurt them. They shall lay hands on the sick and they shall recover". Now not only did Paul experience a deadly snake bite, but we find him also healing again, as recorded in this chapter, showing the promise of Mark xvi. is still holding good at this point. Following hard on the episode concerning the snake bite, verse 8 states "and it came to pass, that the father of Publius lay sick of a fever and of a bloody flux". We would call it by its modern name—dysentery—a very serious and difficult disease to treat, especially in those days; "to whom when Paul entered in, and prayed, and laid his hands on him, and healed him". This was instantaneous healing; it was the real thing. He did not have to wait for two or three weeks before he was cured. "So when this was done, others also, which had diseases in the island, came and were healed." So there is the second promise of Mark xvi. being fulfilled in connection with Paul's public ministry. Do these signs follow every true believer today according to the Lord's promise? If not, why not? This should be a challenge to everyone who is saved to find a Scriptural answer. Now he comes to Rome, the very centre of civilization at that time, and the first thing he does is to do what he has done all the way through the Acts; he contacts the leaders of Israel. He gather them together, speaks to them and reasons with them thus: (verse 20) "For this cause therefore have I called for you, to see you, and to speak with you: because that for the hope of Israel I am bound with this chain." Now he had already before Agrippa stated that Israel's hope was still possible. The twelve tribes, he said, are still waiting for their hope, and here he asserts that he is bound for the hope of Israel. This awaited one thing—Israel's repentance and their conversion—their turning back to God. We are never going to understand the Divine movement through the Acts unless we put Israel in the proper place that this book puts them. It is "to the Jew first" to the last chapter, clearly showing that they had not yet been laid aside in unbelief by God. But now God's longsuffering runs out. God had not "cast away His people which He foreknew" (Rom. xi. 2). He had waited in matchless patience for some 35 years since Calvary. He said "all day long I have stretched forth my hands unto a disobedient and gainsaying people" (Rom. x. 21). But now His judgment is about to fall.

Coming to verse 23 we read "And when they had appointed him a day, there came many to him into his lodging; to whom he expounded and testified the Kingdom of God, persuading them concerning Jesus, both out of the law of Moses, and out of the prophets". There is an earthly side and a heavenly side to the all-embracive Kingdom of God. Which is Paul dealing with here? The context connects it with Moses (the Pentateuch) and the O.T. prophets. He must have been dealing then with the Israel and the earthly kingdom purpose. It was that part of the Kingdom of God that was revealed in the O.T. concerning God's kingdom on earth.

What was their response? Let us see (verse 24) "And some believed the thing which were spoken, and some believed not". Still no unanimity you see—some believed, some believed not. After all this long waiting on the part of God, after all this ministry to them which included the gospel of the circumcision, there is no sign of a unanimous repentance and turning to God as they had been commanded to do (Acts iii. 19-26).

And this is where God's longsuffering finally ran out: "And when they agreed not among themselves, they departed, after that Paul had spoken one word". He now quotes from a very solemn passage from the O.T.; It is from Isa. vi. "Well spake the Holy Ghost by Isaiah the Prophet unto our (but if you read the R.V. 'unto your') fathers saying, Go unto this people and say, Hearing you shall hear, and not understand; and seeing ye shall see and not perceive. For the heart of this people is waxed gross (heavy, hard), and their ears are dull of hearing, and their eyes have they closed, lest they should see with their eyes, and hear with their ears, and understand with their heart, and should be converted and I should heal them". This is the same word that Peter spoke to them in Acts iii.: "Repent and be converted"—turn again—but they refused to turn back to God and truly repent. "Be it known therefore unto you, that the salvation of God is sent (or 'was sent') unto the Gentiles, and they will hear it". You refuse to hear it, they will hear it—look at the difference! The poor, despised Gentiles whom the Jews looked on as dogs, heard the Word gladly and received it, but the Jews would not do so, with the consequence that they had become blind, deaf, and so hardened spiritually, that now they are quite unusable by God and He lays them aside. As a race they have been in this condition ever since. True, God has saved individual Jews, but racially they are still Christ rejecters. They have been in the forefront of God's purpose since Gen. xii., for the establishment of God's kingdom on earth. Will this kingdom never come? Has God finally cast away Israel? The Scriptural answer is 'no'. On the basis of the New Covenant of grace, they will yet be restored (Jer. xxxi. 31; Rom. xi. 25-29) at the Second Coming of the Lord. Meanwhile God has been carrying out another phase of His great redemptive purpose that affects the heavens, and men and women of this age who are saved by grace. For them are unsearchable riches such as Israel never knew. These lie ahead for our explanation by faith.

We finished our study last time at the end of the Acts of the Apostles; we saw that it struck a tragic note because the plan of God, which embraced the whole world to be reached through the Jewish nation, was temporarily brought to a halt through their opposition and unbelief. God's longsuffering at last ran out with this people, and at Rome, the Apostle Paul was commissioned by the Holy Ghost to quote from Isa. vi., and tell them that, like their fathers of old, they had got into such a terrible condition that they could not see, hear, or understand God's truth, whereas the Gentile, the outsider, would receive the message. The prophet Hosea had looked forward to this time, and prophesied that God would call Israel, Lo-ammi, not my people. But not only that, He says something even worse: "and I will not be your God". Can you think of anything more terrible than that? Supposing God said to us, "I will not be your God", what could we do about it? Absolutely nothing, and our outlook would be hopeless in the extreme. And this nation cannot do anything about it until, as we have seen, God steps in, in the Person of His Son, when He returns in power and glory. Nothing less than this great event will be needed to convert this hardened earthly people of the Lord. Then their hard hearts are going to melt; then at last they are going to have their real Day of Atonement, they will repent when they look on Him and see Him as their Saviour and their Sinbearer. And I am sure they will then marvel because they have been so blind, when their O.T. Scriptures made it so clear that He was their Messiah, their Priest-King.

Before we go any further, let us note a promise that Christ made in resurrection, in Mark xvi. 17, 18, because this promise was fulfilled right through the book of the Acts. Verse 15 reads "And He said to them (that is, the eleven) Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature. He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved, but he that believeth not shall be damned (or condemned). And these signs shall follow them that believe. In my name they shall cast out devils (or better—demons), they shall speak with new tongues . . . . ." (they did, on the day of Pentecost and onwards), "They shall take up serpents . . . . ." (we have seen that Paul did this and suffered no harm from the snake bite). "If they drink any deadly thing it shall not hurt them; they shall lay hands on the sick and they shall recover"—miraculous thing!

Now on the day of Pentecost, in chapter ii., Peter makes this statement (Acts ii. 22) "Ye men of Israel hear these words, Jesus of Nazareth, a man approved of God (attested of God) among you by miracles, and wonders and signs, which God did by Him in the midst of you, as ye yourselves also know . . . . ." Do you realize that these miracles, wonders and signs were Messiah's credentials, as it were? It was a Divine guarantee to Israel that Christ was the true Messiah. There have been many false Christs, and how were the people of Israel to avoid being deceived? The answer is that the real Messiah would not just perform miracles (Satan can travesty and perform miracles, II Thess. ii. 8, 9) but that He would perform the specific miracles predicted by the O.T. Scriptures.

So let us turn back to Isa. xxxv. 4 "Say to them that are of a fearful heart, Be strong and fear not; behold your God will come with vengeance, even God with a recompense; He will come and say you. Then the eyes of the blind shall be opened, and the ears of the deaf shall be unstopped. Then shall the lame man leap as an hart, and the tongue of the dumb sing". Were not these the very miracles that the Lord Jesus performed day after day in His earthly ministry, If any, in Isaiah's day, had spiritualized these verses they would have been hopelessly wrong: They were literally fulfilled, time after time, by the Lord in the days of His flesh. He did open the eyes of the blind; He did give hearing to the deaf; He did make people leap as an hart (the impotent man); He did make dumb people speak! These were the specific miracles, wonders and signs which were the guarantee that He was the true Messiah. And you will find these divine signs did not stop at the Crucifixion; they continued right throughout the Acts and then stopped.

Let us turn to Acts ii. 43: "And fear came upon every soul, and many wonders and signs were done by the apostles". Chapter iii. commences with one; the healing of a lame man, and he is made to do what Isaiah said—"leap as an hart". Peter takes him (verse 7) “by the right hand, and lifted him up, and immediately his feet and ankle bones received strength. And he leaping up . . . . .” here is the lame man leaping as an hart!

Acts iv. 29. Here is a gathering of believers praying and saying “And now, Lord, behold their threatenings; and grant unto Thy servants that with all boldness they may speak Thy word—by stretching forth Thy hand to heal; and that signs and wonders may be done by the Name of thy holy Child Jesus”. Acts v. 12 “And by the hands of the apostles were many signs and wonders wrought among the people . . . . .” Not just a few, many were performed. And then in verse 15, “Insomuch that they brought forth the sick into the streets and laid them on beds and couches, that at the least the shadow of Peter passing by might overshadow some of them. There came also a multitude out of the cities round about in Jerusalem, bringing sick folks and them which were vexed with unclean spirits, and they were healed every one”. No failures, no mention of a lack of faith, no exceptions, but every one healed!

Acts vi. 8 “And Stephen, full of faith and power, did great wonders and miracles among the people”. Chapter viii. 13 “Then Simon himself believed also; and he was baptized, he continued with Philip, and wondered, beholding the miracles and signs which were done”.

We come to chapter xiii. and here we find another miracle, but this time one of judgment, not healing. A Jew named Elymas, a sorcerer, was blinded for a season. This was a prophetic warning to Israel of what finally came on them at Acts xxviii.—blinded eyes. Verse 11: “And now, behold, the hand of the Lord is upon thee and thou shalt be blind, not seeing the sun for a season”. It is not blindness for ever; nor is it with the people of Israel, as Rom. xi. makes clear. Chapter xiv. 3, “Long time therefore abode they speaking boldly in the Lord, which gave testimony unto the word of his grace, and granted signs and wonders to be done by their hands”. And then there is another record of a cripple being healed at Lystra, and note what is said in verse 10: Paul “Said with a loud voice, Stand upright on thy feet. And he leaped” (here is the leaping again) “and walked”. God’s Word is fulfilled to the letter! Chapter xv. 12: Here is recorded a very important church meeting at Jerusalem and this is what was said—“Then all the multitude kept silence, and gave audience unto Barnabas and Paul, declaring what miracles and wonders God had wrought among the Gentiles by them”. Acts xix. 11: “And God wrought special miracles by the hands of Paul: So that from his body were brought unto the sick handkerchiefs or aprons, and the diseases departed from them, and the evil spirits went out of them”. So, in those days, it was not even necessary for Paul to be present for healing to take place! Even a handkerchief that had touched his body could heal at a distance, and did so, as this verse tells us. Then we come to the last chapter, Acts xxviii., where we are told (verse 8) “that the father of Publius lay sick of a fever and of a bloody flux” (what we would call dysentery) “to whom Paul entered in and prayed, and laid his hands on him, and healed him. So when this was done, others also, which had diseases in the island came and were healed”.

These special miracles, then, go right through the Acts like a thread, and are as much in evidence in the last chapter as they are at the beginning, and then they cease, which can be seen when we turn to the epistles written after the Acts of the Apostles. Turning to Philippians, a letter Paul wrote from his Roman prison, we find in chapter ii. that he refers to a very valued fellow-worker by the name of Epaphroditus, and in verse 26 he says: "He longed after you all and was full of heaviness, because, ye had heard that he had been sick". And indeed he was sick, near to death (verse 30) "because for the work of Christ he was nigh unto death, not regarding his life" ('he hazarded his life', says the R.V.). Does Paul heal him? No; what he says is this: "God had mercy on him . . . . . and on me also". Now if the Apostle Paul still had the power to heal, this is inexplicable, is it not? Here is a valued fellow-worker and all the Apostle can say is that God had mercy on us both and preserved his life! Paul did not heal him; why not, if he still had the power so to do?

We turn to I Tim. v. 23, and here we have the Apostle giving health advice to his beloved son in the faith, Timothy. Now here was one who was very close indeed to the Apostle Paul—This is what he says to him (v. 23) "Drink no longer water, but use a little wine for thy stomach's sake and thine often infirmities". A "little wine" prescribed, rather than miraculous healing! Or look at Paul's last letter (II Tim. iv. 20): "Erastus abode at Corinth; but Trophimus have I left at Miletum sick". We do not find Paul doing that in the Acts. Evidently now the power to heal was his no longer. The covenant nation, who had all the signs and wonders, had now been laid aside by God and all the external evidential miracles went with them. What we are going to see now is that there is new truth about to be revealed, and this truth is a secret phase of God's purpose which He had never made known before. It is not directly connected with the earthly kingdom, but with a heavenly side of His purpose, and miraculous gifts have no relationship to this spiritual calling.

No.17. pp. 96 - 100

In our last study we noted how evidential miracles run right through the Acts of the Apostles and then stop abruptly, and we noted the reason for this. In summing up, let us now look through the Book as a whole. The Acts is a most important book in the N.T. because, if we get a correct understanding of it, we shall be greatly helped to place the Epistles of the N.T. in their right setting. We saw that there was an overlapping between Luke's Gospel and the Acts. The Gospel ended with the Saviour giving the eleven opened understanding that they might understand the Scriptures, so that whatever doubts and wrong ideas they had before, He was able to correct. And not only that but the first chapter tells us that for forty days they had the wonderful privilege of Him taking the Word, the O.T. Scriptures, and explaining their meaning to them. So they were in an extraordinarily favoured position. We should hardly think that any Christian has been in a better position to understand God's truth. And we saw the first question they asked, because of that instruction was, "Wilt Thou at this time restore again the kingdom to Israel?" If we just opened the Book and pick out that verse without seeing what has gone before, we might say, as some have said, that this was a foolish question. They should have been asking the Lord to teach them about the Church. But they could not have known anything about the Body of Christ as we know it today, for that was still a secret, hid in God. But they do ask Him, because of His unfolding of the O.T. Scriptures, as to whether the kingdom would be restored again to the people of Israel at this time. The Lord did not say it would never be restored to this people, rather it was the time of restoration that He could not reveal.

Then we looked at the day of Pentecost and its relationship to that great plan for world blessing that is reveled in the Bible. We saw that the Apostle Peter, under the guidance of the Holy Spirit, links it with the prophecy of Joel. We saw that Peter's quotation was in a setting of restoration for the people of Israel; so that it is all in line with the disciples' question. And Peter tells us that the Lord Jesus Christ had been raised to sit on David's throne, and that has surely a close relationship with the people of Israel and not the church, the Body of Christ. The Hebrew Christians who were saved on that day formed part of the faithful Jewish remnant that the Apostle Paul is going to talk about later on.

Then we came to chapter iii., an extremely important chapter. There is a miracle of healing performed before the Jews, showing, in effect, that what God had done for that lame man, he was able to do spiritually for them, if they would only repent and turn again, and that is what they were commanded to do by the Apostle. Wondrous things God promised if they would do that. Their sins would be forgiven (you would hardly think it possible that God could forgive the great sin of crucifying Christ!). Yet it was possible; and not only that, but He would send back again Jesus Christ who before had been preached to them in His earthly ministry. And we took the trouble to look through all the epistles written during the time covered by the Acts, and every one of them looks on the Lord's coming as being imminent. And no one at that time knew whether the people of Israel would repent or not; we know that now, of course, as it is a matter of history that they did not! But we must try and put ourselves back in the place of people at this time if we really want to understand how the purpose is developing. Peter not only tells them that the Lord Jesus Christ would return, but that the glorious kingdom as made known by the O.T. prophets would then set in. This was no secret; it had been clearly revealed in the O.T. And we can still go to those same Scriptures and see exactly what would have happened had the Nation of Israel obeyed that command.

Then we passed on to chapter v., where Peter deals with the resurrection. He says that the Lord Jesus had been raised from the dead to give repentance to Israel. That is a fact that is often overlooked. The resurrection of Christ is of tremendous importance because it is the very foundation of the Christian faith; but how often do we hear of the Lord Jesus being raised to give a change of heart, a change of mind, to the people of Israel? The usual idea is that the Jew, as regards God's purpose, was finished at the Cross; but no, there is at this point, still a possibility of them repenting and turning back to the Lord and the earthly Kingdom being set up.

And then in Acts x. we find a very important event recorded—the coming-in of a Gentile to blessing with Israel. We see Peter using the keys of the kingdom and unlocking the door to the Gentiles. And, of course, there was nothing secret about that. God had never intended from the start that the kingdom would be limited to the people of Israel. His plan was that it should be worldwide, but that Israel should be the channel, to take the knowledge of salvation to the ends of the earth. But Gentile blessing was happening in advance of the Divine plan because, at this point, Israel was not ready to be used as a channel for world blessing. The reason for this is made clear in Rom. xi. where the Apostle instructs the Roman church and tells them that the Gentile was admitted to provoke the people of Israel to emulation, to provoke them to jealousy, that is, if possible, to wake them up from the terribly hardened and blinded condition that they were sinking into deeper and deeper.

Then we came on to the recorded ministry of the Apostle Paul. His public ministry started in chapter xiii. at Antioch. We find he gives a very long speech there, again dealing with the people of Israel, and he also mentions the resurrection. He tells his hearers, among other things, that the Lord was raised in connection with "the sure mercies of David" and this took us back to Psa. lxxxix., where God had made a covenant with David concerning the throne. He made a covenant with Abraham, Isaac and Jacob concerning the seed and the land; and the sure mercies of David deal with the seed and the throne; not only the people and the home, but the leader they were to have. So this is parallel with Peter, Christ raised to sit on David's throne. The sure mercies were fulfilled of course, finally, in the Lord Jesus Christ Himself, for at the first the angel prophesied that He would reign over the house of Jacob for ever and ever.

Next we found that the Apostle Paul, on his missionary journeys, always went to the synagogue first. It was to the Jew first always with him. This is impossible to understand unless we see that, in God's plan then being worked out, the people of Israel are still to be reckoned with. There is still the possibility of them being used for world blessing if they would only turn to God and repent. Otherwise why go to them first? But Paul said to them in Acts xv. 46 it was necessary that they should have the message first. Peter says the same thing to the Jew in chapter iii. "unto you first". This is what is stressed, as we know, in the opening chapter of Romans; to the Jew first for the gospel, to the Jew first for judgment, too. As long as the Jew is in covenant relationship with God, which put them above all other nations in light and responsibility, the Jew must be first: that was the position that God willed they should have in the outworking of the earthly kingdom, and O.T. Scriptures made that very clear (Deut. xxviii. 13). Although in so many places that Paul visited the message is rejected by the Jew, we find he still goes to the synagogue. And he does this right to the last chapter when, under the guidance of the Lord, he finds himself at Rome, and there again he calls the chief of the people of Israel. He tells them he is still bound for Israel's hope. But before that, we saw in chapter xxvi. that he stood in front of King Agrippa and also reminded him, even at this juncture, that the twelve tribes were still waiting for their hope. And when, at Rome, there was still disagreement among them, he was inspired by the Holy Spirit to give the final word, the final quotation of that terrible prophecy recorded in Isa. vi.—laying the nation aside in unbelief and spiritual darkness. And this spiritual darkness is so terrible that it can only be removed by the Second Advent of the Lord. It is when they look on Him Whom they have pierced, the Scripture says that they are going to mourn and repent. It will take nothing less than the returning glory of their Saviour to at last bring them to their knees.

So we find then that the break with the Jewish nation is not at the Cross; it is at the end of the Acts. There is a consistent line of Divine purpose going right through from Gen. xii., where God lays hold of Abraham, right on to the end of the Acts, and we can say that the people of Israel are in the forefront all the way through till that point. There is coming a time, the Second Advent of Christ, when God is going to deal with His earthly people again. Between these two points there is a gap so far as the earthly kingdom is concerned, and what fills it up is the revelation that the Lord Jesus Christ made known through Paul, His prisoner. And this concerns the revelation of a secret purpose of God concerning His heavenly people, the body of Christ, the fullness of Him that filleth all in all.

In this company there is no Jew and no Gentile either. It is a new creation where both lose their status and something infinitely better is revealed. That is one reason why this could not be revealed during the Acts where Israel, the chosen nation, is being dealt with by God until the last chapter.

We have looked at the word 'church' as used in the Bible, and we saw that it would be quite Scriptural to talk about the children of Israel as a church, because this word only means a called-out company of people, which just describes the nation of Israel. And in any case, the word 'congregation' that we have as many times in the O.T. is translated 'church' in the Greek translation of the O.T., the Bible in common use in N.T. times. Stephen does not hesitate to use the word 'church' in connection with the people of Israel; he calls them 'the church in the wilderness'. It is not correct to say that there is only one church in the Bible: there is only one Body, but that is quite another thing. There was a called-out company of Hebrew Christians, as we would term them today, at Pentecost—a church who were indeed the Israel of God. But was it the Church connected with the secret that was revealed after the Acts through Paul's later prison ministry? We have seen that this cannot be. For one thing every step in the Acts was linked with the O.T. which is quoted at various points and therefore was not, and could not be secret in any way. Let us obey the command in Phil. i. 10 margin and "Try the things that differ" and not confuse them. If we do this, how can we expect to get light and blessing? We want to make it plain that it is not foundation or basic truths that change after the Acts, such as sin, salvation and sanctification, these are true for all time. But God can reveal various aspects of His great plan for His creation, all of them resting solidly upon the death and resurrection of Christ, and this is what we find after Israel's failure at the end of the Acts. God now reveals something entirely new, related to the heavens and not the earth, and it is this heavenly side of the purpose of the ages connected with the Body of Christ that now comes to the forefront and dominates the scene during this age of grace, while the nation of Israel are in darkness and unusable by God.

No.18. pp. 109 - 114

We have been studying the Acts, and have found that the people of Israel are dealt with by God right through to the last chapter. The Apostle Paul put them first because of their important covenant relationship with God, but at the end they are laid aside in unbelief and hardness of heart. We now ask the question—have they any part in God's future plan for world blessing and the establishment of his Kingdom on earth? We find that evangelicals are largely divided on this. Some will say yes, definitely, there is coming a time when this nation is at last going to be saved and restored and made useable by the Lord. Equally, there are others who say—no, there is no future for them as a nation in God's redemptive plan; all the blessings that God promised to them have been transferred spiritually to the Church. The Church now is the real Israel; they are the Israel of God—the spiritual Israel. Now this is very important because we are, together, trying to search out the revealed plan of God in His Book, past, present and future, and we cannot afford to err on such important points of doctrine.

We have, in past studies, looked at the covenant that God made with this nation. In Exod. xix. we saw that God made some remarkable statements concerning what He was prepared to do for them, but it was a conditional covenant. God said, you shall be a peculiar people to me, a peculiar treasure, above all people. You shall be a kingdom of priests; there had never been such a thing before—a priestly kingdom and a holy nation. But it was conditional, to be realized only if they kept the law. They had already received the ten commandments through Moses, but they broke them. We would admit that, if this was all God had revealed for Israel, then there is no future for them as a nation. They broke the conditions for the fulfillment of the covenant and they have no claim at all upon God from that standpoint.

However God did not let the matter rest there; later on He made another covenant with the same people and this time there was no 'if' about it. It all concerns God's actions for Israel, and this time it is not conditional. Let us turn to Jer. xxxi. 31 and see.

This reads: "Behold, the days come, saith the Lord, that I will make a new covenant with the house of Israel, and with the house of Judah:". Obviously this is the same nation that we have mentioned in the Book of Exodus as the following verses clearly show.

We read on: "Not according to the covenant that I made with their fathers in the day that I took them by the hand to bring them out of the land of Egypt, which My covenant they brake, although I was an husband unto them, saith the Lord. But this shall be the covenant that I will make with the house of Israel. After those days, saith the Lord, I will put My law in their inward parts". When God writes His truth in the heart of an individual something lasting is going to happen. God says, I will do this for this people; I will put My law in their inward parts, and "write it in their hearts; and will be their God, and they shall be My people". There are no 'ifs' here; God says He will do all these things without conditions. "And they shall teach no more every man his neighbour . . . . . saying, Know the Lord; for they shall all know Me from the least of them unto the greatest of them, saith the Lord: for I will forgive their iniquity, and will remember their sin no more". And then God appeals to creation (verse 35): "Thus saith the Lord, which giveth the sun for a light by day, and the ordinances of the moon and of the stars for a light by night, which divideth the sea when the waves thereof roar: The Lord of hosts is his name". Now a challenge thrown out: "if those ordinances depart from before Me, saith the Lord, then the seed of Israel also shall cease from being a nation before Me for ever". This cannot be just the blessing of individual Jews and their being saved by the Gospel today. "Thus saith the Lord, If the heaven above can be measured, and the foundations of the earth searched out beneath", (then—another challenge) "I will also cast off all the seed of Israel for all that they have done, saith the Lord". What a challenge this is! Nobody can accept it because it is impossible to carry out!

So there must be, then, a future for this people, for God could not be more emphatic or more clear. We shall see some other parts of Scripture confirm this, and at the end the combined testimony is overwhelming.

Let us now turn to the N.T. to Rom. xi. 11. Here the Apostle Paul is dealing with Israel's lack of response, their opposition to the gospel right throughout the Acts of the Apostles. God had opened the door, through Peter's ministry, to the Gentiles, and here Paul tell us why. "I say then, Have they stumbled that they should fall? God forbid; but rather through their fall salvation is come unto the Gentiles, for to provoke them (Israel) to jealousy"—in order to stimulate them spiritually, if it was possible so to do. And then in verse 14: "If by any means I may provoke to emulation them which are my flesh, and might save some of them. For if the casting away of them be the reconciling of the world, what shall the receiving of them be but life from the dead?" If this is true, how can some say there is no future for Israel in the plan of God? Paul says there is coming a time when they are going to be received back into blessing. God has lopped them temporarily in unbelief, the branches had been 'broken off'. But God is able to put them back again and restore them, and when that happens it is going to be like resurrection life, life from the dead, to the world. That is what a dead world needs, resurrection life.

We will go on further to verse 24. The Apostle now speaks to the Gentiles: "For if thou wert cut out of the wild olive tree which is wild by nature" (the olive tree is simply a symbol of the people of Israel Jer. xi. 16) "and wert grafted contrary to nature into a good olive tree; how much more shall these, which be the natural branches, be grafted into their own olive tree?" This is the receiving of them back again. Then he drops symbolism and says plainly: (Verse 25) "For I would not, brethren, that ye should be ignorant of this mystery (this secret), lest ye should be wise in your own conceits; that blindness in part is happened to Israel, until the fullness of the Gentiles be come in". Even if we do not understand what "the fullness of the Gentiles" means, we can surely understand that Israel's blindness cannot be for ever. It is only blindness for a limited period on this people. After that (verse 26) "And so all Israel shall be saved". And the context makes it clear that he is not dealing with the Church which is His Body! This is the literal people of Israel, the nation of Israel, those who are "my flesh" as Paul describes them in chapter ix. as his own kinsmen. "And so all Israel shall be saved: as it is written, There shall come out of Sion the Deliverer, and shall turn away ungodliness from Jacob." He is coming back to deliver them and He is going to deal with their past sins and apostasy. You will remember the New Covenant with its assurance—"Their sins and their iniquities will I remember no more". When the Lord was on earth He instituted the New Covenant memorial feast. He said "This is (this represents) the New Covenant in My blood which is shed for many". Basically, the restoration of the people of Israel depends upon that one perfect Sacrifice which the Lord Jesus Christ made, and upon that firm foundation, and at the return of Christ, they shall look upon Him Whom they have pierced, repent and believe. That will be sufficient at last to bring them to a saving knowledge of the Lord Jesus. They will be a nation born at a stroke; a nation useable at last by God to be a channel of blessing to the whole world. All the true Israel will indeed be saved.

Now note verse 27: "For this is my covenant unto them, when I shall take away their sins". This is a direct reference to the New Covenant we have been considering, the same covenant when God does these wondrous things for them and saves them. He is going to deal with their sins, the sin of blindness and hardness and deafness and refusal. They have been in this condition for nearly 2,000 years, but one day all that is going to be taken away on the basis of this New Covenant of grace resting upon the shed blood of the Lord Jesus.

Verse 28: "As concerning the gospel, they are enemies for your sakes: but as touching the election they are beloved for the fathers' sakes. For the gifts and calling of God are without repentance". Do let us get clear in our minds what the meaning of this word "repentance" is. It is not the same as a similar-sounding word—penitence—but it, primarily means a change of mind. Now here is a most marvelous statement, that God does not change his mind over His purposes. As this is a fact, there must be a future for the people of Israel. Some Christians tell us that He has changed His mind and has transferred all the promises made to Israel over to the Church! But this goes flatly against what the Scriptures have made so very clear.

This view is held by the a-millennialist, who does not believe in a literal earthly Kingdom for 1,000 years, and this view is gaining ground alas, in some quarters. We want to be quite sure that we are resting upon the Word of God and not on the opinions of men, however good they may be. Let us go back to Jer. xxxiii. 25, "Thus saith the Lord: If my covenant be not with day and night, and if I have not appointed the ordinances of heaven and earth: Then will I cast away the seed of Jacob, and David My Servant, so that I will not take any of his seed to be rulers over the seed of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob: for I will cause their captivity to return, and have mercy on them". Here is another Divine challenge thrown out concerning creation: God says, if I have not appointed the ordinances of the day and night then I will cast this nation off—but He has ordained day and night, and so He has not and will not cast away His earthly people for ever!

Turning now to Deut. xxx. 1, 2 we read: "And it shall come to pass, when all these things are come upon thee, the blessing and the curse which I have set before thee, and thou shalt call them to mind among all the nations, whither the Lord thy God hath driven thee" (and that is where they are now, and have been for 1,900 years or more) "And shalt return unto the Lord thy God, and shalt obey His voice according to all that I command thee this day, thou and thy children, with all thine heart, and with all thy soul: That then the Lord thy God will turn thy captivity . . . . . and will return and gather thee from all the nations whither the Lord thy God hath scattered thee. If any of thine be driven out unto the outmost parts of heaven, from thence will the Lord thy God gather thee, and from thence will he fetch thee: And the Lord thy God will bring thee into the land which thy fathers possessed, and thou shalt possess it; and He will do thee good, and multiply thee above thy fathers". That has never been fully fulfilled; there have been partial fulfillments, but not a complete one.

We go on to Isa. xliii. 5: "Fear not: for I am with thee: I will bring thy seed from the east, and gather thee from the west; I will say to the north, Give up; and to the south, Keep not back: bring My sons from far, and My daughters from the ends of the earth". We are told in Jer. xxxi. 10 that He which scattered Israel will also gather him; and just as Israel must be the literal nation who were scattered, so the gathering must refer to the same people.

And finally, to Ezek. xxxvii. 21. The prophet is instructed to say this to them: "Behold, I will take the children of Israel from among the heathen" (from among the Gentile nations) "whither they be gone, and will gather them on every side, and bring them into their own land"; this must be the literal land that God promised to Abraham. In our earlier studies we went back to the very beginning and saw the geographical boundaries that God set to that land, from the great river Nile to the river Euphrates, and this cannot be spiritualized and make sense. Verse 22: "And I will make them one nation in the land upon the mountains of Israel; And one king shall be king to them all: and they shall be no more two nations, neither shall they be divided into two kingdoms any more . . . . ." Verse 24: "And David my servant shall be king over them; and they shall have one shepherd: they shall also walk in My judgments and observe My statutes, and do them. And they shall dwell in the land that I have given unto Jacob My servant, wherein your fathers have dwelt". Again this must be the same land. "And they shall dwell therein, even they, and their children, and their children's children for ever: and My servant David shall be their prince for ever. Moreover, I will make a covenant of peace with them: it shall be an everlasting covenant with them; and I will place them, and multiply them, and will set My sanctuary in the midst of them for evermore. My tabernacle also shall be with them; yea, I will be their God, and they shall be My people. And the heathen (the Gentile nations) shall know that I the Lord do sanctify Israel, when My sanctuary shall be in the midst of them for evermore". As we have seen, we are dealing with a God who does not change His mind.

"The gifts and the calling of God are without change of mind", and these rest then, not upon anything that Israel are, or what they have done, but upon God's unchanging love and His unchangeable purpose, and they stand four-square upon the wonderful redemptive work of the Lord Jesus Christ on Calvary's Cross. That is sufficient, surely, to establish a future of blessing for this nation. So in our consideration, then, of the plan of God, we must have a place for the restored, saved, cleansed and, at last, useable people of Israel. One other thing we must consider. Those who do not subscribe to a future for the nation of Israel, constantly refer to the Church as being "the Israel of God". You would think, to hear them talk or write, that this was a title scattered all over the N.T., so often do they use it. The Body of Christ, they say, is the real Israel. The phrase occurs once only in the Scriptures, in Gal. vi. 16, "For in Christ Jesus neither circumcision availeth anything, nor uncircumcision, but a new creature (or a new creation). And as many as walk according to this rule, peace be on them, and mercy, and upon the Israel of God". Now will you note that there are two companies here, not one. This is not a descriptive title, even for all the saved at this time. "Peace be on them"—them that walk according to this rule—"and mercy, and upon the Israel of God". The little word "on", the preposition which is epi in the Greek, is repeated twice. We are dealing with two companies not one. It was a description of the faithful Israel, the faithful remnant, at this time. When the Apostle Paul wrote the letter to the Romans there was a remnant according to the election of grace. The few among the Jews were responding to the Gospel; the bulk were not. They were not the true Israel; those Hebrews who were saved during the Acts period, were the true Israel from the Divine standpoint, and they are the Israel of God. This title is never used again in the N.T., and we have no right to take this as a covering title for all the redeemed for all time. This is surely a very flimsy basis on which to erect a great doctrine. Beware of one-text doctrines! Important doctrines do not rest on single verses!

Let us be thankful to realize that God is unchanging in His love and purpose for His earthly people, in spite of their sin, failure, and opposition. If this was not so, what assurance could we have that He will always remain the same toward us, the members of the Body of Christ?

No.19. pp. 136 - 140

In past studies together we have noted the wonderful fact that in the plan of the ages in Christ Jesus, there are three spheres of blessing wherein His redeemed children have an inheritance. When we reach the new heaven and earth wherein dwelleth righteousness (II Pet. iii. 13), we shall have come round as it were in a full circle, because that is the way God started in the beginning with a perfect creation. In this future new creation these spheres will have their place. One is, of course, the earth itself. How often have people read the Sermon on the Mount, and in it the verse which states "the meek shall inherit the earth"? (Matt. v. 5). All the redeemed are not going to heaven; neither are all going to be blessed on the new earth. Some will evidently be blessed in each of these spheres otherwise the Word of God is not true. And then we have seen, too, that Abraham, although he had an earthly inheritance promised him by the Lord, looked for something better, a better country and city as the Epistle to the Hebrews reveals. This is the heavenly Jerusalem. The Apostle John also had a vision of it, and he describes it in the last chapters of the Book of the Revelation.

In the Book of the Revelation we are told three times that this heavenly city is not going to stay in heaven permanently; it is going to descend to the new earth. We still have the highest heaven where the Lord Jesus is now enthroned at the Father's right hand; and, wonder of wonders, we find in God's Word the revelation concerning a company of His redeemed children whom God sees positionally there in Christ! (Eph. ii. 6). This gives us three great spheres of blessing in the wonderful purpose and plan of God.

Then we noted, too, that this is a predominantly Gentile age because the Jew, for nearly two thousand years, has been unusable. He is still rejecting the Lord Jesus Christ, and he was left at the end of the Acts (Acts xxviii.) with blinded eyes, deaf ears and a hardened heart. In spite of this, God has a future for the Jew as a nation because of the New Covenant, which was ratified by the precious Blood of the Lord Jesus Christ. The essence of that New Covenant is that God is going to touch their hearts and put His law therein. That will be a heart that can believe, appreciate and obey Him, and moreover God declares that He will forgive and forget all their past sins and failures (Jer. xxxi. 34).

Now all down this present age what has been happening in the purpose of God? Can we find some part of Scripture that will cover this time? We most certainly can! And we find that God has an appointed messenger for this Gentile age with a special message, and he is the Apostle Paul (Eph. iii. 1; I Tim. ii. 5-7). He was able to describe himself when he wrote the Epistle to the Romans as "the apostle of the Gentiles" (Rom. xi. 13), and we have seen that the word 'apostle' just means a 'sent one'. God sends His messengers with His truth to different companies of His children according to His purpose.

This special revelation to Gentiles is found in Paul's prison letters. The end of the Acts finds him at Rome, a prisoner, and after the Acts period there are five of his Epistles which are stamped with his Roman prison. Ephesians is the first one—"the prisoner of Christ Jesus" for us Gentiles (iii. 1). This very intimately, can concern you and me if we are Gentiles, and believers in the Lord Jesus Christ.

Philippians is the next prison letter (i. 7, 13, 16).

After this we come to the epistle to the Colossians and the fourth chapter. He says (in verse 3) "Withal praying also for us, that God would open unto us a door of utterance, to speak the mystery of Christ, for which I am also in bonds".

And then we have in II Tim. ii. 8, 9 "Remember that Jesus Christ of the seed of David was raised from the dead according to my gospel: Wherein I suffer trouble, as an evil doer, even unto bonds, but the word of God is not bound". There is also the short letter to Philemon, and in the first verse we read: "Paul, a prisoner of Jesus Christ, and Timothy our brother". So there are five letters written after the end of the Acts by the Apostle that are stamped with his prison. The Philemon epistle is a beautiful, personal little letter, typical possibly of many that the Apostle Paul must have written, and we are thankful that we have one preserved like this. We can say there are four outstanding basic, doctrinal prison epistles. They are Ephesians and Colossians (the two having many parallels beside their own distinctive teaching), Philippians and II Timothy.

Now at the end of the Acts when the nation of Israel was laid aside, nobody living at that time knew exactly what God was going to do next. How thrilled they must have been when they had this first letter after this period, the Epistle to the Ephesians, possibly a circular letter sent round to all the churches, revealing a new phase of God's purpose, what He was going to do now when this nation was laid aside in unbelief. In it we find glorious truth which He had never previously made known—the Apostle connects it with a Divine 'mystery' or 'secret'; something that God had hidden in the past and at last made known. In this letter we are going to see the first revelation of some of the distinctive truth for this present age that God wants us to know. How many want to listen? Surely we ought to be all attention when He has something wonderful to tell us! These prison epistles contain untold riches, and this word 'riches' occurs 8 times.

Let us glance at them and later on we shall be able to give them deeper consideration. In chapter i. of Ephesians we have a recurring phrase in the opening verses referring to 'grace' and 'glory'. You will find it in verse 6—"To the praise of the glory of His grace, wherein He hath made us accepted . . . . ." He, the Father, has made us accepted—literally, 'grace us' in the Beloved One, the Lord Jesus "In whom we have redemption through His blood, the forgiveness of sins". And the measure is—"according to the riches of His grace". We are not merely saved by grace, but saved and forgiven by the riches of His grace. It would be good if we paused to get some understanding of what it cost Him to provide them for us to begin with, and what it even cost this man in his Roman prison. He asked these Ephesian believers "not to faint", he said, "at my tribulations for you". What did it cost the Apostle Paul so that the Ephesian believers—and you and me today, might be reading these things?

With these riches of grace we have got to start, and if we have not started here, we have not started at all! Do we appreciate for ourselves the glorious fact of redemption and the forgiveness of sins? The companion letter, the Epistle to the Colossians, says this: "Having forgiven you all trespasses" (ii. 13). That just means what it says, all past sins, present and future, all covered by that wonderful redemptive work of the Lord Jesus on Calvary's Cross. He was made sin "for us, who knew no sin, that we might be made the righteousness of God in Him" (II Cor. v. 21).

Let us pass on to the next occurrence. Later on in the first chapter of Ephesians the Apostle begins to pray for these Ephesians saints (verses 16 and 17) and in verse 18 we read: "That . . . . . the eyes of your understanding being enlightened" (or, having been enlightened) "that ye may know what is the hope of His calling, and what the riches of the glory of His inheritance in the saints". These things are so wonderful that they almost defy explanation, His inheritance in His heavenly people, connected with the real holiest of all in heaven's innermost shrine. If we want to receive this for ourselves we shall have to use this prayer intelligently, humbly, simply and depend upon the only One who can give us understanding—the Holy Spirit Himself—the Spirit of wisdom and unveiling and revelation. First riches of grace, then riches of glory!

Then in chapter ii., after telling us what we once were from two different angles, and the wonderful interposition by God in His grace and mercy (verses 4, 5) we read: "But God, who is rich in mercy for His great love wherewith He loved us. Even when we were dead in sins, hath quickened us (made us alive) together with Christ". And then we have the reference to grace slipped in by the Apostle. Some people start with grace and then they seem to forget it. But we should not do that. We must learn to live by grace, to serve by grace, and we go on with grace right from the moment of salvation to the end of the pilgrim journey. "By grace", he says, "ye are saved. And hath raised us up together, and made us sit together in heavenly places in Christ Jesus". This is a tremendous climax; here we have reached the highest point of revelation in the whole of the Bible for the believer! This is a challenging statement, but I ask you to try and find something in the Scriptures that is higher or more wonderful than this. Think of the height of glory that the Lord Jesus Christ ascended to, the Father's right hand. Think too of the "exceeding greatness of His power" which was worked in Christ when He was raised from the dead and seated (set) in the heavenly places far above all. Then consider this redeemed company in the same heavenly places, seated together in Him—what a position! But the Apostle (in verse 7) goes on "That in the ages to come He might show the exceeding riches of his grace in His kindness toward us through Christ Jesus". So when the whole of the Church is at home in glory, there are still riches to unfold. This too baffles description. The Apostle uses the word 'exceeding', as though even he could not fully explain. What is the future going to unfold for the favoured believers of this company, the Body of Christ as the ages roll their course? Exceeding riches are going to be made known to us!

Let us come to chapter iii. Paul is speaking again of his ministry concerning this secret. There are two secrets in this context which we will look at more closely in another study. There is the 'mystery of Christ', the secret concerning Him, the Head, and the secret concerning His Body, the Church. The one concerning His Body you will find explained in verse 6: "That the Gentiles should be fellow-heirs, and of the same body, and partakers . . . . ." In the Greek is a three-fold stress on the preposition sun which gives us equality "Joint-heirs, and a joint-body, and joint-partakers of His promise in Christ by the good news (gospel) whereof I was made a minister according to the gift of the grace of God which is given to me by the effectual working of His power. Unto me, who am less than the least of all saints, is this grace given, that I might preach among the Gentiles" (that is you and me), "the unsearchable riches of Christ". Here is something that Israel, even at their zenith, never had. Do we realize what a favoured people we are? We are put in the position to get to know some of the most marvelous truths that it is possible to conceive. And then the Apostle adds that he wants to make all see "what is the fellowship (or dispensation) of the secret, which from the beginning of the world hath been hid in God Who created all things by Jesus Christ".

Further on in this chapter he prays the second time, and we find this word 'riches' occurring once more. He writes (verse 16) "That He (the Father) would grant you (or give you) according to the riches of His glory". What a measure to give! God is going to give this company according to the riches of His glory "to be strengthened with might by His Spirit in the inner man". One step leads to another. And when we reach the end of it, think on these words (verse 19): "And to know the love of Christ, which exceeds (passes) knowing, that ye might be filled with (or unto) all the fullness of God". No wonder all he can do now is to close with a glorious doxology. "Now unto Him that is able to do exceeding abundantly above all that we ask or think, according to the power that worketh in us. Unto Him be glory in the church by Christ Jesus throughout all ages, world without end."

Passing on to the next letter, Philippians, we find one occurrence of the word 'riches' in the last chapter. This church had been a very practical company. They had wanted to make some recognition of their love and their indebtedness to the Apostle Paul in his prison, so they had sent him a gift. We do not know what it was, but it was something that had touched his heart, something that he said was very fragrant to the Lord. He even used the word 'sacrifice' to describe it. So he says (iv. 18): "But I have all, and abound; I am full, having received of Epaphroditus the things which were sent from you, an odour of a sweet smell, a sacrifice acceptable, well pleasing to God. And my God shall supply all your need according to His riches in glory by Christ Jesus". It does not say 'out of His riches', but, 'according to His riches'. If a millionaire gave out of his riches he could give a few pence, that would be giving 'out of' his riches, but if he gave 'according to' his riches, I wonder how much he would have to give? A large sum surely! You see the difference? This is the way your needs and mine are supplied by the Lord—'according to His riches in glory', but remember this was said to generous Christians.

Lastly there are two references in Colossians: "To whom God would make known what is the riches of the glory of this secret among the Gentiles; which is Christ in you" or "Christ among you", as the margin reads (i. 27). Years before, the Apostle rejoiced in the fact that he had Christ dwelling in him, "Christ liveth in me" he had written to the Galatians (ii. 20), but he did not say this was a secret. Here we have Christ among us Gentiles—Gentiles who, as Ephesians tells us, were hopeless, aliens, strangers, outside the pale, now so near as to have Christ among them apart from the chosen nation of Israel.

Then in chapter ii., he prays (verse 2) that their "hearts may be comforted, they being knit together in love, and unto all riches of the full assurance of understanding, that they may know the mystery of God (R.V.), even Christ". He is the great secret of God. This secret has not been fully revealed yet, but there are untold riches attached to Him with Whom it is connected, riches of full assurance of understanding.

So you see what an inheritance lies before us in Paul's prison letters! May we have that keenness to go on, to search and see and make wonderful discoveries by the enlightenment of the Holy Spirit.

Having given a short consideration to the spiritual riches revealed in the Apostle Paul's prison letters, we will now turn to the first of these, namely the epistle to the Ephesians, because this was the first letter written after the Divine break with Israel at Acts xxviii., and contains the new revelation concerning an aspect of God's redeeming purpose which He had kept hidden all the while He was dealing with Israel as His earthly covenant People (from Gen. xii. to Acts xxviii.).

We have noted that this was possibly a circular letter, as the words "at Ephesus" are missing from some Greek manuscripts. If this was so, it would be all in line with the need to make the new truth known to all the churches, not just to one only. In our consideration of Ephesians, we do not intend to make it a very detailed and exhaustive study. Our main aim is to get the general drift of the teaching as simply as possible.

We first take note of the fact that the Apostle addressed the epistle not only to those at Ephesus, but to "the faithful in Christ Jesus", and he does this again when he writes from his prison to the Colossian church (Col. i. 2). We have no right to ignore this qualification. If we ask ourselves "are all believers in Christ automatically faithful?" the answer is obviously "no". Some play fast and loose with God's truth, and the N.T. as a whole has a lot to say about Christians who are disloyal to the Lord. It must be clear at the outset that, whatever wonders of truth are going to be revealed from this point onwards, they are not for the unfaithful or untrustworthy. This should make us search our own hearts and honestly face up to the challenge as to whether we are prepared to be absolutely loyal to the Lord and to all the truth He chooses to reveal to us in His grace and love. If we are not, then Ephesians and the epistles to follow will be closed so far as we are concerned.

After the important introduction of the first two verses, the first section commences with verse 3 and extends to verse 14. It is sub-divided for us by a recurring phrase containing the words "praise" and "glory". This will be found in verses 6, 12 and 14. The three sections thus formed deal with God and the Father (verses 3-5), God the Son (6-12), and God the Holy Spirit (13, 14) in their gracious dealing with believers who form the Body of Christ. Let us look at the first section which reveals the Father's will. In this supreme will we have the Father's choice—us, the Father's object—that we should be holy and without blemish, and the Father's motive—love (verse 4).

Primarily verse 3 starts, not with God the Father blessing us, but we blessing Him! This of course is only possible when we have appreciated, in some measure, experimentally the wonders of revelation that His Divine will contains, and our hearts then spontaneously respond in praise to Him. We are assured that the Father "hath blessed us with all spiritual blessings in heavenly places in Christ". Every blessing that is spiritual is nearer the meaning. Note the quality and the quantity of these blessings, and where they are to be found, namely "in Christ" and "in heavenly places". Their quality is that they are spiritual; their quantity is such that none have been held back by our heavenly Father. All have been lavished upon us. This is prodigality indeed!

But to appreciate them better, let us try and get some measure of understanding of the word "spiritual". We know nothing of the sphere called heaven except what the Bible reveals. That it is not a place of concrete materials, such as our present earth is, must be surely clear. Heaven or the various heavens or sub-divisions that comprise it, is a place of spirit. God Himself is spirit (John iv. 24), and has created angels, principalities and powers who are spiritual beings (Heb. i. 7, 14). This may not reveal much to us, but let us not think that heaven is less real than the earth because we cannot fully grasp it by our five senses. Possibly it is all the more wonderful because we cannot do so, insomuch that it is too great and exalted for our present limited comprehension. If we were able to bear a glimpse of heaven, we should have some idea of the spiritual blessing that go with it.

We can contrast these with Israel's blessings, which were earthly, because they were God's earthly people with an inheritance that they will finally enjoy in the earth. God suits the blessings to the sphere where they will be enjoyed. As our homeland exists in heaven (Phil. iii. 20), our blessings relate to heaven and heavenly conditions, a realm of spirit, and therefore they are spiritual blessings not material ones. But also we do well to remember that there is an evil spirit world dominated by Satan, "the spirit that now worketh in the children of disobedience" (Eph. ii. 2), and in connection with this we are told that there is "spiritual wickedness" (vi. 12), so it is clear that the words "spirit' or "spiritual" are not necessarily synonymous with what is good or Christ-like.

The Father has assured us that He has lavished upon us every blessing that is spiritual, namely all the blessings of the highest heavens to which the Lord Jesus was exalted after His resurrection ". . . . . heavenly places, far above all principality, and power, and might, and dominion, and every name that is named, not only in this world, but also in that which is to come" (i. 19-21). This is also described as the Father's "right hand" (20), and must be the highest pinnacle of glory and exaltation. This answers the question as to where these blessings are now, and where they will be enjoyed by every member of the Body. They are additionally secure because they are "in Christ", and what safer place could they be in? Who can touch the exalted Christ? Who can wrest these priceless blessings from Him? Not even Satan, with all his power and the hosts of demons under his control can lay their hands on such Divinely guarded spiritual wealth. Nor are they put into our hands yet, for it they were, we should probably spoil or lose them. They are treasured up in the Saviour and Head of the Body until His members are home with Him, are made like Him with a body of glory, and can enjoy and use them to the full. Now we receive them by faith; then faith will be exchanged for sight and full experience.

If we should ask, why did God do this? There is only one answer—LOVE, Divine love that is beyond our full comprehension (iii. 16-19), but which we should seek to know more and more. Here then is spiritual wealth beyond dreams, and if the new revelation given in Ephesians consisted of nothing more than this, it would be overwhelming, but this is only the beginning! Verse 4 continues: "According as He (the Father) hath chosen us in Him (the Son) before the foundation of the world, that we should be holy and without blame before Him in love". The word 'chosen' is the word 'to elect', and so we have election in the forefront of Ephesians. We need not be puzzled by this, for, as we have stressed many times, God is working out a great redemptive plan for heaven and earth, and what could be more reasonable than that He has chosen the channels or the means through which He will work His will out. He certainly has not left this to chance or human volition. Israel was a Divinely elected people, not because they merited it, or were in any way in themselves better than the surrounding nations, but simply that they were the means that God willed to use to reach and bless the whole world.

Likewise He has chosen the Body of Christ for some great heavenly purpose that for the moment He has not fully revealed. Before such a Divine choice or predestination, comes God's ability to foreknow everything, as Rom. viii. 29 and I Pet. i. 2 make clear. If we do not put God's foreknowledge before election as the Bible does, problems will be raised in our minds that we cannot solve. In past eternity our heavenly Father knew who would be faithful and who would not, and we are in no position to query His methods, choice or acts, but, on the contrary, to gratefully accept His great condescension and graciousness, and fully respond to Him in return. This election was "in Christ", and in this section (verses 3-14), nothing is seen apart from Him. All has its centre in the Lord Jesus. The time of the Father's choice was "before the foundation (or overthrow) of the world". As far as the redeemed are concerned, this time is unique. No other company of God's children reaches back, as it were, before creation. This phrase elsewhere is reserved for the Son of God alone (John xvii. 24; I Pet. i. 20). Other phases of God's redemptive purpose are stated to be "from or since the foundation of the world" (Matt. xxv. 34), and if words mean anything, these are two distinctive time periods that must not be confused, and therefore two distinct companies of the redeemed must be related to them.

We shall find, as we further consider the new calling of Ephesians, that it has other unique features which only serve to emphasize the riches of grace that have overflowed to every member of the Body from God the Father, Son and Holy Spirit. Verse 4 continues with the Father's object: "that we should be holy and without blame before Him in love". What an aim to have in view! The words 'holy' and 'holiness' are so far removed from human experience that they are never used in ordinary conversation concerning human beings and human affairs. Holiness belongs to God alone, and yet He wills us to be as Himself—holy! We surely do not need anyone to tell us that this is one thing that we definitely have not got, no matter what our abilities or attainments are. Nor can we procure it for ourselves or get any other created being to do so for us. Unless God Himself shall work it out on our behalf and give it to us as a free gift, we shall certainly never experience it. But this is exactly what He has done, by the redemptive work of the Son: as Eph. v. 25-27 states, ". . . . . Christ also loved the church, and gave Himself for it . . . . . that He might present it to Himself a glorious church, not having spot, or wrinkle, or any such thing; but that it should be holy and without blemish", (same words as i. 4). What the Father willed and chose us to be in past eternity, the Son has made possible for us sinner by His great redemptive work on the Cross. Truly all this must have originated from love, love that transcends all our thinking. Such overwhelming love cost the Father

His beloved Son, for He "spared not His own Son, but delivered Him up for us all" (Rom. viii. 32). What is our response to such love so wonderfully expressed?

No.21. The Epistle to the Ephesians (1).
pp. 176 - 180

Having considered the greatness of the Father's choice of each member of the Body of Christ, His object, that we should be holy, His motive, love, we pass on to i. 5, "having predestinated us unto the adoption of children by Jesus Christ to Himself, according to the good pleasure of His will". As in verse 4, we have three great statements brought before us to believe and rejoice in; the Father's predestination—US; the Father's object—ADOPTION; the Father's motive—GOOD PLEASURE. The Father's predestination obviously balances His election of the previous verse. It is unfortunate that we have 'destiny' in the make-up of the English word. This is not resident in the Greek which has the thought of "marking off beforehand". Those who form the Body of Christ have been appointed by the Father in His will to a definite and wonderful position, that of 'the first-born son' with an inheritance in view. "Adoption" brings to our mind the modern practice of bringing an outsider into the family, one who is not linked with any blood ties and making him just a member of the family. The archaeological researches of Sir William Ramsay have shown clearly that, in Paul's day, adoption meant much more than this, namely that the adopted child was given the place of the first-born son, with the right to inherit the property of the father, and moreover, once this had been ratified, it could never be changed or rescinded (see Gal. iii. 15).

Translated into the spiritual terms of Eph. i. 5, it means that the Body has been marked off, in the Father's purpose, for the position of the first-born, with an eternal inheritance in view, not on the earth, but in heavenly places where Christ is now enthroned! Phil. iii. 20 states definitely, in accord with this, that our citizenship, our homeland, now exists as a present fact, in heaven. That is our great goal and is what our mind should be centred upon. "If ye then be risen with Christ (a blessed fact as other Scriptures show) seek those things which are above, where Christ sitteth on the right hand of God. Set your mind (not affection) on things above, not on things on the earth" (Col. iii. 1, 2). With this glorious inheritance go all the spiritual blessings in heavenly places that Eph. i. 3 has described.

All this was in the plan of our heavenly Father when in past eternity He chose us in Christ, and we need to take time and reflect upon the magnificence and wonder of this revelation to us, and to respond in practice with grateful hearts. As we have noted before, nothing of this is seen apart from the Lord Jesus Christ. This predestination is "by Jesus Christ to Himself", and the only reason we are given for it, is the overwhelming 'love' of verse 4, and the "good pleasure of His will" of verse 5, which only reminds us that there is nothing in ourselves to merit such a choice. This being so, verse 6 continues, that this should be "to the praise of the glory of His grace". The whole of this heavenly plan, as well as the earthly one, will finally uplift the Lord and bring glory to Him, to Whom it alone belongs.

The fact that grace is brought in here doubly emphasizes the fact that human merit and works are ruled out, just as Rom. xi. 6, dealing with the characteristics of grace, clearly reveals. This great grace has been reckoned ours, as the rest of verse 6 states. The words "made us accepted" have the word 'grace' in the original, reading literally ". . . . . the glory of His grace, wherein He graced us in the Beloved (One)". This is another of the great words of Paul's prison letters. It occurs only once more in the New Testament, namely Luke i. 28, where the angel addresses Mary as "highly-favoured". The margin here reads "graciously accepted, or much graced", and how true this is for each one of the members of Christ's Body! What company of God's redeemed children since Genesis have had such grace and riches poured upon them?

Israel were indeed a favoured nation, above all nations of the earth (Psa. cxlvii. 19, 20; Rom ix. 3-5), yet this eclipses anything that they possessed, and just as Israel were intended 'to possess their possessions', so are we. But are we doing so? If we are not, then we are indeed foolish and robbing ourselves of much joy and blessing.

Once more we see this linked to the Lord Jesus Christ, for we have been much-graced "in the Beloved (One)", and this brings us to the next section of the chapter which enlarges on the redemptive work of the Son, Who alone makes all these wonders of the Father's will possible by what He has accomplished for us on Calvary's Cross: "In Whom we have redemption through His blood, the forgiveness of sins, according to the riches of His grace" (verse 7). If we want to see redemption in picture form, then we find it being carried out in Israel's experience, when the Lord redeemed them from Egypt with its cruelty and bondage. The book of Exodus makes it clear that the Israelites were in no position to redeem themselves. They were slaves of a tyrannical Pharaoh, and all they could do was to cry to God for deliverance (Exod. ii. 23, 24; iii. 7, 8). The earlier chapters of this book reveal the majestic way in which God accomplished this for them, but not before Calvary had been exacted typically, by the blood of the Passover lamb (Exod. xii. 3, 12-14).

We, who are the members of the church which is the Body of Christ, have a greater redemption from a greater bondage to Satan (Eph. ii. 2), the world which at present lies in his power (I John v. 19 R.V.) and from the sinful old nature which we all inherit from fallen Adam. We have been set free from all this, not typically by a Passover lamb, but by the reality of the precious shed blood, the life laid down by the Saviour on the cross on our behalf, this being the price He paid for our deliverance, and "if the Son therefore shall make you free, ye shall be free indeed" (John viii. 36). This is liberty in the fullest sense, not the spurious thing that man prates about. We who once were slaves, whether we knew it or not, are now free, not just to please ourselves, but to please and serve Him as He wills and shows us just what this involves day by day.

This redemption is further explained in Eph. i. 7 as "the forgiveness of sins". There is only One Who has the right to forgive sins, and that is God alone, for all sin ultimately is against Him, as David once realized to his cost (Psa. li. 1-4). There is the thought of deliverance in this word too, for in Luke iv. 18 it is translated 'deliverance' and 'set at liberty', and the measure is "according to the riches of His grace, wherein He hath abounded toward us" (verses 7 and 8). The slight adjustment in punctuation does not touch the original Greek, for in this there are no punctuation marks.

We have before given a short consideration of the various and great riches which the prison epistles of Paul make known, and we start here with the riches of God's grace in which He has (literally) overflowed toward us. Here is no trickle of blessing, but a veritable torrent! Let us not pass by this lightly. Well may we sing, with Frances Ridley Havergal: "I could not do without Thee, O Saviour of the lost, Whose precious blood redeemed me at such tremendous cost", and realizing this afresh, we shall be more ready to serve Him faithfully.

Verses 8 and 9 continue, "In all wisdom and prudence, having made known unto us the secret (mystery) of His will, according to His good pleasure which He purposed in Him" (R.V.). It will be noticed that redemption is put into God's secret will, for the good reason that God did not plan sin and death to enter into His creation, but, foreknowing all things, He had provided for its eradication in that aspect of His will which He had kept secret until the right time for its revelation. When God warned Adam that disobedience would lead to death, He did not reveal to the man that such an eventuality had been provided for in the work of the Kinsman-Redeemer. This was kept in God's secret will until its need had become apparent. Without such a provision, the wonderful plan of the ages which finds its goal in the dispensation of the fullness of the seasons, could never be realized (verse 10). The word 'fullness', another of the great words of the Prison Epistles, occurs in Ephesians four times (i. 10, 23; iii. 19; iv. 13). Its basic meaning is 'to fill up' a rent or a gap. The fall of Satan, sin and death, and the failure of the people of Israel, have indeed made gaps in God's great plan, but in each case He has gloriously filled these up in His redemptive purpose, so that at the end it reaches a glorious conclusion unmarred and in all its beauty.

Eph. i. 10 looks forward to this goal of the final dispensation when everything in heaven and earth will be filled by the Lord Jesus Christ, Who Himself contains all the fullness of the Godhead bodily (Col. ii. 9). Then all will come under His headship and control. The words "gather together in one" represent one word in the Greek "to head up again".

Since the beginning of time, God has placed the headship over creation in the power of created beings, possibly unfallen Satan, but certainly Adam and later on Israel (Psa. viii.; Deut. xxviii. 13). These have failed and brought untold misery and suffering, and the way our heavenly Father in His wisdom and prudence will ensure that such tragedy can never be repeated, is to take such power out of the hands of the creature and put it in the control of the Creator. Then all rule and authority and power will be abrogated and He alone will be Sovereign (I Cor. xv. 24). What a magnificent conclusion to which to look forward! Then indeed the will of God will be carried out perfectly and completely in heaven and earth, and all problems, personal and world-wide, and in the heavens too, will be solved. Eph. i. 11 goes on to teach us that we have a sure part in the Kingdom of God when it is thus realized. Just as the word 'adoption', as used in Paul's day, brings before the mind an inheritance, so here we are told "in Whom (Christ) also we have obtained an inheritance, being predestinated (or marked off beforehand) according to the plan (purpose) of Him Who worketh all things after the counsel of His own will". Nothing happens by chance, all has been designed by God the Father and is being carried out with absolute certainty.

From our limited standpoint, everything seems to work so slowly, or even to come to a standstill, but we have to remember that God is not dealing with puppets, but moral creatures, who by their opposition, sin and failure, may lengthen out that plan. But the goal cannot fail of realization; God cannot be defeated! and the age of faith can look beyond the present darkness and overwhelming problems that thicken all around us, to the very time of triumph that this context is revealing, in which, by redeeming love and grace, we shall share. We shall then be "to the praise of His glory" as verse 12 declares, thus His glory will be magnified.

The rest of this verse states that we "first trusted in Christ". The margin points out that the word 'trust' is really 'hope'. What is the meaning of 'first'? Is it first in time, or first in place and dignity? It all depends how far the Apostle is looking back into the past. If the Acts period, then it possibly refers to those who first responded to the gospel. If only a short time previously when he was commissioned to make the new revelation known, it could refer to the hope of this new calling, which is the first to be realized in time and the first in dignity, for this hope encompasses heavenly places 'far above all', and this church is part of Him Who is the First-born of all creation and the First-born from the dead (Col. i. 15, 18), now enthroned at the Father's right hand.

Each calling of the redeemed has its own particular hope, centred in Christ, according to its place in the Divine plan, whether it be linked with the new heavens or the new earth, yet to come into being. The consummation of the Body's hope is to be taken to the glory of heaven's holiest of all, where the Father has willed it to be. This eclipses anything that had been revealed up this point, and no wonder Paul goes on to pray that these Ephesian believers would go on to apprehend what such a transcendent hope involves (verse 18). This is a challenge to us all, whose eyes have been opened in measure. As the days come and go, is this hope becoming clearer, greater and more vital to us?

We quote Eph. i. 13, 14 in the R.V. rendering, as it is more accurate with the tenses than the A.V. "In Whom ye also, having heard the word of the truth, the gospel of your salvation, in Whom, having also believed, ye were sealed with the Holy Spirit of promise, which is an earnest of our inheritance, unto the redemption of God's own possession, unto the praise of His glory." The A.V. 'after' used twice is misleading, and gives rise to the erroneous idea that some time after believing, the Ephesians saints were sealed by the Holy Spirit, a kind of second blessing. But the Greek makes it clear that the believing and sealing were accomplished at the same time.

The sealing is a well-known illustration of a finished transaction. We use the phrase "signed, sealed and settled" to convey the same meaning. In Eph. iv. 30 we are again reminded of this sealing of the Holy Spirit. For our own comfort let us get it quite clear, that we ourselves are not able to affix the seal and so secure the Divine transaction. This is God's work alone and once He has affixed the seal, it can never be broken! This is one of God's guarantees that we cannot fail to attain to the heavenly inheritance He has appointed for us. No wonder we can have full assurance of faith and hope, as we rest in what He has willed and accomplished for us!

Not only this, but the Holy Spirit of promise gives us now the earnest or foretaste of this glorious inheritance. The word "earnest" is a pledge, very much like the three occurrences in Gen. xxxviii. 17-20. It is used in Greek of an engagement ring, a pledge of marriage. The possession of the Spirit now, and the new nature that He gives to the believer, is the beginning of that fullness that we shall one day enjoy in the heavenlies, when in resurrection the redemption of our body will be attained (Rom. viii. 23; Phil. iii. 20, 21). This will indeed be "the redemption of God's own possession". Now we enjoy the first fruits, then will be the great harvest and we shall be "unto the praise of His glory".

Prayer and its purpose.

Having made known this spiritual wealth emanating from the Father's will, the Son's redemptive work, and the Spirit's present witness and sealing, the Apostle ceases from further doctrine and begins to pray. This in itself teaches us one of the great purposes of prayer. The Apostle is now concerned that, what he has been the means of revealing would now become real in the experience of the Ephesian believers. To approach truth intellectually is not enough. Words of Scripture can be read and memorized by all, but what of the truth behind the words? This will elude the grasp of the cleverest unless they come God's way to get spiritual understanding.

So he continues: "For this cause I also, having heard of the faith in the Lord Jesus which is among you, and which ye show toward all the saints, cease not to give thanks for you, making mention of you in my prayers" (15, 16 R.V.). At least seven times Paul declares that he never stopped praying for others. The whole of his Christian life was one long intercession. What an example this is to us! Is it any wonder that he was so mightily used by the Lord and so many were blessed through his ministry? Spasmodic praying for other people achieves little or nothing. It is the constant intercession along the lines of God's will which achieves much. May this stimulate each one of us to be more diligent in our remembrance of others at the throne of grace.

The Two prayers of Ephesians compared.

In chapter iii. we find another profound prayer of the Apostle recorded. Before we go any further, it will be helpful to compare them. Both prayers are addressed to the Father (i. 17; iii. 14). In the epistles, prayer is never addressed to the Lord Jesus Christ or the Holy Spirit. We are exhorted to give thanks to the Father, in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ (Eph. v. 20). To directly address the Saviour denies the need for a mediator between ourselves and God, and the Lord Jesus in His present position is precisely this to all men. "No man cometh unto the Father but by Me" He expressly declared, and we ought to remember this constantly.

The Father's gifts.

In both prayers the Father gives, that we may know (i. 17, 18; iii. 16-19) and this is the right order. Unless He first gives how can we possibly come to any knowledge of the Truth? In the second the Father grants (gives) to be strengthened with might so that Christ may take up His abode in our hearts by faith (iii. 16, 17); and that we might get to know the surpassing love of Christ (19). In both prayers there is something 'exceeding', the exceeding power that raised Christ from the dead and this love of the Lord that exceeds knowledge. The first prayer looks up to the Father's right hand where Christ is now enthroned. The second prayer comes down to our experience, revealing that this highly exalted One is prepared to stoop and dwell in our hearts by faith.

Both prayers stress resurrection power. This was the power that conquered death and raised the Lord Jesus from the dead (i. 20) and this same overwhelming power can work in us (iii. 20). The goal of each prayer is "fullness". In the first, the raised and seated Lord is Head of the Body, which is His fullness (i. 22, 23). In the second we find the mighty statement "that ye may be filled unto all the fullness of God (iii. 19 R.V.).

The First prayer --- Wisdom and Revelation.

The first of these prayers is that "the Father of glory, may give unto you a spirit of wisdom and revelation in the knowledge of Him" (i. 17 R.V.). "The Father of glory" is a profound title which we may not be able to grasp fully. Does it mean that the Father is the origin of that indescribable divine quality called "glory", or that there is a unique glory connected with God's Fatherhood? Eph. iii. 15 states that all fatherhood in heaven or on earth is finally derived from His Fatherhood, for this is the archetypal Fatherhood. The desire of the Apostle is that this Father may give to the Ephesian saints "a spirit of wisdom and revelation". Note the order. Wisdom is put before revelation because of its prime necessity. Of what use is knowledge without wisdom? Where there is no wisdom, knowledge can be squandered and abused. In fact knowledge without wisdom can be a menace. True wisdom is not inherent in fallen human nature. We need this as a gift of God as much as anything else. How glad we should be to read James i. 5 "If any of you lack wisdom, let him ask of God, that giveth to all men liberally, and upbraideth not".

The classic N.T. passage dealing with wisdom is chapters i. and ii. of I Corinthians. There the word occurs 17 times and the seeker after truth should carefully ponder over these chapters. In Ephesians and Colossian wisdom occurs 9 times (Eph. i. 8, 17; iii. 10; Col. i. 9, 28; ii. 3, 23; iii. 16; iv. 5). All these references should be studied too, and then the importance of this divine gift will surely become apparent.

Wisdom leads on to revelation, the basic meaning of which is "to remove the veil from" and so disclose what has been hidden. If ever there was a need for 'opened eyes' it is here where we are dealing with the most profound truth of the Scriptures. Thousands read these epistles and their wonder and teaching is unperceived. They cannot comprehend the new calling revealed therein, neither do they understand those who are rejoicing in the riches unfolded in them. There is no doubt that the believer needs this revelation from God regarding Ephesian truth, just as much as when he was an unsaved sinner he needed Christ revealed as Saviour. This need for revelation should be a challenge to every child of God who reads Eph. i. 17.

Such revelation is closely connected with the ascended Christ in glory, where He is now enthroned in the heavenly places. The truth of all the callings of the redeemed is linked with the Lord Jesus Christ in some way, either as King of kings in His earthly sovereignty or as Head over all things in His heavenly exaltation. It is this latter aspect of the knowledge of Christ that Paul stresses here, and when we remember that the word translated "knowledge" is sometimes "acknowledge" (Col. ii. 2; Titus i. 1; Philemon 6), we have even deeper truth, namely that divine wisdom and revelation are intimately connected with a practical acknowledgment in our daily lives. God does not pour spiritual truth into our minds quite apart from our practical response. This would not be wisdom. If we are not prepared to 'acknowledge' in practice day by day, then we are not in the right condition for divine enlightenment.

Three-fold Knowledge.

The Apostle continues his prayer, pre-supposing this necessary enlightenment to have been experienced: "Having the eyes of your heart enlightened, that ye may know what is the hope of His calling" (18 R.V.). Hope is the fulfillment, or practical realization of the callings and promises of God. When Paul stood before Agrippa, he declared, "And now I stand and am judged for the hope of the promise made of God unto our fathers, unto which promise our twelve tribes, instantly serving God day and night, hope to come" (Acts xxvi. 6, 7). The hope of the twelve tribes will be realized, the Apostle asserted, when the promises concerning the seed and the land made to Abraham, Isaac and Jacob are fulfilled and this they were waiting for as late as Acts xxvi. This indeed is the "hope of Israel" (Acts xxviii. 20), which in no way can be made identical with the hope of the Body of Christ, if sound precepts of interpretation are used and words are allowed to mean what they say.

In Eph. i. 18 we have the hope of His calling, and in iv. 4 the "one hope of your calling". The calling of the Body is a heavenly one as we have seen (Phil. iii. 20), and the realization of its hope will take place when Head and Body are united and manifested in the heavenly holiest of all. It should be obvious that a clear knowledge of the calling under consideration is essential, if the hope attached to it is to be understood. Any blurred conception of the calling will result in an imperfect or completely wrong interpretation of its hope. We have heard it stated that the Ephesian hope is 'vague', but this is only because the revelation of the secret of Eph. iii. has not been clearly grasped.

So many see in it nothing more than the Gentile being blessed with the Jew, in spite of the fact that this never was a secret, and was clearly stated to be God's will as far back as Gen. xii. 1-3, where the Divine promise reads: "And I will bless them that bless thee, and curse him that curseth thee: and in thee shall all families of the earth be blessed". Israel was meant to be first, but not first and last. There was never any Divine intention to limit light and truth to this people, and Israel's tragedy was that they finally became obsessed with this idea. They were intended by God to be a channel only to reach the Gentile world. But the Gentile being blessed through the Jew is certainly not the secret of Eph. iii. This we will give a close study when we reach this third chapter.

The next expression in the Apostle's prayer is "that ye may know . . . . . what is the riches of the glory of His inheritance in the saints". That God finds His inheritance in His people is surely true and wonderful, but we believe something deeper lies here. The word 'saints' in the Greek can mean holy people or holy things, and as the latter it is translated 'holiest of all' in Heb. ix. 8. If it is rendered in the same way in the context we are considering, it would read: "what (is) the riches of the glory of His inheritance in the holiest of all", that is, the real holy of holies in heaven itself of which the O.T. Tabernacle and Temple had copies and were patterns (Heb. viii. 5; ix. 23). The reality is the innermost shrine of heaven, which, as far as we can understand, is solely the abode of God. Certainly the earthly copies were, for it contained the Shekinah glory, an expression of God's presence, and no redeemed Israelite, with the exception of Aaron on the annual Day of Atonement, ever entered it, and he only remained in it while he was performing the ritual prescribed by God. The holy of holies as the permanent home for the redeemed is absolutely unknown in the O.T., and the N.T. as well, until we reach the new revelation of Paul's prison ministry.

Here then is something tremendous, something entirely new. No wonder the Ephesian saints needed "opened eyes" and a "spirit of unveiling" in order to know and rejoice in it! And what "riches of glory" are attached to it, just as glory was centred in the holiest of all in both the Tabernacle and the Temple!

The third thing that Paul prayed for the Ephesians to know was "what the exceeding greatness of His power to usward who believe, according to that working of the strength of His might, which He wrought in Christ, when He raised Him from the dead . . . . .” (19, 20 R.V.). Here is something so tremendous that the Apostle piles synonym on synonym, exhausting the resources of language to describe how God’s resurrection power (dunamis) operates according to the inworking (energeia) of the strength (kratos) of His might (ischus). Why does he do this? Because he is trying to describe the greatest of all powers, the power that conquers death.

We live in an age of power. Men in their researches are discovering the great power that God has locked in the atom. But great though this is, it can never raise a person from the dead. In this prayer we are facing up to the power that can, and actually did so, when our Saviour burst the bonds of the grave, and this same power, says Eph. iii. 20, can work in us. Hence its importance to every member of the Body of Christ.

Have we realized its possibilities in our daily lives?

No.23. The Epistle to the Ephesians (3).
pp. 217 - 220

The goal in both the prayers of Ephesians is tremendous and is connected with fullness, one of the great words of the Prison Epistles. The ascended Christ, far above all heavens, with all things under Him, is now Head of the Body, the church, the fullness of Him that filleth all in all (Eph. i. 22, 23). In the second prayer the climax is reached when the member of the Body is “filled unto (not ‘with’ A.V.) all the fullness of God” (iii. 19). This is so overwhelming, that it almost defies exposition. There is no doubt that these two prayers touch the high water mark in the N.T. The basic idea behind the word fullness (pleroma) is that which fills up something that has been torn or is empty, such as the patch which filled up the rent in an old garment (Matt. ix. 16). There have been a number of ‘rents’ in the purposes of God caused by sin and failure, such as followed the fall of Satan, of Adam and the failure of Israel. It would appear that the Body of Christ fills up the gap caused by the sin of Satan and the angels with him. Ezek xxviii. gives us a glimpse of the high and holy calling that Satan occupied in his unfallen state.

Not only this, but this church fills the “rent” made by the defection of Israel at Acts xxviii., up to their being restored to Divine favour at the end of the age. In the context we are dealing with, the Church is described as the fullness of Christ Who is the Head. Just as the human body is the complement of the head in order to make up a complete man, so here this church is the complement of its Divine Head, the Lord Jesus Christ. As God, the Lord Jesus Christ is complete, for in Him dwells all the fullness of the Godhead bodily (Col. ii. 9). As Head He needs the Body as His complement, and when one realizes this, what an overwhelming honour is given to the Church!

We express our minds through our bodies, and the absent Lord expresses Himself likewise. Or does He? This is a challenge to us all never to forget that day by day we can know His indwelling by faith (Eph. iii. 17) and that in word and action we can express Him. In chapter iv. 10 we are told that the Lord's ascension was in order that "He might fill all things", that is the complete universe. The Body of Christ shows this in miniature now as Christ's fullness, and in fact in this and in many other respects sets forth the great goal of the ages when God shall be all in all (I Cor. xv. 28).

Sometimes the best way of explaining truth is by contrast, and in the chapter that follows we have this in two ways. Twice Paul takes us back into the past, from two different angles. First reminding us of our desperate condition as sinners lost and undone and under the control of Satan, and second, as Gentiles we were distant outsiders, not being members of the chosen race of Israel, the favoured nation who had all the divine blessings showered upon them! The words "in time past" introduce each of these sections (verses 2 and 11). Verse 1 tells us that we have been made alive from spiritual death caused by trespasses and sins. As to the translation "dead to trespasses and sin" (along the line of Rom. vi. 2, 11) we do not enter here, as the explanation of the Greek construction is too technical for these particular articles. The fact is that whichever way the phrase is translated, it expresses truth.

Looking back to our lives before we were saved, we walked "according to the course of this world", literally "the age of this world". In Gal. i. 4 the Apostle has already described this age as being evil, and this is still true despite all the scientific advance in knowledge and social improvement that has taken place. This age still rejects Christ, Who is the Truth, and is therefore evil whatever its external appearance may be, though one would have thought that, with the rampant sin and ungodliness that abounds everywhere, with the mounting problems that result from this, such demonstration of the truth of Paul's statement is not really necessary. But men are very loath to admit that this present age is basically evil, and whether they admit it or not, the fact remains that the evil world system dominates all the unsaved without exception. That means that the educated, refined person who is unsaved is just as much under its control as the profligate. Satan does not mind people living good lives, according to human standards, as long as they do not come into living touch with the Lord Jesus Christ.

The reason for the present age being evil is made clear by the Apostle's next statement, "according to the prince of the power of the air", or put more clearly "the ruler of the authority of the air". This is none other than Satan whom the Lord described as the "prince (ruler) of this world" (John xii. 31; xiv. 30; xvi. 11). Through man's sin he has temporarily got control of the affairs of the world and he now energizes (works in) all the sons of disobedience although they do not recognize this power which is unfelt and therefore unknown to them. Such power is indeed mighty to have such a wide influence, and is in utter contrast to the tremendous resurrection power which energized (worked in) Christ, when He was raised from the dead. Satan has control of the aerial regions for the moment, and when this is seen to be a fact, man's invention of the aeroplane, instead of being a blessing ultimately becomes a great danger. At the end of this age, Satan's last desperate throw to gain world worship, is to hand over to his earthly representative, the wild Beast of Rev. xiii. 2, all his power and authority, which must include this control of the air. He who controls the air, controls the world. No wonder at this juncture, it is said

"who can make war with him?" (Rev. xiii. 4), and so this monster can pose as the "prince of peace" and offer to solve the problems of the nations, torn, impoverished and wearied by war and the intolerable burdens that result because of it.

Verse 3 continues "Among whom also we all had our conversation (manner of life) in times past, in the lusts of our flesh, fulfilling the desires of the flesh and of the mind, and were by nature children of wrath, even as others".

By 'flesh' Paul means the unregenerate nature of man, and we must remember that this can manifest itself in respectable ways as well as the more gross acts of sin. There is even such a thing a 'religious flesh'. Some unsaved people are temperamentally attracted to outward forms of religion—specially those that appeal to the senses, but such are as much in spiritual darkness as the atheist and the libertine. The fact remains that all who are out of touch with Christ are under the control of the spirit called Satan, the great enemy of God, whatever their manner of life is.

Now in the abundant mercy of God comes the great reversal. The word 'but' indicates a sweeping change. "But God, Who is rich in mercy, for His great love wherewith He loved us, even when we were dead in sins, hath quickened us together with Christ" (4). The word translated 'quickened together' is a word not found in secular Greek, only in early Christian writers and it is very likely that it was coined by Paul himself to express the truth of the identification of the believer with the Lord Jesus. When He was made alive in resurrection, in God's plan, the believer was made alive too! The wonder of it all constrains the Apostle to magnify the grace of God that has made this possible, and he slips in one of his characteristic parenthesis—("by grace ye are saved") and then adds the topstone of revelation: "and hath raised us up together and made us sit together in heavenly places IN Christ Jesus."

Let us not hurry, for here we have truth connected with a company of God's redeemed children that is unique in the realm of Scripture. Israel were indeed a favoured nation with all the blessings given to them (Rom. ix. 3-5), but not in their wildest dreams would any Jew have imagined that they were to be blessed in the highest heavens where God is enthroned! This is the apex of revelation so far as the redeemed are concerned and God has made it known for the appropriation by faith by His children. Yet how few know or rejoice in such riches of grace and glory! Let us note the exact wording. Many misquote Eph. ii. 6 as though it read seated together with Christ in the heavenly places. It actually reads IN Christ, not WITH Christ. In other words it is positional, in our standing in Christ. Just as II Cor. v. 17 states: "if any man be IN Christ, he is a new creation", and we could not change this to read "if any man be with Christ, he is a new creation", so in this passage of Ephesians, we are not WITH Christ until our hope is realized, and we are manifested WITH Him in glory (Col. iii. 4).

Even the height of glory made known in Eph. ii. is not the end, for verse 7 goes on to says: "that in the ages to come He might show the exceeding riches of His grace in His kindness toward us in Christ Jesus". Note the word ages in the plural which tells us that the Millennium is not the last age, as some expositors imagine. Just how many ages there are to come in the future, we do not know, but we are certain of one great fact that, as each age succeeds age, the crowning display of God's grace will be shown in His kindness revealed in increasing measure in all its fullness.

Again Paul returns to the theme of grace, which for him was inexhaustible. Grace for ever rules out human goodness or merit, so however high or great the blessings are, there can be only one basis for them, namely the "exceeding riches of His grace". Riches of grace are seen in the Son's redemptive work (i. 7), but exceeding riches is the only expression that befits the Father's kindness in the future age. Verse 8 gives perhaps the most concise summing up of the gospel of grace in the N.T. revealed through Paul: "for by grace are ye saved through faith: and that not of yourselves: it is the gift of God. Not of works, lest any man should boast" (8, 9).

This is an extension of the parenthesis of verse 5. The believer's salvation springs solely from the grace of God and is made our own possession by faith or trust in Christ alone. And all of this is a gift of God, not just faith alone. It is the whole grace-by-faith salvation that God has given us, and faith is the channel through which we receive it. It is "not of works, lest any man should boast" (9). If man was able to do anything in connection with his salvation, he would have something to boast about, but God has so arranged it that this is impossible, and He alone must have all the glory in saving mankind. This high and holy calling starts with grace and continues with it in the coming ages. Do we constantly rejoice in this?

No.24. The Epistle to the Ephesians (4).
pp. 237 - 240

While the Apostle in Eph. ii. 8, 9 gives his concise summing-up of the gospel of grace, which rules out good works or human merit, we must not deduce from this that Paul was an Antinominian, or against the law from any angle (see Titus iii. 1, 8, 14). To get complete balance we must not divorce verse 10 from verses 8 and 9: "For we are His workmanship, created in Christ Jesus unto good works, which God hath before ordained (margin, prepared) that we should walk in them". To get the teaching of the N.T. for the present time relative to good works clear in our minds, is to make a considerable step forward in the knowledge of the Truth. Good works can never be the ground of the believer's salvation, but they should be the fruit or result of it in his daily life. Thousands never get this clear, stressing one at the expense of the other, or getting them in the wrong order.

We should be careful too, to avoid any fatalistic ideas about these "good works". Verse 10 does not teach that we produce them automatically because "God hath before ordained that we should walk in them". The margin tells us that 'ordained' can read 'prepared', and the teaching is that God has prepared us by redemption and grace so that we are now free to produce these works or fruits of the Spirit which are according to His mind and will. Before salvation, while we were under the domination of the flesh and the god of this age, good works, as God sees them, were impossible.

Verse 11 starts another section and looks back into the past once more, but from a different angle. Verses 2-10 show our basic condition as unsaved sinners. Verses 11 and 12 give our dispensational disability of being Gentiles and therefore not belonging to the chosen race of Israel. "Wherefore remember, that ye being in time past Gentiles in the flesh, who are called Uncircumcision by that which is called the Circumcision in the flesh made by hands; that at that time ye were without Christ, being aliens from the commonwealth of Israel, and strangers from the covenant of promise, having no hope, and without God in the world." To better appreciate this great disability 'in the flesh', let us see what Scripture teaches concerning Israel, the nation specially chosen by God and redeemed by type and shadow and in close covenant relation to Him. In Rom. ix. 3-5 Paul states: "For I could wish that myself were accursed from Christ for my brethren, my kinsmen according to the flesh; who are Israelites; to whom pertaineth the adoption, and the glory, and the covenants, and the giving of the law, and the service of God, and the promises; whose are the fathers, and of whom as concerning the flesh, Christ came, Who is over all, God blessed for ever. Amen". No wonder Psa. cxlvii. 19, 20 reads: "He showeth . . . . . His statutes and His judgments unto Israel. He hath not dealt so with any nation: and as for His judgments, they have not known them. Praise ye the Lord".

It should be quite obvious that in the human sphere, that is "in the flesh", God's dealings and the blessings He showered upon the Jew were unique. No Gentile, however civilized and cultured, could ever hope to attain to such a position of Divine favour by his own efforts. Israel had all the earthly blessings; they were a nation near to the Lord, as Moses described it, and had the honour of being custodians of His written revelation, "the oracles of God" (Rom. iii. 1, 2). They were in close covenant ties with God and had the unique position of being His servants and His witnesses to a darkened Gentile world. To cap it all, in His humanity Christ came primarily to them (Matt. xv. 24). Israel alone had the expectancy of a Messiah (Christ).

To all this the Gentile was a 'stranger' and an 'alien'. Great Gentile civilizations arose and passed away, making their mark on human history, but not one of them could compare in Divine privilege with the elect nation of Israel. In this section of Ephesians, it is a question of distance and nearness to God. The favoured nation of Israel were placed near by God Himself, whereas anyone being born a Gentile was as far off from God as it is possible to imagine, and his only hope of canceling this out was to become a proselyte and forsake his Gentile status. When one adds on top of all this his condition as a helpless sinner under the dominion of Satan and death, the picture of hopelessness is complete.

As we have before seen, unless God steps in there could be no possibility of deliverance, but just as He did so in verse 4, so He does again in verse 13: "But now in Christ Jesus ye who sometimes were far off are made nigh by the blood of Christ". It is the Lord's redemptive work on the Cross that can alone cancel this appalling state of the Gentile unbeliever. What is utterly impossible by human ability or effort, God has wonderfully accomplished through the one offering of His beloved Son on our behalf.

Verse 14 continues: "For He is our peace, Who hath made both (Jew and Gentile believers) one". No colour bar, or class distinction was ever so great as the separation between Jew and Gentile previous to the epistle to the Ephesians. One of the great features of the distinctive teaching of Ephesians relating to the Mystery or Secret (Eph. iii.) is the cancellation by Christ of this great estrangement in the "New Man", the joint-Body of Christ. This is further illustrated in the succeeding words of verse 14, "and hath broken down the middle wall of partition (between us)". This is most evidently an allusion to the literal wall of partition in the Temple area at Jerusalem which separated the outer court of the Gentiles from the inner courts and the Temple itself, into which only Jewish worshippers might enter. Notices were displayed in Greek and Latin warning Gentiles to keep out or suffer the death penalty. Paul himself had had a vivid experience of this when, a few years earlier, it was rumoured that he had taken a Gentile into the holy place and violated its sanctity, thereby narrowly escaping death himself (Acts xxi. 28).

This 'middle wall of partition' was a symbol of the tremendous barrier between Jew and Gentile represented by the law of God given through Moses to Israel, whether considered in its moral, ceremonial or civil aspects. It also included the special decrees instituted by the Hebrew church at Jerusalem in accordance with God's will, which represented a minimum of the law that the Gentile believer was expected to observe (Acts xv. 28, 29; xvi. 4), in order to avoid giving offence to the Jewish believer. These are the 'ordinances' of Eph. ii. 15. They have no reference to the Lord's Supper or water baptism. These, together with the Mosaic law, caused the 'enmity' which verse 15 tells us has been abolished by Christ in this new calling.

In a similar way Col. ii. 14 shows that the "handwriting of ordinances that was against us, which was contrary to us" have been cancelled by being nailed to the Cross. Having disposed of these insurmountable barriers, God can now in Christ 'create' (not just 'make' as A.V.) in Himself of twain (literally the both, that is Jew and Gentile believer) one new man, so making peace" (verse 15). Let us get this quite clear. The calling of Ephesians revealed after Acts xxviii. is something new. It is not a continuation or merely an improvement of the position during the Acts, where the Gentile believer was likened to a wild olive grafted into the true olive tree of Israel (Rom. xi. 17-22), and sharing their spiritual things (Rom. xv. 27). Here Israel the nation with its covenant blessings has no place, neither has the Gentile as such with his great disability. In this 'new man' there is neither Greek nor Jew, circumcision nor uncircumcision (Col. iii. 11).

The newness of this calling revealed in Ephesians is further stressed by the usage of the word 'create' rather than 'make'. The essence of Divine creation is that old things have passed away and new things have come into being (II Cor. v. 17). The church or out-calling revealed in this epistle is a new beginning, not an evolution of some existing grouping, though doubtless many believers of the Acts period, came to learn from 'enlightenment' (Eph. i. 17, 18) that they now belonged to this new creation, where Israel with their earthly privileges and the Gentile with his hopeless condition, cease to exist.

The goal of this "new man" is to grow up to a "full grown male" ("perfect man" Eph. iv. 13 A.V.). This is the word translated 'husband' in v. 25 and it can never represent a woman or a bride. God never mixes His metaphors and we have no right to make Him do so by teaching that this company, whose goal is to be a full-grown male, can be the same as the Bride of the Lamb.

Believers who do this are confusing the callings of God and this can only lead to a lack of appreciation and insight into the wonderful purpose of the ages in Christ (Eph. iii. 11). It is confusing a calling where Israel is prominent (Rev. xxi. 12-14) with one where Israel as such has no existence, to say nothing of seeking to blend the Jerusalem which is above and whose goal is the new earth (Rev. xxi. 2, 10) with a position 'far above all heavens' (Eph. iv. 10) where the Lord Jesus Christ is now exalted.

The removal of the 'wall of partition' and everything that would divide the members of the joint-Body, whether Jew or Gentile, leads to reconciliation, the removal of all barriers: "that He might reconcile both in one Body unto God by the Cross, having slain the enmity thereby" (verse 16). Here is another aspect of the Lord's great reconciling work on the Cross, dealing not with the relationship of God to the sinner, but the relationship of each member of this new calling to each other and to the Father, and this leads to the widest aspect of reconciliation, that of Col. i. 20, dealing with the Body and all the heavenly beings. The removal of all 'enmity' and differences of position and blessing results in "peace to you which were afar off (the Gentile), and to them that were nigh (the Jew)".

All this finally leads to unrestricted access to the Father: "for through Him we both have our access in one Spirit unto the Father" (18 R.V.). This peace does not just remove enmity and barriers; it brings every member, whether Jew or Gentile, into the presence of God the Father. To appreciate this tremendous privilege properly we should go back and consider the position of Israel as a covenant nation. With all the advantages and blessings we have seen that Israel possessed, unrestricted access to the presence of God, located in the holy of holies in the Tabernacle and the Temple, did not exist. If a Jew did not belong to a priestly family, not once during his lifetime could he even enter the Tabernacle, let alone go into the sacred innermost shrine, where the glory of God, the Shekinah, dwelt!

God deliberately hedged Himself round with all sorts of barriers, to impress upon His people the inestimable privilege of coming into His holy presence, lest this should become cheap and under-valued. For us who belong to the one Body, all such restrictions are gone and we can go to Him through the one Mediator at any time and with any frequency. Do we really appreciate this and avail ourselves constantly of such a precious privilege?

PHILEMON

No.1. pp. 210 - 215

This delightful little epistle, which is so often neglected because of its brevity and personal nature, has much to teach the believer in Christ. Since it belongs to the post Acts xxviii. period this should especially concern the members of the Body of Christ who are now being called out. True it does not contain the depth of teaching as set out in Ephesians and Colossians, nor the exhortations to 'run the race' in view of the prize set before us, of Philippians and II Timothy, but it does lay down an important principle which every believer ought to note. It reveals Paul's attitude to one of the evils of his time—slavery, and so indicates what should be the practice of the present day believer to the evils of his day. Before this is pursued at any length, a brief outline of the story behind the epistle may be of help in understanding why the letter was composed at all.

The story behind the epistle.

Philemon was a Colossian, or at any rater an inhabitant of Colosse. This is apparent from Col. iv. 8, 9 and Philemon 10, 12:

> "Whom I have sent unto you . . . . . with Onesimus, a faithful and beloved brother, who is one of you."
>
> "Onesimus, whom I have begotten in my bonds . . . . . whom I have sent again (R.V. 'back to thee')."

If Onesimus, the slave of Philemon, was one of the Colossians, it is reasonable to suppose that since he was being sent back to Philemon, then Philemon himself was at Colosse, and almost certainly resident there. This being so it is interesting to note the reference to the "church in thy house" (Philemon 2)*, which could have been the meeting place of the Colossian believers. It also reveals how Philemon may have come to deserve the commendation of Paul, "the bowels of the saints are refreshed by thee, brother" (7). How important a place hospitality must have held for these early believers who had no splendid buildings in which to meet.

[* - (# or number) indicates the verse in the epistle to Philemon.]

Philemon seems to have become a believer under the ministry of Paul, but where and when is not apparent from Scripture. It is possible that the Apostle's long stay at Ephesus when "all they which dwelt in Asia heard the word of the Lord Jesus" (Acts xix. 10), may have been the time when Philemon came to owe Paul, "even thine own self besides" (19)—an undoubted reference to his conversion. Since that event Philemon had become a beloved brother of Paul, in whom the Apostle had confidence concerning his wishes, both with respect to what he asked for Onesimus, and for the preparation of a lodging, should he be released from prison (21, 22). Philemon evidently did not disappoint Paul, or else the epistle which bears his name would hardly have been passed down to us.

Onesimus was the slave of Philemon. (It may be wondered how a believer of Philemon's character could retain a slave after his enlightenment, but when it be realized what Paul taught as to the relationship between masters and slaves, this will present no problem.) Onesimus had evidently run away from his master, and it seems possible from verse 18 of the letter that he had stolen money or goods:

> "If he hath wronged thee, or oweth thee ought, put that on mine account."

Whether or not this was due to the relaxed restraint of his master, having become a believer, cannot be said, but it is evident that Onesimus was not a believer at this time. Coming to Rome (not Caesarea as will be shown later) he contacted Paul and was converted. How this contact was made is a matter of speculation. He may have been aware of Paul's imprisonment there and (not unlike the Prodigal Son) having exhausted his means and "come to himself", turned to the only one he knew in the thronging crowds of the metropolis. That he could have free access to the Apostle at this time is evident from Acts xxviii. 30:

> "And Paul dwelt two whole years in his own hired house, and received all that came in unto him."

Whether the above speculation be true or not, after his contact with, and conversion under Paul in prison (10), Onesimus remained long enough in Rome to minister to the needs of the Apostle and so be judged of him to be "profitable to thee and to me" (11). Paul desired that he should remain in Rome to continue this ministry, but would not impose upon Philemon his master, and so sent him back (13, 14). A favourable opportunity occurred, and accompanying Tychicus, who was traveling to Colosse with letters to the church there and in Laodicea, Onesimus returned to his master bearing Paul's covering letter—the letter to Philemon. (This latter connection with Tychicus and its implications concerning Colossians and Ephesians will be considered later.)

The covering letter, which Onesimus was to deliver to Philemon, called for the acceptance of the runaway slave as 'a brother' (15, 16), and the letter was to be read to the church (and was so addressed, verses 1, 2). Thus all would know Paul's desire in the matter. They would also be aware of the attitude he was taking, an attitude characteristic of the great man, who could have 'enjoined' (ordered) Philemon to obey him in his capacity as an Apostle, but chose rather to 'beseech' (8, 9). Paul looked upon the whole affair as a means of God (15), an example of all things working together for good for those who love God and are called according to His purpose (Rom. viii. 28).

Such is a brief look at the story behind the epistle. It is quite evident why the letter was written in the first place; it may not be so obvious as to why the Holy Spirit singled it out to form a part of inspired Scripture. Unlike the other epistles which were addressed particularly to individuals (I & II Timothy and Titus), it does not discuss important matters affecting church discipline and government. There must have been many other letters like it which have not survived the test of time, and yet Philemon has not only done this, but has been accepted as part of the canon of Scripture from early days. Bishop Ellicott says of it:

> "The originality with which the Apostle is thus stamped, and the strong external testimonies of antiquity, which, short as this epistle is, are by no means wanting, may justly be said to place its genuineness and authenticity beyond all doubt."
> (Introduction to Philemon).

There are probably a number of reasons why the epistle holds the place it does. "It is one sample of numberless letters which must have been written to his many friends and disciples by one of St. Paul's eager temperament and warm affections, in the course of a long and chequered life" (Bishop Lightfoot). As a sample it reveals, perhaps better than any other of his epistles, the character of the man who was set forth as a "pattern to them which should hereafter believe in Him to life everlasting" (I Tim. i. 16). The Apostle is as it were caught in an unguarded moment. He could surely never have imagined regarding this letter (even if he did with respect to his others) that it would have been handed down to posterity. He is revealed in this most private of all his letters as one who practices what he preaches—he lives up to his convictions, and his private life is as much to be commended as that open to public gaze. If Paul was going to fail anywhere it would have been here, but he does not do so; he shows himself to be the man presented to us in the longer, more public, records of his thoughts and ways. He is a consistent pattern, and Philemon reveals this.

> "The example tact with which his (Onesimus') fraudulent conduct towards Philemon is alluded to (18),—the absence of everything tending to excuse or palliate the misdeed, yet the use of every expression and sentiment calculated to win the fullest measures of Philemon's forgiveness,—has not failed to call forth the reverential admiration of every expositor from the earliest times down to our own day."
> (Introduction to Philemon—Bishop Ellicott).

But there is a more particular reason for the retention of this epistle as part of the word of God, for as has been already noted, it reveals Paul's attitude to one of the evils of his day, and as such is a guide for present practice in this respect.

How did Paul react to slavery? Before this question can be answered it must be remembered that the Apostle was a Hebrew, familiar with the history and teaching of the O.T. He was aware that a system of slavery was enacted under the Mosaic law, (a system which has been greatly misunderstood by opponents of slavery since), and he would naturally have been influenced by this. It has been suggested that by his action in sending back Onesimus to his master he "countenanced the principles of modern fugitive-slave law". These points must be considered before any clear conception can be gained of the Apostle's attitude to N.T. slavery.

Old Testament slavery.

This title, although correct in the broadest meaning of "slavery", will be modified in the course of this consideration, to "Old Testament servitude", for the system which prevailed under the Hebrews must in no way be confused with the more modern Negro slave trade. There is no need, with some expositors, to "put out the hand to save the ark of God". O.T. servitude, correctly understood, will leave the believer no cause for alarm, nor need to compromise his belief in the veracity of "all Scripture". As with all systems, it was to be expected that it would be abused by some, but laws were formulated which protected the lot of the individual, and behind it all was the reminder:

> "And thou shalt remember that thou wast a bondman in the land of Egypt . . . . ." (Deut. xv. 15).

Bishop Lightfoot's remarks are here much to the point:

> "Considering the conditions of ancient society, and more especially of ancient warfare, slavery as practiced among the Hebrews was probably an escape from alternatives which would have involved a far greater amount of human misery."
> (Epistle to Philemon).

The writer has of course in mind here the bondage of foreigners to the Hebrews, but the system of servitude covered also the Hebrews themselves and was in many cases a blessing in disguise as will be seen.

Slavery, of the sort practiced by ships' crews who carried off savages to be sold in some distant land, men-stealing in fact, was condemned outright under the Mosaic law:

> "He that stealeth a man, and selleth him, or if he be found in his hand, he shall surely be put to death" (Exod. xxi. 16).

Paul was well aware of this aspect of O.T. law:

> ". . . . . the law is not made for a righteous man, but for the lawless and disobedient, for the ungodly . . . . . for men-stealers" (I Tim. i. 9, 10).

Theft of property must be atoned for by restitution. Sometimes this would mean paying double (Exod. xxii. 9), quadruple or even quintuple restitution (Exod. xxii. 1), but a man-stealer must forfeit his life. Such was the sanctity of human life under the Mosaic law.

A person could be sold into servitude if, having stolen and been caught, he was unable to make restitution:

> "If a man steal . . . . . he should make full restitution; if he have nothing, then he shall be sold for this theft" (Exod. xxii. 1-3).

This is surely a much better system than one in which the thief is kept at the expense of the State in prison, when there is very often no thought of restitution being made to the one stolen from. Perhaps the idea of restitution being demanded two, four or even five-fold, would provide a more effective deterrent to would-be thieves, than a short prison sentence, at the end of which the prisoner is freed to enjoy, after a suitable period of waiting, the fruits of his robbery, which had been carefully hidden before his capture. There is surely nothing inhumane in the above law, except to those modernists who refuse to accept that a man may be responsible for his actions.

A further reason for servitude under the Mosaic law is stated in Lev. xxv. 39:

"If thy brother that dwelleth by thee be waxen poor, and be sold unto thee . . . . ."

"Thy brother" evidently refers to a Hebrew in this passage, and it should be noted that there was a difference between the sale of such and the sale of foreigners. A Hebrew could not be sold, under these conditions, as a 'bondservant', only as a 'hired servant'. This is understood by some to mean that the individual sold himself, or more strictly the right to his labour. In this way, a man falling into poverty and becoming unable to maintain himself, could obtain the means of subsistence for himself and his family. Again it will be recognized that this is a thoroughly humane system, especially when it be observed that this service at most could last six years (Deut. xv. 12).

There is a further view on Lev. xxv. 39 which emphasizes the humanity of this law even more. Translate, that is to say, having done all possible to help him he still fails, then allow him to be sold unto thee. See especially verses 35-37 which precede this passage and suggest the above idea.

"And if thy brother be waxen poor by thee . . . . .",

When the six years was at an end (or should the jubilee arrive first, Lev. xxv. 40) then the servant was to be sent out with many gifts, reminiscent of the treatment afforded the Israelites on their departure from Egypt:

> "And when thou sendest him out from thee, thou shalt not let him go away empty: Thou shalt furnish him liberally . . . . . of that wherewith the Lord thy God hath blessed thee thou shalt give unto him. And thou shalt remember that thou wast a bondman in the land of Egypt, and the Lord thy God redeemed thee" (Deut. xv. 13-15).

The treatment of servants was at no time to be with rigour:

"Thou shalt not rule over him with rigour; but shalt fear thy God" (Lev. xxv. 43), which should be seen in contrast to Exod. i. 11-14, where the experience of Israel is recorded. That this injunction was likely to be obeyed is seen in that provision was made for the servant who did not wish to leave his master:

> "And it shall be, if he say unto thee, I will not go away from thee; because he loveth thee and thine house, because he is well with thee; Then thou shalt take an aul, and thrust it through his ear unto the door, and he shall be thy servant for ever" (Deut. xv. 16, 17).

Compare this last clause with Philemon 15:

"For perhaps he therefore departed for a season, that thou shouldest receive him for ever."

Other aspects of this subject could be examined but enough has been presented to show in what O.T. servitude consisted. There is one passage however, which in the light of Paul's action with Onesimus, demands attention. This will be considered in the next article.

No.2. pp. 229 - 235

It was demonstrated in the previous article that O.T. servitude was a humane and merciful system and very often a blessing in disguise. All systems however may be abused, and it must be allowed that there were those Hebrews who took advantage of being a master over another man. Cruelty is a sin not confined to the heathen of the O.T. but being found even among those of the Lord's inheritance. Provision was therefore made for such cases as would come to light:

> "If a man smite his servant, or his maid, with a rod, and he die under his hand; he shall be surely punished (avenged)."
> "If a man smite the eye of his servant, or the eye of his maid, that it perish; he shall let him go free for his eye's sake" (Exod. xxi. 20, 26).

In addition to this, the willful murder of a servant was treated under the general law affecting all under the laws of Israel (Lev. xxiv. 17, 22). But the passage which is of most interest under the circumstances, is Deut. xxiii. 15, 16, which deals with what has been called the "fugitive-slave law":

> "Thou shalt not deliver unto his master the servant which is escaped from his master unto thee: he shall dwell with thee, even among you, in that place which he shall choose in one of thy gates, where it liketh him best: thou shalt not oppress him."

Such a passage as this might well come into the Apostle's mind when Onesimus, the runaway slave, came to him. A great difference however existed between what was behind the O.T. injunction and Paul's present experience. Referring to the passage in Deuteronomy, The Imperial Bible Dictionary says:

> "When a servant escaped from his master, the law presumed that he had good reason for fleeing, and therefore forbade anyone on whose protection he might throw himself to deliver him up to his master. He was to remain with the person in whose house he had taken refuge . . . . . It is obvious that the effect of such a law must have been to stimulate masters to treat their servants with all possible kindness and consideration."

Things were very different under the system of slavery in Paul's day. Bishop Lightfoot commenting on this, first contrasts the slaves among the Jews, who 'formed only a small fraction of the whole population', with the vast masses held in Greece and Rome. Referring to the latter he continues:

> "And these vast masses of human beings had no protection from Roman law. The slave had no relationships, no conjugal rights. Cohabitation was allowed to him at his owner's pleasure, but not marriage. His companion was sometimes assigned to him by lot. The slave was absolutely at his masters disposal; for the smallest offence he might be scourged, mutilated, crucified, thrown to the wild beasts" (Epistle to Philemon).

One can well imagine, under such a system, how Onesimus, having stolen from his master, would flee to the metropolis to escape detection and punishment (possibly death).

Could he be certain that he would be treated with leniency, even though he might have observed a changed attitude in his master since he became a believer? Evidently not. There is also another factor which ought to be considered; the character of Onesimus himself.

> "There was absolutely nothing to recommend him. He was a slave, and what was worse, a Phrygian slave; and he had confirmed the popular estimate of his class and nation by his own conduct. He was a thief and a runaway. His offence did not differ in any way, so far as we know, from the vulgar type of slavish offences."
> (Epistle to Philemon).

In line with this it should be noted that Paul does not seek at any time to excuse the misdeed of Onesimus, nor blame his action upon the circumstances under which he had grown up. Only the Lord can judge of the relationship between circumstances and action. The character of Onesimus may perhaps be judged from Philemon 11:

> "Which in time past was to thee unprofitable . . . . .", a possible allusion to the name "Onesimus" which means profitable, so that before his conversion he did not live up to his name. After, things were different.

How Onesimus contacted Paul in Rome, as has been noted before, belong to the realm of speculation. Onesimus, having exhausted his means, and knowing of the whereabouts of Paul, may have thrown himself upon the Apostle's mercy and learnt of the greater mercy of Christ in redeeming all sorts and conditions of men from bondage, whence his conversion—but this is pure guesswork.

Now is observed the great test of Christianity. How much difference does belief in Christ make to a man? The law required that Onesimus must be sent back to his master. In addition to this the law of conscience required that, although Onesimus had repented of his misdeed, restitution should be made. This could only be possible if the runaway slave was returned to his master. But how would Philemon react? Confessedly he was a believer, but it must be remembered, brought up in a society which accepted slavery. By returning, Onesimus would put himself entirely at the mercy of his master, who had every right to exact death for a far lighter offence than his. But Paul's confidence is strong in both Philemon and Onesimus. Accompanied by Tychicus, Onesimus returns to Colosse (Col. iv. 7-9); Paul now assured that he will live up to his name (11), and the letter he carries has the words:

> "receive him . . . . . not now as a servant, but above a servant, a brother beloved . . . . . receive him as myself . . . . . Having confidence in thy obedience I wrote unto thee, knowing that thou wilt also do more than I say" (Philemon 15-21).

It must be assumed that, since this letter has survived, Philemon did not disappoint Paul in his expectations.

The change wrought in both Philemon and Onesimus as a result of their contact with the living Christ was no less in Paul himself with respect to slavery. Paul had been trained as a Rabbi, and would, prior to his conversion, have acceded to the teachings of his former masters. Dean Farrar observes the following in his book The Life and Work of St. Paul, gleaned from Jewish writings:

> "It happened that on one occasion a female slave of Rabbi Eliezer died, and when his disciples came to condole with him he retired from them from room to room, from upper chamber to hall, till at last he said to them, 'I thought you would feel the effects of tepid water, but you are proof even against hot water. Have I not taught you that these signs of respect are not to be paid at the death of slaves?' 'What, then', asked the disciples, 'are pupils on such occasions to say to their masters?' 'The same as is said when their oxen and asses die', answered the Rabbi—'May the Lord replenish thy loss'."

Probably not all Rabbis would take the above extreme view, but would hold less severe ideas. Nevertheless, it seems that Rabbinic tradition would have influenced the Apostle's mind enough to have caused him to regard slaves as very inferior persons, and no doubt his position as a Roman, free born (Acts xxii. 25-28) would contribute to such an attitude. But what grace is found in Christ, grace which caused the Apostle to write in an epistle delivered at the same time as Philemon, and in the context of 'masters and slaves':

> "there is no respect of persons . . . . ." (Col. iii. 25).

Paul's attitude to slavery.

It is evident from the foregoing that Paul's Christianity was opposed in principle to all that Roman slavery stood for. His exhortation to a master to receive a slave 'as a brother' is indicative of this. Yet Paul never attacked slavery as an institution, nor urged believing masters to free their slaves as a part of their duty to God. It is true, as Lightfoot observes, that in Philemon "the word 'emancipation' seems to be trembling on his lips, and yet he does not once utter it". He does however in the same epistle put Philemon under an obligation which far transcends the emancipation of Onesimus:

> "receive him as myself . . . . . thou owest unto me even thine own self besides" (17, 19).

Onesimus was in debt to Philemon but the reverse was also true. Philemon owed to his now believing slave what all believers owe to each other:

> "Owe no man any thing, but to love one another . . . . ." (Rom. xiii. 8).

Such truth in practice would in time undermine the system of slavery, and what was already true in Christ Jesus, "there is neither . . . . . bond nor free" (Col. iii. 11), would eventually become true in the flesh. Two Scriptures are helpful in establishing Paul's view on this system, which was entrenched so deeply into the society of his day:

> "Every man should remain in the condition in which he was called. Were you a slave when you were called? Do not let that trouble you; but if a chance of liberty should come, take it. For the man who as a slave received the call to be a Christian is the Lord's freedman, and, equally, the free man who received the call is a salve in the service of Christ. You were bought at a price; do not become slaves of men. Thus each one, my friends, is to remain before God in the condition in which he received his call."
> (I Cor. vii. 20-24 New English Bible).

There is an alternative idea as to the translation of the latter half of verse 21 advocated by Coneybeare, Bengel, Meyer, etc., which would make it read:

> "Wast thou in slavery at the time of thy calling? Care not for it. Nay, though thou have power to gain thy freedom, rather make use of thy condition" (Coneybeare's translation).

There are thus two opposing views as to what Paul is here advising, both equally admissible on the grounds of the language alone. Either Paul is recommending the slave to accept any offer of freedom given to him, or to refuse the same. One factor which weighs heavily with the latter view is the proximity of the Lord's coming (parousia) at the time of I Corinthians. In the very same chapter Paul is advising the unmarried to remain so, "for the present distress" (vii. 25-29) and in view of the fact that "the time is short" (verse 29). Should not the slave manifest the same attitude?

Even if the above be conceded as Paul's attitude during the Acts period, there is no need to imagine that this continued to be so when the hope of the Lord's parousia was postponed at Acts xxviii. In I Timothy (a post-Acts xxviii. epistle) the Apostle advises the younger widows to marry and bear children, a recommendation contrary to the spirit of I Cor. vii. Only the recognition of a changed dispensation will account for this. And also in the light of a changed dispensation it seems highly improbable that Paul would recommend slavery in preference to freedom, if that freedom could be obtained lawfully. "The independent position of the freeman would give him an obvious advantage in doing the work of Christ, which it is difficult to imagine St. Paul enjoining him deliberately to forego" (Lightfoot).

Turning however to the main point in I Cor. vii. 20-24, it will be observed that the slave was to be content with his lot, untroubled by his position in society. He was to be aware that his condition in this life meant little when seen in the light of the Lord's work in him. He was the Lord's freeman and as such stood on an equality with all who were the Lord's. A realization of this position would make his condition in this life tolerable. Paul never condoned slavery; what he did was to remind those who suffered under it, of their position in Christ. In the flesh the slave had nothing; in Christ he was rich beyond dreams. (Compare Col. iii. 23-25).

The second passage which has a bearing upon Paul's attitude to slavery is I Tim. vi. 1-10. The passage begins with an exhortation to slaves to "count their own masters worthy of all honour, that the name of God and his (literally 'the') teaching be not blasphemed". This exhortation seems to be directed especially at slaves with unbelieving masters in contrast to verse 2, "they that have believing masters". What grace would be needed to obey such an exhortation when the master might well be a tyrant, with no sympathy whatsoever towards the beliefs of his slave, yet "the name of God and the teaching" was at stake.

Not all however held 'the teaching' here referred to. There were those who would not consent to "wholesome words" (verse 3), who apparently taught the slave to adopt quite a contrary attitude. Why should he acquiesce to his position in his life! why remain content with his lot as a slave? He should be free and enjoy some of the goods of this world. On the face of it this sounds very plausible, for why should a man be a slave subject to the whims and fancies of another; has he no right, on the basis of Christian principles, to an equal chance in life as his master? Certainly, but this is not the point of this passage. The attitude of mind is that which is uppermost in the Apostle's thoughts, for there were those who were,

> "supposing that gain is godliness" (verse 5), or better, "holding godliness to be (equivalent to) gain". So that for a slave to seek betterment in the form of social standing, or particularly (in the context), by gaining materially, was the process of godliness. Such a doctrine was contrary to "the words of our Lord Jesus Christ" which taught that, "godliness with contentment is great gain" (verse 6). It may seem hard to expect a slave to accept such a statement, but then Paul adduces as his reason an observation true of all men of all times:

> "For we brought nothing into this world, and it is certain we can carry nothing out. And having food and raiment let us be therewith content" (verses 7, 8).

Also it should be remembered, that Paul was not asking for an attitude of mind on the part of others, which was contrary to his own:

> "I have learned, in whatsoever state I am, therewith to be content" (Phil. iv. 11).

When Paul wrote these words he was in a Roman prison, not a very pleasant state to be in, yet he was content, as is also emphasized in his reference to himself as, "The prisoner of Christ Jesus" and "The prisoner of the Lord" (Eph. iii. 1; iv. 1), rather than recognizing that he was a prisoner of the Roman power. If Paul could take such an attitude to life from a position of captivity, and if he could encourage such an attitude in those under the bondage of slavery, then those believers of the present time whose lot is cast in "pleasant places" have no excuse for taking any other attitude. The wisdom of God, which is foolishness from man's point of view, reveals that the contrary attitude, the determination to be rich, leads to 'temptation and a snare' (I Tim. vi. 9).

> "Those who want to be rich fall into temptations and snares and many foolish harmful desires which plunges men into ruin and perdition. The love of money is the root of all evil things, and there are some who in reaching for it have wandered from the faith and spiked themselves on many thorny griefs" (I Tim. vi. 9, 10 N.E.B.).

The attitude, the 'bent' of the mind is all important. Paul directed that it should be on things above, "where Christ sitteth on the right hand of God", and this was to be so whether bond or free.

Summarizing Paul's attitude to slavery it is noted:

(1) He never attacked it as an institution, but his teaching opposed it at heart.
(2) He expected slaves to give due honour to their masters.
(3) Slaves were not to care about their condition but to be content.
(4) If a slave could obtain his liberty legitimately, he should do so.
(5) "In Christ" there is neither "bond nor free".

The Apostle's general teaching for slaves and servants of all degrees, is as true today as it ever has been. Similarly his injunctions to masters. If today they are known as "employers" and "employees" does that make any difference? The Apostle would not have thought so. So may all take heed to his words, which, since they form part of Scripture, are "words which the Holy Spirit teacheth":

> "Servants, obey your masters here below . . . . . do not work simply when their eye is on you . . . . . but serve them with a single heart, out of reverence for your Lord and Master. Whatever be your task, work at it heartily, as servants of the Lord and not of men; remember, you are to receive from the Lord the inheritance . . . . . the wrongdoer will be paid back for his wrongdoings—there will be no favour shown. Masters, treat your servants justly and fairly; remember that you have a Master of your own in heaven" (Col. iii. 22 - iv. 1 Moffatt Version).

The Out-Resurrection

(Phil. iii. 11).

What does it imply?

pp. 147 - 152

In II Tim. ii. 16-21 the Apostle speaks in most serious terms of a system of teaching "which will eat as doth a canker . . . . . saying that the resurrection is past already". We do not know just exactly what this heretical teaching was, and need not spend time in a negative research, but we should be exceedingly sensitive to any line of teaching that touches either the Resurrection of the Lord, or of His people

As the martyr Tyndale said, the idea that at death the believer enters into the presence of the Lord, empties resurrection of any meaning. We have particularly in mind in writing this article the idea, entertained by some children of God, that any, who like Paul "attain unto the out-resurrection", do not wait for the end of the age, or the Second Coming, but 'depart' to be with Christ at death. While this prospect is exceedingly attractive, it can only be accepted if justified by the Scriptures, all else must eventually come under the censure of II Tim. ii. 16-21.

Let us consider the term "out-resurrection". Whatever prefix we may place before the word 'resurrection' such as 'the better resurrection', 'the resurrection of life or of condemnation', 'the first resurrection', the meaning of resurrection remains constant, and resurrection is linked with a 'body', and cannot be spiritualized away. The 'out-resurrection' is an expression which is not found in the A.V. but is justified by the original text.

Let us turn to Mark ix. 1-13 where we have described the Transfiguration of Christ, for an illustration:

> "And as they came down from the mountain, He charged them that they should tell no man what things they had seen, till the Son of Man were risen from the dead" (verse 9).

The problem that meets us here is the fact that these disciples questioned one another as to,

> "What the rising from the dead should mean?" (verse 10).

As the matter stands, we too would be perplexed, for it is common knowledge that even the Pharisees believed the resurrection of the dead (Acts xxiii. 6-8) as also did Martha (John xi. 23-27). It seems strange therefore that the disciples should question it. Whenever we meet with any similar problem, our first thought should be to consult the original, not to attempt some independent explanation. In the original we find the preposition ek 'out of', which is not translated in the A.V. and it was the presence of this word that caused the disciples' perplexity.

> "Till the Son of Man were risen OUT FROM the dead."
> "What the rising OUT FROM the dead should mean."

In Luke xx. 35 we read of some who shall be 'accounted worthy to obtain' that world, and the resurrection which is OUT (ek) from the dead, that they shall be equal to the angels. So that this 'out-resurrection' is associated with being 'accounted worthy'. In other words we are being prepared to accept the idea that 'out-resurrection', if it be used elsewhere, may be associated with a 'prize', and this is just what we find.

In Phil. iii. 10-14 we read:

> "If by any means I might attain unto the resurrection of the dead. Not as though I had already attained . . . . ."

Now if the Apostle Paul was not sure that he would be included in the resurrection of the dead, what hope have we? Besides, the words 'attain', 'not already perfect', 'that I may apprehend', prepare us for the fact that we have before us not a calling and a standing in grace, but a race and a prize.

And so we find this preposition ek occurs as in the passages quoted above.

> "If by any means I might attain unto the exanastasis, the out-resurrection, ek nekron, out from the dead" (best texts).

Sometimes it is hopeful to consider any parallels that exist elsewhere, and the epistle to the Hebrews and the Book of the Revelation provide these parallels. Heb. xii., in its opening verses, shows that in Heb. xi. there has been some element of race and prize. "Let us run with patience the race that is set before us", and so the reference to a 'better resurrection' in Heb. xi. 35 falls into line with 'the out-resurrection' of Phil. iii.

Philippians is balanced by II Timothy, as Ephesians is balanced by Colossians, and recognition of this correspondence is helpful.

> "Try the things that differ" (Phil. i. 10 margin)
> "Rightly dividing the Word of Truth" (II Tim. ii. 15).
> "The prize of the high calling" (Phil. iii. 14).
> "Henceforth a crown . . . . . at that day" (II Tim. iv. 8).
> "Having a desire to depart" (Phil. i. 23).
> "The time of my departure is at hand" (II Tim. iv. 6).
> "I count not myself to have apprehended" (Phil. iii. 13).
> "I have finished my course" (II Tim. iv. 7).
> "Not . . . . . already perfect" (Phil. iii. 12).

There is also a parallel to be found between Philippians and Hebrews.

> "Our citizenship (conversation) is in heaven; from whence also we look for the Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ, Who shall change this body of our humiliation, that it may be fashioned like unto His body of glory" (Phil. iii. 20, 21).
> "He looked for a city" (Heb. xi. 10).
> "He hath prepared for them a city" (xi. 16).
> "A better resurrection" (xi. 35).
> "The spirits of just men made perfect" (xii. 23).
> "Let us go on unto perfection" (vi. 1).

"We are not of them who draw back unto perdition" (x. 39).
"Esau . . . . . for one morsel of meat sold his birthright" (xii. 16).

These references taken from Hebrews find their counterpart in Philippians, 'the citizenship', 'the out-resurrection', 'not as though I were already perfect'. The word translated 'perdition' is the same in the original as 'destruction' in Phil. iii. 19, and the reference to Esau is found in the warning concerning those 'whose god is their belly'. These most evident parallels cannot be ignored, and Paul's reference 'to depart' in Philippians is to be understood in the light of his own words found in II Timothy:

> "Henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous Judge, shall give me at that day: and not to me only, but unto all them also that have loved His appearing" (II Tim. iv. 8).

The classical passage concerning resurrection is of course I Cor. xv.:

> "For as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive. But every man in his own order; Christ the first fruits; afterward they that are Christ's at His coming. Then cometh the end" (I Cor. xv. 22-24).

There is no place here for an 'out-resurrection' or a 'better resurrection', but we get some lead when we look at the overcomer in Rev. xx.:

> "And I saw thrones, and they sat upon them . . . . . and they lived and reigned with Christ a thousand years. But the rest of the dead lived not again until the thousand years were finished. This is the first (or former) resurrection" (Rev. xx. 4, 5).

Here, most certainly is an out-resurrection of those to whom a throne, and to change the figure, a crown is awarded, but there is nothing here to suggest that these who are prize winners, or partakers in an 'out-resurrection', passed at death into their reward; all waited for the Advent of Christ.

We come back to the Apostle's own position, and find this to be similar. Nearly 2,000 years ago Paul died. He was indeed an overcomer. He knew that a 'crown' awaited him. But there is not the slightest evidence from Scripture to justify the idea that for nearly 2,000 years the Apostle has been consciously 'with Christ', having received the 'prize' of Phil. iii.

Heb. xi. say of those who were examples of the overcomers:

> "These all died in faith, NOT HAVING RECEIVED the promises, but having seen them AFAR OFF . . . . . they desire a better country, that is, an heavenly . . . . . God . . . . . hath prepared for them a city" (Heb. xi. 13-16).

This city is the Heavenly, or the New Jerusalem that has not yet descended out of heaven. It would be a contradiction of the words "NOT HAVING RECEIVED" to assume that one by one as they died they, by an "out-resurrection", went before the Lord's return to that city of their faith. They saw them 'afar off', not as an immediate hope, and the closing lines of this chapter read:

> "That they without us should not be made perfect."

To this line of teaching the Apostle evidently referred when in Philippians, with the race, the prize and the out-resurrection in view, he said:

> "Not as though I had already attained, either were already perfect; but I follow . . . . . I press . . . . . for the prize" (Phil. iii. 12-16).

The Apostle in another context said, concerning the hope of resurrection:

> "For we that are in this tabernacle do groan, being burdened; not for that we would be unclothed, but clothed upon, that mortality might be swallowed up of life" (II Cor. v. 4).

The same apostle, writing to the same church, used this same figure "Death is swallowed up in victory" and related it to the "last trump" (I Cor. xv. 51-54). If those who attain to the prize and the out-resurrection pass, after three days burial (as some have maintained) into the presence of the Lord, why has Paul, the Apostle, not said so? So far as Paul is concerned, the crown will be his at the Lord's "appearing" (II Tim. iv. 8), which is the word that refers to the hope, of the Church of the Mystery.

We will not continue unduly to consider this idea that is held by some believers, but realize that those who die in faith, in any dispensation, fall asleep to awake:

> "When Christ, Who is our LIFE, shall appear" (Col. iii. 4).

Let our criterion ever be 'what saith the Scriptures?' not what we ourselves wish the Scriptures said.

In conclusion, we feel that it is due to all readers to state, that in Volumes VII & VIII of The Berean Expositor we did, on page 150 of Volume VIII indicate a leaning to the possibility that those who attained to this "OUT-resurrection" and who died, did pass into the presence of the Lord. For this we had no actual Scriptural basis, it was but a possible inference. Such 'leanings' or 'inferences' can never be satisfactory to the true Berean who searches to see if what is taught is "SO", and for years now since 1918, we have regarded this teaching to be but a private opinion which could possibly approximate to that which the Apostle so strongly condemned in II Tim. ii. 16-18, and so have left the matter as it stands in Scripture.

We believe Paul himself settled the question for us, and for all who will let him speak for himself. We note how the following words taken from the same epistle (Philippians) harmonize with the subject we have been discussing. We are content to let our faith rest here:

> "For our citizenship is in heaven; FROM whence also we look for the Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ; who shall change this body of our humiliation, that it may fashioned like unto His body of glory" (Phil. iii. 20, 21).

While Paul's "citizenship" existed as a present fact (huparcho) IN HEAVEN, he himself, and those likeminded with him, "Looked for the Saviour FROM WHENCE". Clearly he did not anticipate experiencing this, and at the same time, a special resurrection at death.

APPENDIX by Stuart Allen.

As an appendage to this study, we would point out that the above reflects our late President's mature views on this subject. It was written in October 1964 when he was ministering fully at the London chapel. It is evident from the Scriptures that there is more than one "out-resurrection". Some have imagined that a special out-resurrection is peculiar to the Mystery alone, and yet they go to II Cor. v. for some of its details! As Mr. Welch has shown, the Lord, in His earthly ministry, taught that there was an out-resurrection for those who "shall be accounted worthy to obtain that age (world), and the resurrection out from (ek) the dead" (Luke xx. 35). The resurrection of Rev. xx. 5 is parallel, as those who experience it are overcomers who have been faithful unto death, whereas the rest of the dead are left in their graves until after the 1,000 year reign of Christ is accomplished. While the word out-resurrection is not used, the fact of it is obviously there. Similarly we can place the 'better resurrection' of Heb. xi. 35 in the same category, as all those mentioned in chapter vii. are likewise overcomers who are stamped with faithfulness, being willing to suffer loss in this present life, and content to be strangers and pilgrims.

These are therefore at least three out-resurrections: (1) in connection with the Lord's earthly kingdom; (2) the ministry of the Acts and the heavenly Jerusalem; (3) the Body of Christ. In the first two the exact time element is not revealed. Neither is there any time element in Phil. iii. 11, but if we realize that 'prize' and 'crown' are symbols, not of two separate things but of one thing, namely reward for faithful service, then the parallel epistle of II Timothy does date it for us. The Apostle says:

> "I have fought the good fight, I have finished the course, I have kept the faith. Henceforth there is laid up for me the crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous Judge shall give to me AT THAT DAY, and not only to me, but also to all them that have loved His Appearing" (II Tim. iv. 7, 8, R.V.).

In Philippians he was running the race for the prize, but, at that time, he was not certain of attaining to it. In his last letter, II Timothy, he has finished the same course and is allowed to say with certainty that he will receive his reward, not at death, but AT THAT DAY, which the context of verses one and eight links with the Lord's appearing (epiphaneia), the distinctive word which describes the hope of the Body. If the prize or crown is received through a special resurrection just after death, then the Lord must be sitting on His award-throne all down this age of grace and giving rewards one by one as each prize winner dies. Needless to say, such an idea is completely unscriptural.

If we allow this important passage of Scripture to weigh with us, then we shall believe that, as far as the time element is concerned, the prize or crown is received at the same time as the hope is experience, namely at the epiphaneia of the Lord as Head of the Body.

We must be careful, too, that the truth of identification with Christ is not mis-used. The "raising together" of Eph. ii. 6 (sunegeiro) is not physical resurrection, but is positional, IN Christ Jesus (6), and is how God sees us now in Christ in our glorious standing. It is no more physical than our present being "seated together in Christ Jesus" (same verse) is physical. On the other hand anastasis 'resurrection' is never used in the N.T. except in the literal bodily sense, but that word does not occur in this context. Moreover, if identification with Christ teaches that the out-resurrection occurs at death or soon after, then it proves too much, for the Pentecostal church was likewise seen to be raised with Christ (Rom. vi. 3-5), and if this means literal resurrection, then away goes the uniqueness of the out-resurrection as applied to the Body.

It is important to realize that the out-resurrection is not the prize, but the gateway to it, just as in Rev. xx. the first or former resurrection is not the prize for these overcomers, but the necessary introduction to it, that is, reigning with Christ in His millennial kingdom. It is the sharing of this glorious reign which is the crown or reward for these faithful believers, not this resurrection taken by itself.

So with the Body, it is the reigning with Christ in the heavenlies, symbolized by the word 'prize' or 'crown', which is the abiding reward for faithfulness and endurance:

> "If we died with Him, we shall also live with Him. If we endure, we shall also reign with Him . . . . ." (II Tim. ii. 11, 12, R.V.), and this is introduced by the out-resurrection of Phil. iii.

There is no need to be concerned with the gap between death and this resurrection. However long or short this may be, in experience it will be death and sudden glory. The fact that 'sleep' does not occur in the Prison Epistles proves nothing. Sanctification is not mentioned in Ephesians or Colossians. Are we to deduce from this that the truth of sanctification does not apply to the Body of Christ? What has been settled as basic truth in earlier epistles does not need repetition. And if the prize winning believer is only in the grave for three days (as some assert), would not this be 'sleep'?

We cannot help feeling that if, instead of clinging to the time element and unscriptural inferences and wishful thinking, we paid more attention to the stringent conditions for obtaining the prize or crown, it would be much wiser. What is the use of arguing about the exact time it will be realized if we are not fulfilling the conditions for obtaining it? Specially when we remember that the cunning adversary is always waiting for an opportunity to divide the saints on doctrinal points if he possibly can and so spoil that unity which the Lord has made, and which we are charged to guard (Eph. iv.). The evil doctrine that the Apostle Paul so solemnly warned Timothy about did not so much deny the resurrection of the believer, but asserted that it was 'past already', and so overthrew the faith of some (II Tim. ii. 18). It was the time element that was wrong. Resurrection, with was yet future, Hymenaeus and Philetus taught as being already attained by some, and this was spreading like a 'gangrene', upsetting other believers and giving place to the devil. It was part of 'profane and vain babblings'.

As the days darken around us, there is more need than ever that everyone who professes to be a true Berean will take care not to teach anything but what is clearly and unambiguously revealed in the Scriptures, especially in those of Paul's prison letters which so intimately concern the Body of Christ.

The Pleroma

No.21. "All the Fullness of the Godhead Bodily-wise."
pp. 10 - 14

Three Greek words are translated "Godhead" in the N.T., namely, To Theion that which is divine, the thing pertaining to Theos. Theiotes, divinity, the characteristic property of Theos. That which is discernible from the works of creation, thereby making idolatry "without excuse" (Rom. i. 20) and Theotes.

> Theotes, Deity, the being in Whom Theiotes of the highest order resides (Col. ii. 9).

The above is partly quoted from Dr. E. W. Bullinger's Lexicon, and it agrees with the definitions given by Trench, Cremer, Lightfoot and most commentators.

Those of us who believe the doctrine of the Deity of Christ naturally turn to Col. ii. 9 as to a proof text, but this may not be the right attitude of heart and mind when dealing with the sacred Scriptures. We do no honour to the Lord, if we misuse a portion of Scripture, even to prove or to enforce the glorious doctrine of His Deity. Truth needs no bolster. One of the reasons that caused us to hesitate about this use of Col. ii. 9 is that when we apply the principle given in I Cor. ii. 13 namely, that we speak not in the words of man's wisdom, "but which the Holy Ghost teacheth", and that we then go on to compare spiritual things with spiritual, we come up against a doctrinal difficulty. If the words "all the fullness" of the Godhead, prove the Deity of Christ, what do they prove in Eph. iii. 19. There, the prayer of the apostle is for the believer, that Christ may dwell, katoikeo, in their hearts by faith, and as a consequence that they may be "filled with (eis unto, with a view to) all the fullness of God". If "all the fullness of Theotes" proves the Deity of Christ, should not "all the fullness of Theos" prove the Deity of the Church? To express the thought is to refute it. Such cannot be the meaning. In Col. i. 19 we meet the expression "all the fullness", but there it is not followed, either by "God" or "Godhead", yet this first reference must have a definite bearing upon the second reference found in Col. ii. 9.

> "For it pleased the Father that in Him should all the fullness dwell pan to pleroma katoikedai" (Col. i. 19).

We cannot expect to understand the reference in Col. ii. 9 if we ignore the earlier reference in Col. i. 19. They go together and constitute a united testimony. The first passage opens with redemption (Col. i. 14) and closes with "peace through the blood of His cross" (Col. i. 20). He Who created "all things, that are in heaven and that are in earth" (Col. i. 16) reconciled "all things, whether they be things in earth, or things in heaven" (Col. i. 20). We move from Creation to Reconciliation via the headship of the church which is His body, and the blessed fact that He Who was in the beginning "the firstborn of every creature" is revealed as being Himself "the beginning, the firstborn from the dead". While the triumph of His resurrection is the feature that is stressed here, we believe we shall never understand the reference to "fullness" in Col. ii. 9 if we do not know the corresponding "emptying" of Phil. ii. In order to illustrate this approach we use the figure of Jacob's ladder, being fully justified so to do by the reference made to it by the Lord Himself.

In Gen. xxviii. we have the record of Jacob's dream, wherein he saw a ladder set up on earth, and the top of it reached to heaven, "and behold the angels of God ascending and descending on it" (Gen. xxviii. 12). In John i., Nathaniel is referred to by the Lord as "an Israelite indeed, in Whom is no guile" (John i. 47). The word translated "guile" is dolos and is used in the LXX of Gen. xxvii. 35, where Isaac tells Esau, "Thy brother came with subtilty (dolos) guile, and hath taken away thy blessing". One cannot avoid seeing an oblique reference in John i. 47 to Jacob, an Israelite who was most certainly not without "guile". However, that is by the way, our interest is more directly concerned with verse 51.

> "Hereafter ye shall see heaven open, and the ANGELS of God ASCENDING and DESCENDING upon the Son of Man" (John i. 51).

Now observe, "fullness" is associated with Christ, in the fact that in order that He might FILL ALL THINGS, He that descended is the same also that ascended far above all heavens" (Eph. iv. 10).

Returning to John i., we observe the following sequences of thought:

> "In the beginning was the Word . . . . . the Word was God."
> "All things were made by Him."
> "The Word was made flesh and dwelt (tabernacled, skenoo, not the permanent 'dwelling' katoikeo of Col. ii. 9) among us."
> "Of His FULNESS have all we received."
> "The angels of God ascending and descending upon the Son of Man."

So in Col. i. 15-20, He Who was the "Image of the Invisible God" (compare John i. 1 and 18), Who created all things (see John i. 3) Who became also the Firstborn from the dead, Who is before all things (even as John the Baptist acknowledged, John i. 30), in Him, in the capacity, not only as Creator but as the Firstborn from the dead (thereby assuming the death of the cross), in that capacity and in no other way, was it pleasing to the Father that "in Him should all the fullness dwell". It is for this reason, we find the word somatikos "bodily" in Col. ii. 9. This word has been translated by several commentators "bodily-wise", as though the fullness could not dwell in Him in any other way.

We spoke a little while ago about the fact that if Colossians speaks of the Saviour's "Fullness", the Philippians speaks of His voluntary self-emptying. Phil. ii. 6-11 has been given a fairly full exposition in the book entitled The Prize of the High Calling, and the reader would be advised to consult pages 75-111 of that volume. Here, we can deal with one item only, the meaning of the words "He made Himself of no reputation" (Phil. ii. 7). First of all we give the structure of verses 6-9.

b | Every tongue confess.
a | Jesus Christ is Lord.

Here it will be observed "things in heaven, and things in earth" occurs as in Col. i. 16.

"He made Himself of no reputation." The A.V. has used the word "reputation" twice in Philippians, the second occurrence being at ii. 29, "hold such in reputation". The R.V. has wisely omitted the word "reputation" in both passages, reading in ii. 7 "but emptied Himself", and in ii. 29 "hold such in honour", for two different Greek words are used.

The change, however, while it makes some aspects of the truth clearer, introduces other problems for, to a modern mind, there is something strange about the idea of anyone "emptying himself". In modern usage, empty places foremost in the mind the idea of a "jug without water", "a room without furniture" & "empty vessels" (II Ki. iv. 3). These come naturally to mind. In order to avoid too crude an application of the figure of "emptying a vessel" when speaking of the Saviour's humiliation, most of us slip into paraphrase and say "He divested Himself" of His dignity and insignia of Deity, but this is confessedly an attempt to avoid a problem. The verb keno is cognate with kenos "vain" and means "empty". That the word has a wider application than that of emptying a vessel, such expressions as "seven empty ears" (Gen. xli. 27), "the sword of Saul returned not empty" (II Sam. i. 22) will show.

Where kenos is translated "empty" in the A.V. of the N.T. it refers in the parable to the treatment of the servant by the wicked husbandmen, who sent him "empty away" (Mark xii. 3; Luke xx. 10, 11), and to "the rich" who were "sent empty away" (Luke i. 53); in most cases, however, kenos is translated "vain", as for example, in Philippians itself "run in vain" and "labour in vain", where it is evident that "empty" would have no meaning (Phil. ii. 16).

The verb keno translated "to make of no reputation", occurs 5 times in the Greek N.T. and the four occurrences other than that of Phil. ii. 7, render the word "make void", "make none effect" and "be in vain" (Rom. iv. 14; I Cor. i. 17; ix. 15; II Cor. ix. 3). In Phil. ii. 3 we find the word kenodoxia "vain glory". We remember with adoring wonder that in the Psalm of the Cross, we read "I am poured out like water" (Psa. xxii. 14). He did indeed "empty Himself". The word translated "offer" in Phil. ii. 17 is found in the LXX of Gen. xxxv. 14, where Jacob revisited the scene of the "ladder", which he re-named "Bethel", and following his Master's footsteps, faintly adumbrates that awful condescension which, for our sakes, left behind the glory of heaven, for the deep, deep humiliation of "the death of the cross".

Above the ladder is intimated "the glory that He had" before the world was. This must not be confused with the glory that was "given" Him, as the Man Christ Jesus, the One Mediator. We may, in resurrection behold the one, but "the glory which thou gavest Me" the Saviour said "I have given them, that they may be one, EVEN AS we are one" (John xvii. 22). We do not pretend to understand this profound revelation. We would add not one syllable of our own lest we spoil and corrupt such unearthly beauty; but we can bow our heads and our hearts in adoring wonder, as we perceive that this is implied in the word "fullness", for the church of the One Body is revealed to be,

> "The fullness of Him, that filleth all in all" (Eph. i. 23).

Here the church is one with the Lord. We see the wondrous descent seven steps down to the death of the cross. Here at the foot, on the earth He is seen as Emmanuel "God with us". Here, it was fulfilled "He was numbered with the transgressors". And by virtue of that most wondrous "reckoning", He became our Surety. The word translated "surety" in the O.T. is the Hebrew word arab, which in the form arrabon is brought over into N.T. Greek, occurring in Eph. i. 14 as "earnest". This word corresponds with "pledge" in Gen. xxxviii. 17, 18 "Wilt thou give me a pledge till thou send it?" The root idea appears to be that of mixing or mingling:

> "A mixed multitude" (Margin a great mixture) (Exod. xii. 38).
> "The holy seed have mingled themselves" (Ezra ix. 2).
> "A stranger doth not intermeddle with his joy" (Prov. xiv. 10).
> "In the warp or woof" (Lev. xiii. 48).

Arising out of the idea of this mixing and interweaving comes that of a surety, who is so intimately associated with the obligations laid upon the one for whom he acts, that he can be treated in his stead. So we get:

> "Thy servant became surety for the law" (Gen. xliv. 32).
> "He that is surety for a stranger shall smart for it" (Prov. xi. 15).
> "We have mortgaged our lands" (Neh. v. 3).
> "Give pledges to my lord the king" (II Kings xviii. 23).

In Ezek. xxvii. 9, 27 we find the word translated "occupy" in the sense of exchanging or bartering. In the same way we understand the expression, "Occupy, till I come", and still speak of a man's trade as his "occupation".

Such is the underlying meaning of the word "surety", one who identifies himself with another in order to bring about deliverance from obligations. This is clearly seen in Prov. xxii. 26, 27: "Be not thou one of them that strike hands, or of them that are sureties for debts. If thou hast nothing to pay, why should he take away thy bed from under thee?". It is evident from this passage that the surety was held liable for the debts of the one whose cause he had espoused, even to the loss of his bed and this meant practically his all, as may be seen by consulting Exod. xxii. 26, 27, "If thou at all take thy neighbour's raiment to pledge, thou shalt deliver it unto him by that the sun goeth down; for that is his covering only, it is his raiment for his skin: wherein shall he sleep?" Judah who became Surety for his brother Benjamin, gives us a picture of Christ's Suretyship, saying to Joseph:

> "How shall I go up (ascend) to my father, and the lad be not WITH ME?" (Gen. xliv. 34).

If poor erring Judah could enter like this into the meaning of Suretyship, how much more must our Saviour have done so. At the foot of the ladder, the transfer is made, and the first of the seven steps up to the glory of the right hand of God is made. The self-emptying on the one hand is compensated by all the fullness on the other, but that fullness would never have been attained had the Saviour not become man, a Man of flesh and blood, all the fullness dwells in Him "bodily-wise". The church is the fullness of Him that filleth all in all. The goal and standard of that church is the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ. The personal experimental climax of the faith is that each member shall be filled with (or unto) all the fullness of God. It is difficult, with these features so clearly set forth in Ephesians, to think that the same word "fullness" when dealt with in Colossians, a confessedly parallel epistle, should suddenly swing over to the doctrine of the deity of Christ.

It may be that our attempt to explain Col. ii. 9 is so defective that the gleam of truth we saw at the commencement of this article has already become dimmed by our very effort to explain it. Shall we then, writer and reader, pause, put aside our lexicons, our concordances, our interpretations and follow in the footsteps of Asaph, who tells us that not until he went into the Sanctuary of God, did he understand.

No.22. "The fullness of the seasons."
pp. 32 - 35

The failure of Israel at the time of Nebuchadnezzar was answered by the times of the Gentiles, which commenced in the third year of Jehoiakim king of Judah (Dan. i. 1), but, although earthly dominion passed from Israel at that time, they did not become "Lo-ammi" in the full sense of the term until a fuller and deeper apostasy opened a deeper gulf that could only be spanned by a greater and more spiritual fullness among the Gentiles. In the fullness of time God sent forth His Son, and His birth at Bethlehem and His genealogy constitute the opening chapters of the books of the New Covenant (Matt. i. and ii.). The earthly ministry of the Saviour opened with a proclamation concerning the kingdom of heaven (Matt. iv. 17), and as "The King of the Jews" He was crucified (Matt. xxvii. 37). The earlier stages of the culmination of this rejection is revealed in chapters xi.-xiii.

> "They repented not" "Even so Father" (Matt. xi. 20, 26).
> A greater than the temple, than Jonah and than Solomon (rejected Priest, Prophet and King) (Matt. xii. 6, 41, 42).
> The MYSTERIES of the kingdom of heaven (Matt. xiii.).

In these three chapters the gap and its antidote are anticipated. The miracles which the Saviour wrought, had, as their primary purpose the repentance of Israel, and so to finally lead to the setting up of the earthly kingdom (Matt. xi. 20-24). Christ stood in their midst as Prophet, Priest and King, but they knew Him not and rejected Him. In Matt. xii. we meet the first favourable use of the word "Gentile". In Matt. x. 5 the disciples were told "Go not into the way of the Gentiles" but upon it becoming manifest in Matt. xi., that Israel were not going to repent, a change is indicated:

> "That it might be fulfilled which was spoken by Esaias the prophet, saying . . . . . He shall bring judgment unto the Gentiles . . . . . And in His name shall the Gentiles trust" (Matt. xii. 17-21).

The next chapter, Matt. xiii. supplies the third key word namely "mystery".

Here we find:

(1) Non-repentance of Israel, in spite of evidence of miracles.
(2) The inclusion of the Gentile for the first time, consequent upon Israel's failure.
(3) The kingdom of heaven passes into its "mystery" stage and the parable form of speech is introduced.

The introduction of the parable, contrary to popular interpretation, was NOT in order that the common people should be enabled to understand the message of the Gospel, but to veil the new aspect of truth from the eyes of those who were not repentant. As this point of view is so contrary to that which is considered orthodox, let us consider what the Lord actually said in answer to His disciples' question "Why speakest Thou unto them in parables?" (Matt. xiii. 10). The very fact that the disciples were moved to ask such a question suggests that the parable form of speech was new to the Saviour's method hitherto. His answer is unambiguous and conclusive.

> "He answered and said unto them, because it is given unto you to know THE MYSTERIES of the kingdom of heaven, but to them it is not given" (Matt. xiii. 11).

Here, the first reason given has to do with the making known the "mysteries" of the Kingdom not of the kingdom of heaven itself as already announced both by John the Baptist and by the Lord (Matt. iii. 2; iv. 17). Neither was this mystery aspect made known with such publicity as the opening ministry of the kingdom of the heavens, for "Jerusalem and all Judaea, and all the region about Jordan" together with Pharisees and Sadducees (Matt. iii. 2-7) heard the one, whereas it was "given" to the disciples to know these mysteries, but to the people of Israel as such it was "not given". The second part of the Lord's answer indicates that a great dispensational change was imminent.

> "Therefore speak I to them in parables: because they seeing see not; and hearing they hear not, neither do they understand. And in them is fulfilled the prophecy of Esaias . . . . . but blessed are your eyes, for they see: and your ears, for they hear" (Matt. xiii. 13-16).

The people of Israel had reached the point when the blindness prophesied by Isaiah had begun to take effect. It is a matter of importance to note the peculiar word used by the Lord here that is translated "fulfilled". Up to Matt. xiii. 14 the accepted formula "that it might be fulfilled" or "Then was fulfilled" translates the verb pleroo, and this on seven occasions (Matt. i. 22; ii. 15, 17, 23; iv. 14; viii. 17 and xii. 17). Once only in the whole record of the Saviour's utterances, is there a departure from this rule, and that is made at Matt. xiii. 14, where the intensive form anapleroo is employed. There is an element of completion about this word, as I Thess. ii. 16 will show. Even though the long-suffering of God waited throughout the whole period covered by the Acts of the Apostles and there was granted a stay of execution consequent upon the Saviour's prayer and the witness of Pentecost, it is not without significance, that when the Apostle in his turn quotes Isa. vi. 9, 10 in a similar context, namely, upon the rejection of Israel, the favourable mention of the Gentile, and the brining in of the dispensation of the Mystery, he does not say "In them is fulfilled" but "Well spake the Holy Ghost by Esaias the prophet unto your fathers" (Acts xxviii. 25). What was de jure in Matt. xiii. is de facto in Acts xxviii. At the failure of Israel, the Apostle Paul became the prisoner of the Lord, and as such received the dispensation of the grace of God for the Gentiles, the dispensation of the Mystery (Eph. iii. 1-9 R.V.), and while the church of this new dispensation is usually referred to by its title "The church which is His Body" or "The One Body" there is an extension of this title that is of vast importance. The full passages reads:

> "And hath put all things under His feet, and gave Him to be Head over all things to the church, which is His body, THE FULNESS of Him that FILLETH all in all" (Eph. i. 22, 23).

When the dispensation of the Mystery comes to an end, the successive dispensations that have suffered a rupture will be resumed, and as the signs of the times thicken around us, they tell us plainly that the lo-ammi ("Not My people") condition of Israel is nearing its close. Already believing Jews who accept Jesus as their Messiah are gathering and witnessing in complete independence of Gentile Christianity, and the claim of Israel for national recognition, made at Pentecost 1948, while not to be confused with the day when they shall be restored by the Lord Himself, is certainly an indication that the great epoch is upon us. The church of the Mystery fills the last gap in the outworking of the ages, and in this dispensation of the Mystery, the conception of "fullness" receives its fullest exposition.

> "That in the dispensation of the fullness of times He might gather together in one all things in Christ, both which are in heaven, and which are on earth; even in Him" (Eph. i. 10).

Gap after gap has been succeeded by fullness after fullness, as we have already seen in the outworking of the age-purpose, and at last we have arrived at the fullness of these seasons. The outstanding characteristic of the dispensation of the fullness of the seasons is that therein,

> "He might gather together in one all things in Christ, both which are in heaven, and which are on earth; even in Him."

Thy Kingdom Come

(A Consideration of the Lord's Prayer).

No.1. pp. 131 - 135

The New Bible Dictionary opens its article on The Lord's Prayer with these words:

> "The prayer which our Lord taught His disciples as the model prayer for believers and for His Church of all ages."

This view is by no means novel, having been held by believers throughout the ages of Christendom, and so the prayer is repeated in most churches at least once every Sunday, to say nothing of its use at other meetings and in private devotions. To question its usage is to mark oneself with the brand 'heretic', although it is quite legitimate apparently to spiritualize its clauses so that they may be properly understood. "Daily bread", instead of being a reference to material needs, is to be understood as a spiritual need of some description, since most people in Christianized countries have no difficulty in obtaining material 'daily bread'. The clause on forgiveness is interpreted in the light of Eph. iv. 32, in spite of the added explanation of the Lord that, "If ye forgive not men their trespasses, neither will your Father forgive your trespasses". The honest, thinking Christian will not be satisfied with such handling of the Word of God, but will seek the true meaning of each of the clauses of the prayer, a task that can only be accomplished by those prepared to 'search the Scriptures' with a view to observing 'things that differ' (Phil. i. 10 margin). This will be the object of these articles.

The prayer is recorded by two of the Evangelists, Matthew and Luke, and it is evident from a comparison of the contexts that the two passages are not parallel, so that the Lord gave the prayer on at least two separate occasions. The following arrangement is presented with due regard to the best Greek texts and will be found to be more in line with the R.V. than the A.V., hence the omissions:

Matthew vi. 9 – 13.	Luke xi. 2 - 4.
Our Father	Father
Who (art) in the heavens
sanctified be Thy Name	sanctified be Thy Name let come Thy kingdom	let come Thy kingdom
let Thy will be done as in heaven (so) also upon earth
our bread (the epiousion) give us today	our bread (the epiousion) give us daily and forgive us our debts, as also	and forgive us our sins, for we have forgiven our debtors	we ourselves also forgive everyone indebted to us and lead us not into temptation	and lead us not into temptation
but deliver us from evil

It will be observed that the Greek epiousion (translated 'daily' in the A.V.) has for the moment been left untranslated. Nobody can be quite sure of its meaning and it will be considered in a later article. Also the expression in Luke xi. 3 translated above 'give us daily', could be rendered 'give us according to the day', which will prove of help in understanding the meaning intended by the Lord. The reader should also take note of the change of words, 'sins' for 'debts' in Luke.

Omission of the doxology may come as a shock to some, but it should be noted that it does not appear in the A.V. of Luke's account of the prayer anyway, and in the R.V. it is also omitted in the Matthew account. Following the best evidence available it is omitted by the following translations also, J. N. Darby, Weymouth, Rotherham, Moffatt, R.S.V., N.E.B., etc. It is also omitted by the latest text of the N.T. based upon all the results of modern scholarship. The Companion Bible however suggests it is wrongly omitted and cites a number of ancient versions as containing it. Since no great doctrine hinges upon either its presence or absence nothing more need be said, except to note that it is not by any means unscriptural, in fact it is not unlike I Chron. xxix. 11:

> "Thine, O Lord, is the greatness, and the power, and the glory . . . . . thine is the kingdom . . . . ."

The other omissions will be considered in their place, as also the differences of language of the two accounts.

It will be of help to note the occasions on which the prayer was given. In Matthew it forms part of a long address given by the Lord (v. 1 - vii. 29) known popularly as "The Sermon on the Mount". In Luke it is the answer to the request from "one of His disciples" to "teach us to pray, as John also taught his disciples". Hence we observe the different introductions:

> "After this manner therefore pray ye . . . . ." (Matt. vi. 9).
> "When ye pray, say . . . . ." (Luke xi. 2).

Since the prayer in Matthew is part of a long address, it is doubtful whether it would have been remembered word for word by the hearers, and the context suggests that it was not given to be so remembered. "After this manner" is in contrast to some other manner already suggested.

> "When ye pray, use not vain repetitions, as the heathen do . . . . . be ye not therefore like unto them . . . . . after this manner therefore pray ye" (Matt. vi. 7-9).

The prayer is to be contrasted with the "much speaking" of the heathen (Gentiles), and since the Lord found it necessary to give such a correction, it is evident that these "vain repetitions" had permeated the life of the people of Israel and the heathen. Two examples from Scripture are helpful in understanding this.

> "And they took the bullock which was given them, and they dressed it, and called on the name of Baal from morning even until noon, saying, O Baal, hear us" (I Ki. xviii. 26).
> "But when they knew that he was a Jew, all with one voice about the space of two hours cried out, Great is Diana of the Ephesians" (Acts xix. 34).

The word translated 'vain repetitions' (battologeo) is thought to be derived from the idea of stammering and hence repetition. It is evidently to be explained by 'much speaking' (polulogia) and is in direct contradiction to the words of Eccles. v. 2:

> "Be not rash with thy mouth, and let not thine heart be hasty to utter anything before God, for God is in heaven, and thou upon earth, therefore let thy words be few."

The reason given here for the few words is, "God is in heaven", which fact is remembered in the Lord's Prayer—"Our Father, Who art in heaven".

The prayer, according to Matthew, was given as a model upon which prayer for the time then present should be based. The prayer, according to Luke on the other hand, with its introduction, "When ye pray say", suggests that here the Lord was giving the disciples in question the actual words to use in prayer. It must not be assumed that the disciples who desired this teaching on prayer were necessarily present at the giving of the Sermon on the Mount. The Lord had more disciples than the twelve whom we generally associate with the word disciple, so this was not repetition as far as they were concerned.

Before leaving the subject of 'much speaking', it should be observed that the Lord did not condemn 'much praying', in fact by his own example He commended it. Also the Apostle Paul with his exhortation to "Pray without ceasing" encouraged the practice of prayer. It is 'much speaking' even 'vain repetition' that is to be avoided, and it is sad to observe that the very prayer which was given as a model of this, has become by its mechanical repetition in some churches just the opposite. It has become 'vain repetition'.

The prayer part of the Sermon on the Mount.

What are the implications of the prayer as forming part of the Sermon on the Mount? If we believe, with Bloomfield, that the sermon contains "the great outlines of Christian practice", then we can have no hesitation in believing that the prayer is for us today. If however we look more closely at the sermon we observe that it was given to a people subject to "persecution for righteousness' sake" (v. 10), in danger of "Gehenna" (v. 22 "hell fire"), who must pay "to the uttermost farthing" (v. 26), who were waiting for a "coming kingdom" (vi. 10) and were in need of "daily bread" (vi. 11). If they did not exercise forgiveness neither would they be forgiven (vi. 15), they were still to fast (vi. 17) and they were not to be concerned about food and clothing (vi. 25). The 'coming kingdom' for which they were to pray was "the kingdom of the heavens", which at that time was at hand (iv. 17), and the whole sermon must be understood in the light of this nearness, and hence the prayer also as forming part of it. The period immediately before the coming of this kingdom (with the return of the King) is known as the Great Tribulation, a period during which the prayer with its references to 'bread', 'temptation' and 'the evil' is most appropriate. This will become clearer as the various clauses are considered.

One of the most important point to notice about its place in Scriptures is that it is given in Matthew prior to the revelation of xvi. 21:

> "From that time forth began Jesus to shew unto His disciples, how that He must go unto Jerusalem, and suffer many things . . . . . and be killed, and be raised again the third day."

The prayer therefore takes no account of the implications of these events leading as they do to the sacrificial work of Christ. It is not offered in the Lord's name and this gives point to John xvi. 24:

> "Hitherto have ye asked nothing in My Name: ask, and ye shall receive, that your joy may be full."

The prayer formed part of what they had asked hitherto, and as such it was a continuation of prayer on O.T. principles, offered towards the Temple in Jerusalem.

> "Have thou respect unto the prayer of Thy servant . . . . . which Thy servant prayeth before Thee today: that Thine eyes may be open toward this house night and day, even toward the place of which Thou hast said, My name shall be there: that Thou mayest hearken unto the prayer which Thy servant shall make toward this place . . . . ." (I Kings viii. 28, 29).

Hence Daniel's prayer in Dan. vi. 10:

> "His windows being open in his chamber toward Jerusalem, he kneeled upon his knees three times a day, and prayed . . . . ."

The Lord ordained a place where He could be sought, a place where He had put His Name, and this place must be duly recognized in approaching Him.

> "Unto the place which the Lord your God shall choose out of all your tribes to put His Name there, even unto His habitation shall ye seek . . . . ." (Deut xii. 5).

The Lord Jesus Christ is the antitype of this meeting place and it is true for the present time that, "No man cometh unto the Father but by Me" (John xiv. 6). He is the One who manifested the Father's Name and in His name only can prayer be offered.

> "Giving thanks always for all things in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ to God even the Father" (Eph. v. 20 R.V.).

Compare also Paul's prayer in Eph. iii. 14-21. The Lord's Prayer does not belong to this period, being given at a time when type and shadow still prevailed, and when Jerusalem was still the acknowledged place of acceptance before God. When prayer 'after this manner' is offered during the yet future Great Tribulation, it seems as though such prayer will have to make due recognition of the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, but as given it makes no such recognition.

The Missionary Prayer.

Although the prayer will be applicable during the Great Tribulation, it must be remembered that the period during which the disciples lived could have developed into that time of trouble. Matt. xxiv. is so written as to demonstrate this. Also the book of Revelation, which deals with this period, speaks of things which must "shortly come to pass". All this being so then, we should expect the prayer to have some application at the time given. This is so with respect to the missionary efforts of the disciples.

The twelve disciples were appointed "that they should be with Him, and that He might send them forth" (Mark iii. 14). In Luke ix.:

> "Then He called His twelve disciples . . . . . and He sent them to preach the kingdom of God . . . . . and He said unto them, Take nothing for your journey, neither staves, nor scrip, neither bread, neither money . . . . ." (verses 1-3).
>
> "After these things the Lord appointed other seventy also, and sent them two and two before His face . . . . . I send you forth as lambs among wolves, Carry neither purse, nor scrip, nor shoes . . . . ." (Luke x. 1-4).

The disciples were entirely dependant for their needs upon their reception in the places to which they came. They were sent forth both unarmed and without bread. It would not be surprising for such to pray, "Give us this day our daily bread . . . . . deliver us from the evil".

A Rabbinic "fountain" prayer.

Although the Lord warned the disciples not to be called Rabbi, both He and John the Baptist accepted the title. In John i. 38-40 Christ is viewed as a traveling Rabbi lodging in the area where John and his disciples were. The disciples are directed to the Lord as "the Lamb of God" and they followed Him.

> "Then Jesus turned, and saw them following, and saith unto them, What seek ye? They said unto Him, Rabbi . . . . . where dwellest thou? He saith unto them, Come and see. They came and saw where He dwelt, and abode with Him that day . . . . ."

The outcome of this meeting was (verse 41) "We have found the Messiah". The disciples become followers of this traveling Rabbi, and in common with other Rabbis of the time, He teaches them a "fountain" prayer.

> "In the time of Christ, among the Jews of Palestine, there were prayers and prayers: there were those that were full and regular, and there were those that were brief or summary in form: and both were proper as having been duly sanctioned by the Rabbis. The brief, or summary, form was called a 'Fountain', and those who could not pray the prescribed prayer in its fullness were expected to pray the 'Fountain' . . . . . it was the recognized habit of teachers to give forth short prayers for their students, or followers . . . thus providing 'Fountains' for special classes and exceptional circumstances."
> (The Lord's Prayer by J. W. Thirtle).

The travels of the Lord and His disciples would exclude them from the normal synagogue worship, and so these 'exceptional circumstances' called forth the "Lord's Prayer" from the greatest Rabbi that ever walked this earth. He gave them a 'Fountain' prayer.

These 'Fountain' prayers seem also to have given a 'tone' to the particular Rabbinic school in question, as indeed this prayer did for the Lord's school of disciples.

The Lord's Prayer was not then given for "believers of all ages", neither for use during the coming Kingdom Age (or why pray, "Thy kingdom come"?), but for a people awaiting that kingdom, who were asked to endure for 'a little while' in the light of the nearness of the return of the King. When understood in this light, every word can be given its full value and there is no need for spiritualizing. The Lord has given us in its place the prayers of Eph. i. 15-23; iii. 14-21; Col. i. 9-12; iv. 12, all applicable to the present time and in harmony with God's present purpose.

No.2. pp. 152 - 157

Before considering the various clauses of this prayer, it will help to observe that the first three requests are qualified by the words "as in heaven so also upon the earth", thus:

Sanctified be Thy Name \
Let come Thy Kingdom } . . . . . as in heaven so also upon earth.
Let Thy will be done /

Also the omission of the words, "but deliver us from evil" in Luke, suggest that these words are included in the clause "lead us not into temptation", and we read it so:

"Lead us not . . . . . but deliver us . . . . ."

The prayer then, expresses a desire for heavenly conditions to prevail upon the earth, "as in heaven so also upon earth"; it represents the desire of God's ancient people for their golden age, the Millennium, to come, when "the heavens do rule" (Dan. iv. 26). The answer to the prayer will be the setting up of this 'kingdom of the heavens' which will run on into the "new heavens and new earth wherein dwelleth righteousness". Before the coming of that glorious age however, this same people will pass through a refining process, the Great Tribulation, when the need to pray for deliverance from 'the evil' of that day will be expressed in the latter part of the Lord's Prayer, and when they still "hunger and thirst" (compare Rev. vii. 13-17) and need 'daily bread'.

Our Father.

It is the blessed experience of all 'the children of God' to be able to approach God with the word "Father". This fact however must not blind us to the import of the word used in this context. The expression, "Our Father", being suggestive of a company of people, reminds us of the relationship between Jehovah and His people Israel.

"Do ye thus requite the Lord, O foolish people and unwise? Is not He thy Father that hath bought thee?" (Deut. xxxii. 6).

"Thus saith the Lord, Israel is My son, even My firstborn" (Exod. iv. 22).

The actual expression "Our Father" is rare in the O.T., occurring but three times in the prayer in Isa. lxiii. 16 (twice); lxiv. 8:

> "Doubtless Thou art our Father . . . . . Thou, O Lord, art our Father, our Redeemer."
> ". . . . . now, O Lord, Thou art our Father."

In verse 16 Jehovah is their Father in contrast to Abraham and Israel (Jacob), who, although 'fathers' of Israel, yet could take no knowledge of them since they were asleep. The contrast in lxiv. 8 may be seen thus:

a | O Lord Thou art our Father
b | we are the clay
a | Thou (art) our Potter
b | we all are the work of Thy hand.

The conception of the Father in this context is of one Who has fashioned them as the Heavenly Potter and could take knowledge of them. Such an one is called upon (lxiii. 15) to "Look down from heaven, and behold from the habitation of Thy holiness and of Thy glory". Compare this with, "Our Father, Who art in heaven".

The conception of the Fatherhood of God in the O.T. was however, limited. It was the coming of the Son that was to show to Israel the real meaning of the relationship. When Philip requested, "Lord show us the Father and it sufficeth us", he was met with the answer:

> "Have I been so long time with you, and yet hast thou not known me Philip? he that hath seen Me hath seen the Father" (John xiv. 8, 9).

If they had known Him, they would have known the Father, for He revealed the Father. The expression "Our Father" would thus take on new meaning according to their knowledge of the Son.

One point which should be noticed is that although the Lord encouraged His disciples to use the expression "Our Father", yet we have no record that He Himself ever used it. The nearest He came to it was in John xx. 17:

> "Touch me not; for I am not yet ascended to My Father: but go to My brethren, and say unto them, I ascended unto My Father, and your Father; and to My God, and your God."

The Lord was one with His brethren (Heb. ii. 11-13) and yet preeminent among them (Rom. viii. 29), and thus it was not to Him "Our Father", but "My Father and your Father". Let none mistake the condescension of the Lord in being made 'like unto His brethren' for inferiority. He is "the firstborn of all creation, for by Him were all things created", and "firstborn from the dead, that in (or among) all things He might have the pre-eminence" (Col. i. 15-18).

The expression "Our Father" is suggestive of a Father Who belongs to us, but if the Greek be rendered literally another aspect is revealed. Pater hemon is actually "Father of us" suggesting our belonging to Him rather than someone upon whom we have laid claim. This is surely more expressive of the truth implied in "Our Father", and is of course true of all the children of God.

Who art in the heavens.

The words of Eccles. v. 2 have already been observed to have some bearing upon this clause:

> "God is in heaven, and thou upon earth: therefore let thy words be few."

"Much speaking" and "vain repetition" would be avoided by due recognition of the relative positions of God and the supplicator. He is in heaven, "therefore let thy words be few". At the introduction to the Lord's Prayer, a further reason is given for those "few words":

> "Your Father knoweth what things ye have need of" (Matt. vi. 8).

It was a mistake to imagine, with the heathen (vi. 7), that prayer was heard for 'much speaking', or indeed that God had to be supplicated continually for the needs of life. He was fully aware of their needs and this clause "Who art in the heavens" was a reminder of this.

> "Therefore take no thought, saying, What shall we eat, or What shall we drink? or Wherewithal shall we be clothed? (For after all these things do the Gentiles seek): for your heavenly Father knoweth that ye have need of all these things" (Matt. vi. 31, 32).

In the Lord's prayer therefore, the daily need is expressed in simple terms—"Give us this day our daily bread"—and then with due regard to priorities, for it does not occur until first have been mentioned, "Thy Name", "Thy Kingdom", and "Thy will". Hence Matt. vi. 33 goes on:

> "But seek ye first the kingdom of God, and His righteousness; and all these things (the needs just mentioned in verse 31) shall be added unto you."

In Matt. vii. 7-11 the disciples were further encouraged to, "Ask, and it shall be given you . . . . . for everyone that asketh receiveth . . . . . If ye then, being evil, know how to give . . . . . how much more shall your Father which is in heaven give". The clause "Who art in the heavens" would be a reminder of the position, ability and willingness of the Almighty God to answer their prayer. The "heavenly Father" Who took due account of every sparrow that fell to the ground, who had the very hairs of their head numbered, was the one they supplicated. With what confidence then would they begin their petitions, and with what confidence also should we approach the same Heavenly Father, knowing that He can "do exceedingly abundantly above all that we ask or think" (Eph. iii. 20).

Sanctified be Thy Name.

This clause is the first of three qualified by the words, "as in heaven so also upon earth", and the implication is that the Father's Name is already sanctified in heaven.

Sanctified (A.V. "Hallowed") is the Greek verb hagiazo, evidently related to hagios, holy. Parkhurst suggests the possible derivation of the two words from a, negative and ge, the earth, so, "separated from the earth". Whether this be the correct derivation or no, it is not possible to say with certainty, but there seems little doubt that the basic meaning of sanctification is separation. When "God blessed the seventh day and sanctified it" (Gen. ii. 3), He set that day apart from the other six. This Sabbath, which was given to Israel, was itself a sign between the Lord and Israel, that He had sanctified them, and so was their Sanctifier.

> "And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, Speak thou also unto the children of Israel, saying, Verily My sabbaths ye shall keep: for it is a sign between Me and you throughout your generations; that ye may know that I am the Lord that doth sanctify you" (Exod. xxxi. 12, 13).

Or literally, "I, Jehovah am your Sanctifier". To say that God gave the Sabbath to any other nation than Israel is to deny the truth of this verse. It was a sign between the Lord and Israel, and it suggested separation. If the other nations had received this sign also, what evidence would it then have been to Israel that the Lord was their Sanctifier?

In the prophecy of Isaiah the expression, "the Holy One of Israel" occurs some twenty-five times. The people of Israel at that time were condemned because they had "provoked the Holy One of Israel unto anger" (Isa. i. 4); the word 'provoked' being translated elsewhere 'abhorred' (I Sam. ii. 17), 'blasphemed' (Psa. lxxiv. 18), 'despised' (Isa. v. 24), etc. The word is used in a particularly significant context in Numb. xvi. 30. Korah and his company had challenged the position of Moses and Aaron with respect to the whole congregation of Israel saying:

> "You have gone too far! For all the congregation are holy, every one of them, and the Lord is among them; why then do you exalt yourselves above the assembly of the Lord?" (Numb. xvi. 3 R.S.V.).

The danger of this challenge lay in it being a half-truth. The whole congregation, insofar as the Lord had separated them from other nations, were holy. What Korah failed to recognize was a further separation, a choice from among this holy people, of leaders, even Moses and Aaron. In this way he provoked the Lord, and the opening up of the ground to swallow him and his company was evidence of this (verse 30). He failed to recognize the Lord as the Sanctifier, and so provoked or despised the Lord. In the expression, "sanctified be Thy Name", there is a call for a recognition of the Father's Name as being holy, and this is equivalent to a recognition of Him as holy. The opposite of this would appear to be despising or blaspheming the name of the Lord, something of which both Korah (in Numb. xvi.) and Israel (in Isa. i.) were guilty.

The sanctified nation, Israel, were evidently intended to so conduct their lives that the Lord would be sanctified in them. Owing however to their constant failure and apostasy, this has yet to be. Paul, in Rom. ii. 17-27 brings the condemnation against the Jew for his failure in these words:

> "Thou that makest thy boast of the law, through breaking the law dishonourest thou God? For the name of God is blasphemed among the Gentiles through you . . . . ." (verses 23, 24).

Instead of God's name being sanctified by the sanctified people serving the Lord and keeping the Law, rather was it being blasphemed through them. Obedience to the voice of the Lord and the keeping of His covenant with them, would have constituted them a "kingdom of priests, and an holy nation" (Exod. xix. 5, 6), but this covenant they brake. Under the terms of the New Covenant there will yet be the fulfillment of this promise in Exodus, and during the Acts period it was anticipated:

> "Peter . . . . . to the strangers scattered throughout Pontus . . . . . ye are a chosen generation, a royal priesthood, an holy nation, a people for a possession, that ye should shew forth the virtues of Him Who hath called you out of darkness into His marvelous light" (I Pet. i. 1; ii. 9).

During the future Millennium the promise will find its fulfillment, and then will the Lord God be sanctified in His people, and the prayer, 'sanctified be Thy Name', answered in its fullness.

> "For in mine holy mountain . . . . . saith the Lord God, there shall all the house of Israel . . . . . serve me in the land . . . . . and I will be sanctified in you in the sight of the nations . . . . ." (Ezek. xx. 40, 41 R.V.).
> "When the house of Israel dwelt in their own land, they defiled it by their way . . . . . and I scattered them among the nations . . . . . and when they came unto the nations . . . . . they profaned my holy name . . . . . I will sanctify My great name, which hath been profaned among the nations . . . . . and the nations shall know that I am the Lord . . . . . when I shall be sanctified in you before their eyes . . . . ." (Ezek. xxxvi. 17-23 R.V. See also Ezek. xxxix. 25-27, etc.).

The close connection of the clause 'sanctified be Thy Name' with 'Thy kingdom come' and 'Thy will be done', suggests when the answer to this part of the prayer will be fulfilled. The will or wishes of the Father being done on earth will be when this kingdom (the subject of the Lord's Prayer) shall have come, and at that time will the Father's Name be sanctified. Heavenly conditions will then prevail on earth, "the kingdom of the heavens" having come, and it will then be true to say, "as in heaven so also upon earth". The Lord's Prayer, set as it is in the period immediately preceding the Millennium, calls upon the one who needs "daily bread" and seeks deliverance from 'the evil' of that day, to look to the near future, when the present necessity will have passed. It bids him to seek earnestly that day when the Name of the Father will be reverenced by obedience to His wishes, and when He will be sanctified in His people.

It should be noted that although the answer to 'sanctified be Thy Name' awaited a future day for those addressed in I Peter, yet could it have a partial answer in the life of an individual believer then. Writing to those who were "elect . . . . . through sanctification of the Spirit" (i. 2), were a "holy nation" (ii. 9) called by One Who Himself was "holy" (i. 15), Peter exhorts holiness "in all manner of conduct" (i. 15), and that in the midst of suffering they should "sanctify the Lord God" in their hearts (iii. 14, 15). This sanctification of the Lord in the heart may be something of which He alone was aware, but it had the manifestation of a readiness to state the hope within (iii. 15) in the event of being asked, and that in spite of being falsely accused as an evil doer (iii. 16). In a day when the righteous suffer and evil doers prosper, the sanctification of the Father's Name must remain unfulfilled except in the way already suggested, in the heart, and inasmuch as it was the province of the Son to manifest the Father's Name (John xvii. 6), and that all should honour the Son even as they honour the Father (John v. 23), so it could be possible to "sanctify the Lord Christ in your hearts" (I Pet. iii. 15). (Christ is substituted for God in the best texts).

In the narrow dispensational sense the petition "sanctified be Thy Name" belongs basically to Israel, but surely all can join voices to desire earnestly the day when both in heaven and upon earth that Name shall be sanctified.

No.3. pp. 168 - 173

Let Thy kingdom come.

The kingdom for which the disciples of the Lord were to pray had already been qualified in the Sermon on the Mount as "the kingdom of heaven" (Matt. v. 3, 10, etc.). More literally it should read "the kingdom of the heavens", an expression peculiar to Matthew and used some 32 times. This kingdom had drawn near at this time and both John the Baptist and the Lord Himself proclaimed it (iii. 2; iv. 17). It was to be possessed by the "poor in spirit . . . . . persecuted for righteousness sake" (v. 3, 10), whose righteousness exceeded that of the Scribes and Pharisees and who had become 'little children' (v. 20; xviii. 3). Many of these would come from the east and west to recline at the table with Abraham, Isaac and Jacob in the kingdom (viii. 11).

The expression 'kingdom of God', used 5 times by Matthew is used by the other evangelists in such a way as to suggest that at this time it meant the same as "the kingdom of the heavens". It seems that "the kingdom of God", insofar as it is found in Col. iv. 11, is an embracive term covering more than one aspect of the purposes of God, and is to be looked upon as including within its meaning "the kingdom of the heavens". Viewed in this light, it was true to say that at the time of our Lord's earthly ministry, and afterwards during the Acts period, the kingdom of God, described by the specific term "the kingdom of the heavens", had drawn near. It was this that was implied in "Thy kingdom come".

One other expression which may be looked upon as further explaining this kingdom is "My Father's kingdom" (Matt. xxvi. 29), or speaking of the righteous of this kingdom, "the kingdom of their Father" (Matt. xiii. 43). The kingdom of God was to be sought—"seek ye first the kingdom of God" (Matt. vi. 33), and the petition "thy kingdom come" should be looked upon as being included within this seeking.

Although the kingdom prayed for as "the kingdom of the heavens", the petition desired that it should "come", and the qualifying clause, "as in heaven so also upon earth", shows that it was to come on earth. The expression then describes its character rather than its position, and its origin rather than its goal. Its establishment depends upon the presence of the King and so looks for the Second Coming of the Lord Jesus Christ to the earth. So writes John in the book of the Revelation, "Even so, come, Lord Jesus" (Rev. xxii. 20).

Let Thy will be done.

The kingdom of the heavens will be a place where the will of God is done, and therefore entry into it was dependent upon this factor:

> "Not every one that saith unto me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven; but he that doeth the will of my Father which is in heaven" (Matt. vii. 21).

Such were viewed in a special relationship to the Lord:

> "For whosoever shall do the will of My Father which is in heaven, the same is My brother, and sister, and mother" (Matt. xii. 50).

The word 'will', thelema with its verbal form thelo, should be considered with care before deciding on its meaning. In the very same Gospel as the above quotations are found, we read:

> "If any man will come after me" (Matt. xvi. 24).
> "For whosoever will save his life" (xvi. 25).
> "If thou wilt enter into life" (xix. 17).
> "If thou wilt be perfect" (xix. 21).

Can any man will (in the sense of determine) to follow the Lord? Can he will to save his life (Gr. 'soul') or enter into life? Can he will to be perfect? Consider the import of the following verse if the word thelo is to be so understood:

> "O Jerusalem, Jerusalem . . . . . how often would (thelo) I have gathered thy children together . . . . . and ye would (thelo) not" (Matt. xxiii. 37).

It was not that Jerusalem deliberately determined not to be gathered, but simply that they were found without any desire for it. Behind the Greek word thelo is the idea of desire not determination. When applied to God it is possible that it should be regarded as strong desire, but it is nevertheless desire. A good idiomatic translation would be 'want'. (For a fuller consideration of thelo the reader should consult The Berean Expositor Volume XXXVII pages 84-87).

In case it should be imagined that the above suggests a certain looseness with respect to God, it must be remembered that on the other hand we have such words as 'purpose', 'election' and 'predestination' to give us a balanced view of His ways.

The petition, "Thy will be done", expresses the highest form of prayer that can be offered, since it suggests that the desire of the supplicator is in line with the desire of the Father Himself. In the case of the Lord's Prayer the expression is qualified by the words, "as in heaven, so upon earth", limiting it to the earthly kingdom, but prayed in the context of any calling of God, it is a call for the strong desires of God to become reality.

The "epiousion" bread.

> "Our bread the epiousion give us today" (Matt. vi. 11).
> "Our bread the epiousion give us according to the day" (Luke xi. 3).

Before considering the meaning of the word epiousion ('daily' A.V.), consider the expression "according to the day" (in the Luke account) in the light of Exod. xvi. 16, 18:

> "Gather of it (i.e. the manna) every man according to his eating, an omer for every man, according to the number of your persons . . . . . he that gathered much had nothing over, and he that gathered little had no lack."

The prevailing thought in these words is of need supplied. The gathering was according to the need of each person and the number in each tent. There was neither lack nor excess; the need of every man was met. Inasmuch as they "gathered twice as much" (verse 22) on the sixth day, the supply was also "according to the day". The day by day need of a people who were unable to obtain food in the wilderness, was miraculously met with bread from heaven, bread which came down upon them.

Consider now the Great Tribulation, a period into which it has already been suggested the Lord's Prayer fits:

> "Let them which be in Judaea flee into the mountains: let him which is on the housetop not come down to take anything out of his house: neither let him which is in the field return back to take his clothes . . . . . for then shall be great tribulation . . . . ." (Matt. xxiv. 16-21).

Such will be the swiftness of flight, that there will not be time to take even the very necessities of life into the mountains. This people will therefore be in very real need, wanting even the bread of the day. How will such survive? Will God ask such to flee for their lives into the mountains only to let them die of hunger when there? Emphatically no! The One Who once fed this people miraculously in the desert will feed them again with the epiousion bread for which they pray. This is more than suggested in at least two passages in Revelation:

> "And the dragon stood before the woman which was ready to be delivered, for to devour her child as soon as it was born. And she brought forth a man child, who was to rule all nations with a rod of iron: and her child was caught up unto God, and to His throne. And the woman fled into the wilderness, where she hath a place prepared of God, that they should feed here there a thousand two hundred and threescore day."
> "And when the dragon saw that he was cast unto the earth, he persecuted the woman which brought forth the man child. And to the woman were given two wings of a great eagle, that she might fly into the wilderness, into her place, where she is nourished for a time, and times, and half a time, from the face of the serpent" (Rev. xii. 4-6, 13, 14).

In both passages is the suggestion of the three and a half years of the Tribulation, which begins when "the abomination of desolation is set up" (Dan. ix. 27; xii. 11; Matt. xxiv. 15), during which time the woman is fed. If the man child is Christ, then it points to the woman as Israel, or at least part of Israel.

In the light of all this the meaning of epiousion may now be considered. The word possibly derives from epi, upon and ousia, substance. Ousia is used twice in the N.T. of the 'goods' and 'substance' of the prodigal son (Luke xv. 12, 13), and Parkhurst suggests it as related to the verb 'to be' in the form ousa. The literal rendering of the word would then seem to be, "the substance which comes upon us".

Until recently it was thought that this word had been specially coined by the Holy Spirit, as it could not be found in secular Greek. However it has at last turned up in an ancient housekeeping book, discovered in archaeological research (Light from the Ancient East, 1927 edition p.87), and Professor A. T. Robertson points out that it also occurs in three late verses after 2 Macc. 1:8 (tous epiousious after tous artous). The latter part of the word he derives, with other authorities, from eimi "to go", rather than eimi "to be". Arndt and Gingrich in their Greek-English Lexicon state that epiousios may equal the Latin diana, the daily ration of food given out for the next day. In view of these facts one cannot be dogmatic over its precise meaning. If the older view of Parkhurst is correct, there seems to be an allusion to the manna of the O.T.

One verse in particular calls for attention:

> "And when the dew that lay was gone up, behold, upon the face of the wilderness there lay a small round thing, as small as the hoar frost on the ground. And when the children of Israel saw it, they said one to another, It is manna: for they wist not what it was" (Exod. xvi. 14, 15).

The Companion Bible note on this verse reads, "It is manna. Hebrew man-hu = What is that? for they knew not what that was". The manna was named from the fact of their not knowing what it was, and similarly with the bread of Matt. vi. and Luke xi. it is simply termed 'a substance', that which exists, and like the manna of old, it was to 'come down upon them'.

One other passage might be of interest to the reader in placing the time for which such a petition as this is applicable. Rev. xiii. 16, 17:

> "And he (another beast verse 11) causeth all, both small and great, rich and poor, free and bond, to receive a mark . . . . . and that no man might buy or sell, save he that had the mark, or the name of the beast, or the number of his name."

If a man may not buy or sell, how shall he eat? And if the mark of the beast brings God's wrath, how shall the faithful live except by being fed miraculously by God Himself? That there will be some who hunger at this time seems implied in Rev. vii. 13-16:

> "What are these which are arrayed in white robes? . . . . . These are they which came out of great tribulation (lit. the great tribulation) . . . . . They shall hunger no more, neither thirst any more . . . . ."

It has always been the lot of those who would be faithful, to "suffer for righteousness sake". This is true of all dispensations during which evil triumphs. The time of the Great Tribulation will however be exceptional, a time of suffering the like of which has not been known before and of which it will be true to say, "Except those days should be shortened, there should no flesh be saved" (Matt. xxiv. 22). See how this period is described in Scripture:

> "Alas! for that day is great, so that none is like it: it is even the time of Jacob's trouble; but he shall be saved out of it" (Jer. xxx. 7).
> "There shall be a time of trouble, such as never was since there was a nation even to that same time: and at that time thy people shall be delivered, every one that shall be found written in the book" (Dan. xii. 1).
> "Then shall be great tribulation, such as was not since the beginning of the world to this time, no, nor ever shall be . . . . . for the elect's sake those days shall be shortened" (Matt. xxiv. 21, 22).

During this period, the Lord's Prayer with its epiousion bread, reminiscent of the wilderness experience of a past generation, will find its place. What a comfort it will be for those who pray this petition to know the truth of the Lord's words in Matt. vi. 8, "Your Father knoweth what things ye have need of, before ye ask Him".

Forgive us . . . . . as we also have forgiven.

Before considering the meaning of the next petition in any depth, observe that forgiveness is, in this context, conditional. Many expositors have sought to get round this and to bring the petition in line with the present experience of forgiveness as taught in Eph. iv. 32:

> "forgiving one another, even as God in Christ forgave you."

But it is evident that Matt. vi. and Eph. iv. are on different ground and this is emphasized by the Lord's explanation of the petition:

> "For if ye forgive men their trespasses, your heavenly Father will also forgive you: but if ye forgive not men their trespasses, neither will your Father forgive your trespasses" (Matt. vi. 14, 15).

Matt. xviii. 21-35 ought also to be considered in this respect, but especially verses 34 and 35:

> "And his Lord was wroth, and delivered him to the tormentors, till he should pay all that was due unto him. So likewise shall my heavenly Father do also unto you, if ye from your hearts forgive not everyone his brother their trespasses."

These passages may present tremendous problems, but at least they should be recognized rather than to deal deceitfully with the Word of God by reading thoughts into them contrary to their whole tenor. This part of the prayer alone ought to have made the professing church hesitate before ordaining the prayer as part of the regular worship of God's people, and any believer who seeks the glory of God must satisfactorily explain the apparent contradiction with Eph. iv. 32, before accepting the prayer as being for him.

It may be argued that 'debts' rather than 'sins' are involved in this forgiveness, and this is certainly true in Matthew:

> "And forgive us our debts, as we also have forgiven our debtors" (vi. 12), but in the explanation (verses 14, 15) "trespasses" (paraptoma), translated "sins" in Eph. i. 7, is used. Also the Luke account interchanges 'debts' with 'sins', a fact which will help in a true understanding of the meaning here intended:

> "And forgive us our sins, for we also ourselves forgive everyone indebted to us" (Luke xi. 4).

All this however does still not get round the conditional nature of the petition which must not be lightly set aside. The O.T. background of forgiveness must be first considered, before any true interpretation can be put on this forgiveness of sins and debts, but let it not be confused with the present experience of grace.

> "In whom we have . . . . . forgiveness of sins, according to the riches of His grace" (Eph. i. 7).

No.4. pp. 190 – 196

O.T. background to "debts" and "sins".

Literal renderings of Matt. vi. 12 and Luke xi. 4 are respectively:

> "And forgive us our debts, as we also have forgiven our debtors" (R.V.).
> "And forgive us our sins, for we ourselves also forgive everyone that is indebted to us" (R.V.).

The Greek word involved are, 'forgive' aphiemi; 'debts' opheilema (with its cognates opheiletes and opheilo—'debtors' and 'indebted'); 'sins' hamartia.

A basic passage which throws light on forgiveness of debts in the Old Testament is Deut. xv. 1-11, of which are given verses 1 and 2 according to the A.V. and LXX renderings:

> "At the end of every seven years (Companion Bible 'when the seventh year has arrived') thou shalt make a release. And this is the manner of the release: Every creditor that lendeth ought unto his neighbour shall release it; he shall not exact it of his neighbour, or of his brother; because it is called the Lord's release" (A.V.).

> "Every seven years thou shalt make a release. And this is the ordinance of the release: thou shalt remit every private debt which thy neighbour owes thee, and thou shall not ask payment of it from thy brother; for it has been called a release to the Lord thy God" (LXX).

The LXX version employs the Greek aphesis to translate the Hebrew sh'mitah ('release'), and the verbal form of the same word aphiemi for shamat ('release' A.V., 'remit' LXX). Also the word 'debt' (LXX rendering) is the Greek opheilo. A comparison between the three passages cited will reveal similarities which are invaluable in throwing light on the petition under consideration. The very Greek words used are the same, and in each case the 'forgiveness of debts' is involved. Where 'sins' fit into the picture should become obvious later; enough now to observe that the word aphesis is employed in the N.T. expressions "remission (or forgiveness) of sins" (Matt. xxvi. 28; Mark i. 4; Luke i. 77, etc.).

The seventh year was important in the life of an Israelite. It was a period of 'rest' for the land (Exod. xxiii. 10, 11; Lev. xxv. 1-7) and "release' for the debtor and servant (Deut. xv. 1-18). The release of the servant may not have been coincident with the "Lord's release", but the servant was to be released after six years of servitude anyway, demonstrating the same principle as being involved. The seventh year was of particular importance after seven of them had been numbered:

> "And thou shalt number seven sabbaths of years unto thee, seven times seven years; and the space of the seven sabbaths of years shall be unto thee forty and nine years. Then shalt thou cause the trumpet of the jubilee to sound on the tenth day of the seventh month, in the day of atonement . . . . . And ye shall hallow the fiftieth year, and proclaim liberty throughout all the land . . . . ." (Lev. xxv. 8-10).

The whole passage bearing upon the Jubilee should be read and the following points observed:

(1) The word 'liberty' (d'ror), in verse 10, is the same word used in Isa. lxi. 1, "to proclaim liberty to the captives", and this passage of O.T. prophecy called 'the acceptable year of the Lord' was stated by the Lord Jesus Christ as being fulfilled in the ears of the Jews at Nazareth (Luke iv. 17-21). In other words it was being fulfilled at the very same time as the Lord's Prayer, with its petition concerning "forgiveness of debts", was given. Also it should be observed that when the Lord quoted the Isaiah passage, He twice used the word 'forgiveness' (aphesis) to interpret the Hebrew words:

> "to preach deliverance (aphesis) to the captives . . . . . to set at liberty (aphesis) them that are bruised . . . . ." (Luke iv. 18).

If the "acceptable year of the Lord" proclaimed by the Lord was a jubilee year, as hinted at by the Companion Bible, then the forgiveness of debts of the Lord's Prayer would be expected in the light of that jubilee. The baptism being practiced was "the baptism of repentance for (Gr. eis 'with a view to') the remission (aphesis) of sins", and this in the light of bringing forth fruits 'worthy of repentance' (Luke iii. 2-8). Not to act in harmony with the Lord's proclamation, (i.e. not to forgive all debts), would constitute a failure to 'bring forth fruits worthy of repentance', and thus no remission of sins could be expected. Seen in this light, the conditional nature of the petition on forgiveness must be understood of the time then present, which time will again draw near during the future Great Tribulation.

(2) The Jubilee was proclaimed on the Day of Atonement (Lev. xxv. 9), a day on which the people of Israel were to afflict (humble) their souls (Lev. xxiii. 27, 32); the one day in which the high priest entered the holiest of all, the day when the sins and iniquities of the people were especially remembered (see Lev. xvi., especially verse 21).

(3) The Jubilee was a time of return and restoration:

> "Ye shall return every man unto his possession, and ye shall return every man unto his family" (Lev. xxv. 10).

Surely this return of the people will find its fulfillment when the Lord completes what He began at His first coming, and the times of restoration associated with His presence (prosopon, 'face'), will come. These times during the Acts Period were conditional upon repentance, but they will yet come in association with the sending back of Christ Jesus (Acts iii. 19-21).

> "For thus saith the Lord God; Behold I, even I, will both search my sheep, and seek them out. As a shepherd seeketh out his flock in the day that he is among his sheep that are scattered; so will I seek out my sheep, and will deliver them out of all places where they have been scattered in the cloudy and dark day. And I will . . . . . bring them to their own land, and feed them upon the mountains of Israel . . . . . I will seek that which was lost . . . . ." (Ezek. xxxiv. 11-16).

The One who came 'to seek and to save that which was lost' (Luke xix. 10), will yet complete that work, a time pictured by the O.T. Jubilee, and in the light of which 'forgiveness of debts' is expected of these who would have a place in that gathering.

The reader might also consider in the context of all this, the action of the saints at Jerusalem, when they sold their possessions and laid the money at the apostle's feet. Was this done in the light of the return of the Lord and their entering into their true possessions in the land? It is especially interesting to note that there is no record of this practice anywhere else, and even in Jerusalem, as it became apparent that the people as a whole were not repenting, the action was not repeated. Could this sale of possessions explain "the poor saints at Jerusalem" of Rom. xv. 26?

It is evident that the forgiveness of debts and sins harmonizes with a particular 'season' of God's dealings with His ancient people. Seen in that context there is nothing incongruous in a conditional forgiveness. To bring such a petition into the present dispensation, however, is to fail to appreciate the grace of God, and to introduce a contradiction into the Word of God. The great key which has unlocked many a mystery and thrown light on many a passage of Scripture, the key of 'right division', when applied here does not fail us but places the petition, "forgive us . . . . . as we", in the setting into which the whole prayer has been cast for us, by every part of it which has so far been examined. One petition remains, and it will be seen also with this, that it again yields its truth when placed in its right setting.

Lead us not . . . . . but deliver us.

It has already been suggested that the clauses, "Lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil" are one petition, this being partly inferred from the absence of the second clause in Luke xi. This is immediately helpful insofar as it brings together the ideas of 'leading' and 'delivering', and 'temptation' and 'evil'.

a | Lead us not
b | into temptation
a | deliver us
b | from the evil

The idea of temptation in Scripture must be carefully handled. Consider the following:

> "Let no man say when he is tempted (peirazo), I am tempted (peirazo) of God: for God cannot be tempted with evil, neither tempteth (peirazo) He any man" (James i. 13).
> "By faith Abraham, when he was tried (peirazo)—(O.T. 'God did tempt Abraham' Gen. xxii. 1), offered up Isaac . . . . ." (Heb. xi. 17).

There is a plain contradiction in these statements unless we recognize that the word peirazo can have both good and bad associations. The presence of the word 'evil' (lit. evils) in the James passage is suggestive of this, and if the following verses are read it will be seen that 'lust' and 'sin' are involved in the context. Peirazo probably derives from peiro, and Parkhurst's note is suggestive.

> "to perforate, pierce through, by doing which we make trial of the internal constitution of things" (Greek and English Lexicon to the N.T.).

A man may be tried in a good sense or tempted in an evil sense, but in both cases his reaction reveals his internal worth. Perhaps this is one way in which the Lord is able to work all things (good or bad) together for good to them that love God, to them who are the called according to His purpose (Rom. viii 28). It is the province of God to sift the wheat, in order to separate from it the chaff for burning:

> "He that cometh after me . . . . . shall baptize you with holy spirit and fire: whose fan is in His hand, and He will thoroughly purge His floor, and gather His wheat into the garner; but He will burn up the chaff with unquenchable fire" (Matt. iii. 11, 12).

But Satan has also a sifting to do:

> "And the Lord said, Simon, Simon, behold Satan hath desired to have you (R.V. margin 'obtained you by asking'), that he may sift you as wheat" (Luke xxii. 31).

The plural 'you' indicates that all the disciples were subjected to this sifting, and the lure of money, (the love of which is a root of all evils), brought the separation of the chaff (Judas Iscariot) from the true wheat. Let the tests of God be carefully distinguished from the temptations of Satan. God seeks the wheat, Satan the chaff.

The wilderness experience of 'bread from heaven' threw light upon the meaning of the epiousion bread of the Lord's Prayer. The provision of manna (Exod. xvi.) closely followed by a need for water:

> "And there was no water for the people to drink. Wherefore the people did chide with Moses, and said, Give us water that we may drink. And Moses said unto them. Why chide ye with me? wherefore do ye tempt the Lord?" (Exod. xvii. 1, 2).

It was not unreasonable in the circumstances to ask for water; what was wrong however was the attitude of the people. They quarreled with Moses and murmured against him. The word 'murmur' (loon) has about it the basic idea of abide or dwell. The people's error lay in dwelling on the subject of their need with discontent and grumblings, and so they tried the Lord. This attitude, which was characteristic of the whole period of their wandering, is further explained in Heb. iii. 8 as being 'provocative', characteristic of 'hardness of heart'. The experiences through which they passed were intended to humble and prove (nasah) them (Deut. viii. 2), but alas it turned out that they tried (nasah) Him. The period of this failure became proverbial; it was "the day of temptation in the wilderness" (Psa. xcv. 8; Heb. iii. 8).

The attitude, and consequences of that attitude, of the Moses' generation are quoted by the writer of Hebrews as a warning to the then present generation, "lest any of you be hardened through the deceitfulness of sin" (iii. 13). Their experience was very much a wilderness experience, and they could fall to the same temptation. If that dispensation had continued unbroken it would have run on into the Great Tribulation and the experiences recorded in the Revelation, a time of need even greater than that of Moses' generation. In the light of all this, a promise given to those that endure during this yet future period is very significant:

> "Because thou hast kept the word of My patience (endurance), I also will keep thee from the hour of temptation (peirasmos), which shall come upon all the world, to try (peirazo) them that dwell upon the earth" (Rev. iii. 10).

What this may imply can be felt from II Pet. ii. 6-9:

> "Turning the cities of Sodom and Gomorrha into ashes . . . . . and delivered (roumai the word used in the Lord's Prayer—'deliver us from evil') just Lot . . . . . the Lord knoweth how to deliver (roumai) the godly out of temptation."

The warning given to Lot, which saved him from being consumed in the destruction of Sodom, is paralleled in Matt. xxiv. 15-22, where the setting up of the abomination of desolation in the holy place is a warning signal to 'flee into the mountains', for then shall be 'great tribulation'. Under such conditions as will prevail during this period, there will be great tendency to react like a previous generation of Israel, who tempted the Lord with their murmurings. The Acts period was not the Great Tribulation, but it was preparatory to it in some senses. An early epistle written during this period was that of James and parts of it are very significant to this subject:

> "My brethren, count it all joy when ye fall into divers testings (peirasmos); knowing that the trying (dokomion) of your faith worketh endurance . . . . . Blessed is the man that endureth temptation (peirasmos)" (i. 2, 3, 12).
> "Be patient therefore brethren, unto the coming of the Lord . . . . . we count them happy which endured. Ye have heard of the endurance of Job, and have seen the end of the Lord . . . . ." (v. 7, 11).

The endurance of Job is brought to bear as an example, but how in the O.T is Job commended?

> "Job said . . . . . the Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away; blessed be the name of the Lord. In all this Job sinned not, nor charged God foolishly (with injustice) . . . . . Then said his wife unto him, Dost thou still retain thine integrity? Curse God, and die. But he said unto her, Thou speakest as one of the foolish women speaketh. What? shall we receive good at the hand of God, and shall we not receive evil (trouble)? In all this did not Job sin with his lips" (Job i. 21, 22; ii. 9, 10).

Job, unlike the Moses generation, did not murmur during his trial, and thus is set forth as an example of endurance to be emulated.

The Lord Himself was called to go through an "hour of temptation" in Gethsemane:

> "My soul is exceeding sorrowful unto death . . . . . and he prayed that; if it were possible, the hour might pass from Him" (Mark xiv. 34, 35).
> "Could ye not watch with me one hour? Watch and pray, that ye enter not into temptation (peirasmos)" (Matt. xxvi. 40, 41).

Both the period immediately before the Great Tribulation ('the beginning of sorrows' Matt. xxiv. 8) and the Great Tribulation itself, will be times of testing for some of God's people. Especially will it concern those in Judea (Matt. xxiv. 16). During these periods many will break down, betraying one another and hating one another. The love of many will wax cold by reason of abounding lawlessness. Endurance is the order of the day (Matt. xxiv. 9-13). During this great trial, the faithful will need to pray to be delivered from 'the evil' of that day, and especially that, unlike a generation of their forefathers who failed under trial, they will not enter into any murmuring spirit, tempting the Lord.

The implication in, "Father . . . . . lead us not into temptation" must not be pressed outside the limits of the context. The Lord of the O.T. led the children of Israel into trial to test their worth (Deut. viii. 2). That they then 'tempted' Him was entirely on their part. Strength to overcome under such trial is given by the Lord, but He desires that such should be sought from Him. This then demonstrates the importance of the place of prayer in any believer's life, but especially under trial. So with the Lord's Prayer. The supplicators must pray, "that they enter not into temptation" (Matt. xxvi. 41), and that they be "delivered from the evil". Instead of murmuring at their lot, they must pray. The Moses generation failed; they might do also—"Our Father . . . . . lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from the evil".

This petition, seen in its context, has nothing to do with the members of the Body of Christ as such, but there is a possible parallel to "the hour of temptation" mentioned in Eph. vi. 13—"the evil day"—for which the whole armour of God is provided. What this day will be is not fully known yet, but it is evident that for it to be so described implies a time of trial. In Paul's day there was a need of deliverance, and his confidence was in the Lord:

> "I was delivered (roumai) out of the mouth of the lion. And the Lord shall deliver (roumai) me from every evil work . . . . ." (II Tim. iv. 17, 18).

May all the members of His Body enjoy the same confidence, not neglecting to pray always "with all prayer and supplication in spirit, and watching thereunto with all perseverance and supplication for all saints" (Eph. vi. 18).

CONCLUSION.

The Lord's Prayer has now been examined throughout, and although not every problem has been solved, enough has been seen to place the prayer into a very particular 'season'. To take the prayer out of this context is to miss its whole point, and to fail to rightly divide the word of truth. The tradition of many years has ordained its use, both amongst Catholics and Protestants. It has been laid open to many interpretations, most of them begin an attempt to get round the conditional forgiveness clause, in the light of the 'present' season. To see it in its correct light is to be delivered from all this. May the Lord's people, who are members of His Body, be prepared to recognize the place of this prayer in the purpose of God, and to turn rather to the prayers of Ephesians and Colossians, which are so very much more applicable to the present dispensation.

The Valley of the Shadow

No.1. An enquiry into the Scriptural meaning of the words "The Shadow of Death" (Psa. xxiii. 4).

pp. 173 -176

An assurance of redeeming love, of heavenly provision, of tender care, and of blessed guidance is no guarantee that the object of such love will be immune from the troubles and afflictions that are in the world. David knew this redeeming love, for he said "The Lord is my Shepherd". He knew that heavenly provision, for he said "I shall not want". He had experienced the Lord's tender care, when the Lord has made him to lie down in green pastures. He knew the blessed guidance that had led him beside still waters. Yet the self-same Psalm speaks of walking through the valley of the shadow of death.

But, some may say, David spoke of death which comes to all. A moment's thought upon the Psalm as a whole will reveal that this is untenable. Death is the end of all things in this life. Rod and staff may comfort while life lasts, but are useless after death. Moreover, to introduce actual physical death into the middle of the Psalm, is to ignore the fact that the Psalmist continues without break to speak of a table spread, of an anointed head, and of goodness and mercy following all the days of his life.

"The valley of the shadow of death" is a figure found in a number of O.T. books, and in none more than in the book of Job, a man who, for a time, longed for death though it came not. At first sight the reader who is seeking immediate comfort in his hour of trial, may be repelled by a long investigation into the meaning of the phrase, but all those who really value "the comfort of the Scriptures", will be among the first to see to it that they do not rely for their comfort or peace upon the uncertain foundation of incomplete understanding.

While we may be obliged to admit that Psa. xxiii. speaks of an experience ('dying daily') rather than the dissolution of the body in the article of death, there are passages where the valley of the shadow of death includes death itself. Yet even so, it is death accompanied with sore distress and trouble that is in view. One such passage is that of Job x. 21, 22, where such a death is contrasted unfavourably with death at the moment of birth (Job x. 21, 22):

> "Before I go whence I shall not return, even to the land of darkness and the shadow of death. A land of darkness, as darkness itself; and of the shadow of death, without any order, and where the light is as darkness."

This chaotic condition implies however something more than death itself; there is all its terrible accompaniments and consequences. Shakespeare uses the same figure:

> "Let order die . . . . . and darkness be the burier of the dead."

In Job xxxiv. 22, the words 'the shadow of death' are used in a more figurative manner:

> "There is no darkness, nor shadow of death, where the workers of iniquity may hide themselves", or as in Job xxiv. 16, 17, the wicked whose natural element is darkness, "In the dark they dig through houses", look upon light as an enemy, "For the morning is to them even as the shadow of death".

To the Psalmist, bondage and affliction could be described in terms of the shadow of death,

> "Such as sit in darkness and in the shadow of death, being bound in affliction and iron."
> "He brought them out of darkness and the shadow of death, and break their bands in sunder" (Psa. cvii. 10 and 14).

In Psa. xliv. we have the figure of the shadow of death used together with that of sheep devoted to destruction:

> "Thou hast given us like sheep appointed for meat; and hast scattered us among the heathen."
> "Yea, for thy sake are we killed all the day long; we are counted as sheep for the slaughter" (Psa. xliv. 11, 22).

So, the Psalmist could say:

> "Thou hast sore broken us in the place of dragons, and covered us with the shadow of death" (Psa. xliv. 19).

To the zealous Israelite, the nations outside the land of promise lived in the shadow of death:

> "Galilee of the nations. The people that walked in darkness have seen a great light; they that dwell in the land of the shadow of death, upon them hath the light shined" (Isa. ix. 1, 2).

Jeremiah likens the wilderness experience of Israel to that of passing through,

> "A land of drought, and of the shadow of death" (Jer. ii. 6).

It will be seen therefore that when the Psalmist speaks of the valley of the shadow of death, he refers rather to life's dread experiences, than to death itself.

To be 'killed all the day long' may not yield sense to the cold and critical, but to those whose experience enables them to understand the language of the heart, no explanation is necessary. Many of those who read these words, have lived in the very shadow of death. There is comfort for all such, for the Psalmist said:

> "Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil."

The believer's path through life is a mingled experience. Sometimes resting at an Elim, with its palm trees and its wells of water; sometimes walking with weary step through a waterless desert. Sometimes resting beside still waters, sometimes treading the valley of the shadow.

The testimony of Psa. xxiii., however, makes one thing certain. However varied the circumstances of life's pilgrimage may be, one thing remains constant, the presence of the Lord. "Thou art with me." His presence is not limited to experiences of joy or sorrow, but irradiates them all. When experience is that likened to resting in green pastures, it is He Who makes me thus to lie down. It is He Who leads me beside still waters; it is He Who restoreth my soul. Further, the green pastures, or the quietest waters would lose their charm without that presence, whereas the hardest couch is comfort if endured with Him.

David therefore dwells upon this blessed fact as he contemplates the deepest of life's trials, even there, in the valley of the shadow of death, he can say:

> "I will fear no evil, for Thou art with me."

As in the language of the N.T., so in that of the Old, there is much to be learned from the particles of speech. This little word 'with' for instance is the hinge upon which the passage turns. It is the Hebrew immadi, and is formed from the verb amad to stand. It is used of the close and lasting relationship which God ordained should exist between man and wife, as Adam makes clear when he spoke of Eve as "The woman whom Thou gavest to be with me" (Gen. iii. 12).

The personal presence and fellowship of the Lord in the sorrows and troubles of His own, is one of the most blessed and comforting of His many condescensions.

> "When thou passest through the waters, I will be with thee" (Isa. xliii. 2).
> "He shall call upon Me, and I will answer him: I will be with him in trouble" (Psa. xci. 15).
> "In all their affliction He was afflicted, and the angel of His Presence saved them" (Isa. lxiii. 9).

Keeping to the figures of Shepherd and sheep, David spoke out of his own shepherd experiences when he said:

> "Thy rod and thy staff they comfort me."

"The rod" refers to the shepherd's club, with which he defended the sheep. "The staff" refers to the shepherd's crook with which he rescued the sheep from dangerous paths.

> "The rod" for the enemy is seen in Psa. ii.
> "Thou shalt break them with a rod of iron" (Psa. ii. 9).
> "The staff" (Hebrew misheneth, from shaan 'to lean').
> "The Lord was my stay" (Psa. xviii. 18).
> "Lo, thou trustest in the staff of this broken reed, on Egypt" (Isa. xxxvi. 6).

It is good to know that in the dark valley we have Someone upon whom we may confidently "lean".

This 'leaning' is but a symbol of "trusting".

> "Trust in the Lord with all thine heart, and lean not unto thine own understanding" (Prov. iii. 5).
>
> "Who is among you that feareth the Lord, that obeyeth the voice of His servant, that walketh in darkness, and hath no light? let him trust in the name of the Lord, and stay upon his God" (Isa. l. 10).

In the darkest part of life's pilgrim path, the Lord stands with us. He is armed against our foes, He holds a trustworthy staff upon which we may confidently lean.

If these things are true in our experience, then we can say:

> "Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil."

No.2. The "needs be" of the Valley of the Shadow.
pp. 187 -190

It may be a means of comfort to some of God's tried ones, if we pause in our reading of Psa. xxiii. to ask, "Why should the valley of the shadow of death" come in to this Shepherd Psalm at all? This is not exactly the same as saying "Why should Christians ever suffer?" for such a question would be tantamount to denying both life's experiences, the testimony of all saints, and the record of Holy Scripture. There is a lesson to be learned if we will but acquaint ourselves with the land of the Shepherd Psalm and work of the Palestinian shepherd.

First, let us observe the actual word used by David which is translated 'valley'. He could have used the word which means 'a low land, a plain, a gentle slope' and if he had, such would have been a delightful spot for sheep rather than a place of dread. David uses a word which gives us the name "Gehenna" or "The valley of the son of Hinnom" (Joshua xv. 8).

In the land of Benjamin is a valley, called "The valley of Zeboim", which Gesenius translates "The valley of Hyaenas" (I Sam. xiii. 18) and it would be to some such valley that David would refer in Psa. xxiii. In the "Song of Our Syrian Guest" we read:

> "Some paths that are right paths lead through places that have deadly perils; 'Yea though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death' is the way the psalm touches this fact in shepherd life. This way of naming the valley is very true of our country. I remember one near my home called the 'valley of robbers' and another 'the ravine of the raven'."

While this is true, and may be unquestioned by the reader, we have still left untouched the heart of the question "why should sheep be led by their shepherd into such dreadful places?"

Each case, of course, would have to be settled on its own merits, but in the generality for instances, "the valley of the shadow" was a necessary link between pastures that had been exhausted and pastures that were new. In the hill country of Judah many such ravines and valleys intersect, with their deep shade, the pasture of the hills. Here, in caves and dens, lurked the wolf and the hyena. David knew what it was in the exercise of his calling as a shepherd, to face a lion and a bear. The shepherd never led his flock through these dreadful places without real and imperative reasons, and we may rest assured that God, Who is not only righteous but Who is love, Who is not only creator but is redeemer, Who is not only Lord but is Father, never permits His children to pass through any such experience without reason. We may not understand or appreciate this, any more than 'silly sheep' could understand the working of the Shepherd mind. Enough that we know HIM; we have received from Him the greatest of all blessings, salvation. That salvation was procured at infinite cost, and an argument is put into our lips, drawn from this very fact:

> "If God be for us, who can be against us? He that spared not His Own Son, but delivered Him up for us all, how shall He not with Him also freely give us all things?" (Rom. viii. 31, 32).

If the believer will keep steadily in mind the opening lines of this Psalm, he will find the answer to his question and to his fears in the words "The Lord is my Shepherd". Grant this, and all must follow. He will provide, lead, defend. He will never afflict without good reason, it is for us to follow, and, as the darkness deepens, to "lean hard upon our Guide". However dark the shadow may be He is with us, and however deadly the gloom, He has overcome death, and because He lives, we shall live also.

Peter, in his epistle, makes use of the figure of Shepherd and sheep and knew that this dark valley must sometimes be endured:

> "Though now for a season, if need be, ye are in heaviness through manifold temptations" (I Pet. i. 6).

The valley of the shadow therefore must needs be the experience of all who travel through the wilderness of this world. Let us not make it more dismal by complaining or repining, let us rather face its gloom saying:

> "I will fear no evil, for Thou art with me."

This valley of the shadow of death may at times be given a particular name to emphasize some special phase of experience. In case any reader should hesitate to use mere geographical names as a basis for spiritual teaching, let him remember that the instance which we now put forward is an inspired example of this very thing. It is good to be sensitive in our handling of Scripture, but not super-sensitive, lest things written beforehand for our learning and comfort be lost. One such name for this valley is "The Valley of Achor", or to translate the name into English "The valley of trouble". The actual valley of Achor was so named, because of the sin of Achan who 'troubled' Israel (Josh. vi. 18). In I Chron. ii. 7 Achan's name is actually altered to read 'Achar' the word for 'trouble' to emphasize the fact.

There are two references in the great prophecies of Israel's restoration where this "Valley of Trouble" is turned by overruling grace into a place of blessing:

> "I will bring forth a seed out of Jacob, and out of Judah an inheritor of My mountains: and Mine elect shall inherit it, and My servants shall dwell there. And Sharon shall be a fold of flocks, and the Valley of Achor a place for the herds to lie down in, for My people that have sought Me" (Isa. lxv. 9, 10).

The lesson that appears on the surface, which administers balm to our hurt minds, and soothes in times of stress is this:

(1) God has a chosen people "Mine elect".
(2) Though sin has robbed them of their inheritance, and turned the place of triumph into a valley of trouble (Josh vi. and vii.), the elect shall yet enter into their own.
(3) The present "Valley of Trouble" can be turned into a place of rest;
(4) And the principle is found in the closing words of the passage "For My people that have sought Me".

Here, therefore, we can see the lesson for ourselves. At one end of the story is the electing love of God, and at the other the voluntary seeking of the Lord by His people. In between lies the valley of Achor, the valley of trouble, but electing love, and seeking faith can turn the valley of trouble into green pastures wherein the herds may 'lie down'.

The second occurrence of this valley of Achor in the prophets, is that of Hos. ii. 15. This chapter opens with the shameful unfaithfulness of Israel, under the figure of a woman who has 'played the harlot'; and of the Lord's dealings with such, taking away the corn, the wine, the wool and the flax, not only as a judgment upon the woman's utter unfaithfulness, but as a means of opening her poor blind eyes.

> "For she did not know that I gave her corn and wine and oil, and multiplied her silver and gold, which they prepared for Baal" (Hos. ii. 8).

When the lesson has been learned however, the Lord says:

> "Therefore, behold, I will allure her, and bring her into the wilderness, and speak comfortably (as in Isa. xl. 2) unto her. And I will give her vineyards from thence, and the valley of Achor for a door of hope, and she shall sing there, as in the days of her youth, and as in the day when she came up out of the land of Egypt" (Hos. ii. 14,15).

The valley of trouble, can become 'a door of hope' to all who have learned the lesson of faith. The figurative use of a 'door' for 'opportunity' is familiar to all who know the writings of the Apostle Paul. He speaks of "a great and effectual door" (I Cor. xvi. 9), "a door . . . . . opened by the Lord" (II Cor. ii. 12); 'a door of utterance' (Col. iv. 3). The book of the Revelation uses the word in the same figurative sense (Rev. iii. 8).

The Valley of the Shadow, through which the believer must sometimes pass, may turn out to be such a valley of trouble that it, by the grace of God, shall become a ‘door of hope’.

> “And not only so, but we glory in tribulation also; knowing that tribulation worketh patience; and patience, experience; and experience hope” (Rom. v. 3, 4).
> “Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil.”

No.3. The Vale of Tears, a place of triumphant faith.
pp. 215 -217

The valley of the shadow, we have seen, may at times prove to be “The valley of Achor (trouble)” which under God’s blessing may become ‘a door of hope’.

The valley of the shadow, may have another name attached to it at times, it can be called ‘the valley of Baca’.

> “Blessed is the man whose strength is in Thee:
> in whose heart are the ways of them.
> Who passing through the valley of Baca make it a well:
> the rain also filleth the pools” (Psa. lxxxiv. 5, 6).

“The valley of Baca” means “The valley of tears”, and the figure has passed into English literature in the phrase “This vale of tears”, to indicate the passage of humanity through life. It would take us too far afield to discuss the general intention of this Psalm. Some teach that the Psalmist is cut off from the fellowship and thinks with pain that even sparrows and swallows find a resting place in the courts of the Lord, an access which was denied to the Psalmist. Others question this idea saying that in no circumstances could sparrows and swallows build nests at the very altar, and teach that the sparrow and the swallow is to be understood as of the Psalmist himself who has found a resting place in his God, whether having access to the place of worship or whether such access be denied.

This truth appears in verse 6. Those who have ‘the ways’ in their heart, can turn even a ‘valley of tears’ into a place of blessing. Burkhardt writes:

> “After you have advanced two hours, the valley for an hour gets the name of Wady Beka, or the valley of the weeping.”

Rotherham translates Psa. lxxxiv. 5:

> “How happy the men whose strength is in Thee, > Festive processions are in their heart.”

It appears therefore that the valley of the shadow, can become very much what we make it. If our faith is largely made up of human traditions, ‘places’ of worship, veneration of ‘days’ and other elements of ‘religion’, we shall miss the externals of our faith badly, when the happy fellowship of the Lord's people must be exchanged for the valley of weeping. But the living realities of faith are ours. If our 'place' or worship is 'where Christ sits at the right hand of God' if, even though far from human fellowship, "Festive processions are in the heart" then the Valley of Weeping provides a Well of Salvation.

Many readers of The Berean Expositor are cut off from the fellowship they enjoyed in days gone by. They sit or work in loneliness and isolation. They 'long even faint' for an opportunity to meet around the Word once more. But, as one such wrote to us: "The teaching we received at the meetings, now proves to be our armour". To such, "Christ is all" and if He is with them in the Valley, then even though every external accompaniment of their salvation should be denied, though all fellowship broken, though all opportunities of study denied, though the mind refuses to concentrate because of the pressure of the times, nevertheless, the valley of Baca becomes a valley of triumphant faith. Tears are dried, He is with them, and all is well.

> "Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil, for Thou art with me."

The Transforming Presence.

If we set no bounds to our license we may spiritualize every valley that is found in Palestine, but we refrain. We have endeavoured to minister comfort to those who may be called upon to walk through the valley of the shadow; and the very heart of this comfort is found in the precious fact that the Psalmist could say "Thou art with Me".

We have discovered that there is a true spiritual application of geographical terms, for although the valley of Achor can be found on the map, yet the valley of Achor is also used as a spiritual experience. We read of the 'valley of Jehoshaphat' which becomes in the prophets message the 'valley of Decision' (Joel iii. 2, 12, 14), and it may be that sometimes the valley of the shadow can become in a very intense way, a valley of decision for the one passing through it, a decision which, like that of the blinded Saul of Tarsus, should influence the whole of his after life. The valley of the shadow may be to some, 'the valley of Hebron', where a most blessed fellowship is entered that could not otherwise be enjoyed. The valley of the shadow can become the 'valley of Mispeh', a place where we learn to watch as Habakkuk did (Hab. i. 1-4; ii. 1-4). Others will find that the valley of the shadow may become he 'valley of Succoth' or 'booths' (as at the feast of Tabernacles), where rest and peace are exchanged for alarm and strife.

Sometimes, the believer may discover the valley of the shadow, to become the "valley of Eshcol" with its blessed reminder of the 'earnest of the inheritance' that the "grapes of Eshcol" stand for. Sometimes the valley of the shadow may appear to be a dreadful cul-de-sac at times, yet it may become "The valley of passengers" (Ezek. xxxix. 11), and prove to be a covered bridge, leading from 'light to light'. But there are limits to this application and we can but hope that, whenever the believer passes through the valley of the shadow, not only the spiritual experiences outlined in this series will be entered, but others, unrecorded here will be, by the overruling grace of the Lord, the blessed parallel of those experiences symbolized by the valley of Achor and its door of hope, or the valley of Baca, and its well of water. Let us once again remind ourselves of the one essential all covering factor:

"Thou art with me."

No.4. The Valley of Vision.
pp. 235 -237

If we approach the subject from the standpoint of the flesh, then the valley of the shadow must be the last place wherein to expect illumination, but if the valley of the shadow should be a spiritual experience, there is hope that the very darkness will be blessed to illuminate both our own need and the Lord's provision. It may become in grace "The Valley of Vision". This term is borrowed from the prophecy of Isaiah, and for its place in that prophecy and its primary meaning, the reader is referred to the series entitled "Fundamentals of Dispensational Truth" in which the book of Isaiah is given an exposition. As we have stated before, following the example set by the usage of the Valley of Achor, we are taking a little liberty with the text in this short series, using these different passages as a means to an end, namely to minister comfort to those of our readers who may be passing through periods of trial.

The word used by Isaiah to describe this valley of "Vision" is almost identical with his use in Isa. i. 1:

> "The vision of Isaiah the son of Amoz, which he saw."
> Sometimes there comes into the spiritual experience of the people of God a period that may be likened to the days of Eli, when:
> > "The word of the Lord was precious (perhaps because of its rarity) . . . . . there was no open vision" (I Sam. iii. 1).

It may be that one has accepted the blessings of the Lord, without due consideration of their grace: it may be that it becomes necessary that we should be obliged to pass through the valley of the shadow, that in the darkness the eyes of our heart may see. Something of this spirit is expressed in the words of the Psalmist when he said:

> "Before I was afflicted I went astray: but now I have kept Thy word."
> "It is good for me that I have been afflicted: that I might learn Thy Statutes" (Psa. cxix. 67, 71).
> "Where there is no vision", said the wise man, "the people perish" (Prov. xxix. 18).

One very important lesson was learned by the prophet Habakkuk. He entered the valley of the shadow, but in it he learned a most valuable lesson concerning 'vision'. In chapter i. we find Habakkuk in the valley of the shadow.

> "O Lord, how long shall I cry, and Thou wilt not hear? even cry out unto Thee of violence, and Thou wilt not save?" (Hab. i. 2).

There can be no gloom quite so oppressive as that which comes from a fear that God has forgotten one, or no longer 'cares'. The gloom deepened with each step, for Habakkuk complains that he was 'shown iniquity, and caused to behold grievance' yet judgment never seemed forthcoming (Hab. i. 3, 4). Yet that dark valley of the shadow became to him "The Valley of Vision".

> "I will stand upon my watch, and set me upon the tower, and will watch to see what He will say unto me . . . . . Write the vision, and make it plain upon tables, that he may run that readeth it. For the vision is yet for an appointed time, but at the end it shall speak, and not lie: though it tarry, wait for it; because it will surely come, it will not tarry" (Hab. ii. 1-3).

The valley of the shadow—"Thou wilt not hear"; "Thou wilt not save"—is transformed. "It will surely come, it will not tarry." The lesson that brought light in the darkness, is the lesson of the ages. God has an appointed time, and prayer must not be abused. We must not act as though by our continual crying unto God, we can or should attempt to persuade God to alter by a single line His great and glorious purpose. Habakkuk summed up the lesson in the pregnant words:

> "The just shall live by his faith" (Hab. ii. 4).

If we may be permitted to speak of a mountain-top experience as a passing through the valley of the shadow of death, then Abraham trod his path when he rose up early in the morning with knife and wood and fire to obey the heart-searching command:

> "Take now thy son, thine only son Isaac whom thou lovest . . . . . and offer him . . . . . for a burnt offering" (Gen. xxii. 2).

When Abraham said to Isaac "My son, God will provide Himself a lamb . . . . ." (Gen. xxii. 8), he used a word that meant 'to see' even as 'pro vision' means "to see beforehand". This became most gloriously true, for after the testing, came the naming of the mountain "Jehovah-jireh"; as it is said to this day, "In the mount of the Lord it shall be seen". Abraham's valley of shadow became a valley of vision, he rejoiced to see the day of Christ, he saw it and was glad.

Job passed along the valley, until darkness gave place to light and he could say:

> "I have heard of Thee by the hearing of the ear; but now mine eye seeth Thee" (Job xlii. 5).

Darkness and light are both the same to the Lord. Darkness especially when used in the spiritual sense depends far more on that which is within than which is without. The very darkness that is without may but lead the spiritual eye to see the better. Let us therefore never forgat that if the Valley of Trouble can become a Door of Hope so the Valley of the Shadow may be so blessed that it becomes to us "The Valley of Vision".

Dear Fellow-Members,

Once again we wish to express our gratitude to our heavenly Father that we have been enabled to complete yet another volume of The Berean Expositor. When one considers the increasing difficulties of the times, the rise in the cost of living, the deepening apostasy and indifference all around us, which has caused more than one Christian magazine to cease production, we marvel at the goodness of our God Who has sustained us right through to the present time.

We have nothing to offer except a sincere attempt to expound faithfully the Word of God as a whole, with special emphasis on the riches of Truth that God wills to make known during this age of grace (Col. i. 24-27). There are no advertisements in The Berean Expositor for a source of income, nor any attempt to curry favour or please the crowd, but we offer it to those who want and value Truth at all costs.

To all who have so loyally supported us in every way, both here and abroad, we express our thanks and appreciation. As we look around us at the veritable landslide from the Truth and true values, we realize there is but one effective antidote, to "preach the Word" (II Tim. iv. 2). Will you join with us once again in practical and prayerful support so that this witness for the Word rightly divided may be maintained?

His Kindness Towards Us

The blessings and position of the members of the Body of Christ so far transcend the ordinary experiences of life, that we might well fear being overwhelmed by it all. "Blessed with every spiritual blessing . . . . . made to sit together in heavenly places . . . . . builded together for an habitation of God"; these expressions which are at present beyond our ability to fully comprehend, and yet they intimately concern our future (Eph. i. 3; ii. 6, 22). Are we going to be lost in the wonder and immensity of it all? Is it going to be just a bit too much to us? Happily, Scripture assures us that such will not be so.

In Eph. ii. 7 we read of God's intentions towards us in "the ages to come", and they are expressed in the lovely word "kindness". There is no thought that the extent of His grace will leave us either overwhelmed or uncomfortable. We are dealing with One described as "The Father" and associated with "every family" (Eph. iii. 14, 15 R.V); the environment is that of the home, and the atmosphere "kindness". None will feel out of place here. Such blessing and assurance are associated with an abundance of God's grace, and represent the third step of a progression in grace revealed in Ephesians:

(1) His grace . . . chosen . . . predestinated . . . before the foundation of the world.
(2) Riches of His grace . . . redemption . . . forgiveness . . . (now).
(3) Exceeding riches of His grace . . . kindness . . . in the ages to come (Eph. i. 4-7; ii. 7).

We may not yet fully appreciate the blessings given us "in Christ Jesus", not be able to conceive of "heavenly places". We may hardly be able to believe the extent of God's grace toward us, such unworthy creature, but this we can grasp. His "kindness" towards us in Christ Jesus is an assurance that, in the ages to come, we will not be overawed, but feel completely at home in His presence.

He has Spoken Well of Us

pp. 159, 160

Eph. i. 3 is a well known and much beloved verse of Scripture to the members of the Body of Christ. It calls for blessing of the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, the One Who "blessed us with every spiritual blessing in the heavenly places in Christ" (R.V.). What is fully involved in "every spiritual blessing" may at present be far beyond our understanding, but it is very often helpful to consider the literal meaning of words, and it is worthwhile here.

Three related words are used in this verse, all of which have the root idea "to speak well of". They are:

> "Blessed (eulogetos) be the God and Father . . . . .
> Who hath blessed (eulogeo) us > with every spiritual blessing (eulogia) . . . . ."

Eulogetos is used only of God in the N.T. and reminds us that praise is due to Him as Creator (Rom. i. 25), as well as because of these "spiritual blessings", which call forth "spiritual songs" (Eph. v. 19). The greatest such song ever to be written is probably Eph. i. 3-14 itself, and in it we praise Him (as did the Psalms of old) by recalling the grace bestowed upon us in Christ. In this way the "redeemed of the Lord say so" (Psalm cvii. 1, 2).

Eulogeo, as used here, gives the ground for our praise of Him—He "spoke well of us", whilst eulogia answers the question, How?—"in every spiritual eulogy".

But can it be that God has spoken well of us? Dare we use such a word as 'eulogy' in this connection? Certainly not if the word is seen as referring to any qualities we possess, for what is there in us of which "to speak well"? But the verse has not yet been fully quoted:

> ". . . . . Who spoke well of us in every spiritual eulogy in the heavenly places in Christ."

There is truly nothing to call forth His well speaking of us—except "in Christ". Indeed, we cannot read far into this epistle without being constantly confronted by such phrases as "in Christ", "in Him", "in the Beloved". God can only speak well of us in Him, and has done so according as He has bestowed upon us such abundant grace and blessing.

The verses which follow enumerate these blessings and are a "kaleidoscope of dazzling lights and shifting colours" (J. A. Robinson). We see ourselves as objects of grace, chosen, marked off for sonship, redeemed, forgiven offences, enlightened as to the secret of His will, taken as an inheritance, etc., and all "to the praise of His glory". But as we proceed deeper into this wonderful epistle, another truth emerges which almost takes our breath away.

He spoke well of us, yes, but where? Where was the spiritual eulogy heard? Eph. i. 3 supplies the answer, "in the heavenly places". Who then heard it?—"the principalities and powers" there surely. But with what object? The same undoubtedly as the effect of bringing to light the dispensation of the mystery (which treats of the blessings already referred to), as it was made known among men, viz.,

> "to the intent that now unto the principalities and powers in heavenly places might be known by (means of) the church the manifold wisdom of God, according to the purpose of the ages (lit.) which He purposed in Christ Jesus our Lord" (Eph. iii. 10, 11).

The attention of mighty spiritual beings has been drawn to the church, which is being used to make known "the full sweep of the Divine wisdom" (Moffatt). The members of this church, the Body of Christ, have had made known to them, "in all wisdom and prudence", the secret of His will "for a dispensation of the fullness of the seasons" (i. 8-10). Such a dispensation sees "all things in Christ" under His Headship ('gather together in one' in verse 10 is lit. 'to head up again'), and the church which is His Body is a kind of firstfruits in this respect, insofar that Christ is already given to it as Head (Eph. i. 22, 23), and something of the harvest may be learned from the firstfruits!

But it is as well to remember that there is a practical side to this also. When the Lord drew the attention of Satan to Job, it was not, in that case, to the blessings of Job, but to his response to blessing:

> "Has thou considered My servant Job, that there is none like him in the earth, a perfect and an upright man, one that feareth God, and escheweth evil?" (Job i. 8).

So then we also ought to recognize that our response to such blessings as are ours, may also be under observation by spiritual beings, and if that is so, what manner of persons ought we to be? He has spoken well of us, and we are to speak well of Him; ought not that 'speaking' to include our manner of life?

> "For we are His poem (A.V. 'workmanship', Greek poiema), created in Christ Jesus for good works, which God prepared before in order that we should walk in them" (Eph. ii. 10).

Joint-Partakers

A consideration of Eph. iii. 6.

pp. 177, 178

In our attempt to bring before the reader the peculiar character of the church of the Mystery, we have translated the words found in Eph. iii. 6 "joint-heirs", "joint-body" and "joint-partakers". One of our readers has questioned the accuracy both of the translation and the intentional insistence upon equality that underlies it, drawing our attention to two passages in Romans:

> "For if the Gentiles have been made partakers of their spiritual things" (Rom. xv. 27).
> "If some of the branches were broken off, and thou, being a wild olive tree, wert grafted in among them, and didst become partaker with them of the root and fatness of the olive tree" (Rom. xi. 17).

Here, before the Mystery was made known, the Gentiles are found "partakers" of the spiritual things belonging to Israel. Where then does the distinctiveness of Eph. iii. 6 come in, is the question.

We must consider this matter under several heads:

(1) The actual words used.
(2) The actual blessings that are symbolized.
(3) Wherein they are the same, or wherein they differ.

First of all, the word which we have translated "joint-partaker" in Eph. iii. 6, is summetochos, whereas the word translated "partaker" in Rom. xv. 27 is koinoneo, and in Rom. xi. 17 it is sugkoinonos. At the outset therefore we are faced with the fact that the inspired writer was led to use different words. He uses the simple koinoneo in Romans xv. 27, and the more advance sugknoinonos in Rom. xi. 17, evidently indicating even there that some difference must be observed between the subject of the two chapters, and the fact that neither of these words are used in Eph. iii. 6, should make us pause if tempted to think of them as of one aspect of truth only. Let us become acquainted with the meaning and usage of these words.

Koinoneo comes from the word koinos which means "common".

> "They had all things common" (Acts xx. 44).
> "The common faith" (Titus i. 4).
> "The common salvation" (Jude 3).

This same word is translated “defile” (Mark vii. 2) and “unclean” (Rom. xiv. 14) in the sense meant by Peter:

> “I have not eaten anything that is common” (Acts x. 14).
> “I should call no man common” (Acts x. 28).

No one would dream of saying that these words uttered of Cornelius in Acts x. 28 put the Gentile upon absolute equality with the Jew, for the very idea is a contradiction of what is actually taught in the Acts and in the epistles of the period. Reconciliation, however, had brought the Gentile nigh, and so this word “common” is found in Romans xv. 27.

In Rom. xi. 17 the word is sugkoinonos “fellow partaker”:

> “And if some of the branches be broken off, and thou, being a wild olive tree, wert grafted in among them partakest of the root and fatness of the olive tree.”

This in no way destroys the pre-eminence that Rom. i. 16 or Rom. ix. 3-5 grant to Israel; it must be kept within the confines of the symbol, that of a graft into a stock. Whether the graft be that of a wild olive, a true olive, a rose or an apple, graft and natural branch must jointly partake of the root and its supply, otherwise the branch would die. Where Paul uses the figure of the olive tree he is consistent and uses “joint-partaker”. Where he speaks in plain terms without a figure he modifies the word to “partaker”, and as Rom. xv. 27 was written after Rom. xi. 17, we must accept the modification as intentional and as being necessitated by the fact that the Gentiles were not strictly speaking “joint-partakers” with Israel.

Coming now to Eph. iii. 6, we find that the word translated “partakers” is summetochos, a word occurring nowhere else in the N.T. but in Eph. v. 7. Metochos is found once in Luke and five times in Hebrews, and metoche occurs but once, namely in II Cor. vi. 14. Paul therefore had the lesser word to use if it had suited his purpose. We are constrained therefore to recognize in Eph. iii. 6 in the threefold use of sun, a unique relationship among the members of the Body, and while confessing that there is much to be desired in such a clumsy translation, the limits of our vocabulary will not allow us to translate these three words into a better English equivalent than,

“Joint-heirs, a joint-body and joint-partakers.”

CHARLES H. WELCH

The Nature of Reward for Christian Service

pp. 178 - 180

The need to distinguish between salvation (the free gift of God) and reward or prize has often been emphasized in our writings, and there is obviously a great difference between living with Christ and reigning with Him. All believers will "live", but the additional "reigning" is conditional upon their faithfulness and endurance.

A | If we died with Him, we shall also live with Him.
B | If we endure, we shall also reign with Him.
B | If we deny Him, He also will deny us.
A | If we are unfaithful, He remains faithful, for He cannot deny Himself (II Tim. ii. 11-13).

Terms "A" "A" deal with life given to those who have died with Christ (the position of all believers, identified with Him in death and resurrection—cp. Rom. vi.). It cannot be lost through the unfaithfulness of a believer, for that 'life' depends upon His faithfulness, not the believer's.

Terms "B" "B" speak of something over and above ("also" verse 12) which is earned by faithfulness and endurance. This is "reigning", but it will be denied to those who deny Him by an unfaithful witness.

But what of the 'nature' of the reward, and what does 'reigning' imply? It may seem at first rather fleshly for a believer to even contemplate gaining a reward for Christian service, for however much is done for Him it can never repay what He has done for us, let alone be deserving of a prize. The believer's attitude ought surely to be:

> "We are servants and deserve no credit; we have only done our duty" (Luke xvii. 10 N.E.B.).

If we yield our bodies as living sacrifices it is but our "reasonable service" (Romans xii. 1), for we can surely do Him no favours?

Yet does Paul employ the figure of a race for the Christian walk, and at the end of it stands the possibility of gaining a prize (I Cor. ix. 24-27; Phil. iii. 12-16; Heb. xii. 1, 2 and cp. Col. ii. 18). Even "Jesus" is looked upon as enduring the cross "for the joy that was set before Him" (Heb. xii. 2). Was this the "mind in Christ Jesus"?

Also, it seems strange that Paul could exhort believers to be concerned with the things of others in Phil. ii. and yet occupy his own attention with gaining a prize in the next chapter. In ii. 2 he expects the Philippians to "look" (skopeo) on the things of others, but his own 'look' is according to a "mark" (skopos) for a prize (iii. 14). What is the answer to these apparently contradictory ideas?

The difficulty comes about when the 'nature' of reward for service is not appreciated. If 'prize' conjures up in our mind the picture of a man proudly displaying his trophies to be admired by all, "prizes" which he has won for himself, then we have not grasped the Scriptural conception. Similarly, if 'reigning' suggests idly sitting on a throne to be admired by underdogs, the same shallow thinking on our part is apparent. What then is the Scriptural conception?

Beginning with the Lord Himself, His 'mind' was set on "the joy lying before Him". What was this joy? It was certainly connected with His exaltation to the right hand of God, and was won by His endurance of, and obedience to, the death of the cross (Hebrews xii. 1, 2; Phil. ii. 8, 9). He was faithful unto death, enduring the cross to secure the joy set before Him.

By comparing Heb. xii. 1, 2 with Psa. xvi. 11 (note that Peter quoted this Psalm of the resurrection and exaltation of Christ, verses 8-11; Acts ii. 25-33) note the parallels: "race" ("path"), "the right hand of God", and "fullness of joy". The word "fullness" (soba) is related to "satisfied" (sabea), and by observing its usage in Isa. liii., some idea of what the Lord's "joy" included may be gained:

> "He was cut off out of the land of the living, stricken for the transgression of my people . . . . . He shall see the fruit of the travail of His soul and be satisfied" (verses 8, 11 R.S.V.)

The Lord's satisfaction (fullness) of joy involved seeing the fruit of His service; "the joy that was set before Him is not something for Himself alone, but something to be shared with those for whom He died" (F. F. Bruce on Heb. xii. 2). Compare John xvii. 24.

Similarly with Paul, his "joy" and "crown" involved others; in seeking "the things of others", he sought the prize, the joy set before him. The Philippians, won from the human standpoint by his labour, were his "joy and crown" (Phil. iv. 1). So too the Thessalonians:

> "What is our hope, or joy, or crown of rejoicing? Are not even ye in the presence of our Lord Jesus Christ at His Coming? For ye are our glory and joy" (I Thess. ii. 19, 20).

Paul's joy and crown lay in the fruits of service presented before the Lord in that day; this was a reward in itself.

But these thoughts do not exhaust the idea of "crown" and "reigning" in Scripture, for Paul expected (together with all who have loved His appearing) the "crown" of righteousness" in "that day" (II Tim. iv. 8). He had fought a good fight and finished the course, his "endurance" surely guaranteed for him the privilege of "reigning" (II Tim. ii. 12). But what is "reigning"? It is simply higher service for Him.

> "His servants shall serve Him: and they shall see His face . . . . . and they shall reign for ever and ever" (Rev. xxii. 3-6).

It may be reflected that our Queen Elizabeth does not idly sit on a throne to be admired by her subjects, but is a servant to our country.

Returning to the thought of "joy", note how this is also connected with the entry to a higher and more responsible service for the Lord.

> "Lord, thou deliverest unto me five talents; behold, I have gained beside them five talents more. His lord said unto him . . . . . thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will set thee over many things: enter thou into the joy of thy lord" (Matt. xxv. 20, 21).

Compare also Luke xix. 16-19. The receiving of a crown, the conception of "reigning", is but the entrance to a higher and more responsible service for Him which will bring greater glory and honour to the only One Who is deserved of it (cp. Rev. iv. 9-11 R.V.). Our reward is in the service itself (is this not our experience in Christian ministry?), the glory and honour belong to Him. If we are "exalted in due time" (I Pet. v. 6) it is to His glory. Even Christ Jesus (in the final analysis) is "highly exalted . . . . . to the glory of God the Father" (Phil. ii. 9-11).

Be Filled by The Spirit

pp. 218 - 220

The injunction to be "filled with the Spirit" (Eph. v. 18 A.V.) has been greatly misunderstood by some believers and interpreted as though it referred to an ecstatic experience which the Lord desires His people to have. It has been thought that such an experience may be gained by convening prayer meetings and "waiting for the Spirit", or by whipping up emotions through repetitive chorus-singing, handclapping and other rhythmic movements.

There has also been a failure to realize that the Holy Spirit is, in this verse, the Giver and not the gift; the believer here not being filled "with the Spirit" but "by the Spirit" (see The Companion Bible and The Giver and His gifts by E. W. Bullinger). When however, it is appreciated what the Holy Spirit (as Giver) is prepared to fill the believer with, then none of the views or practices mentioned above will be seen to have any relevance to the fulfillment of the injunction.

Ephesians and Colossians have, from early times, been recognized as being parallel epistles. As such, a truth expressed in one of the epistles may be seen in a clearer light by referring to a parallel passage in the other. So here, Eph. v. 18 - vi. 9 is in some respects parallel to Col. iii. 16 - iv. 1. Both passages refer to "psalms and hymns and spiritual songs . . . . . giving thanks . . . . . wives, husbands, children, parents, fathers, servants, masters" in much the same general order. But whereas Eph. v. 18 enjoins,

> "Be filled by the Spirit",

Col. iii. 16 (standing in the section in a parallel position) exhorts,

> "Let the word of Christ dwell in you richly in all wisdom."

The outcome of this is to note that the Holy Spirit fills the believer with the word of Christ according to the believer's desire and response.

Such an idea is not confined to this part of Scripture however, for the ministry of the Holy Spirit in the Gospel of John is associated with the things of Christ (John xvi. 13, 14), and the Lord claims that His own words are spirit and life (John vi. 63). There are also a number of passages in both the O.T. and the New where "spirit" and "word" are associated together in such a way as to suggest that they are almost synonymous in some aspects of their usage.

> "The Spirit of God moved . . . . . And God said" (Gen. i. 2, 3).
> "By the Word of the Lord were the heavens made; And all the host of them by the breath (spirit) of His mouth" (Psa. xxxiii. 6).
> "All Scripture is given by inspiration of God" (The God-breathed Word) (II Tim. iii. 16).

"The Spirit entered into me when He spake unto me" (Ezek. ii. 2).

It may also be remembered that when, on the day of Pentecost, "they were all filled with holy spirit" (literally), the first outcome of this was, that they "began to speak with other tongues" (Acts ii. 4). Also in both Eph. v. 18 and Col. iii. 16 the immediate contexts in which "filled by the Spirit" and "word of Christ" appear refer to "speaking" and "singing".

Hence, in the light of the strong connection between 'spirit' and 'word' in some parts of Scripture, the comparison between Eph. v. 18 and Col. iii. 16 can be seen to be quite valid insofar that it suggests that, to be "filled by the Spirit" is to be filled with "the word of Christ".

But how does this become a reality for the believer? Is it to be prayed for? Certainly prayer enters into it, but not that alone. The "word of Christ" is surely that word which the believer has before him an open Bible; it is the word that He has already given through His servants, Moses, Peter, Paul, John, etc.; it is "the word of the Lord" in both Old and New Testaments. It must surely be obvious that for it to 'dwell' in the believer that word must be read, and if it is to dwell in him "richly", it must be inwardly digested, and if it is to dwell richly "in all wisdom", then it must be wisely handled, it must be "rightly divided" (II Tim. ii. 15).

The outcome of this is that if the Word of Christ is neglected, then there can be no possibility of being "filled by the Spirit" in the present dispensation. The attitude for the believer to take with respect to the Scriptures must be that of a 'workman' seeking approval before God (II Tim. ii. 15), and so will the Holy Spirit fill him with that Word. (To emphasize the workmanlike attitude that the believer should take to the Word of truth, we recall that the late editor of this publication, Mr. C. H. Welch, was fond of describing his own study of the Word as, one percent inspiration and 99 percent perspiration"!).

It has been observed (at the beginning of this article) that some believers look for an emotional experience in connection with the injunction "be filled with the Spirit" (A.V.) and it may be thought, in the light of what has been said on this so far, that emotion must be discounted altogether, but this is not so. There is an emotion connected with the hearing of the Word of Christ which is quite Scriptural:

> "Beginning at Moses and all the prophets, He expounded unto them in all the scriptures the things concerning Himself . . . . . And they said one to another, Did not our heart burn within us, while He talked with us by the way, and while He opened to us the Scriptures?" (Luke xxiv. 27, 32).

Many believers would testify to a similar experience while sitting under the ministry of the Word, or in private devotion with the Word of truth. This is the real thing, and must not be confused with any emotion brought about by other means (all too common unfortunately, especially in evangelistic rallies).

Another point which bears upon the work of the Holy Spirit and the Word of Christ, concerns the presence of the Holy Spirit in Christian assemblies. Some believers are very fond of speaking of the Lord's, or the Holy Spirit's, presence at their meetings, but can they really claim this? Also, in what way are they present? The passage which comes immediately to mind is Matt. xviii. 20:

> "For where two or three are gathered together in My Name, there am I in the midst of them."

What is not often recognized, however, with respect to this verse, is that it begins with the word "for", which links it back to the previous words,

> "If two of you shall agree on earth as touching anything that they shall ask, it shall be done for them of My Father which is in heaven. FOR . . . . ."

If the implications of these words are considered, together with the context in which the whole appear, it will be seen that there are dispensational aspects to be reckoned with, before ever verse 20 can be applied to the situation today. There is not the space here to consider these things, but it could be asked what is implied by "gathered together in My Name".

Whatever else may be read into this phrase, it surely must include the idea that those so gathered seek to honour His Word, and in recognizing this we are on safe ground in the present dispensation. The terms of the present calling are such that believers are entirely dependent upon the Word of truth for both the proof of their salvation and the hope of their calling. "Having heard . . . . . having believed, ye were sealed with that holy Spirit of promise" (Eph. i. 13), but there is no outward evidence upon which to rely for proof of this sealing, as for example there was during the Acts period when "signs . . . . . followed them that believed" (Mark xvi. 17).

It seems logical in the light of these things to suggest that the presence of the Lord (or the Holy Spirit) in an assembly of believers, can only be inferred if the Word of truth, the Scriptures, is opened and read, or at least considered, but certainly honoured. The Holy Spirit's ministry is intimately tied up with the ministry and glorifying of Christ (John xvi. 13, 14). He operates through the Word of Christ, both with respect to convicting the world, and teaching the believer.

> "He will convict the world of sin . . . . ." (John xvi. 8).

This conviction will come as the Word is preached, and the Holy Spirit applies it, as happened on the day of Pentecost:

> "Now when they heard this they were pricked in their heart" (Acts ii. 37).

Others who heard Stephen's exposition of the Word are mentioned by him as "resisting the Holy Spirit" (Acts vii. 51).

There can be no substitute for the Word of truth in seeking to bring men to Christ. Likewise there can be no alternative either for the believer who desires the experience of

Eph. v. 18. The believer today is entirely dependent upon that Word for the proof of his own salvation, the reaching of others and the experience of both the Spirit's filling and the Lord's presence.

> "Let the Word of Christ dwell in you richly in all wisdom" (Col. iii. 16).

Happiness

Whatever mankind may be occupied with, the search for true happiness is largely behind it. The quest often resolves itself into the seeking of wealth, position or popularity, although some find their joy in family and friends, or in some life's work or cause. But wherever the natural man pursues his quest, it is in the things of this life, and for that reason there comes the day when the happiness ceases, either through a change of circumstances, or, in the final analysis, death. True Scriptural happiness, because it speaks of permanence, is different.

Solomon set himself the task of examining all things "under the sun" and his verdict was, "all is vanity and vexation of spirit" (Eccles. i. 12-14); the word "vanity" used many times by him being the Hebrew hebel (transitory, soon to vanish, vapour-like). Each thing is conditioned by a season (it may be "beautiful in its proper season"—iii. 11), so nothing lasts "under the sun". (See also James iv. 14).

Paul observed the whole, groaning creation, "subject to vanity", under "the bondage of corruption" (Rom. viii. 20-23), a fact which had been appreciated to some extent by the first human beings, in naming their second son Abel (Hebel, transitory).

Where then is true happiness? It is found in hope and resurrection. "Happy are they that have not seen (the risen Lord in the flesh, as Thomas did) and yet have believed (that He rose)"—John xx. 29. It is the resurrection of Christ, guaranteeing life for the believer, life which is not "transitory", that gives the hope (and present experience) of true happiness. Because of Him we can rejoice in "the good news of the glory of the happy God", and look forward to the realization of the "happy hope" associated with His glory (I Tim. i. 11; Titus ii. 13; Col. iii. 4).

"If in this life only we have hope (even) in Christ, we are of all men most miserable." If there was no resurrection of Christ, if we can look to nothing beyond the grave, "let us eat and drink (Paul does not add 'be merry'); for tomorrow we die" (I Cor. xv. 19, 32).

"But now is Christ risen from the dead, and become the firstfruits of them that slept" (20). Blessed be God, Who in Christ, has given all His people a sure and certain and lasting (truly happy) hope.

The Air.

Its place in World Politics and Bible Prophecy #1
pp. 114 - 117

A brief survey of a mighty theme.

Such a passage as that of Ezek. xxviii. superficially addressed to the King of Tyre, but which uses terms like "thou art the anointed cherub", "thou sealest up the sum, full of wisdom and perfect in beauty", make it impossible to limit such a passage to the human King of Tyre, and in like manner the language of Isa. xiv. spoken of as a "proverb against the king of Babylon", can hardly be limited to that earthly king:

> "How art thou fallen from heaven, O Lucifer, son of the morning! how art thou cut down to the ground which didst weaken the nations! For thou hast said in thine heart,
> I will ascend unto heaven,
> I will exalt my throne above the stars of God . . . . .
> I will ascend above the heights of the clouds;
> I will be like the Most High" (Isa. xiv. 12-14).

As these words stand they are ominous, but when the air and outer space, projected landings on the moon, or investigating at close range Mars or Venus, are topics in our daily newspapers, together with aerial missiles and the use of the air for defence, offence, and world wide communication, these call for an examination of the Scriptures that have something to say about this important sphere and its relation to the latter days.

There are many prophecies in both the Old Testament and the New, that in earlier times have been scanned by learned and godly men but not apprehended, and have been left to speak when the time foreseen by omniscience should arrive, and prominent among such foreshadowings are the references to the air found in a number of prophetic contexts, but which until quite recently have only attracted a passing attention. In 1921, in the series of articles dealing with the book of the Revelation, we wrote concerning the monster that represents the Antichristian Beast in chapter xiii. at the time of the end:

> "We do not wish to be fanciful, yet we are confident that Scripture fully anticipates the end. Military experts, as well as the man in the street, know that the next war is to be a war in the air . . . . . we know that the introduction of aerial warfare has broken down all frontiers. That nation, large or small, which has dominion of the air, will conquer the world. Satan is called 'The Prince of the authority of the air' (Eph. ii. 2). Satan gives his great authority to the Beast, the result being that all the world at once recognize his position and say 'Who is able to make war with him?'."

We make no foolish claims to the gift or prophecy; we are only pointing out that for over nineteen hundred years, the Scriptures have indicated that the air and its authority will be the arsenal of the future Kingdom of the Beast to which all nations are unwittingly making preparation for their own subjection by the great urge for political, financial, military and church unity, repeating in the large, the urge exhibited in the building of the tower of Babel. We cannot make amends for the failure of our forebears, but we can turn to these cryptic references to the air with a desire to learn what their inspired foreshadowings have to teach us as the last days which assuredly are close upon us.

The air above is now the sphere both of offence and defence, so let us therefore give the Scriptures a hearing.

When the vials of God's wrath are poured out, we read that the fifth angel poured out his vial "upon the seat of the beast, and his kingdom was full of darkness" (Rev. xvi. 10). The Greek word thronos occurs 46 times, and where we read in Rev. ii. 13; xiii. 2 and xvi. 10 of "the seat" of the Beast or of Satan, we should alter that rendering and read "throne" (Gk. thronos), for Satan is a 'Prince' though fallen and wicked. The same word archon (prince) used of Christ is used of "The Prince of the Kings of the earth" (Rev. i. 5) and of Satan (Matt. ix. 34; xii. 24; Mark iii. 22; John xii. 31; xiv. 30; xvi. 11; Eph. ii. 2) and we rob ourselves of valuable though terrible teaching by altering either the word 'throne' or 'prince' out of a false desire to stretch out our hand to stay the ark of God. Michael had no two thoughts as to the rank of this fallen foe, as Jude 9 reveals. We read not only that one of the vials was poured out upon the throne of the Beast, but also upon "the AIR" (Rev. xvi. 17).

Now without the title "the prince of the authority of the air" to guide us, we might wonder why the air we breathe should be thus visited, but knowing this fact, and in the close association with the throne of the Beast in the context (Rev. xvi. 10), we realize that Satan's domain is here seen to come under the judgment of the last days. Perhaps we shall perceive a deeper significance in I Thessalonians when we read concerning the Second Coming that some will "meet the Lord in the AIR" (I Thess. iv. 17). It should also be remembered that ouranos translated 'heaven' over 260 times in the N.T. is nevertheless translated "air" ten times, as in "the fowls and birds of the air".

This is also true of the Hebrew of the O.T. shamayim, translated nearly 400 times "heaven", is nevertheless translated "air" 21 times, as in Gen. i. 26, even as in Matt. xiii. 32. The 'fowls' that devoured the seed in the parable of Matt. xiii. 4 are explained in Matt. xiii. 19 as the agents or the work of the wicked one.

With these passages in mind, and with the present emphasis upon dominion of the air for both offence and defence, let us look a little more closely at other prophetic utterances long neglected and misunderstood. When we read the appalling consequences of the atomic bomb that fell on Hiroshima and then come across the terrible description of the plague spoken of in Zech xiv. 12 (and the reader would be well advised to turn to that passage and consult it once more before proceeding) and we read further of "everyone that is LEFT of the nations, which come up against Jerusalem" in verse 16, one begins to wonder whether we have here a prophetic forecast of the results of nuclear warfare, and also in the hurting of the earth, the sea, and the trees in Rev. vii. 3 which results from the censer filled with fire being cast to the earth (Rev. viii. 5).

Do we now deny that man's nuclear weapons could, and possibly will, burn up a third part of the trees, and all the green grass? Is it merely an extravagant figure of speech to say that a "third part of the ships" were destroyed? or that the "third part of the waters" become bitter as "wormwood"? (Rev. viii. 7, 11). The very diplomats who might possibly repudiate such a book as the Apocalypse, are entertaining the possibility of these very quotations, without realizing that they have been accessible to all in the pages of the N.T. for 1,900 years. The words of Rev. xi. 18:

> "Thy wrath is come . . . . . and shouldest destroy them which destroy the earth", make us ask, will man, with his inventions, bring about his own ruin? We are not prophets, but we have in our hands a sure word of prophecy, and realize that the blessed hope for which we look and wait will be realized before the advent of the Son of Man. More than this we do not intend to say or to anticipate, but there is comfort even in these dread prophecies, in that they make it abundantly clear that God knows the end from the beginning, and can never be taken by surprise, or forget to provide for the safety of His redeemed people, "as it was in the days of Noah" in more senses than one. Human life is utterly impossible apart from the functioning of the "green grass" or leaf. One field of green grass can yield excellent beef or mutton, chicken, eggs, cheese and butter, milk, bone, hides, hair, bristles and glue. Countless other essentials to normal life are all produced by the consumption and use of green grass and herb. If necessary, let the reader use an Encyclopaedia if he is not aware of the meaning of photo-synthesis; he would then the better realize the tragedy behind the statement that "all the green grass" will be burnt up (Rev. viii. 7).

Its place in World Politics and Bible Prophecy #2

We now quote from an article in The Midnight Cry issued in November 1963. One or two extracts form a supplement to the conclusions made in the body of this article, and the testimony of "two or three witnesses" is in line with the requirements of the Scriptures.

Things that Must shortly come to pass by Hubert H. Heath.

> "True science and Bible prophecy, rightly interpreted, always run in parallel lines, and ever have. This is inevitably always the case, for both being true and it being impossible for truth to be contradictory, it is inescapable.
>
> The Word of God tells us that all matter of every sort is composed of atoms, and atoms are composed of nothing more stable and equally invisible, as electrical energy—electrons, neutrons, protons, &c. Scientists vapourized a two thousand acre island in the Pacific not long ago, and apparently reduced it, largely, to its original elements. What has been done can be done again. These actions come with a terrific display of heat and fire. A few years ago a famous Scandinavian geophysicist was visiting Los Angeles and was asked what such heavy explosions might do to the position of the earth in space. His reply was both interesting and instructive. He said that the ice cap on the Arctic was receding rapidly while the ice caps on the Antarctic had an overload.

That being so, he said, no person on earth could foretell what effect such explosions might have on the earth's position in space, nor what would result from it. Try throwing a ball far with a wad of gum stuck to one side of it and watch its erratic course and draw your own conclusions. Now let us turn to the Word as given to the great Hebrew prophet Isaiah, chapter 24:1. 'Behold, the Lord maketh the earth empty, and maketh it waste, and turneth it upside down, and scattereth abroad the inhabitants thereof'. Verse 3 'the land SHALL be utterly emptied, and utterly spoiled; for the Lord hath spoken this word. The earth also is defiled under the inhabitants thereof; because they have transgressed the laws, changed the ordinance, broken the everlasting covenant'. Verse 6 'Therefore hath the curse devoured the earth, and they that dwell therein, are desolate: therefore the inhabitants of the earth ARE BURNED AND FEW MEN LEFT'. Those words certainly point to a climax and give the reason for it. Then again in verses 19 and 20 of the same chapter we read: 'The earth is utterly broken down, the earth is clean dissolved, the earth is moved exceedingly. The earth SHALL reel to and fro like a drunkard, and SHALL be removed like a cottage; and the transgression thereof shall be heavy upon it; and it shall fall, and not rise again'.

These are the sort of things the 'one-worlders' responsible for our undoing are saying that they can accomplish. After making a study of these writings of the great Isaiah, it is well to turn to Matthew twenty-four, and read what the Lord Jesus Christ said of these days. These things are admittedly possible. They have NOT occurred as yet. It is very definitely in the power of very wicked, very powerful men, to bring all this to pass at any moment they see fit. Greed-mad men, lusting for power over others, are the greatest menace of the ages.

These men are responsible for the great moral, spiritual and economic chaos and ruin that now covers all the earth. In their insane greed and lust for power over all others they are the supreme menace of all time. No sane man ever desired to destroy the Christian faith and Christian civilization. But that is what these are now doing in their mad grasp after total power and all wealth. THINK ON THESE THINGS, for they shall shortly come to pass."

We have no desire to emulate the 'fat boy' of Dickens who tried to make peoples' "flesh creep", but it is most certainly unwise to emulate the ostrich, which traditionally hides its head in the sand! All Scripture is profitable, not only John xiv. or Psalm xxiii. We quote experts in the scientific world who make no reference to the Scriptures, the Coming of the Lord, or give any indication that they are even aware of the prophetic utterances of the Bible, yet their testimony concerns all who are alive today. The following quotations, the original of which can be verified in the usual way. They are verbatim so far as we know, and no word has been added or subtracted or toned down.

> "In fifteen years from to-day (Dean Acheson said), this world is going to be too dangerous to live in."

While the U.S.A. may have more atomic weapons than Russia, Dr. Linus Pauling, a leading scientist and professor of chemistry, said:

> "A mere 4,000 such weapons (U.S.A. had 100,000 at the time) could destroy the human race."

The consequences of atomic fall-out, as an aftermath of atomic war is too terrible to contemplate. (See references to Zechariah already mentioned.) It has been found that caribou bones found in the Arctic showed 102 units of radioactive strontium, yet 17 units is about the safe limit for human life, and a biologist who examined these bones said that the safe limits had been exceeded.

"It is clear that for a great area of the earth's surface that time has now come."

Strontium is now served up to us in milk, beef, eggs, as well as in vegetable products. Some have set aside the attitude expressed in the Bible concerning "inventions" considering this antiquated and pointing to the affluent society with its labour-saving devices and its luxuries (II Chron. xxvi. 15; Eccles vii. 29; Psa. cvi. 29, 39; Rom. i. 30). These many inventions make life easier, by camouflaging the curse that was pronounced in Gen. iii., as the descendants of Cain are said to have done in Gen. iv. 21, 22. It was the Lamech, descended from Seth, who refused this smoothing over of the curse, as seen in his attitude in Gen. v. 29, where the only acceptable deliverance was the type of atonement in the Ark built by his son Noah. Can anyone who reads with horror the results of the first atomic explosion over Hiroshima together with Zech. xiv. 12 and the reference to "every one that is left" (Zech. xiv. 16) have any doubt as to this prophecy being a true foreshadowing of nuclear warfare?

Not till all that is implied in the closing words of Zech. xiv. are fulfilled, will true peace be known in the earth, i.e. when there will be "no more Canaanite" in that kingdom of Priests, which in its turn anticipates "The End" or goal as written in I Cor. xv. 24-28.

Our purpose in writing this article is to draw attention to the signs of the times, particularly as they refer to the important place the air is predicted to occupy at the time of the end.

The Background to the New Testament.

No.1. pp. 90 - 96

This series of articles is intended to give some idea of the background against which the record of the New Testament should be considered. It is evident that by reading this record with western eyes, and by viewing the happenings of that day in the light of the present time, much is missed. What must be done is to build up a picture of N.T days which will throw the writings of that period into focus. To do this it will be necessary to consider the various parties and institutions which flourished at the time.

This will include a look at the scribes and Pharisees, the Sadducees and Herodians, the Zealots and Essenes (although they are not actually mentioned by name in the N.T.) and the Samaritans, who stood halfway between the Jews and the Gentiles. With respect to institutions, the Temple with the Sanhedrin, and the synagogue with its court of judgment must be reviewed, and to make the picture complete, consideration must be given to the political situation of the day, the influence of Greek ideas upon the Jews, and of Judaism upon the Gentiles, leading as it did to proselytism.

When considering the Jewish parties, the names which come most readily to mind are of course, the Pharisees and Sadducees. There was a third party, however, mentioned by the Jewish historian Josephus together with these two, but it is apparently not referred to in the N.T. record. This was the Essene party, a monastic sect which has become better known as a result of the finding of the Dead Sea Scrolls.

The Essenes.

> "They were an exclusive, ascetic and isolated community, with whose discouragement of marriage and withdrawal from action the Gospels have no sympathy, and to whom our Lord never alluded, unless it be in those passages where he reprobates those who abstain from anointing themselves when they fast, and who hide their candle under a bushel" (The Life of Christ by Dean Farrar).

The origin of this sect appears between Malachi and Matthew, and like that of the Pharisees and Sadducees, is buried in obscurity. Three well known writers of the first century A.D. make mention of the Essenes, viz., Pliny, Josephus and Philo.

From these it is known that the Essene community was located on the western shore of the Dead Sea, that its members were bound together more closely than the Pharisees and Sadducees, that they renounced riches, and lived on only the simplest fare, that they cultivated the earth, or concerned themselves only with the peaceful arts, and that they, or at least some of them, abstained from marriage.

The information that has come down through the centuries is not always consistent with itself, and is fragmentary in nature, which is not really surprising since the sect must only have been seen by historians from the outside, and also as time went on and other communities of the sect appeared in the towns of Judea, it must be expected that different views would be held.

According to Josephus, although they occupied no one city, yet they settled in large numbers in every town. They seem to have preferred the smaller towns and villages, and did not engage in commerce or navigation. Their occupations included farmers, shepherds, cowherds, beekeepers, etc., and they would have nothing to do with the instruments of war. They were very much a community, and their whole day appears to have been subjected to rigid discipline. Like the early church of Acts they had "all things common", and new members surrendered their property to the order, and in return received all their needs.

It has been this latter point, together with certain aspects of their teaching, which has caused some to identify them with the early Christians. Some suggest that John the Baptist, and even the Lord himself, were members of the sect. The obscure period in the life of the Lord between the ages of twelve and thirty, lends itself to this idea, and the silence of the Scriptures as to what He did during this period, is accounted for by assuming Him to have been within an Essene community.

But any who have really appreciated the teaching of the Lord in the Gospels, will know that it is on a very much higher plane than any of "the commandments and doctrines of men". His words were confessedly not his own, but neither were they derived from any human source, for they were the words of his Father in Heaven (John xvii. 8). The identification of the Lord with the Essene community must be rejected by all who love the Scriptures, and recognize them as the inspired Word of God.

The Scribes and Pharisees.

The scribes and Pharisees are mentioned in association with each other above 20 times in Scripture, and they were both active in opposing the ministry of the Lord. The relationship between the two is not easy to trace, although it appears that the sympathies of the scribes were with the Pharisees, even if it be not true to say that the scribes belonged to the Pharisaic party. There is no evidence that scribes were ever Sadducees, although Matt. xxii. 34, 35 has sometimes been urged for this view.

> "But when the Pharisees had heard that he had put the Sadducees to silence, they were gathered together. Then one of them, which was a lawyer, asked him a question."

The words 'of them' have been referred to the Sadducees, but it surely makes better sense to refer them to the Pharisees who were here taking over the word battle against the Lord, after the silencing of the Sadducees. The 'lawyer', it is true, was almost certainly a scribe, as will be shown later, but it is quite wrong to imagine he was a lawyer in the narrow sense of holding only the Law of Moses to be the Divine rule, thus identifying him with the Sadducees.

The scribes also appear in sympathy with the Pharisees in Acts xxiii. 9:

> "And there arose a great cry, and the scribes that were of the Pharisees' part, arose."

The scribes are frequently referred to as acting alone, or mentioned in association with the chief priests, and they formed part of the Sanhedrin, the supreme court in Israel. (See Acts xxiii. 1-10, where the word "council", verses 1 and 6, is the Greek sunedrion, Sanhedrin.) They must, therefore, be seen as an authoritative body, exercising great influence over the affairs of Israel from a religious standpoint. From this point of view they would appear to be a separate section of the community from the Pharisees, although they may only have been the more learned section of the Pharisaic party.

There being no reference to the Pharisaic party in the O.T., together with their appearance without explanation on the opening pages of the N.T., leads to the obvious conclusion that they originated in the Malachi-Matthew period, during which God gave no inspired record. There is therefore a certain amount of obscurity about their origin.

The word Pharisee, Pharisaios, is evidently related to aphorizo, 'separate', which is twice used by the Apostle Paul of himself:

> "Paul, a servant of Jesus Christ, called . . . . . separated unto the Gospel of God."
> "God, who separated me from my mother's womb, and called me" (Rom. i. 1; Gal. i. 15).

The connection between these words is even more significant when it is remembered that the Apostle was "as touching the law, a Pharisee" (Phil. iii. 5). He was a separated one, both before and after his conversion on the Damascus road.

The history of the People of Israel was likewise one of separation:

> "I am the Lord your God, which have separated you from other people. And ye shall be holy unto me: for I the Lord am holy, and have severed you from other people, that ye should be mine" (Lev. xx. 24, 26).

Israel were given special laws by the Lord, laws which governed their everyday lives, and extended even to what they could or could not eat. They were God's inheritance, and as such, were to be separate from other peoples. They were being prepared to fulfil their place in God's purpose for the earth, to be a channel through which the knowledge of the Lord might reach the ends of the world. Hence they were to be holy, separate, sanctified, meet for his use.

But they failed. Consistent failure brought God's judgment upon them, until finally, they went into the captivity of Babylon, and the separation which had been enjoined upon them, became impossible in many respects. After the captivity, many of Israel returned to their land, but it was a land which, from now on, was to be dominated by Gentile Powers. It passed in succession from Babylon to Medo-Persia, to Greece, until, at the time of the Lord's coming, it was dominated by Rome. No people can be so ruled without losing some of their individuality, and Israel were no exception. Greek thought and culture were a powerful influence which many could not resist, and a Hellenizing spirit began to prevail. The idea of Israel as a separate nation, with separate laws, began to wane.

The origin of the Pharisaic party must, in all probability, be assigned to this time, arising as a reaction to the spirit of Grecianism, and seeking to defend the national position of Israel. Hence the Pharisees were the "separate ones", separated from the rationalism of the day, and defending zealously the law and heritage of Israel. The Imperial Bible Dictionary is much to the point:

> "There were two lines of important influence at work, the one tending to narrow the spirit of Judaism, the other to rationalize it. This latter influence again could only have the effect of intensifying the former, and lead all who would remain faithful to Israel's inheritance from the past and hope of the future, to a still sterner adherence to the law. It was at this time then, that the party of the Pharisees began, in all probability, to be formed."

The rationalizing spirit against which Pharisaism revolted, was personified during the Lord's earthly ministry, in the Sadducees and Herodians, the priestly ruling class who had the chief share in the crucifixion.

The basic ideals of Pharisaism may be considered to have been good at the outset, defending the position of Israel from the intrusion of foreign ideas but the means resorted to actually undermined what they sought to defend. The Law was hedged about with oral traditions intended to protect it and interpret it for daily life, but these traditions had become, at the time of the Lord's earthly ministry, as important as the Law itself. In fact in some cases, the traditions transgressed the Law, or made it of no effect.

> "Why do ye also transgress the commandment of God by your tradition? . . . . . ye made the commandment of God of none effect by your tradition" (Matt. xv. 3, 6).

The Lord went on to show that Pharisaism (in practice) was condemned by Isaiah during his days, and it seems that it had very nearly always existed in germ throughout the long period of Israel's history. There can always be found those who worship either the letter of the Law to the exclusion of the spirit, or add their own traditions which ostensibly protect the Law, but in practice supersede it. Such was true of the days of Isaiah and of the Lord.

> "Ye hypocrites, well did Esaias prophesy of you, saying, This people draweth nigh unto Me with their mouth, and honoureth Me with their lips; but their heart is far from Me. But in vain they do worship Me, teaching for doctrines the commandments of men" (Matt. xv. 7-9).

The origin of the Pharisaic party cannot be pinned down accurately to any date, but the spirit which has come to be recognized as associated with Pharisaism may be traced far back into the history of Israel. Whilst the voices of the prophets continued to be raised against the empty religion which this spirit produced, no party was formed which could be termed "The Pharisees", but when the last of the O.T. prophets had ceased his words to Israel, Pharisaism with its narrow Judaistic leanings, and reacting against the intrusion of Grecianism, formed itself into a solid body and became the most important religious force in Israel. How they subsequently developed is now to be considered.

The Pharisees at the time of Christ.

During the Lord's earthly ministry the Pharisees exercised great power and influence over the mass of common people, and this in spite of the wealth, rank and connections of their bitter opponents, the Sadducees. In all religious matters the people sided with the Pharisees, so much so that even the Sadducees themselves had to give way against their real views. The Sadducees exercised worldly influence, but the Pharisees dominated the religious scene. The Lord Himself recognized their position:

> "Then spake Jesus, saying, The scribes and the Pharisees sit in Moses' seat: all therefore whatsoever they bid you observe, that observe and do; but do not ye after their works: for they say, and do not" (Matt. xxiii. 1-3).

The scribes and Pharisees sat in the position of authority, Moses' seat. They were the religious leaders of the people, the shepherd of Israel; unfortunately, many of them fitted only too well the words of the Lord, "blind leaders of the blind" (Matt. xv. 14), "an hireling . . . . . who careth not for the sheep" (John x. 12, 13).

It seems strange then, that the Lord should encourage the multitude to "observed and do" that which these Pharisees bade them, especially in the light of what he had already taught his disciples:

> "Take heed and beware of the leaven of the Pharisees . . . . . the doctrine of the Pharisees" (Matt. xvi. 6-12).

The solution to the problem is found by recognizing, with The Companion Bible, that the words "observe and do" are in the indicative mood, not the imperative as translated in the A.V. (There is no way of determining whether the mood is indicative or imperative here, except by observing the context.) So that although the Lord recognized that the Pharisees sat in the place of authority, and that the multitude observed and did that which they taught, he did not himself bid them so to do. A revised translation would be:

> "The scribes and the Pharisees sit in Moses' seat: all therefore whatsoever they bid you observe, that ye observe and do; but do not ye after their works: for they say, and do not" (Matt. xxiii. 1-3).

It must no be imagined, however, that all of the teaching of Pharisaism or all of their practice was to be condemned. Error is a more effective leaven when mixed with an element of truth. Nor indeed must it be thought that all Pharisees were evil men. It is reasonable to suppose that there were some, apart from those mentioned in the N.T., who were good men, sincere in their convictions and seeking to serve God honestly according to their light.

But Pharisaism as a system was to be condemned. It was occupied with things infinitely small, whilst the weightier matters of the Law were neglected (Matt. xxiii. 23). Its adherents gave alms liberally, but with great ostentation (Matt. vi. 2), and their fasting and long prayers were made to the same end (Matt. vi. 5, 16; xxiii. 14). Both the Pharisees and the Sadducees were denounced by John the Baptist (Matt. iii. 7), and the Lord (Matt. xvi. 1-4), and a whole chapter (Matt. xxiii.) is devoted to an exposure and denouncement of the position of the scribes and Pharisees, who were largely responsible for the reception afforded the Lord at his first coming. The party, which by its teaching and influence over the people could have prepared them for the advent of their Messiah, when He did come, opposed and rejected all that He stood for until they had filled up the measure of their fathers, who had persecuted and slain the prophets of old (Matt. ii. 29-36). Such was the development of this party.

Before giving consideration to the scribes, it may be helpful to observe the basic differences between the Pharisees and Sadducees. The following table does not pretend to be exact, but to give some idea of the parties as they stood in relation to each other and the people.

Pharisees.	Sadducees.
Religious.	Political.
Ritualistic.	Rationalistic.
Rabbinic.	Priestly.
Synagogue.	Temple.
Associated with the common people, whom they influenced.	Associated with the nobility, whom they were drawn.
Religious influence.	Worldly influence.

In addition to the above it may be noted that the Pharisees and Essenes were largely positive sects (the Pharisees essentially practical, the Essenes tending to mysticism), whilst the Sadducees' position was mainly based upon denials (no resurrection, no angels) and was thus inclined to be negative. These differences will be qualified and explained more fully in subsequent articles, when the position during the early part of the first century should become clearer.

No.2. The Scribes.
pp. 110 - 114

The earliest occurrence in the A.V. of the word "scribe" is II Sam. viii. 17, although the Hebrew saphar as a participle noun occurs before this in Judges v. 14, translated "the writer". According to The Companion Bible, this word, which as a verb means "to count" or "to number", gives us the word Sopherim. The Sopherim were the scribes of Ezra's day, his successors in fact, for Ezra is described as:

> "A ready scribe (saphar) in the law of Moses, which the Lord God of Israel had given . . . . . a scribe of the words of the commandments of the Lord, and of his statutes to Israel . . . . . a scribe of the law of the God of heaven" (Ezra vii. 6, 11, 12).

Closely related to saphar "to count", is the Hebrew sepher "book" or "letter". Dean Farrar states that this latter word gives the word Sopherim, "scribes", and that the name means "scripturalists", those who explained and copied the Law. Whichever be the correct derivation, the scribes appear to date as a distinct body from the period of Ezra, a time of restoration and reformation when the text of the Hebrew Bible began to be set in order. (See Companion Bible Appendix 30.)

The revision of the text having been completed, a work which lasted over a hundred years, the Sopherim, scribes proper, ceased to exist as such and were succeeded by the "teachers of the Law", nomikoi and nomodidaskaloi, the scribes of the New Testament.

"Scribe", grammateus, derives from the Greek gramma, "letter", and the duties of a New Testament scribe included the reading, copying, explaining and protecting of the Law. They performed their functions in schools, synagogues, the outer courts of the Temple (Luke ii. 46), and even in the streets.

Their method of teaching was in sharp contrast to that of the Lord Himself (Matt. vii. 28, 29):

> "And it came to pass, when Jesus had ended these sayings, the people were astonished at his doctrine: For He taught them as one having authority, and not as the scribes."

Dean Farrar writes:

> "Secondhandness, the slavish dependence on precedent and authority, is the most remarkable characteristic of Rabbinical teaching. It very rarely rises above the level of a commentary, at once timid and fantastic."

Rabbi Eliezer actually made it his boast that he had originated nothing. The style of the scribes was, "Rabbi A says on the authority of Rabbi B", whereas the manner of Christ's teaching was, "I say unto you"; no wonder the common people were astonished at his doctrine.

The scribes prided themselves on their accuracy to the letter of the Law (Acts xxii. 3, J. N. Darby translation):

> "I am a Jew, born in Tarsus of Cilicia, but brought up in this city at the feet of Gamaliel, educated according to the exactness of the law of our fathers."

Unfortunately, in their slavishness to the letter of the Law, they missed the spirit. (See Rom. ii. 17-29).

The scribes and the Pharisees loved to be called "Rabbi", but the Lord bade His disciples not to accept the title (Matt. xxiii. 1-8). Both John the Baptist and the Lord Himself were addressed with the title "Rabbi", and it was as Rabbis that they taught prayers to their disciples (Luke xi. 1). The Lord is never actually called a scribe in the N.T., yet it was testified of him, "How knoweth this man letters, having never learned", and, "Never man spake like this man". Christ was undoubtedly the greatest Rabbi that ever lived.

It must not be imagined, however, that Rabbinic teaching was wholly devoid of moral significance and wisdom. There is the example of Gamaliel in Acts v. 33-40, a man much honoured by the people, whose wise counsel saved the necks of the Apostles. He is called in verse 34, "a doctor of the law", and was undoubtedly a scribe. His action must not, however, be misinterpreted as though he himself was sympathetic with the Apostles' cause, for it was not so very much later that one of his pupils, Saul of Tarsus, came out from under his teaching, "breathing out threatenings and slaughter against the disciples of the Lord" (Acts ix. 1).

It has so far been assumed that the scribes were identical with the lawyers and doctors, or teachers of the Law mentioned in the N.T. This assumption must now be qualified. The German theologian, H. A. Meyer, says:

> "The term nomikos, 'lawyer', is more specific and more strictly Greek. Grammateus, 'scribe', on the other hand, is more general and more Hebrew in its character."

This would appear to be in accord with Scripture. A scribe was sometimes designated from his most important function, that of teaching the Law. The word "scribe" is therefore an inclusive word, embracing lawyers, doctors and teacher of the Law. In confirmation of this, compare Luke v. 17 with Luke v. 21, and compare the whole context with Matt. ix. 2-8.

Throughout the whole life of the Saviour, the scribes watched Him like hawks, ready to pounce on any action of His contrary to their teaching. They accused the Lord's disciples of transgressing the tradition of the elders (Matt. xv. 2). They judged that when He cast out demons He did it by Beelzebub, the prince of the demons (Mark iii. 22). When the Lord said to the sick of the palsy, "Son, thy sins be forgiven thee", they charged Him in their hearts with blasphemy (Mark ii. 1-12). Together with the Pharisees, they brought to Him a woman taken in adultery, "tempting Him, that they might have to accuse Him" (John viii. 3, 6). In council with the chief priests "they sought how they might destroy Him; for they feared Him, because all the people was astonished at His doctrine" (Mark xi. 18), and when He stood before Herod, they joined with those that accused Him (Luke xxiii. 10).

Their familiarity with the Old Testament should have caused them to realize that this Jesus was He that was to come, the Messiah, the Hope of Israel. But religion, as is often the case, blinded their eyes to the truth. They strained out gnats and swallowed camels (Matt. xxiii. 24). For all their outward sanctity, within they were full of hypocrisy and iniquity (Matt. xxiii. 27, 28). (The whole of Matt. xxiii. should be read for a complete picture of these religious leaders, "blind leaders of the blind".)

"Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites!"

The Sadducees.

A table has already been presented showing the basic differences between this party and the Pharisees. Whereas the Pharisees were religious, the Sadducees were more political. The Pharisees were ritualistic; the Sadducees rationalistic. The Pharisees were associated with the common people and exerted a religious influence over them, whereas the Sadducees, on the other hand, were associated with the nobility, and their influence was of a worldly nature. The sphere of activity of the Pharisees was the synagogue, that of the Sadducees, the Temple.

The origin of the Sadducean party, like that of the Essenes and Pharisees, cannot be traced with accuracy, but it is likely that they arose at the same time, and in opposition to, the Pharisaic party. As the Pharisees tended to narrow the spirit of Judaism, so the Sadducees were inclined to rationalize it. When a spirit of Grecianism began to prevail in Israel, the Sadducean party was inclined to accept it, and to compromise the economy of Israel in order to be at peace with the ruling power. This explains why most of them were drawn from the nobility, and why, at the time of the Lord, some of them were associated with the family of Herod. Indeed, it would appear that the Herodians were a branch of the Sadducees. (Cp. Matt. xvi. 6, Mark viii. 15.).

The name "Sadducee", according to Rabbinical tradition, derives from one Zadoc, thought to be the founder of this party, and who lived about the middle of the third century B.C. Another view is that the name "Sadducee" is derived from the Hebrew tsadeq, "righteous", but very little weight can be attached to either of these views.

It is a matter of some doubt as to whether or not they accepted the whole of the O.T., or just the Law of Moses. Matt. xxii. 23-33 has sometimes been urged in favour of the latter view, for the Lord there demonstrates the truth of the resurrection, which the Sadducees denied, from the Law proper, quoting from Exodus, rather than from passages in other parts of the O.T. which bear more clearly upon the point; for example, Dan. xii. 2. The inference drawn from this is that the Lord recognized that the Sadducees acknowledged only the Pentateuch, so that Exodus would be accepted and Daniel rejected. But it should be noted before accepting this as proof, that the Sadducees had themselves referred to the authority of Moses in verse 24, and it was fitting that they should be reproved from the same action of the O.T. which they themselves had quoted. It should be remembered also in connection with this, that the orthodox Israelite, in any case, exalted the Law above the other Scriptures, and so the Lord's reference would carry more weight with them.

An argument in favour of the Sadducees' acceptance of the whole of the O.T., is that it would appear to be unlikely that they would have been admitted to the Sanhedrin unless this was so. True, they opposed the oral traditions of the Pharisees, but not the Written Word itself.

As a party which took this position, and appear to have defended the Law against such intrusions, they could have provided a useful balancing factor in Israel, but their motives either were, or became political, to the compromise of the truth whenever necessary. They gained in wealth, rank, connections and authority, and became the party of the nobility, and as corrupted as the Pharisees themselves. Together with the Pharisees they were condemned by John the Baptist (Matt. iii. 7), and the Lord Himself (Matt. xvi. 1), and the Disciples were warned against their doctrine (Matt. xvi. 6).

Their rationalized teaching can be felt from such a passage as Acts xxiii. 8:

> "For the Sadducees say that there is no resurrection, neither angel, nor spirit: but the Pharisees confess both."

The rationalist of today does not accept such things, which are reckoned to be beyond the sphere of human experience.

Josephus, the Jewish historian, says of the Sadducees that "they take away fate entirely, and suppose that God is not concerned in our doing". He further testifies as to the conduct of this party that "the behaviour of the Sadducees one towards another is in some degree wild, and their conversation with those that are of their own party is as barbarous as if they were strangers to them" (Wars of the Jews, Book 2, chapter 8). It should be remembered before accepting this too readily, that Josephus himself was a Pharisee.

It is interesting to note in line with the Sadducean denial of the resurrection, that whereas the Pharisees were more active during the Lord's ministry, the Sadducees became so after the resurrection of the Lord.

> "And as they spake unto the people, the priests, and the captain of the temple, and the Sadducees, came upon them, being grieved that they taught the people, and preached through Jesus the resurrection from the dead" (Acts iv. 1, 2).

In Acts v. 17, they were filled with indignation at the popularity of the Apostles, and again laid hands on them, putting them into the prison.

During the lifetime of Christ, they could probably afford to ignore what they considered to be the religious views of a zealot. But after His triumphal entry into Jerusalem when the multitudes cried, "Blessed is He that cometh in the name of the Lord", and His action in the Temple when He cast out all them that sold and bought, and overthrew the tables of the money changers, saying, "My house shall be called the House of Prayer, but ye have made it a den of thieves", the Sadducees would be forced to recognize the political implications of these things, and in particular the claim already being made that here was the King of the Jews (Matt. xxi. 1-15).

The Sadducees appear to have had the chief share in the crucifixion, as Dean Farrar notes:

> "It is most remarkable and, so far as I know, has scarcely ever been noticed that, although the Pharisees undoubtedly were actuated by a burning hatred against Jesus, and were even so eager for His death as to be willing to co-operate with the aristocratic and priestly Sadducees, from whom they were ordinarily separated by every kind of difference, political, social and religious, yet, from the moment that the plot for His arrest and condemnation had been matured, the Pharisees took so little part in it that their name is not once prominently mentioned in any event connected with the arrest, the trial, the derisions and the crucifixion. The only exception to this is John 18:3. The Pharisees as such disappear; the chief priests and elders take their place" (The Life of Christ).

It was only natural then, that when it was claimed of this One Whom they had put to death, that He was risen from the dead, and when the Apostles had filled Jerusalem with their doctrine (Acts v. 28), the Sadducees should again be the chief antagonists.

After the destruction of Jerusalem, the Sadducees as such seem to have disappeared, but the Pharisees long remained to influence the teachings of the early Christian.

No.3. The Herodians.
pp. 127 - 131

The Gospel writers have very little to say about this party. In fact, there are only three references in the N.T. to the word "Herodian" (Matt. xxii. 16; Mark iii. 6; xii. 13). It is quite evident from their name that they were either attached to, or the champions of, the family of Herod. In either case, they would be concerned with promoting the interests of Herod, and be disturbed by the suggestion that this "Jesus of Nazareth" was none other than the King of the Jews. Hence, their opposition to the Lord was largely on political grounds.

In the first reference to them in Matt. xxii., they are seen acting together with the Pharisees, in order that they might entangle the Lord in His talk (verse 15). After a flattering overture, calculated to ensnare the Lord by putting Him off His guard, the question is asked, "What thinkest thou? Is it lawful to give tribute unto Caesar, or not?" (verse 17).

Had the Lord been but an ordinary man, He would now have found Himself on the horns of a dilemma. Before Him stood the representatives of two parties; the Pharisees, who, being champions of the religion of Israel, did not take kindly to paying tribute to Caesar, and the Herodians, who would take the contrary view. If the Lord had said that tribute was not to be given to Caesar, then He would be in trouble with the authorities, and the Herodians stood before Him as witnesses. If on the other hand, He had maintain that tribute was to be given to Caesar, then the Pharisees could claim that this One was not the people's Messiah, for He bade them submit to the ruling power. The answer of the Lord was a masterpiece:

> "And He saith unto them, Whose is this image and superscription? They say unto Him, Caesar's. Then saith He unto them, Render therefore unto Caesar the things which are Caesar's; and unto God the things that are God's" (verses 20, 21).

In the second reference (Mark iii. 6), the Pharisees again take counsel with the Herodians, this time to consider "how they might destroy Him". This action is particularly significant in the light of John xviii. 31:

> "Then said Pilate unto them, Take ye Him, and judge Him according to your law. The Jews therefore said unto him, It is not lawful for us to put any man to death."

It would appear that at the time of the earthly ministry of Christ, the Jews were unable to exact death penalty, except through the medium of the Roman power. Hence the Pharisees in Mark iii. seek the favour of the Herodian party who, having strong connections with the throne, would be in a position to bring about the death of the Lord Jesus Christ.

These references serve to show that the Herodians, although perhaps a small party, were powerful indeed, and their attachment to the throne of Herod made them useful allies to the Pharisees, although they were normally separated the one from the other by the beliefs which they held. It is important to note how the Devil can draw opposing factions together when it suits his purpose.

It has already been suggested that the Herodians were a branch of the Sadducees. This seems probable from comparing two passages of Scripture together.

> "Then Jesus said unto them, Take heed and beware of the leaven of the Pharisees and of the Sadducees" (Matt. xvi. 6).
>
> "And He charged them saying, Take heed, beware of the leaven of the Pharisees, and of the leaven of Herod" (mark viii. 15).

The contexts appear to be identical, but in one case speak of the leaven of the Sadducees, in another, that of Herod. Was the leaven of Herod spread through that part of the Sadducean party known as the Herodians?

Another passage which may bear upon this subject is Luke xxiii. 1-7. The scene is the trial of the Lord before Pilate, who proclaims, "I find no fault in this man" (verse 4). But this does not satisfy the chief priests and the people, and they become more insistent, saying, "He stirreth up the people, teaching throughout all Jewry, beginning from Galilee to this place" (verse 5). Galilee!—Was the mention of it accidental, or in the heat of the moment, or was there some cunning in drawing attention at this time to the fact that Christ was a Galilean? Note the effect upon Pilate, although he had already pronounced the Lord innocent.

> "And as soon as he knew that He belonged unto Herod's jurisdiction, he sent Him to Herod, who himself also was at Jerusalem at that time" (verse 7).

If Herod could be convinced that here was one who represented a challenge to his position as Tetrarch of Galilee, then the chief priests would have won the day. But Herod took this challenge lightly, and having mockingly dressed Him as a king, sent Him back again to Pilate (verse 11). This incident, however, served to draw Pilate and Herod together as friends, for they had previously been enemies, apparently over some dispute about jurisdiction.

The desire of the Herodians to strengthen the family of Herod by keeping it on good terms with Roman imperialism, was a fact made use of on more than one occasion by the Pharisees, who sought the downfall of the Lord. That the Pharisees had any dealings at all with men whom they must have considered despicable, is a measure of the hatred which they had toward the Lord.

The Zealots.

This party is not referred to anywhere in the N.T. as such, but one of the Twelve Apostles is called Simon the Zealot (Luke vi. 15; Acts i. 13). This same Apostle is also called Simon the Canaanite in Matt. x. 4, although it is more strictly correct to refer to him as "the Cananaean". This latter word appears to derive from the Hebrew qana, "to be hot, or zealous". Whether Simon was so called because of his temperament, or from his association with the party of the Zealots does not appear from Scripture.

The Zealots have been identified with that party described by Josephus the historian as "the fourth sect of Jewish philosophy", the founder of which was Judas the Galilean. This man led a revolt against Rome in 6A.D. (Acts v. 37), and his party sought to be free from the Roman yoke, even if this freedom was to be obtained by dubious means. The Zealots seem to have been more than ready to lay down their lives for this cause. Josephus says:

> "They also do not value dying any kinds of death, nor indeed do they heed the deaths of their relations and friends, nor can any such fear make them call any man Lord" (Antiquities of the Jews, Book 18 chap. 1).

H. A. Meyer, the German theologian, refers to them as, "a class of men who, like Phinehas (Numb. 25:9), were fanatical defenders of the theocracy; and who, while taking vengeance on those who wronged it, were themselves frequently guilty of great excesses". It says much for them, however, that although they suffered a crushing defeat in 6A.D., yet they kept the spirit of the party alive for many years.

The possible connection of Simon the Apostle with this party is a point of interest in this regard, that the Lord is "no respecter of persons". Amongst His followers He numbered one Matthew, a tax collector, a friend of the alien, and unpatriotic to Israel. On the other hand, Simon, as a Zealot, would be a tax hater, anti-Rome, and a fanatical patriot, quite the opposite of his fellow disciple, Matthew, and yet made one in Christ.

Had the Lord not trod His earthly path with extreme care, He might well have been identified with this nationalistic party called the Zealots. If it could have been proved that He had declared Himself on the side of, or even encouraged this party, He would have quickly perished like Judas of Galilee. A wrong answer to the question, "Is it lawful to give tribute unto Caesar, or not?" (Matt. xxii. 17), might well have identified Him with the Zealots, and hence caused His downfall. Despite His clear answer on this occasion, the subsequent charge brought against Him at His trial, and voiced by the multitude was:

> "We found this fellow perverting the nation, and forbidding to give tribute to Caesar, saying that He Himself is Christ a king" (Luke xxiii. 2).

The Lord might well have commanded a great following from this party had His words not been so carefully chosen. The people were looking for a national deliverer, the Messiah, who would free them from the Roman yoke and restore again the Theocracy in Israel. This desire may be felt from such a passage as John vi. 15:

> "When Jesus therefore perceived that they would come and take Him by force, to make Him a king, He departed again into a mountain Himself alone."

The Lord's awareness of what was in man saved Him on this occasion from being identified as another Judas. He knew that it was His right to sit on the Throne of David, but was also aware that there is "a time to every purpose under the heaven" (Eccle. iii. 1).

It is interesting to compare the Zealots of old with the modern Zionist movement. The aims and objects of the latter are, it is true, stated in more refined terms, but the basic desire remains the same. The Zealots of old sought their ends from inside the Land (by force it is true), whereas the Zionist movement has prosecuted its cause from outside the Land. The manifesto declared by the London Zionist League in the year 1905 has the following words:

> "The fundamental postulate of Zionism is that it is both inevitable and desirable that Jews should continue to maintain their separate identity. In races as in individuals there is an instinct of self preservation. Zionism seeks to justify this instinct which is ever active in the Jewish people by insisting that, if the Jew must survive, there must be something to be gained by his surviving. He must have a mission . . . . . The Zionist sees clearly that it is nothing less than a mockery to speak of the Jews as capable of fulfilling any mission whatever in their present state. For a Jewish mission one must have a Jewish people, united by a common Jewish consciousness and common Jewish ideals, not a collection of atoms maintaining a meaningless pretence at separateness when everything in their minds and lives which has any value depends wholly on their non-Jewish surroundings. One wants, in a word, a Jewish nation; and a Jewish nation is only possible in a land with the claims and historic associations of Palestine. The winning of Palestine is therefore essential as a means to the great end of enabling the Jews to play a part worthy of them in the world's history."

Since the above words were penned great things have taken place in the land of Israel. On May 14, 1948, the state of Israel was proclaimed in part of the former British Mandate Territory of Palestine. They are now a Middle Eastern power to be reckoned with. But has not this movement and success been of the flesh? And in this respect, is not modern Zionism like the zealous nationalism of old, seeking to bring about the purposes of God apart from His intervention? It would seem so.

But let none fail to see that these are signs of the times. The child of the flesh must come before the child of the promise; Ishmael precedes Isaac, Esau comes before Jacob.

The Lord during His earthly ministry would not ally Himself with, nor encourage the cause of the party of the Zealots. There was a fullness of time coming when He Himself would take over the reigns of government. That time is again drawing near.

No.4. Proselytes.
pp. 152 - 155

From the very earliest times provision had been made for "thy stranger within thy gates" (Exod. xx. 10). The Imperial Dictionary says:

> "The peculiar vocation of Israel, a the chosen nation set apart to the Lord by the covenant seal of circumcision, established a clear line of demarcation between the Israelites and the surrounding nations; but it did not prevent the presence or preclude the toleration of strangers among them. The various occasions which brought them into peaceful or hostile contact with their neighbours belonging to other races necessarily led to the more or less temporary sojourn, whether voluntary or compulsory, of foreigners in Israel; and accordingly we find their existence recognized and their position defined by various precepts, positive and negative, from the time of the exodus and the establishment of a distinctive Jewish polity."

The word 'proselyte' is not to be found in the A.V. of the O.T., but the Greek proselutos occurs frequently in the Septuagint. The equivalent Hebrew word is ger, generally rendered 'stranger' in the A.V. The first occurrence of this Hebrew word is Gen. xv. 13:

> "And he said unto Abram, know of a surety that thy seed shall be a stranger in a land that is not theirs, and shall serve them; and they shall afflict them four hundred years."

This experience of the People of Israel is referred to by the Lord when He commands:

> "Thou shalt neither vex a stranger, nor oppress him: for ye were strangers in the land of Egypt" (Exod. xxii. 21).

These strangers within the commonwealth of Israel, were together with the Israelites themselves, forbidden to eat unleavened bread during Passover (Exod. xii. 19), to work on the Sabbath (Exod. xx. 10), to eat blood (Lev. xvii. 10), to practice idolatry (Lev. xx. 2), to blaspheme the name of the Lord (Le. xxiv. 16), etc. Their lives were therefore very closely bound up with the People of Israel.

There were however, strangers and strangers, even as there were degrees of proselytes. Accordingly, when the ordinance of the Passover was appointed, it was stated, "This is the ordinance of the Passover; there shall no stranger eat thereof" (Exod. xii. 43). Yet in verse 48 of the same chapter is written, "When a stranger shall sojourn with thee, and will keep the Passover to the Lord, let all his males be circumcised, and then let him come near and keep it". It should be observed that the Hebrew words resident in these two verses are different; verse 43 referring literally to "a son of strangeness", ben-nekar and verse 48 to "a sojourner", ger. The usage of the latter word in this respect seems to indicate the willingness of the stranger to be identified with the People of Israel, to make their home his home. Such a desire is reminiscent of Ruth the Moabitess, who said to Naomi:

> "For whither thou goest, I will go; and where thou lodgest, I will lodge: thy people shall be my people, and thy God my God" (Ruth i. 16).

Not all strangers however, would hold such strong feelings toward Judaism as this, and it must be understood that when the word "proselyte" is used in this article, it is used of all who were attracted in various degrees of intensity towards Judaism. Later, a twofold division of proselytes became apparent; those who by circumcision had obtained access to the privileges of Temple worship, and those who only professed a respect for the Mosaic religion, and attended as hearers in the synagogues (see The Life and Epistles of St. Paul by Conybeare and Howson). The proselytes referred to in Acts (ii. 10; vi. 5; xiii. 43) were probably the former of these two classes, since other terms seem to be used by Luke to describe the latter (e.g. 'devout').

That Gentiles became proselytes during both Old and New Testament days is probably attributable to their recognition of the superiority of the religion of Israel. When, through the dispersion, Jewish communities sprang up in all parts of the then known world, Gentiles, unsatisfied with the heathenism around them, attached themselves to these communities.

Those described during Acts as "fearing God" (x. 2), "worshipping God" (xvi. 14), "devout" (xiii. 50; xvii. 4), were probably some of these. Many of them appear to have been women. Dean Farrar, writing of New Testament days, says:

> "Greek proselytes were at this period common in every considerable city of the empire" (The Life and Work of St. Paul).

Although many Gentiles joined themselves to Judaism of their own volition, it must be remembered that the Pharisees had a certain zeal for proselytism:

> "Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! For ye compass sea and land to make one proselyte, and when he is made, ye make him twofold more the child of hell than yourselves" (Matt. xxiii. 15).

Believing that the end justified the means, the Pharisees had few scruples in the means they employed to make a proselyte. Consequently, although conforming in some degree to Judaism, many proselytes still held heathen ideas, and so were hypocritical and reprobate. Hence the Lord's words, "twofold more the child of hell". The name 'proselyte' thus came into disrepute, and Rabbinical writers had the strongest contempt for them. They called them "the leprosy of Israel", and said "that they are not to be trusted to the twenty-fourth generation". But those who appear in the Acts of the Apostles were evidently not of this character, for many of them embraced the faith and showed that their works were not evil (John iii. 20, 21). Josephus, writing of the Jews in Syrian Antioch, says:

> "They also made proselytes of a great many of the Greek perpetually, and thereby, after a sort, brought them to be a portion of their own body" (The War of the Jews, Book VII, chapter 3).

This quotation is particularly interesting when it be remembered what a large place Antioch had in the exercise of the Christian ministry.

Proselytes were present on the day of Pentecost (Acts ii. 10), and it is reasonable to suppose that they were also present in every synagogue into which the Apostles went. As the Acts period wore on, it is probable that they furnished a majority of the new converts.

The reference already made to the many women proselytes of the time is interesting in the light of certain passages in the Acts.

> "But the Jews stirred up the devout and honourable women, and the chief men of the city, and raised persecution against Paul and Barnabas, and expelled them out of their coasts" (xiii. 50).

It is known that the Pharisees exercised a great influenced over women. By their pious professions they were able to "devour widows' houses" (Matt. xxiii. 14), and exert pressure on female proselytes to stir up their husbands against the Apostles. II Tim. iii. 16 may also have some bearing upon this practice:

> "For of this sort are they which creep into houses, and lead captive silly women laden with sins, led away with divers lusts."

When seen against such a background, the words of the Apostle Paul concerning women take on a new light.

The zeal of the Pharisees to proselytize was still present in those of the party which believed. When the Gentiles were added to the church, "certain of the sect of the Pharisees which believed" (Acts xv. 5) misunderstood the position. They viewed the coming in of the Gentiles as a making of proselytes, and this caused trouble, especially in Antioch and the South Galatian churches. Such misunderstanding called forth the council of Acts xv. and the Galatian epistle. The demand of these Pharisaic believers with respect to the Gentile converts, "that it was needful to circumcise them, and to command them to keep the Law of Moses" (Acts xv. 5) was negated by the Apostles, and no greater burden than four necessary things imposed upon them (Acts xv. 28, 29). Gal. ii. however, demonstrates how close the Christian world once came to giving way to this Pharisaic tendency to proselytize, when even Peter and Barnabas were carried away, compelling the Gentiles, by their own actions, to Judaize (verses 11-14). How much is owed to the Apostle Paul from a human standpoint cannot be estimated, for he appears to have been the only one at this time who stood against this intrusion of rights. He opposed the circumcision of Titus, a Greek (verse 3), and withstood Peter to the face (verse 11). This latter action on the part of the Apostle evidently influenced Peter greatly, for when the council of Acts xv. was later held, he is found saying:

> "Now therefore why tempt ye God, to put a yoke upon the neck of the disciples, which neither our fathers or we were able to bear? But we believe that through the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ we shall be saved, even as they" (Acts xv. 10, 11).

(The evidence demonstrating that the letter to the Galatians was written before Acts xv., is presented in The Apostle of the Reconciliation by C. H. Welch, pages 84-86).

Although the position of the Gentile was clearly defined at this time, and despite the later revelation given to the Apostle Paul (Eph. iii.) so evidently completely divorced from Judaism, yet has this Pharisaic tendency remained in all ages of the professing church. There have always been those who have sought to add to "the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ" (Acts xv. 11) the "command . . . . . to keep the Law of Moses" (Acts xv. 5). Both Catholics and Protestants have alike been guilty of this practice, apparently being unaware that it is written of "you Gentiles":

> "Now therefore ye are no more strangers and foreigners, but fellow-citizens of the holiest of all, and of the household of God" (Eph. ii. 19).

The proselytes of old were limited in their approach to the Lord by type and shadow. At best, they basked in the reflected glory of Israel. The present Gentile members of the Body of Christ have, in contrast to these, been made "meet to be partakers of the inheritance of the Holiest of all in light" (Col. i. 12). Such blessedness is almost beyond belief, especially in contrast to what the Gentile was "in time past", and it should bring forth from every member of this blessed company thanksgiving unto the Father.

No.5. The Samaritans.
pp. 169 - 172

A Samaritan, according to the etymological significance of the word, is an inhabitant of the land of Samaria, but in the sense in which it is found in Scripture, it has an ethnological aspect. It is used of that hybrid race which stood halfway between the Jews and the Gentiles. Note how these three peoples are distinguished from each other in Matt. x. 5, 6:

> "These twelve Jesus sent forth, and commanded them, saying, Go not into the way of the Gentiles, and into any city of the Samaritans enter ye not; but go rather to the lost sheep of the house of Israel."

Compare also Acts i. 8.

The origin of the Samaritans is to be traced to that period following the downfall of the Northern Kingdom, the ten tribes, Israel. The King of Assyria, having carried the original inhabitants of Samaria away to distant cities, repeopled the land with strangers. See II Kings xvii. 20-24:

> "And the Lord rejected all the seed of Israel, and afflicted them, and delivered them into the hand of spoilers, until He had cast them out of His sight . . . . . so was Israel carried away out of their own land to Assyria unto this day. And the King of Assyria brought men from Babylon, and from Cuthah, and from Ava, and from Hamath, and from Sephar-vaim, and placed them in the cities of Samaria instead of the Children of Israel: and they possessed Samaria, and dwelt in the cities there."

These strangers in time mixed with the original inhabitants of the land (it is doubtful whether they were all carried away), and the resulting hybrid race formed the nucleus of the Samaritans. Later, during the Ezra-Nehemiah period, a "mixed multitude", separated from Israel and expelled from Jerusalem, were probably also absorbed among them. Thus, shortly after the return from Babylon, the Samaritans existed as a powerful nation in the centre of Palestine. The hatred which grew up between this people and the Jews dates from the time when Judah returned from the Babylonian captivity. When the children of the captivity began to rebuilt their temple and their walls, the Samaritans offered their help:

> "Now when the adversaries (Samaritans, verse 10) of Judah and Benjamin heard that the children of the captivity builded the temple unto the Lord God of Israel; then they came to Zerubbabel, and to the chief of the fathers, and said unto them, Let us build with you: for we seek your God, as ye do" (Ezra iv. 1, 2).

This offer was spurned by Israel, and these adversaries then set about to frustrate their purpose (verses 3-5). Involved in this opposition was one Sanballat who, according to an Aramaic papyrus discovered in 1909, was "governor of Samaria". The various forms which his opposition took are noted in The Companion Bible at Neh. ii. 10. They are all to be found in Nehemiah, and are grief (ii. 10), laughter (ii. 19), wrath and indignation (iv. 1-3), fighting (iv. 7, 8), subtlety (vi. 1, 2) and compromise (vi. 5-7).

A Sanballat is mentioned by Josephus as having built a temple on Mount Gerizim, but his testimony on this point is to be viewed with some suspicion as his chronology is evidently at fault. It is however possible, that Sanballat, after his failure to successfully oppose the building of the Temple at Jerusalem, did in fact build a rival temple for the Samaritans. (The interested reader is referred to The Antiquities of the Jews, Book XI, chapter 8.) Whatever be the truth of the foregoing, the fact remains that there did at one time exist on Mount Gerizim a temple, and even after its destruction by John Hyrcanus (over one hundred years before Christ) it remained a sacred site to the Samaritans.

After the death of Alexander the Great, when his kingdom had been divided amongst his four generals, a dispute concerning the true site of the Temple was brought before Ptolemy, the general to whom had been allotted Egypt and Palestine. Josephus records the event:

> "Now it came to pass that the Alexandrian Jews, and those Samaritans who paid their worship to the temple that was built in the days of Alexander at Mount Gerizim, did now make a sedition one against another, and disputed about their temples before Ptolemy himself, the Jews saying that, according to the Law of Moses, the temple was to be built at Jerusalem; and the Samaritans saying that it was to be built at Gerizim. They desired therefore the king to sit with his friends and hear the debates about these matters, and punish those with death who were baffled . . . . . By this speech and other arguments, Andronicus persuaded the king to determine that the temple at Jerusalem was built according to the Law of Moses, and to put Sabbeus and Theodosius to death" (Antiquities of the Jews, Book XIII, chapter 3).

This dispute continued till the days of the Lord, when the woman of Samaria again brought it up in His presence (John iv.).

There can be no doubt that Mount Gerizim was a hallowed site. Abraham built his first altar there (Gen. xii. 6, 7), as did also Jacob (Gen. xxxiii. 18-20), and the Lord commanded that His blessing should be put there:

> "And it shall come to pass, when the Lord thy God hath brought thee in unto the land whither thou goest to possess it, that thou shalt put the blessing upon Mount Gerizim, and the curse upon Mount Ebal" (Deut. xi. 29).

Note that Sichem and Shechem, mentioned in the first two of the previous three quotations, are one and the same, and originally represented a region in which the Mounts Gerizim and Ebal stood. Compare Sychar (John iv. 5) and Sychem (Acts vii. 16). Apart from the hallowed connections of Mount Gerizim, the Samaritans justified it as a place of worship from Deut. xxvii. 4, 5:

> "Therefore it shall be when ye be gone over Jordan, that ye shall set up these stones, which I command you this day, in Mount Ebal . . . . . And there shalt thou blind an altar unto the Lord thy God."

The Samaritan Pentateuch reads, "Gerizim" for "Ebal", and although this is thought to be a deliberate alteration, yet did the Samaritans rest their case upon it.

The relationship which existed between the Jews and the Samaritans during the Lord's earthly ministry, is described for us in John iv. 9:

> "Then saith the woman of Samaria unto Him, how is it that Thou, being a Jew, askest drink of me, which am a woman of Samaria? For the Jews have no dealings with the Samaritans."

The Greek word translated "dealings" is sunkraomai, and it requires some explanation. It is evident from the narrative that the Jews did have some dealings with the Samaritans, for "His disciples were gone away unto the city to buy meat" (iv. 8). "The city" was Samaritan, and this implies two things: that the Jews did have dealings with them, and that the food sold must have been deemed kosher (or lawful). The lexicographer Parkhurst, recognizing the difficulty in the Authorized Version translation, quotes Dr. John Lightfoot on the passage:

> "Lightfoot, however, I think more justly, interprets sunkraomai by 'being obliged, or laying themselves under any obligation to, by accepting of favours from'." (Greek Lexicon).

Hence, having no dealings with would seem to imply "having no friendly intercourse with".

The attitude of the Jews toward the Samaritans may be further seen from such a passage as John viii. 48, where the Lord is accused, "Thou art a Samaritan, and hast a demon". Note also the suggestion of the disciples in Luke ix. 54, when certain Samaritans would not receive the Lord. Yet did the Lord portray this people in a good light in contrast to Israel, when He gave the parable of The Good Samaritan (x. 30-37).

And consider also, that of the ten lepers who were cleansed by the Lord, the one who turned back in thanksgiving was a Samaritan (xvii. 11-19).

The Samaritans seem to have reacted favourably to the Gospel. This may be ascertained from the sequel to the Lord's talk with the Samaritan woman. The woman, upon the return of the disciples from the city, left her waterpot, and, speaking to the men of that city, said, "Come, see a man, which told me all things that ever I did; is not this the Christ?" (John iv. 29). The reaction of the Samaritans was immediate, for "they went out of the city and came unto Him" (verse 30). The Lord, seeing them afar off, said:

> "Say not ye, there are yet four months, and then cometh harvest? Behold, I say unto you, lift up your eyes, and look on the fields; for they are white already to harvest" (verse 35).

In verse 39, "Many of the Samaritans of that city believed on Him for the saying of the woman, which testified, He told me all that ever I did", and, "Many more believed because of His own word" (verse 41).

When later, "Philip went down to the city of Samaria, and preached Christ unto them", it is recorded that, "The people with one accord gave heed unto those things which Philip spake" (Acts viii. 5, 6). Luke also allies the church with Samaria (Acts ix. 31), and refers to the brethren there (Acts xv. 3). So the Samaritans, despite their origin, received the Word of God, proving again that God is no respecter of persons, a fact further emphasized by the willingness of the Lord to discuss with the woman of Samaria a subject as high and as holy as worship.

No.6. Temple and Priesthood.
pp. 188 - 192

To build a temple for the Lord was the desire of David the King, and belonged to the period when, "the Lord had given him rest roundabout from all his enemies" (II Sam. vii. 1). But David was not allowed to fulfil this desire for he had been a man of war, and so the honour was reserved for his son Solomon. The building of this Temple represented the passing of the pilgrim stage and the establishing of the kingdom.

After the revolt of the ten tribes during the reign of Rehoboam, the son of Solomon, this Temple suffered a series of misfortunes. In the fifth year of King Rehoboam, Shishak King of Egypt came up against Jerusalem, and took many of the Temple treasures away (I Kings xiv. 25-28). Later, during the reign of Asa King of Judah, more of its treasures were taken in order to establish a covenant with the King of Syria, so that the Northern Kingdom, ruled at this time by Baasha, might be defeated (I Kings xv. 16-21). Thus did the Temple continue to suffer, until finally, the King of Babylon removed all the vessels, burnt it down and demolished the wall. God's reasons for allowing such a thing to happen are given in II Chron. xxxvi. 14-21:

> "Moreover all the chief of the priests, and the people, transgressed very much after all the abominations of the heathen; and polluted the house of the Lord which He had hallowed in Jerusalem. And the Lord God of their fathers sent to them by His messengers. Rising up betimes, and sending; because He had compassion on His people, and on His dwelling place: but they mocked the messengers of God, and despised His words, and misused His prophets, until the wrath of the Lord arose against His people, till there was no remedy. Therefore He brought upon them the King of the Chaldees . . . . . He have them all into his hand. And all the vessels of the house of God, great and small, and the treasures of the house of the Lord . . . . . all these he brought to Babylon. And they burnt the house of God, and brake down the wall of Jerusalem . . . . . to fulfil the word of the Lord."

Under Ezra and Nehemiah the Temple and walls were rebuilt at the decree of Cyrus King of Persia (Ezra i. 1-4). This second Temple, like the first, also had its trials, suffering especially at the hands of Antiochus Epiphanes who set up "an abomination of desolation" upon the altar (I Macc. 1:54). Later the Maccabees cleansed the Temple from this pollution, and turned the enclosure into a fortress. By the time of Herod the Great (appointed Procurator of Judaea by Julius Caesar in B.C.47) it had fallen into decay.

Herod, in accordance with his policy of conciliating the people, and possibly also in expiation of the atrocity he committed by exterminating the Sanhedrin, put the work in order to reconstruct the Temple. But this work was done in such a way that it did not appear to be the building of a third edifice. The Imperial Bible Dictionary has the following comment:

> "Although it was an entirely new building which Herod projected and actually accomplished, yet his very object required that he should avoid conveying the idea of its being wholly new, and that he should rather appear aiming at the proper restoration and embellishment of the existing one. On this account he seems to have taken down the latter piecemeal, and put up the other in its place, so as to preserve the continuity of the edifice, and admit of its being still called, as it certainly was, the second temple."

Herod's temple was begun (according to The Companion Bible) in B.C.20, and was still in the process of being built when the Lord walked this earth.

> "Jesus answered and said unto them, Destroy this temple (naos), and in three days I will raise it up. Then said the Jews, Forty and six years was this temple (naos) in building, and wilt thou rear it up in three days" (John ii. 19, 20).

The Greek naos refers to the actual Temple building consisting of the Holy Place and the Holy of Holies, and should be distinguished from hieron which refers to the whole of the Temple courts. The other word translated "temple", oikos (Luke xi. 51), is really "house", and is so translated in most of its occurrences. This distinction between the Greek words for 'temple' must be taken as qualifying the statement concerning the unfinished work. In fact, according to Dean Farrar,

> "The assertion of the Jews was not strictly accurate, for ho naos autos (as distinguished from to hieron), with all its porticoes, had been finished in eight or nine years" (The Life of Christ).

This suggests that the Jews (John ii. 20) were referring rather to the length in which the whole project had been in hand. Work on this temple continued until 64A.D., just six years before its destruction by fire under Titus.

The Temple which stood during the Lord's earthly days was an attempt by Herod to endear himself to his Jewish subjects, an attempt which failed. And yet in spite of this origin and motive, the Lord identified Himself with it, calling it "My Father's house (oikos)" (John ii. 16). Note also Matt. xxi. 12, 13:

> "And Jesus went into the temple (hieron) of God . . . . . and said unto them, It is written, My house (oikos) shall be called The House (oikos) of Prayer; but ye have made it a den of thieves."

Later "My house" became "your house" (Matt. xxiii. 38). Yet even after this reversal with its associated prophecy concerning the desolation of the Temple, and even after the crucifixion of the Lord, Peter and John (perhaps the two apostles most near to the Lord) go up to this same Temple (hieron) at the hour of prayer. From the early chapters of the Acts of the Apostles it appears that the Temple was the centre of activity of the early church. Just as the Jewish believers of this day did not disassociate themselves from the synagogues, neither did the Apostles separate themselves from the Temple. The object of the Apostles with their call to repentance was not to begin a new calling, but to make ready the people of God for the coming back of their Messiah. The hope of Israel was centred in this Messiah, and the fulfillment of Mal. iii. 1, "The Lord, whom ye seek, shall suddenly come to his temple".

For nineteen hundred years the People of Israel have been without a temple, and although an effort was made under the Emperor Julian to rebuild, this and all other aspirations in this direction have been frustrated. At this present time, the once sacred height is occupied by the Mosque of Omar. In order that Matt. xxiv. may be fulfilled, it would seem to be necessary that the Temple be rebuilt. Then will the prophecy of Daniel (Matt. xxiv. 15) be fulfilled, and the great tribulation commence, leading, as that chapter indicates, to the Second Coming of the Lord Jesus Christ. The events in the Middle East are surely seen by the most casual observer to be leading up to this rebuilding.

Priesthood.

Everything connected with the priesthood was intended to be symbolical and typical, and pointed forward to the Great High Priest and his work for man. The essential idea of the priesthood as, "mediation". Dr. Edersheim writes:

> "The Hebrew term for priest (kohen) denotes in its root meaning 'one who stands up for another, and mediates in his cause" (The Temple, its Ministry and Services at the time of Jesus Christ).

This meaning can be felt from such a passage as Heb. v. 1:

> "For every high priest taken from among men is ordained for men in things pertaining to God, that he may offer both gifts and sacrifices for sins."

Priesthood, in its widest sense, existed from the very earliest times. Before the Mosaic priesthood was instituted, the father was the priest to his own household. Abraham, Isaac, Jacob and Job performed this function (Gen. xii. 7, 8; xxvi. 25; xxxiii. 19, 20; Job i. 5). The priesthood of Melchizedek would seem to be the Scriptural exception to this rule, for even the patriarch Abraham recognized his greatness (Heb. vii. 4). It was 'after the order of' this man that Christ was a priest (Heb. vii. 15-17).

The People of Israel as a whole were intended to be "a kingdom of priests", but this was dependent upon the keeping of certain conditions.

> "Now therefore, if ye will obey my voice indeed, and keep my covenant, then ye shall be a peculiar treasure unto me above all people: for all the earth is mine: and ye shall be unto me a kingdom of priests, and an holy nation" (Exod. xix. 5, 6).

But within this conception, the firstborn in particular were looked upon as specially belonging to God. This was because of the deliverance effected for the firstborn when in the land of Egypt.

> "All the firstborn are mine; for on the day when I smote all the firstborn in the land of Egypt I hallowed unto me all the firstborn in Israel, both man and beast: mine shall they be; I am the Lord" (Numb. iii. 13).

Instead, however, of taking the firstborn, the Lord chose the tribe of Levi.

> "Bring the tribe of Levi near, and present them before Aaron the priest, that they may minister unto him . . . . . I have taken the Levites from among the Children of Israel instead of all the firstborn that openeth the matrix among the Children of Israel: therefore the Levites shall be mine" (Numb. iii. 6, 12).

Aaron and his sons in particular were chosen to "wait on their priests' office" (verse 10), provided they satisfied the conditions of Lev. xxi. 16-23.

The fixed duties of the priests included watching over the fire on the altar of burnt offerings that it should never go out (Lev. vi. 12, 13), offering a lamb every morning and evening and two lambs on the sabbath (Numb. xxviii. 3, 4, 9), attending to the golden lamp outside the veil (Exod. xxvii. 20, 21) and teaching and guarding the law of God (Lev. x. 11, see Mal. ii. 7). In addition they were to be always at their post, ready to do the office of a priest for any Israelite who might require them. The high priest had the additional privileged duty of appearing before God once a year on the day of atonement.

There was thus three orders of ministers, corresponding with the three sections of the Tabernacle and later, the Temple.

> "The Levites were the appointed servants of the court, but from the holy place they were excluded on pain of death. The priests executed the ministry of the holy place, but were as solemnly prohibited from venturing beyond the veil which concealed the Most Holy. The priesthood culminated in the high priest, as mediator between God and the people" (Imperial Bible Dictionary).

From the time of David (although Jewish tradition places it earlier) the priesthood was arranged in 24 courses (I Chron. xxiv.). Each 'course' did duty for a week, the days of which were further subdivided among the families which constituted the course. Zacharias, the father of John the Baptist, was "of the course of Abia" (Luke i. 5).

It is beyond the scope of these articles to consider the history of the priesthood through the O.T. Attention must therefore be turned to the state at which that priesthood had arrived in N.T. days.

No.7. The Priesthood (contd.).
pp. 208 - 212

When the voices of the prophets ceased the way was open for the rise of Rabbinism, and as its power and influence increased, so that of the priesthood declined. At the time of Christ, the Rabbinic party, the Pharisees, were in complete control in all religious and ritual matters. Dean Farrar writes:

> "The wealth, rank, connections, and offices of the Sadducees gave them much worldly influence and authority, but in all religious and ritual matters the people sided so absolutely with the doctors or Pharisees that the Sadducees, even against their real views, were often compelled to conform" (The Life of Christ).

Were it not that the Sadducean priestly party were hand in glove with the ruling power, they would have had no place at all in Israel. The situation at the time of the Lord is aptly put by Dr. Edersheim:

> "Nor must we forget the powerful controlling influence which Rabbinism exercised. Its tendency . . . . . was steadily against all privileges other than those gained by traditionary learning and theological ingenuity. The Pharisee, or, rather, the man learned in the traditional law, was everything both before God and before man; 'but this people, who knoweth not the law', were 'cursed', plebeians, country people, unworthy of any regard or attention. Rabbinism applied these principles even in reference to the priesthood" (The Temple and its Services).

To be a priest, a man must satisfy the Sanhedrin on at least two counts: (a) genealogy, (b) physical perfection. Official records of descent were meticulously kept until the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus in 70A.D., when they were apparently lost. Priests also had to undergo a course of instruction, and before being allowed to officiate, were examined.

The distinction between the priest and Levite at the time of Christ indicated in the parable of The Good Samaritan (Luke x. 30-35), is observed thus by Dr. Edersheim:

> "Generally . . . . . on the Levites devolved the Temple police, the guard of the gates, and the duty of keeping everything about the sanctuary clean and bright. But as at night the priests kept watch about the innermost places of the Temple, so they also opened and closed all the inner gates, while the Levites discharged this duty in reference to the > outer gates, which led unto the Temple mount (the court of the Gentiles), and to the 'Beautiful gate', which formed the principle entrance into the 'court of the women'." (The Temple and its Ministry).

There can be no doubt that at this time the office of high priest carried with it very considerable influence. This can be seen in Acts ix. 1, 2 where the jurisdiction of the high priest is recognized in the synagogues of Damascus, 140 air-miles to the north of Jerusalem:

> "And Saul . . . . . went unto the high priest, and desired of him letters to Damascus to the synagogues, that if he found any of this way . . . . . he might bring them bound unto Jerusalem."

The possessor of the office had a house in the Temple, in addition to his own home in Jerusalem, and was entitled to certain marks of outward respect. According to the Rabbis, he was appointed by the Sanhedrin, and the office was to be held for life and was hereditary. But the high priesthood was interfered with, especially by Herod the Great, and became associated with crime and bribery. Dean Farrar writes of Herod that, "He thrust into the high priesthood creatures of his own, of Egyptian and Babylonian origin". Herod also interfered with the Sanhedrin, to whom even the high priest was answerable, and there can be no doubt that the assembly which condemned the Lord, was of a hybrid nature.

The association of the priests with the Sadducean party, and the fact that they had the chief share in the crucifixion of Christ, has been already noted. They appear on the scene largely at the end of the Lord's ministry, after the triumphal entry into Jerusalem, and they were very active during the early Acts period. A glance at the occurrences of "the chief priests" (hoi archiereis) found in Mark xv., is very revealing of the part they had in the crucifixion:

> "The chief priests held a consultation . . . . . accused Him . . . . . delivered Him . . . . . moved the people . . . . . mocking said among themselves with the scribes, He saved others; Himself He cannot save" (verses 1, 3, 10, 11, 31).

After the death of Christ, they, together with the Pharisees, persuaded Pilate (calling to mind the Lord's prediction that after three days He would rise from the dead) of the necessity to secure the sepulcher and to set a guard. It was to these chief priests that the same guard reported after the resurrection of Christ, when they bribed them with much money to spread abroad the tale that, "His disciples came by night, and stole Him away while we slept" (Matt. xxvii. 62-66; xxviii. 2-4, 11-15). What the real feelings of these chief priests (who were of the Sadducean persuasion, denying the resurrection of the dead) were, after the report of the guard, can only be a matter of conjecture. They were greatly distressed, however, at the later teaching of the Apostles:

> "And as they spake unto the people, the priests, and the captain of the temple, and the Sadducees, came upon them, being grieved that they taught the people, and preached through Jesus the resurrection from the dead" (Acts iv. 1, 2).

Having arrested them, and charged them not to speak henceforth to any man in the name of "Jesus", the Sanhedrin released the Apostles. But their continued activity in the Temple filled the high priest and his associates with anger:

> "Then the high priest rose up, and all they that were with him (which is the sect of the Sadducees) and were filled with indignation, and laid their hands on the apostles, and put them in the common prison" (Acts v. 17, 18).

The miraculous escape of the Apostles during the night, when the angel of the Lord opened the prison doors, caused great perplexity to these Sadducees, and it seems that it was largely due to the wisdom of Gamaliel, a Pharisee, that the Apostles, having again been brought before the Sanhedrin, were delivered on this occasion (Acts v. 19-40). It is refreshing to read, just a few verses later, and in contrast to this, that "A great company of the priests were obedient to the faith" (Acts vi. 7).

Two words in particular are used in the N.T. in connection with the priesthood. They are heireus, translated "high priest", and "priest", and archiereus, translated "chief priest", "high priest", and "chief of the priests". The one reference where the word hiereus is translated "high priest" (Acts v. 24) is omitted by the best texts.

According to the Grimm-Thayer Lexicon, hiereus refers to "a priest; one who offers sacrifices and in general is busied with sacred rites". Apart from its usage in the Gospels and Acts, of the priests living at that time, it is used in Hebrews in reference to Christ, Melchizedek and the Levitical priesthood of the O.T. It is used in the Book of Revelation, of believers.

Archiereus, a word used many times in the Gospels, Acts and the Book of Hebrews, but never outside of those books, is explained in the Grimm-Thayer Lexicon thus:

> "(1). He who above all others was honoured with the title priest, the chief of the priests . . . . . (2). The plural archiereis . . . . . comprises, in addition to the one actually holding the high priestly office, both those who had previously discharged it and although deposed continued to have great power in the state . . . . . as well as the members of the families from which high priests were created, provided they had much influence in public affairs."

The word is used in Hebrews particularly in reference to Christ.

The situation with respect to the high priesthood at the time of Christ, has caused some consternation among Bible students. There can be no doubt that, at the time of the Lord's trial, Caiaphas was high priest (Matt. xxvi. 57; John xviii. 13, 24), and yet, in Acts iv. 6, Annas is called the high priest, while Caiaphas is given no title. In addition to this (in Luke iii. 2, R.V.) there is mention of "the high priesthood of Annas and Caiaphas", with reference to the time when "the word of God came unto John the son of Zacharias". The Companion Bible note on this last passage is:

> "Caiaphas was the high priest as successor of Aaron; while Annas was the Nasi, or head of the Sanhedrin (as successor of Moses), and thus associated with Caiaphas in government."

The note of H. A. Meyer is as follows:

> "The reigning high priest at that time was Joseph, named Caiaphas . . . . . who had been appointed by Valerius Gratus, the predecessor of Pontius Pilate (Josephus, Antiquities of the Jews, Book XVIII, chapter 2). His father-in-law Annas held the office of high priest some years before, until Valerious Gratus became procurator, when the office was taken away from him by the new governor, and conferred first on Ishmael, then on Eleazar (a son of Annas), then on Simon, and after that on Caiaphas . . . . . But Annas retained withal very weighty influence (John 18:12, 13), so that not only did he, as did everyone who had been archiereus, continue to be called by the name, but, moreover, he also partially discharged the functions of high priest."

Either or both of the above suggestions may be true, but it seems fairly obvious from the N.T. record, that Annas, the ex-high priest, exercised considerable power and influence. Dean Alford says of him:

> "He had influence enough to procure the actual high priesthood for five of his sons, after his own deposition, (Josephus Antiquities of the Jews, Book XX, chapter 9)."

The character of Caiaphas, son-in-law to Annas, is seen clearly in his unconscious prophecy concerning the death of Christ for the people:

> "And one of them, named Caiaphas, being the high priest that same year, said unto them, Ye know nothing at all; nor consider it is expedient for us, that one man should die for the people, and that the whole nation perish not" (John xi. 49, 50).

The Sanhedrin had expressed their fear that, "The Romans shall come and take away both our place and nation" (verse 48) as a result of the following which the Lord would command, if allowed to continue with his miracles. Such was the attitude of these self-centred men. But Caiaphas was ahead of them, and saw in "this man" a victim, albeit innocent, by whom they could appease the suspicion of their conquerors. This attitude of Caiaphas lays open the character of the man.

To conclude this article on the priesthood, a few words from Smith's Dictionary of the Bible may serve to emphasize the utter degradation into which the priesthood had come, shortly before the destruction of the temple by Titus in 70A.D.

> "In the scenes of the last tragedy of the Jewish history the order passes away without honour, 'dying as a fool dieth'. The high priesthood is given to the lowest and vilest . . . other priests appear as deserting to the enemy; it is from the priest that Titus receives the lamps, and gems, and costly raiment of the sanctuary. Priests report to their conquerors the terrible utterance, 'Let us depart', on the last Pentecost ever celebrated in the Temple. It is a priest who fills up the degradation of his order by dwelling on the fall of his country with a cold-blooded satisfaction, and finding in Titus the fulfillment of the Messianic prophecies of the Old Testament. The destruction of Jerusalem deprived the order at one blow of all but an honorary distinction."

No.8. The Sanhedrin.
pp. 229 - 232

The word "sanhedrin" (or "sanhedrim") does not occur in the A.V., the Greek sunhedrion being consistently translated "council". In the LXX, the word is used in a general way of any session or assembly of persons deliberating or adjudicating. An example of this latter usage is found in Prov. xxii. 10:

> "Cast out a pestilent person from the council, and strife shall go out with him; for when he sits in the council he dishonours all" (LXX).

In the N.T the word is used more specifically, referring to (a) the smaller tribunal or "council" which existed in every Jewish town in which a synagogue was to be found, its function being to judge less important cases, and (b) the Sanhedrin, the great "council" which met in the Temple at Jerusalem, and had supreme authority in Israel (but of course subject, at the time of Christ, to the Roman procurator).

The former usage is found in Matt. x. 17 and Mark xiii. 9, where the word is in the plural form:

> "But beware of men: for they will deliver you up to the councils."
> "But take heed to yourselves: for they shall deliver you up to councils; and in the synagogues ye shall be beaten."

Most occurrences however, refer to the Sanhedrin at Jerusalem, sometimes designated "The Grand Sanhedrin" by authorities.

The word sunhedrion, from sun together and hedra a seat, means literally, "a sitting together".

Origin of the Sanhedrin.

Jewish tradition traces the origin of the Sanhedrin to Numb. xi. 16, 17:

> "The Lord said unto Moses, Gather unto Me seventy men of the elders of Israel . . . . . bring them unto the tabernacle of the congregation, that they may stand there with thee . . . . . and I will take of the spirit which is upon thee, and will put it upon them; and they shall bear the burden of the people with thee."

The Sanhedrin at the time of the Lord's sojourn on earth was similarly constituted, being made up of seventy members (priests, Levites, scribes and notable members of high priestly families) plus the president (the High Priest). This body sat in the Temple precincts.

It is outside the scope of this article to trace the possible history of this body from Moses to Christ, but it may be observed that Ezekiel was given a vision of such a company (in connection with Israel's idolatry), and an assembly which bestowed upon Simon (father of John Hyrcanus) the supreme power, referred to in the Apocrypha, may well have been such a body.

> "So I went in and saw . . . . . the idols of the house of Israel . . . . . and there stood before them seventy men of the ancients of the house of Israel, and in the midst of them stood Jaazaniah . . . . . with every man a censer in his hand" (Ezek. viii. 10, 11).
>
> "At Saramel in the great congregation of the priests, and people, and rulers of the nation, and elders of the country, were these things notified unto us . . . . . The people therefore, seeing the acts of Simon . . . . . made him their governor and chief priests" (1Macc.14:28,35).

The Sanhedrin at the time of Christ.

Mention has already been made in these articles of the interference of Herod the Great with the Sanhedrin. At one time he is said to have exterminated every member of this body except one, whose eyes he put out. Soon after this, he put into the High Priesthood men of Egyptian and Babylonian origin, who would of course preside over the Sanhedrin.

It would seem, in the light of this, that the body which condemned the Lord, was of a hybrid nature, if indeed He actually appeared before the Sanhedrin as such. Dr. Edersheim asserts in his Jesus the Messiah, that it was "no formal, regular meeting of the Sanhedrin", pointing out that if it had have been, "all Jewish order and law would have been grossly infringed in almost every particular". He quotes the Jewish historian Dr. Jost:

> "A private murder, committed by burning enemies, not the sentence of a regularly constituted Sanhedrin. The most prominent men who represented the Law, such as Gamaliel, Jochanan ben Zakkai, and others were not present."

It is alas only too sad to relate, and in opposition to this view, that even normally calm assemblies of intelligent men, when their judgment is clouded by hatred or fear, will act in the most irrational and unlawful manner. The men who opposed the Lord, even if they could be so described, were certainly burning with a hatred for Him and all He stood for, and there seems no reason to doubt, under such circumstances, that the so-called "Grand Sanhedrin" could act in a way which infringed "all Jewish order and law". As to the absence or otherwise of the most prominent members of this body, since Scripture is silent on this, it cannot be established with any certainty one way or the other.

Authority of the Sanhedrin.

The authority of the Sanhedrin at this time, was to judge in the more important causes, to the extent of pronouncing the death sentence, but with the limitation that such sentences should be confirmed by the Roman procurator, and be put into effect by the Roman power. Hence the words of John xviii. 31; xix. 7:

> "The Jews therefore said unto him (Pilate), It is not lawful for us to put any man to death . . . . . We have a law, and by our law He ought to die."

The death sentence had in effect been already passed upon the Lord by the Jews, and they now sought the confirmation of Pilate, and consequent carrying out of that sentence by the Roman power.

The death of Stephen has sometimes been quoted as demonstrating that the Sanhedrin did have the power to carry out the sentence of death at this time, but what happened with respect to this first Christian martyr was done in the heat of the moment, and is not to be quoted against the plain words of John xviii. 31 already referred to. The N.E.B. translation portrays graphically what happened to Stephen in Acts vii. 57, 58:

> "At this they gave a great shout and stopped their ears. Then they made one rush at him and, flinging him out of the city, set about stoning him."

It may be remembered that there were times during the Lord's earthly ministry when a similar thing could have happened, although confessedly not in connection with the Sanhedrin. See for example John viii. 59 and x. 31.

The Judgment.

> "Ye have heard . . . . . but I say unto you, That whosoever is angry with his brother without a cause shall be in danger of the judgment: and whosoever shall say to his brother, Raca, shall be in danger of the council (Sanhedrin): but whosoever shall say, Thou fool, shall be in danger of hell fire (lit. the Gehenna of fire)" (Matt. v. 21, 22).

In the above passage three degrees of punishment are alluded to, pronounced by two courts. "The Judgment" would represent the local synagogue "councils" (Matt. x. 17 and Mark xiii. 9), which decided lesser cases, but could pronounce the death sentence by the honourable method of the sword, and ordain scourging (Matt. xxiii. 34) and excommunication (John ix. 34). The Sanhedrin dealt with more serious offences, and had the power to ordain death by the more ignominious stoning, and the further disgrace of the Gehenna of fire, the end of a malefactor, whose corpse was denied a proper burial, and was thrown out into the valley of Hinnom (outside Jerusalem), where it would be devoured by worms, or the fires which were kept burning there constantly to keep down pestilence. See Isa. lxvi. 24; Mark ix. 43-48.

The meaning of Matt. v. 21, 22 will be considered in a consequent article; it is enough for the moment to observe the constitution and authority of the judicial system in Israel at this time. All matters, civil, political and religious, came under the jurisdiction of these tribunals, which were intimately connected with the religion of Israel. Such a system is, on paper at least, a Theocracy, and this Israel was intended to be. How far they fell short of this in practice, to say nothing of the impossibility of running such a system whilst under the Roman yoke, is evident to any reader of the Gospel narrative.

The coming of the Lord Jesus Christ to His own people could have re-established that Theocracy, but the prevailing attitude of the leaders of the people was, "we will not have this man to rule over us". They rejected their King-Priest, both during the Gospel and Acts period, and "the hope of Israel" was postponed to a future date, whilst the Lord turned His attention to another aspect of His purposes—the building up of the Body of Christ, a heavenly plan.

The First Epistle to the Corinthians.

No.1. Introduction. pp. 3 - 7

The Corinthian letters are the most personal of Paul's inspired writings. In none of them do we see Paul the man more clearly. This was probably due to the close and personal contact the Apostle had with the church at Corinth. Corinth, at this time, was the chief city of Achaia, situated on the narrow isthmus that connected the mainland of Greece and the Peloponnesus. It was on the main trade route from east to west and north to south, being the chief centre of commerce, and so had a continual stream of traffickers, and a mixed population of Roman colonists, Greeks and Jews. It was a strategic centre, and its importance must have influenced the Apostle Paul in his missionary activities.

Corinth's history was in two parts. The original city was destroyed by the Romans in B.C.146. In B.C.46 it was rebuilt by Julius Caesar and given the status of a Roman colony. The old city contained the infamous temple of Aphrodite with its prostitution and the morals of the new one were no better. The Greek word korinthiagomai, meaning literally "to act as a Corinthian", was synonymous with immorality. Paul reached Corinth on his second missionary journey as recorded in Acts xviii. 1-17. How unlikely, yet how encouraging it must have been to the Apostle to receive the Lord's words "Be not afraid, but speak, and hold not thy peace . . . . . for I have much people in this city" (Acts xviii. 9, 10), which only goes to show that no one is too bad or depraved to respond to the gospel of God's love and grace.

Among the first converts were Aquila and Priscilla, who were not Corinthians, but were living there. Paul resided with them and began his ministry in the synagogue, which lasted over eighteen months with the result that many believed (xviii. 8). And so the good news of salvation in Christ Jesus reached Corinth within twenty years of the Crucifixion. Some notable people responded to the gospel, including Crispus, who was no less than the "chief ruler of the synagogue" (xviii. 8). Not only did he believe, but all his house. Then there was Sosthenes (I Cor. i. 1) also described as the "chief ruler of the synagogue", possibly succeeding Crispus (Acts xviii. 7). This must have been a great blow to Judaism and at the same time an impetus to Paul's witness.

The Authorship, Date and Place of writing and the background of the epistle.

Both external and internal evidences point strongly to the Pauline authorship of the letter. Clement of Rome wrote an epistle to the church at Corinth about 95A.D. and refers I Corinthians to "the blessed Paul, the Apostle". This is the earliest instance of the quotation of a N.T. writer identified by name. Other external evidence is provided by Ignatius and Polycarp. The characteristics of style, vocabulary and content harmonize with what is known of Paul and Corinth.

The Apostle wrote the letter from Ephesus and the date many conservative scholars give is 55A.D., though C. K. Barrett suggests early 54 or the end of 53. It will be helpful to reconstruct the background to the writing of the Corinthian epistles, derived from the Acts and from the epistles themselves. Some of these points may be debated and there is no unanimity among Bible scholars here, but we believe the following will not be far from the true facts.

We have already mentioned Paul's visit to Corinth described in the Acts and referred to in I Cor. ii. 1. After this visit he wrote them a letter which has not been preserved (v. 9). We need have no concern that any part of inspired Scripture has been lost. The Apostle must have written letters which do not form part of Holy Scripture and this is one of them. Disturbing news came from believers in contact with the Corinthian assembly and also a communication from them requesting information on certain problems. In order to meet these needs Paul wrote I Corinthians. Apparently this did not solve all the difficulties, and in consequence Paul was forced to pay them a hurried painful visit (II Cor. ii. 1; xii. 14; xiii. 1, 2). Following this the Apostle wrote them a third letter of very severe character (II Cor. ii. 4). His anxiety for the church there concerning their condition and also how they would receive this severe epistle was so great that he could not wait in Troas for Titus, the bearer of the severe letter, but hurried on to Macedonia where he met him and learned with great relief that the letter had produced the needed results and all was well. From Macedonia Paul then wrote the canonical II Corinthians (II Cor. ii. 13; vii. 5-16). After this he paid his last visit to the Corinthian church (Acts xx. 1-4).

Some modern scholars hold that the "severe letter" is contained in II Corinthians and that this epistle is not a unified work. They claim that vi. 14 - vii. 1 is an interpolation, because it breaks the sequence of thought, that chapter ix. largely duplicates what is in chapter viii., and that the last section (x. 1 - xiii. 14) is so different in character from the earlier sections that it must be part or whole of the stern letter Paul sent to Corinth. Against this there is absolutely no manuscript evidence for such a truncated epistle and a close study will reveal that, far from being disjointed, it shows a remarkable unity.

It will be good to look at the background of I Corinthians a little more closely. Apollos undoubtedly worked in Corinth (I Cor. iii. 6) and it is possible that Peter visited it too. Owing to their spiritual immaturity this tended to cause the Corinthians to break down into groups and to range themselves under the name of one of these leaders (i. 11, 12) thus producing disunity. There were problems and abuses at the Lord's Supper (xi. 18-22), public litigation among members (vi. 1-8), a notorious case of immorality (v. 1-5), arguments about eating food that had been sacrificed to idols (viii. 1-13; x. 14 - xi. 1), disagreements about the need for marriage (vii. 1-40) and of morality outside marriage (vi.. 12-20). Resurrection was denied by some (xv. 12) and Paul's own apostleship questioned by those who were very likely Judaists (iv. 3; ix. 1). All this was quite enough to produce an unhealthy spiritual state in the assembly and to cause great concern to Paul. Some of this bad news had been brought to Paul by the household of Chloe (i. 11). Additionally a trio, Stephanas, Fortunatus and Achaicus arrived from the Corinthian church, probably bringing the problems which Paul was asked to answer (xvi. 17). These may be seen in the recurring phrase "now concerning" (peri de vii. 1, 25; viii. 1; xii. 1; xvi. 1, 2). There were problems too about spiritual gifts. Some were placing too much emphasis upon the gift of tongues and upon these gifts in general, which appeared to be producing pride. Furthermore the gifts were not being used in an orderly or balanced manner. One can therefore readily see that guidance and warning through an epistle was absolutely necessary.

Before we go any further, it will be helpful to give the outline of the epistle as a whole:

A | i. 1-9. Waiting for the Coming of the Lord.
B | i. 10 - iv. 21. "IT HATH BEEN DECLARED UNTO ME."
C | v. 1 - xiv. 40. The Body, physically, spiritually, ecclesiastically.
B | xv. "I DECLARE UNTO YOU."—the gospel and the resurrection. The antidote to their errors.
A | xvi. Maranatha. The Lord cometh.

The first section revolves around these words, calling, confirmation, coming. The word "call" occurs in the first two verses. In each case the A.V. supplies the words "to be" though they are lacking in the original. Whether they are supplied or not, truth is stated, for Paul was a 'called Apostle' by none less than the risen Christ, and so was obviously called to exercise apostolic functions. Likewise in verse 2 the Corinthians were 'called saint' (holy ones), through the salvation and grace of God, and certainly should have been saints in their everyday lives, though it is manifest from the epistle that many of them were anything but saintly in their walk. Here is a good example of the difference between state and standing in Christ. As God sees us in His Son, with all His holiness reckoned ours, we are indeed perfect and complete in Him. In ourselves, and in our experience and walk day by day, we come a long way behind such a glorious position, but it should be a constant concern to us to seek to balance state and standing in the strength of the risen Saviour.

Paul links Sosthenes with himself in the opening salutation. We read of a Sosthenes in Acts xviii. 17 who was a ruler of the Corinthian synagogue and was brought before Gallio's judgment seat and beaten. The book of the Acts does not tell us that this Sosthenes became a believer, so we cannot say dogmatically that the Sosthenes of our epistle is the same person, but the probability is that he was. Not only does the Apostle refer to the Divine calling of the Corinthian believers, but he states that the epistle is "to them that are sanctified in Christ Jesus" (2). The basic meaning of sanctification is separation in a twofold way: separated to and separated from. Basically God separates His children to and for Himself and His will. This is the first and positive aspect of sanctification. Secondly, all such are separated from everything that is opposed to His will. This is the negative aspect. We need to take care to stress the positive side first. Failure to do this has resulted in a man-made narrowness and finally in nunneries and monasteries. This is a false separation which can lead to barrenness and spiritual pride. Once we have realized fully what it means to be claimed by God for Himself, we shall see clearly that the old sinful nature and the spirit of the world which lies in Satan's power, must not intrude or be allowed to mix with such a position.

Paul links the believers at Corinth with "all that in every place call upon the name of Jesus Christ our Lord" (2). The places he refers to were the meeting places for believers. In the early days it could have been the synagogue within the framework of which Hebrew Christians gave their witness. But more likely it was the homes of believers. In xvi. 19 we have a reference to Aquila and Priscilla and "the church that is in their house". We must not think of buildings specially erected for Christian worship as we see around us today. These did not come into being until a much later date. The house of the believer was the home of the church, and we can therefore see why an orderly Christian home was an essential qualification of a bishop or overseer; and warm hospitality a necessary virtue (I Tim. iii. 2, 4, 5).

We next come to confirmation. The Apostle expresses gratitude to the Lord for the grace that had been given them and also that they were made rich in every respect by a bountiful Lord and Saviour. We are not told they were rich in faith, hope or love, but in speech and knowledge of every kind (4, 5). Speech obviously includes the gift of speaking with tongues, and doubtless prophecy and every kind of Christian discourse. A great deal of attention is given to Christian speech in chapters i. and ii. which we must consider in its place. Knowledge refers to the apprehension of Christian truth and it is important to note that these gifts were peculiar to the Acts period as a means of confirmation to each believer. In the twelfth chapter we have a long list of these special confirmatory gifts which were given by the Holy Spirit, of which knowledge, gnosis, is one (I Cor. xii. 8). Here wisdom is linked with knowledge and Paul has a great deal to teach about wisdom in the early part of this epistle. The Apostle John evidently refers to the supernatural gift of knowledge in his first letter:

> "Ye have an anointing (unction) from the Holy One, and ye know all things . . . . . the anointing which ye have received of Him abideth in you, and ye need not that any man teach you, but as the same anointing teacheth you of all things . . . . ." (I John ii. 20, 27).

This is obviously not true today, for Divine Knowledge does not come automatically as a gift of the Spirit. We all know that careful, persistent and prayerful searching of the Scripture of Truth is now necessary to arrive at an understanding of what God has written. The special gifts enumerated in I Corinthians were confirmatory miraculous gifts to prepare believers for the great event of the early coming of the Lord:

> "So that ye come behind in no gift; waiting for the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ" (verse 7).

In Heb. vi. the testing of the heavenly gift, and of the Word of God is linked with "miracles of the coming age", i.e. the Millennium (powers of the world to come A.V.). These gifts were a foretaste of the kingdom age which would be set up at the Lord's return and it is obvious from this letter and others written at this period, that this coming was then imminent (see Acts iii. 19-26; I Cor. vii. 29; x. 11; xvi. 22; I Thess. i. 9, 10; iv. 15-17; II Thess. i. 7; Heb. x. 37; I Pet. iv. 7; James v. 7-9; I John ii. 18).

No.2. Confirmation and Coming. pp. 25 - 30

Not only did the confirmatory miraculous gifts of the Acts period look forward to the Kingdom age, but they were a confirmation of the testimony of Christ which He had given to Israel. The miracles which He had wrought on earth were a Divine attestation of His Messiahship to the earthly people:

> "Now when John had heard in the prison the works of Christ, he sent two of his disciples, and said unto Him, Art thou He that should come, or do we look for another? Jesus answered and said unto them, Go and show John again those things which ye do hear and see: the blind receive their sight, and the lame walk, the lepers are cleansed, and the deaf hear, the dead are raised up, and the poor have the gospel preached unto them" (Matt. xi. 2-5).
>
> "But I have greater witness than that of John; for the works which the Father hath given me to finish, the same works that I do, bear witness of me, that the Father hath sent me" (John v. 36).
>
> "Ye men of Israel, hear these words; Jesus of Nazareth, a man approved of God among you by miracles and wonders and signs, which God did by Him in the midst of you . . . . ." (Acts ii. 22).

The miraculous gifts and signs of the Acts period which followed were a testimony that the twelve apostles were continuing what Christ began to do and teach in His ministry to the chosen people:

> ". . . . . so great salvation, which at the first began to be spoken by the Lord, and was confirmed unto us by them that heard Him; God also bearing them witness, both with signs and wonders, and with divers miracles and gifts of the Holy Ghost, according to His own will?" (Heb. ii. 3, 4).
>
> "These signs shall follow them that believe; In My Name shall they cast out devils; they shall speak with new tongues; they shall take up serpents; and if they drink any deadly thing, it shall not hurt them; they shall lay hands on the sick, and they shall recover . . . . . they went forth, and preached everywhere, the Lord working with them, and confirming the word with signs following. Amen" (Mark xvi. 17-20).

There is no doubt therefore what these miraculous gifts were, and why they were given. They were a Divine confirmation of the earthly kingdom testimony and they only have relevance when kept in this Scriptural setting. To force them into the present time when the earthly kingdom people Israel are laid aside in unbelief and this aspect of kingdom held in abeyance, is an error which can only reap confusion and division.

The Coming of the Lord Jesus Christ.

In the last article we referred to no less than eleven N.T. references, chiefly from the epistles written around this time, which describe the Lord's coming as immanent. This testimony is overwhelming and cannot be ignored by the true student of Scripture. Peter had been authorized by God to declare that the second Advent of Christ only awaited the repentance and conversion of Israel and to this the nation was commanded to respond there and then (Acts iii. 19-26). No one knew whether the Jew would be obedient or not, but all had the hope that this would be realized in their lifetime. "We which are alive and remain unto the coming of the Lord" was the standpoint of all believers at this time and was the comfort and great antidote for the sorrow resulting from the loss of those who were near and dear (I Thess. iv. 13-18). In the letter we are studying, the Corinthian believers were "waiting for the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ" (i. 7). Here the word "coming" translates the Greek apokalupsis, apocalypse. This, together with the word parousia, also translated "coming", but better rendered "arrival", or "presence', are the words which the Holy Spirit uses to describe the hope of the church during the Acts. This arrival of the Lord Jesus on the earth had been clearly described by Him in Matt. xxiv., Mark xiii. and Luke xxi. From the words used, it was to be a visible bodily coming, not a spiritual one, and the Book of the Revelation expands it and describes it as being a time when "every eye shall see Him, and they also which pierced Him" (Rev. i. 7). If we note every occurrence of apokalupsis and parousia and the contexts they are used in, it will be noted that not one of them gives any clear backing to the idea of a secret parousia. This idea has been forced upon those who bring the later revelation of the Mystery into the Acts and fail to see in the Acts the close connection with God's longsuffering to Israel, and His waiting for their response to the command to repent and turn back to Him (Acts iii. 19). This coming back to the earth is the hope of Israel which both the O.T. (e.g. Zech. xiv. 4, 5), and the early epistles of the N.T. deal with and is the dominant hope of all believers during the period covered by Acts.

The confirmation which Paul has referred to, would last "unto the end", that is of this earthly life, whether terminated by death or the Coming of the Lord, so that they might be "blameless in the day of our Lord Jesus Christ" (verse 8). This period seems to look forward to the realization of the Corinthians' hope and the Divine assessment of their service. It is referred to again in the epistle to the Philippians in a similar setting. "Blameless" means "unimpeachable", literally chargeless, and behind it all was the utter faithfulness of God, the only solid rock to rest upon (9). The pattern of verses 1-9, as C. H. Welch has shown is as follows:

A | i. 1-3. Called. Fellowship in every place.
B | 4-7-. Confirmation. Gifts (as in chapter xii.).
C | -7. Coming. Waiting for the Coming.
B | 8. Confirmation. Graces (as in chapter xiii.).
A | i. 9. Called unto the fellowship of His Son.

A new section commences in verse 10 in which Paul reprimands the Corinthian believers for their cliques and disunity, appealing to them to put an end to this sort of thing, which denied in practice union that God has made between His children and makes spiritual growth impossible. We give C. K. Barrett's translation of verses 10-13:

> "I beg you, brothers, for the sake of our Lord Jesus Christ, that you may be all agreed in what you say, and that there may be no divisions among you; rather, that you may be restored to unity of mind and opinion. I make this appeal, my brothers, because it has been made known to me by the members of Chloe's household that there are some contentions among you. What I mean is this: each one of you has his own watch-word—'I belong to Paul', 'I belong to Apollos', 'I belong to Cephas', 'I belong to Christ'."

The immaturity of these believers made the devil's work of splitting them so easy. Those who ranged themselves under the name of Apollos were possibly those who admired rhetoric and the polished style of this leader. One can well understand those who rated the gift of tongues highly, being attracted by Apollos who was an "eloquent man" (Acts xviii. 24), coming from Alexandria, a centre of Jewish rhetoric. Those who followed Peter were doubtless the Judaists who followed the Jewish law and ceremonial and the link with Jerusalem. Others chose the name of Christ, and while this appears better on the surface, they were equally condemned with the other factions, including those who said "I am of Paul". It may be that the Christ followers were those who took the attitude that the words of Christ spoken when on earth were more important than those of apostles, an attitude that many adopt today, forgetting that it was the same Christ who later spoke from heaven (Heb. xii. 25) through His servants, just as He had spoken on earth. To turn away from them, was to turn away from Him. "Perfectly joined together" (katartizo) was a technical word for setting a broken bone. It is used in Mark i. 19 for the mending of nets, and in Gal. vi. 1 for the restoration of a brother overtaken in a fault. The Apostle insists that these divisions must end and that they should be restored to unity of mind and opinion.

Spiritual gifts do not automatically lead to a spiritual state of mind. No church in the N.T. had such an abundance of gifts as the church at Corinth, yet no other assembly equaled it for carnality and division. As a result Paul had to say:

> "And I, brethren, could not speak unto you as unto spiritual, but as unto carnal, even as unto babes in Christ' (iii. 1).

This condition made it impossible for them to advance in the knowledge of the truth:

> "I have fed you with milk, and not with meat: for hitherto ye were not able to bear it, neither yet now are ye able" (iii. 2).

He seeks to bring home to the Corinthians the true meaning of what was happening, by asking a series of rhetorical questions: "Is Christ divided? Was Paul crucified for you? Or were ye baptized in the name of Paul?" He adds: "I thank God that I baptized none of you, but Crispus and Gaius; lest any should say that I had baptized in mine own name. And I baptized the household of Stephanas, besides (that) I know not whether I baptized any other".

Here and in verse 17 the Apostle clearly shows the place that water baptism had in his ministry, which certainly was not in the forefront. He was glad he had only baptized a few of them and could not even remember how many! The last thing any truthful critic could say of Paul was that he was careless or unmindful of things pertaining to the truth or the special ministry with which Christ had entrusted him. If water baptism had the importance that many sects have put upon it, these words would have been impossible. Verse 17 is explicit:

> "For Christ sent me not to baptize, but to preach the gospel, not with wisdom of words, lest the cross of Christ should be made of none effect."

The word ‘sent’ is the verb apostello and therefore nothing is clearer than that water baptism was not an essential part of his Christ-directed apostleship or the gospel that it contained, and makes it quite impossible that the ‘one baptism’ of Eph. iv. 5 can be that of water. As a contrast, Peter’s ministry and that of the eleven to the circumcision was definitely linked with baptism (Mark xvi. 14-18, Acts ii. 38) and this was fitting with a nation so long linked with type, shadow and symbol. While these two servants of the Lord preached the same Christ and the same Saviour, yet there were differences in their ministries which it is foolish to ignore, and only those who have an axe to grind will wish to do so.

Whatever their attitude was to him, Paul was determined to preach to the Corinthians the gospel with which he had been entrusted by the risen Saviour (Gal. i. 11, 12). But he was determined to avoid rhetorical skill (the wisdom of words) lest the cross of Christ be emptied (literally), that is, be emptied of its significance and dwindle to nothing under the weight of rhetorical argument. Paul does not represent himself as a brilliant orator, but a faithful proclaimer of the good news of God in his salvation of sinners. Eloquence by itself cannot save; it rather misleads, and the listener can be carried away by the personality and fluency of the speaker. Paul knew well the attraction that oratory had on the Greek mind and he deliberately avoided it so that nothing could detract from the power of the gospel. He now enlarges on wisdom and uses it in two ways both bad and good, the wisdom of men and the wisdom of God. The word occurs no less than 16 times in the passage comprising i. 17 - iii. 19. The section i. 18 - ii. 5 is laid out as follows:

A | i. 18. The Power of God.
B | i. 19-22. The wisdom of the world.
C | i. 23. We preach Christ crucified.
D | i. 24-31. Object—that no flesh should boast.
C | ii. 1, 2. Jesus Christ and Him crucified.
B | ii. 3, 4. Not with . . . . . man’s wisdom.
A | ii. 5. Your faith . . . . . the power of God.

The wisdom of God is entirely beyond man’s intellect and lies behind the Divine purpose of the ages. It was only the matchless wisdom of God that could have devised such a plan and often in its outworking, the Scriptures comment on it. In Rom. xi., after dealing with the “reconciling of the world” (15) and the “secret of Israel’s blindness” (25), the Apostle concludes with praise to God, specially for His wisdom (33). In Rom. xvi. 25-27 he likewise addresses praise to the only “wise God”. In Eph. iii., after revealing the two secrets: (1) of Christ the Head and (2) the Church, His Body, Paul refers to the fact that even principalities and powers are learning through the out-calling of this church the manifold wisdom of God (Eph. iii. 10). God not only has wisdom beyond the comprehension of man, but also the power to carry it out in practice. Hence the preaching of the cross and the salvation accomplished by it, is connected with the power of God (I Cor. i. 18) which makes it completely effectual in those who believe, in spite of the opposition and misunderstanding of unbelievers, who cannot frustrate its working, however much they oppose.

Such are perishing; they are on the road to destruction and to them the gospel of God is nothing but foolishness (i. 18). To the Greek with his culture and art the cross was abhorrent. The idea that a dead Jew hanging on a cross, could meet all their needs was utterly stupid to them as well. To the Jew with his idea of a conquering Messiah, a powerful Being who could rid them of the Roman yoke, the cross with its outward portrayal of weakness was equally repulsive; it was a "scandal", a "stumbling block".

The only wisdom that man knows is centred in himself and entirely leaves God out of account. The only salvation that he can understand is what he imagines he can work out for himself and for the world. The essential difference between the wisdom of God and the wisdom of man is that the former is Christ-centred, whereas the latter is man-centred and because of his sin and poverty of ability it is doomed to utter failure. The Greek mode of thought still persists today and is behind all the man-made schemes for 'progress' so-called and the betterment of the world.

No.3. pp. 47 - 51

In the section of the epistle we are now considering, i. 18 - ii.5, it is surely clear that human wisdom is set in complete opposition to the wisdom of God. Sin and human limitation have so adversely affected man's mind, that he cannot grasp the thoughts or ways of God (Isa. lv. 8, 9). Yet in his pride and blindness he deceives himself into thinking that his ideas are best, and does not hesitate to bring even the Creator to the bar of his own puny judgment. No wonder the wisdom of man at its best is looked on as foolishness by God, and the ways of God are looked on as foolishness by men (I Cor. i. 18, 20, 21). "For after that in the wisdom of God the world by wisdom knew not God, it pleased God by the foolishness of preaching to save them that believe" (21). Note that it does not say "by foolish preaching". Alas, there is too much of that. More accurately it is "by the folly of the Christian preaching". It is the message preached that appears to be folly to the unsaved, natural man. Whether it was to the Jew, who in his unbelief constantly demanded that God should back up His message by signs additional to those He had already given (Matt. xvi. 1-4), or the Gentile (Greek) who had an inflated idea of his own intellectual capacity. Christ crucified was the only truth that could meet both needs and this was the only proclamation that Paul determined he would give (22-24).

The Apostle now points to the Corinthian church as being a practical illustration of this:

> "You can see what I mean, brothers, by looking at your own calling as Christians, for there are among you not many who are wise by human standards, not many who are powerful, not many who are nobly born" (verse 26 C. K. Barrett's translation).

The Countess of Huntingdon, who did such a fine work with the Gospel in the times of the Wesleys, was reputed to have said she thanked God for the letter 'm'. The context said "not many noble", rather than "not any noble", for she was a society woman who had nevertheless been gloriously saved. From what Paul said it was clear that the gospel was spreading most rapidly among the lower classes and this was another reason why it was despised by the elite. In this gospel not only do we see the deepest needs of every man being met, whatever class or race he might belong to, but also that God was engaged in overthrowing the world's false standards:

> "God chose what the world counts foolish in order to put to shame the world's wise men; and God chose what the world counts weak in order to put to shame what it counts strong, with what the world counts base and despised, even the things that did not exist God chose, that He might do away with what did exist, that no one might glory in His presence" (verses 27-29 C. K. Barrett).

God has arranged the salvation of men so that they have "no finger in the pie"! If they had, they would surely boast of it, however small it might be, and this is one thing God will not tolerate. He Himself will have all the glory and adoration as Redeemer and Lord.

Paul is not only concerned abut the empty boasting of the world; he brings the truth to bear on false boasting in the church where they were "boasting in men" (iii. 21) and putting wrong valuation upon some of their own apostles and ministers (i. 12). They tended to forget that their Christian calling and standing depended not upon the merits of these men, but upon God's call and His grace:

> "But of Him (God) are ye in Christ Jesus, Who of God is made unto us wisdom, and righteousness, and sanctification and redemption" (30).

The verse reads literally "you are from God", that is, you had your origin in God and His redemptive work through Christ, and He is the source of all you need in the way of real wisdom, righteousness, sanctification and redemption, and men, whether apostles or prophets, are but His servants. Of all the many titles of Christ, that of being the Wisdom of God is apt to be overlooked. In Prov. viii. 22-31 wisdom is personified as being with God at creation. In the Word of God, creation is always ascribed to Christ (see John i. 3; Col. i. 14-17). What more natural then for the Apostle to use Wisdom, not in the abstract as was so often done in Greece, but concretely, as a Person, and summed up in the Creator and Redeemer, the Lord Jesus Christ. Paul concludes the section by saying that if anyone is to boast, let him boast in the same Lord. All of us have nothing but what we have received from Him (iv. 7), so it is only fit and right that He should receive our thanks and adoration.

Chapter ii. commences with the emphatic kago, which makes clear that the Apostle is continuing his argument and showing how it applied to his own ministry. If human wisdom at its best is foolishness with God and all true wisdom is embodied in Christ, then in line with this, in his ministry and the preaching of the gospel, he purposely avoided mere cleverness or eloquence and anything that could be construed as being showy or outwardly attractive, knowing that this, while it would appeal to the Greek mind, could only detract from the power of the message:

> "And I, brethren, when I came unto you, came not with excellency of speech or of wisdom, proclaiming to you the mystery of God" (ii. 1 R.V.).

The reader will notice that the R.V. reads 'mystery' instead of 'testimony' (A.V.). It is not easy to decide which is the correct reading, for both have good manuscript backing. The words look somewhat similar in Greek marturion and musterion and could easily have been confused by a copyist. The balance seems to be in favour of 'testimony' and this would line up with "the testimony of Christ" in i. 6. The phrase "the testimony of God" could either mean "testimony about God" (objective genitive) or "the testimony borne by God" (subjective genitive). Lightfoot takes the genitive of i. 6 as objective and ii. 1 as subjective, the testimony borne by God to Christ. One thing is perfectly clear however, that in view of their carnal condition and attraction to clever oratory, Paul determined to proclaim among the Corinthians nothing more than the cross of Christ. As iii. 2 expressly declares, they could only take the beginnings of truth, the milk of the Word. Verse 2 has often been misrepresented by being taken out of its setting and made to mean that gospel preaching sums up all truth, that true ministry should consist of nothing more than proclaiming the way God's grace can save a sinner. There are believers who will listen to nothing else than what they term a "gospel message". This conveniently absolves them from any serious Bible study or searching after the deep things of God and apprehending what is "strong meat". They remain in the immature state of spiritual babyhood, taking nothing but the milk of the gospel and even imagine that this is a virtue!

Such do not hesitate to criticize those who want to go on to maturity (perfection). Many of the present day churches are cluttered up with this type of spiritual infant and it is no wonder that the deep things of God, the unsearchable riches of grace and glory as unfolded in the later prison epistles, are so little known or prized among them.

While the Apostle was forced to limit his testimony to the saints at Corinth, yet he was able to go deeper to some, for in ii. 6 he states "howbeit we speak wisdom among the mature (perfect)", but, for the most part, this was impossible, and we may be sure that it gave him no pleasure to have to restrict his message in this way. Not only this, but he confesses to personal weakness and fear, which only shows how human he was:

> "And I was with you in weakness, and in fear, and in much trembling" (ii. 3).

How encouraging it is for us to realize that this great man of God knew what it was to be afraid and to be conscious of being inadequate and weak in himself. This but makes his faithful ministry and witness an eloquent testimony to the all-sufficient grace and power of God.

Deliberately avoiding persuasive words of human wisdom, he relied entirely upon this power:

> "And my argument and my proclamation were not enforced by persuasive words of wisdom, but by a manifestation of spirit and power" (ii. 4, C. K. Barrett).

The Divine conviction and force that accompanied his preaching conveyed a better proof of its truth than external oratory could provide. This concerned its internal effect. Externally it was confirmed, as Rom. xv. 19 declares:

> "Through mighty signs and wonders, by the power of the Spirit of God; so that from Jerusalem, and round about unto Illyricum, I have fully preached the gospel of God."

No wonder Paul avoided the shallow attractiveness of a golden tongue, especially as I Cor. ii. 5 states:

> "In order that your faith should not depend on men's wisdom, but on God's power." (C. K. Barrett).

There is only one safe place for faith to rest upon, and that is Christ, His Person and His work which are complete and changeless. To rest it anywhere else is to ask for disillusionment and misery. How often men and women have been swayed by attractive and brilliant speakers in Christian meetings, and been carried away by the messenger rather than the message! We can be certain of one thing, that any results from this are external only. They cannot and do not last, and when the effect has worn off, the listeners feel they have been "let down".

However, the Apostle declares that, while carnality prevents spiritual growth and keeps such in a state of babyhood, he was prepared to minister deeper truth to mature believers:

> "Howbeit we speak wisdom among the mature (perfect): yet a wisdom not of this age (world), nor of the rulers of this age (world), which are coming to nought; but we speak God's wisdom in a secret (mystery), even the wisdom that hath been hidden, which God fore-ordained before the ages (worlds) unto our glory; which none of the rulers of this age (world) knoweth; for had they known it, they would not have crucified the Lord of glory" (ii. 6-8 R.V.).

God's wisdom here is practically identical with His truth and His purpose. This, for good reasons, God kept hidden. One of the reasons for the "mystery" (secret) truths of the Scriptures is to hide from Satan and his hosts valuable knowledge about God's plans, just as in wartime, any facts that would be valuable to the enemy are suppressed. Let us never forget that ever since Satan's fall there has been enmity and spiritual warfare between himself and God. There is a tremendous battle being fought and redemption has as much to do with its final victory as with the salvation of the individual sinner. Consequently we must be prepared to find that "the rulers of this age (world A.V.)" may mean more than human beings. Satan is described by Christ three times as the "ruler of this world" (John xii. 31; xiv. 30; xvi. 11) and Eph. vi. 12 speaks of "world rulers of this darkness", "spiritual wickedness in heavenly places". These are the evil spirit hosts under the control of Satan who are animating unbelievers to carry out their deadly work. From these, God in His wisdom, hides vital aspects of His redemptive purpose, so they shall not have the advantage.

In verse 8 we cannot exclude the earthly rulers, such as Pontius Pilate and Caiaphas the high priest; these were but the tools of evil spiritual foes who engineered the crucifixion of Christ. Neither of these human beings could be truthfully called a ruler of this age. Little did Satan realize that in murdering the Son of God, this very act would accomplish his overthrow and destruction, for Calvary means victory over Satan and his hosts as well as over sin and death (Col. ii. 14, 15). Had they known this, they would not have crucified the Lord of glory. This majestic title ascribed to Christ, is an outstanding witness to His Deity. No Jew would ever address such a title to anyone but God in the fullest sense.

Needless to say, the wisdom of God in a mystery does not refer to the later mystery of Eph. iii. concerning the Body of Christ. It is not THE mystery but en musterio "in mystery" literally. It was the wisdom of God that had been hidden. Paul was making known God's secret hidden wisdom which He had determined before the ages began for our glory and ultimately His.

No.4. pp. 67 - 71

Before we proceed to consider the next section, we will give its structural outline, and for this we are indebted to Charles H. Welch:

A | ii. 6, 7. What Paul spoke. Wisdom among perfect (mature).
B | ii. 8. Knowledge. None knew. Had they known.
C | ii. 9, 10-. Revelation. Eye, ear, heart. But God revealed.
D | ii. -10-13. The Spirit. |
a | Things of God revealed by the Spirit.
b | Not spirit of the world.
c | But of God.
b | Not man's wisdom.
c | But Holy Spirit.
a | Things of the Spirit explained by spiritual means.
C | ii. 14, 15. Discernment. Spiritually discerned.
B | ii. 16. Knowledge. Known mind of the Lord. The mind of Christ.
A | iii. 1, 2. Why Paul could not speak. Carnal, babes, milk.

The structure clearly shows the sharp distinction between the hidden wisdom of God which could be revealed to the mature, and the carnality of the Corinthian believers which for the most part made this impossible, keeping them in the state of spiritual infancy with the ability to receive only the 'milk' of the Word, the simplest possible truths. In ii. 9 the Apostle makes a Scriptural quotation:

> "But as it is written, Things which eye saw not, and ear heard not, and which entered not into the heart of man, whatsoever things God prepared for them that love Him" (R.V.).

The difficulty here is that this is not an exact quotation, but seems to be a blending of Isa. lxiv. 4 and lxv. 16. The former passage in the LXX reads: "From the beginning we did not hear nor did our eyes see any God but Thee, and Thy works, which Thou shalt do for those who wait (Thy) mercy", and the second passage thus: "They shall forget their former affliction, and it shall not enter into their mind". Origen believed that Paul was quoting not from the O.T., but the apocryphal Apocalypse of Elijah, but this would not justify the introductory "it is written" which always refers to the Scriptures. Whatever the answer to the problem is, we may be sure that the Apostle, under the guidance of the Spirit of God, was quoting truth, and therefore we need have no misgiving.

He now stresses what is most important to grasp, namely that understanding of the Word of God is something that is beyond unaided human capability, however great this may be. Such understanding only comes from the Holy Spirit Who inspired men to write the Word. The Divine Author alone can be the Explainer:

> "But unto us God revealed them through the Spirit; for the Spirit searcheth all things, yea, the deep things of God . . . . . even so the things of God none knoweth, save the Spirit of God. But we received, not the spirit of the world, but the Spirit which is of God, that we might know the things that are freely given to us by God" (ii. 10-12 R.V.).

Man's knowledge is confined to human things (verse 11). Only God can communicate the truth about Himself, His purposes and His ways. There is no other means of attaining to this Divine knowledge. Human intellectual capacity and education will not throw one ray of light of itself upon the Word of God. Why? Because it is spiritual and can only be spiritually discerned, as enabled by the Holy Spirit. A theological course may teach a lot about the Bible and its background, but this is no substitute for Divine enlightenment. When will men learn this? A man may come from a university with a brilliant theological degree and in the eyes of Christendom be eminently suited for preaching and teaching the Scriptures, but if he is not a humble believer depending upon God to give him "opened eyes", he is as blind as a bat spiritually, and merely becomes a blind leader of the blind.

Not that we despise education, but we should know its limitations and keep it in its rightful place. No one knows the things of God save the Spirit of God (verse 11), and He has been given to us in order that "we might know the things that are freely given to us by God, which things also we speak", says the Apostle, "not in words which man's wisdoms teacheth, but which the Spirit teacheth, comparing spiritual things with spiritual" (verse 13 R.V.). The spirit of the world and human wisdom and knowledge are less than useless here. The Holy Spirit Himself must be the Teacher, and He communicates His truth to us as we grow in grace and love and compare spiritual things with spiritual.

We may well ask, just what is the meaning of this last phrase? There have been a variety of translations and interpretations. It all depends on the meaning of sugkrino translated comparing, and the gender of the adjective pneumatikos spiritual. This can be either masculine or neuter. If masculine it will mean "spiritual persons"; if neuter it will be "spiritual things" or "spiritual words". Sugkrino can mean "combine", "interpret", or "compare". It only occurs again in II Cor. x. 12 rendered "comparing". Darby translates I Cor. ii. 13 "communicating spiritual things by spiritual means". Knox: "matching what is spiritual with what is spiritual". Moffatt: "we interpret what is spiritual in spiritual language". Coneybeare: "explaining spiritual things to spiritual men". Goodspeed: "giving spiritual truth a spiritual form". Revised Standard Version: "interpreting spiritual truths to those who possess the Spirit", and in the footnote: or "interpreting spiritual truths in spiritual language, or comparing spiritual things with spiritual".

It is obvious that this verse is difficult to translate. The sense can either be comparing spiritual things, i.e. the words of Scripture, or interpreting spiritual truths to spiritual people or by means of spiritual words. The fact is that all these renderings express truth and it would be safer to take the meaning of them all. It would be useless to try and explain the truth of God to anyone who is not spiritual, that is not a saved person who is walking according to the new nature (spirit). On the other hand, if we want to correctly interpret God's truth, we must be ready to compare with spiritual words of Scripture and let one passage throw light on or interpret another.

The Apostle makes it quite clear that the unsaved, the natural man, however clever or educated, can never receive or understand the Word of God:

> "Now the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God: for they are foolishness unto him; and he cannot know them, because they are spiritually judged" (verse 14 R.V.).

As we have before stressed it is only by the enlightenment of the Holy Spirit that saved people can come to a full knowledge of the Truth. Even then this is not mechanical. The carnal Christian will not be given light on the Word. A believer must be 'spiritual', with a mind and keen desire for the Spirit's work, and he must search the Scriptures, for this is the means God chooses to use to bring him to Divine understanding. If a Christian keeps the Bible closed, he cannot expect enlightenment. Paul goes on to assert that the spiritual man judges or investigates all things, but he himself is not open to such judgment by anyone (verse 15). Does he mean by this that the spiritual man must not be exposed to testing? This cannot be, for he says in xiv. 29, "let the prophets speak two or three, and let the other judge". The answer seems to be in iv. 3 where he states expressly that human judgment of praise or blame means nothing to him; his only judge is the Lord. So with the spiritual man; for him the final judgment and the only one that matters, is the Lord's verdict. And who can know the Lord's mind, apart from what He is willing to reveal? (verse 16). But we, says the Apostle, referring to himself and his spiritual colleagues, have such a revelation and outlook. In this sense "we have the mind of Christ".

The Apostle now returns to the present situation at Corinth. He has to lament that their carnal condition with their splits, divisions and jealousies had made it impossible for him to give them anything but the simplest truth which he likens to 'milk'. They were no better than Christian babies and could take nothing but the milk bottle. Solid food was impossible, though he longed to lead them on into deeper truths (iii. 1-4). He remonstrates with them for ranging themselves in splinter groups under his own name and that of Apollos and says:

> "What then is Apollos? and what is Paul? Ministers through whom ye believed; and each as the Lord gave to him" (iii. 5 R.V.).

The answer to these questions is not that Paul and Apollos are nothing, but they are servants of Christ, nothing more and nothing less. They are not to be idolized on the one hand, or ignored on the other. They were the channels Christ had chosen to reach them with the gospel, and appreciation of this would have saved the Corinthians from such party divisions.

> "I planted, Apollos watered the plants. It was not we however, but God Who made them grow. It follows that neither he who plants nor he who waters counts for anything, but only He Who causes the growth—God" (iii. 6, 7 C. K. Barrett).

Paul likens the ministry of himself and Apollos to gardeners. No gardener, however diligent, can give either life or growth to the plant. This is God's work alone. The significance is that God accepts his labour and uses it. In himself, the gardener has no independent importance. So it was with the service of Paul and Apollos, and since they were but instruments in the hand of Christ, it was foolish to play one off against the other—"He that planteth and he that watereth are one" (8). That is to say that the aim and result of their work are identical.

This naturally leads to the important question of the quality of Christian service and its final assessment by the Lord, leading either to reward or loss. This line of truth has always to be kept distinct from salvation as God's free gift by grace apart from works or merit. Much damage has resulted from these two linked yet separate truths being confused, or one being stressed at the expense of the other. Many Bible problems can be solved by 'rightly dividing' these two aspects of doctrine and they are principles that run right throughout the Bible, and the importance of correctly evaluating them can hardly be over-stressed. The immediate context here relates first of all to the service of Paul and Apollos, but the argument broadens out to take in all believers:

> ". . . . But each shall receive his own reward according to his own labour. For we are God's fellow-workers; ye are God's husbandry, God's building" (iii. 8, 9 R.V.).

The A.V. "we are labourers together with God" is possible from the Greek, but the R.V. is to be preferred and fits the context better. It is not so much that the apostles were working together and God was working with them (although this was true), but rather that they were united in service and belonged to the Lord. They were "God's fellow-workers", whereas the church at Corinth was likened both to a field and a building. "Ye re God's husbandry, God's building." They were likened to agricultural and architectural work done by the Lord. The Apostle now drops the horticultural metaphor and goes on to describe them as a structure and builders whom the great Architect was using. He reminds them of their responsibility as such; they could be wise builders or jerry builders using bad materials and becoming shoddy workers. At the end they would have to account to the Master, hence they should think very carefully about their present conduct and quality of service. Grace does not mean that God will overlook bad workmanship or disloyalty to His truth.

No.5. pp. 86 - 89

In the section of the epistle we are dealing with, the Apostle Paul elaborates the theme of Christian service, using the figure of a building, with its foundation and superstructure:

> "According to the grace of God which was given unto me, as a wise master builder, I laid a foundation; and another buildeth thereon. But let each man take heed how he buildeth thereon. For other foundation can no man lay than that which is laid, which is Jesus Christ" (iii. 10, 11 R.V.).

The exceeding grace of God which had been manifested in his salvation, still continued with him and enabled him to serve faithfully. As a wise or skilled master-builder he had laid the one Foundation, Jesus Christ. This great Foundation is true and unchangeable for all time, and for the whole of God's redemptive purpose. Paul was the original evangelist through whose ministry the first converts at Corinth had responded. He had faithfully preached Christ and this Foundation had been well and truly laid by him. But foundations are made for erections or superstructures and the Corinthians are now being told that they are all builders, but of what kind? Good builders or otherwise? "Let each man take heed how he buildeth thereupon." The materials used are all-important:

> "But if any man buildeth on the Foundation gold, silver, costly stones, wood, hay, stubble; each man's work shall be made manifest: for the day shall declare it, because it is revealed in fire" (iii. 12, 13- R.V.).

The workman may use shoddy materials, and when the future Day of testing comes, there will be no possibility of concealment. Judgment by fire is not new in the Scriptures. "Our God is a consuming fire" (Heb. xii. 28, 29). The fire of testing will not touch the workman, but his service:

> "And the fire itself shall prove each man's work of what sort it is. If any man's work shall abide which he built thereon, he shall receive a reward. If any man's work shall be burned, he shall suffer loss; but he himself shall be saved; yet so as through fire" (verses -13-15 R.V.).

Nothing could be clearer than the distinction here made between the believer who has been saved by grace apart from his works, and his service to the Lord which consists of his works. Because his salvation depends entirely upon the Lord's redemptive work on the Cross, nothing can affect or alter this. Nothing can separate him from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord (Rom. viii. 39). But it can be very different with his service. There are unfaithful children of God; there are those whose service has not conformed to the pattern of His will. Wrong motives have entered in. Self aggrandizement, error and other works of the sinful old nature have got mixed up with his actions. All this is likened to "woods, hay and stubble", which will be completely destroyed in the day of testing. The Apostle goes on to warn the Corinthian church that they constitute a temple of God, inhabited by the Spirit, and if this temple is marred by their conduct, God will destroy the offenders. The local church, a manifestation of God's Temple, could be removed under judgment and go out of existence. If it is insisted that Paul is referring to the individual believer rather than the assembly as a whole, then such judgment could end in physical death, as the abuses at the Lord's Table later on clearly show (I Cor. xi. 30). Direct Divine judgment for sin, a characteristic of the earthly kingdom, was still in force during the Acts period (cp. Acts v. 1-10; xiii. 6-11). There was indeed "a sin unto death" (I John v. 16).

Paul now returns to the great contrast between earthly and heavenly wisdom, the conceptions of unredeemed man in spiritual darkness, and the thoughts and ways of God so infinitely above these:

> "Let no one deceive himself. If anyone among you supposes that he is wise by the standards of this age, let him become foolish by the standards of this age, in order that he may become truly wise. For the wisdom of this world is foolishness with God. For in Scripture God is described as 'He who catches the wise in their own craftiness'; and again 'The Lord knows that the thoughts of the wise are vain'. So let no one make his boast in men, for all things are yours—Paul, Apollos or Cephas, the world, or life, or death, things present or things to come—all belong to you, and you belong to Christ, and Christ belongs to God" (iii. 18-23 C. K. Barrett).

Self deception is the fate of those who imagine themselves to be really wise apart from God, and this delusion is the fruit of estimation by the wrong standards. If anyone wishes to be wise in the truest sense, then he must not expect to experience this by trying to add a little of God's wisdom to his own. His own wisdom must be cast away completely and God's estimation received by a child-like trust. These two are complete opposites and can never be reconciled. This the Apostle states in the sharpest terms:

> "For the wisdom of this world is foolishness with God."

The conclusion then is inescapable: "So let no one make his boast in men". This is just what the Corinthians had been doing, ranging themselves under the names of various servants of God, stating in effect that they belonged to Paul, Apollos or Cephas. This inverted the truth. They really belonged to Christ, the Lord over all things, and as this was true, then the world, life, death, things present, things to come—all things belonged to them in and through Him. With such a vast heritage, how stupid it was for any of them to follow men, even if these were the Lord's servants!

The fourth chapter commences with advice as to how God's servants, including himself, should be properly regarded:

> "How then should a man think of us? As Christ's servants and stewards of God's mysteries (secrets)" (iv. 1 C. K. Barrett).

If we read the first sentence as a question as C. K. Barrett does, then the answer is that Christian leaders are to be regarded as Christ's servants, no more and no less. The servant has no special significance of his own. His work is not his but his master's. He is also his master's steward or household manager (oikonomos). This is allied to the word oikonomia dispensation, and shows us that a dispensation in the N.T. is not the same as an age, a period of time merely, but a faithful handling and setting forth of some particular aspect of truth that belongs to God, which He has entrusted to the steward to dispense. What is the chief characteristic that one looks for in such a man? Not intellectual prowess or cleverness, but just complete reliability and trustworthiness, specially when one remembers a steward is handling, not his own property, but someone else's. There can be no deviation from this, or any substitute for faithfulness. The Lord's commendation in the parable was not 'Well done, thou good and successful servant', but "well done, thou good and faithful servant" (Matt. xxv. 21), and every one of us who seeks to serve the Lord must continually keep this in the forefront of his mind, for it is of the utmost importance.

With the exception of the book of the Revelation, which deals with the future Day of the Lord described by the O.T., and the final winding up of things when the mystery of God will be finished (Rev. x. 7), the Apostle Paul is the only writer who uses the word 'mystery' or secret in his epistles. His ministry deals with a number of secret aspects of the Lord's great redemptive plan, culminating in the great Secret of Ephesians and Colossians of which he alone claimed to be the minister or channel of revelation (Eph. iii. 3-10; Col. i. 24-27). Peter faithfully gave his witness without using the word once. One must therefore take care to distinguish the fundamental truths relating to salvation that are common to all the apostles, and those other aspects which are peculiar to the ministry the risen Lord gave each of them and the particular sphere to which they were sent by Him.

Having stressed absolute loyalty and trustworthiness as the basic requirement of a steward of God, the question arises, by whose standards of trustworthiness is he to be judged? So the Apostle continues:

> "To me it is a matter of the smallest importance that I should be examined by you, or by any human assize" (iv. 3 C. K. Barrett).

If Paul had been affected by every criticism he received, he would surely have given up his ministry in despair. His argument, which is implicit, is that no fellow-believer can fairly or righteously assess the Christian service of another. Only the Lord Himself, the righteous Judge, can do this (Rom. xiv. 4). It is fairly obvious that the criticism which appears as a full-scale attack in II Corinthians, had already begun. The last words of the above translation are literally "by man's day". If the day of Christ is the time when He will righteously judge His people's service, then man's day is the present time when man has 'all the say' and is judging, or more truthfully, mis-judging. The Apostle is quite indifferent to this, man's poor attempts to do God's work for Him. He even does not depend upon the verdict of his own conscience:

> ". . . . . I judge not mine own self. For I know nothing against myself; yet am I not hereby justified: but He that judges me is the Lord" (iv. 4 R.V.).

Even though my own conscience does not reprove me in any way, says the Apostle, I am not justified by this. My only real judge is the Lord Himself. As the Lord's coming during the Acts was imminent, and the Corinthian letters were written during this period, Paul insists that all judgment must be left to the soon Coming One:

"Wherefore judge nothing before the time, until the Lord come, Who will both bring to light the hidden things of darkness, and make manifest the counsels of the hearts; and then shall each man have his praise from God" (iv. 5 R.V.).

"Now, my brothers, I have for your sake made these things seem to apply to Apollos and myself, in order that by our example you may learn the meaning of 'Nothing beyond what stands written', so that you may not be puffed up, each on behalf of one and against another. For what makes you different from your neighbour? And what have you that you did not receive? But if you received it, why do you boast as if you had not received it?" (iv. 6, 7 C. K. Barrett).

The Apostle Paul evidently made the argument of the last few verses look as if they applied to himself and Apollos, so that the Corinthians might learn by their example what the phrase "Nothing beyond what stands written" really means. It is not easy to interpret this today as we do not know all the circumstances that made up the situation at Corinth, but it was evidently easily understood by the believers there. It would seem to be a Christian slogan that was current in the district, whether Jewish or not, we cannot be sure. But it was a good one, advocating no belief but what could be substantiated by Scripture. It would indeed be good advice for all of us. How much error would be avoided if people would refuse to accept anything that is not clearly backed up by the Word of God rightly divided!

No.6. pp. 106 - 109

The Apostle Paul continues his argument in chapter iv. dealing with the splits in the church and the boastfulness of some of its members. He reminds that what knowledge they possessed had been given them by the Lord and did not originate in their own capability, so that they really had nothing to boast about in themselves:

". . . . . that no one of you be puffed up for the one against the other. For who maketh thee to differ? and what hast thou that thou didst not receive? But if thou didst receive it, why dost thou glory (boast), as if thou hadst not received it?" (iv. 6, 7 R.V.).

The Apostle now turns to irony. The Corinthians were prepared to sit in judgment on Paul and his fellow workers and put them in their place. They imagine that they enjoyed the culmination of blessing and had received all the gifts of the Spirit, not merely some, and were acting as though the earthly kingdom had already been consummated and they had entered into it without the help of Paul or those associated with him:

"Already are ye filled (literally reached satiety), already ye are become rich, ye have reigned without us: yea and I would that ye did reign, that we also might reign with you" (iv. 8 R.V.).

In one sense the Apostle could have wished this was true, for had that been so, many problems would be resolved. But the real position was very different:

"For I think, God hath set forth us the apostles last of all, as men doomed to death: for we are made a spectacle unto the world, and to angels, and to men" (iv. 9 R.V.).

The apostles are presented by God to the world like the unfortunate beings, brought on at the close of a display in the arena, and as such condemned to death by mortal combat with one another, or with wild beasts. The word "spectacle" is theatron, theatre, the place where such spectacles were presented. The sense is "for we became a spectacle to the whole world, angels and men alike" (C. K. Barrett). How very different from the picture conjured up in the Corinthians' boastful minds! Paul now goes on to contrast himself and his fellow workers with the self-satisfied believers at Corinth:

> "We are fools for Christ's sake, but ye are wise in Christ; we are weak, but ye are strong; ye have glory, but we have dishonour. Even unto this present hour we both hunger, and thirst, and are naked, and are buffeted, and have no certain dwelling-place; and we toil, working with our own hands: being reviled, we bless; being persecuted, we endure; beings defamed, we entreat: we are made as the filth of the world, the off-scouring of all things, even until now" (iv. 10-13 R.V.).

The Corinthians may have imagined that they had come into their kingdom and the problems were over. Not so the Apostle. For him there was no relief from labour, privation or suffering. Going hungry, thirsty and naked possibly resulted from the depredations of robbers in his frequent journeyings and through sheer lack of supplies. He includes 'perils of robbers' in his long list of sufferings for Christ (II or. Xi. 26). His language here in I Corinthians reminds one of The Sermon on the Mount, returning good for evil.

He ends this section by describing himself as the world's scapegoat, no better than the scum of the earth. This was the price he was willing to pay in order to be a faithful servant and witness of Christ! How very different from some of the Christian leaders at Corinth! As they read this epistle, describing what Paul was undergoing, they ought to have been ashamed, though Paul insists that he did not deliberately set out to shame them, but rather to warn them as his dear children (verse 14). They might have thousands of tutors in Christ, yet not many fathers; for the relationship of father and son is much closer and intimate, and it was through his faithful preaching of the gospel when he first visited Corinth that they came to spiritual birth and a personal knowledge of Christ our Saviour. Paul had begotten them through the gospel. He does not use the word 'regeneration' for this is God's work. The Apostle only uses this figure of begettal to stress the closeness of his relationship to the believers at Corinth. He can therefore ask them to be 'imitators of me' (16). In xi. 1 he again exhorts them to copy him, even as he imitated Christ. A man must live very closely to the Lord to be able to use such language with truth and without hypocrisy. But there was no doubt that this man's practice squared with his preaching and therefore he could sincerely make such a tremendous statement without any idea of advertising or exalting himself. We should see to it that we are worthy representatives of the Saviour in the same way, for the unbelieving world around us knows Him not. It would indeed be a great thing if they could see some reflection of Christ in us in the way we act and speak.

Because Paul is so concerned with the Corinthians saints he is going to help them to this end, by sending Timothy:

> "For this cause have I sent unto you Timothy, who is my beloved and faithful child in the Lord, who shall put you in remembrance of my ways which be in Christ, even as I teach everywhere in every church" (iv. 17 R.V.).

Chapter xvi. 10 ("If Timothy come") seems to be a difficulty, but we do not know all the circumstances. If we did, there would doubtless be an explanation. The possibility is that there were some reason that might prevent him reaching Corinth. We have already seen the dangers of traveling in those days apart from anything else, so we need have no misgivings about this.

While the Apostle Paul loved these converts at Corinth, yet his wisdom ensured that, when they needed firm handling, this was forthcoming. He now tells them that he knows some among them had taken the view that he would not bother to come to Corinth again, so that they need not be unduly concerned about the state of the church:

> "Now some are puffed up, as though I were not coming to you. But I will come to you shortly, if the Lord will; and I will know, not the word of them which are puffed up, but the power" (iv. 18, 19 R.V.).

"Puffed up" is a characteristic word of this epistle and it expresses the sad state of arrogance in the Corinthian assembly. When he came he would be able to assess and deal with these conceited critics of his. There was evidently a good deal of talking going on at Corinth, but Paul now contrasts this and the carnal power behind it with the real power of the Spirit that operates and develops the kingdom of God, "for the kingdom of God is not (i.e. does not operate) in word, but in power" (20). He then throws out a challenge:

> "What would you like? Am I come to you with a rod? Or in love and a spirit of gentleness?" (iv. 21 C. K. Barrett).

There was no doubt which the Apostle preferred, but it was for the Corinthians to decide. If some did not mend their ways, then he, as the spiritual father, must punish and discipline them with his apostolic power.

A new section now develops in chapter v. in which Paul deals with immorality inside and outside the assembly. We must remember that the state of morals at Corinth was low indeed and immorality was not considered to be a very bad thing. With the rapid drifting away from Christian standards, we have a similar situation developing in our day. If this trend goes on, we shall see fornication and adultery being universally advocated as something desirable. This is clearly a manifestation of the Babylonian lie, where standards are deliberately twisted and altered. Good is represented as being bad, and bad is represented as being good, and all this is a symptom of the terrible degeneracy both spiritual and natural at the end of this age which the Word has foretold.

Paul writes and tells the Corinthians that he has heard of immorality among them, in that one member was living with his father's wife. The Apostle does not call it adultery, from which we may conclude that either the offender's father was not living or that he had divorced his wife. Such a relationship was even condemned by the Gentiles, and what was so distressing was not just the sin itself, but the arrogant way and the levity with which the Corinthian church had treated it. Doubtless they regarded this as real "freedom". They were now not under law and could do what they liked:

> "And ye are puffed up, and did not rather mourn, that he that had done this deed might be taken away from among you" (v. 2 R.V.).

But Paul had already come to a decision. Although he was not personally present at Corinth, in thought and spirit he was there and had already made up his mind regarding the one who had sinned:

> "When you have been gathered together, with my spirit, in the name of the Lord Jesus, we should, with the power of our Lord Jesus, hand over such a man as this to Satan, for the destruction of his flesh, in order that his spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord" (v. 4, 5 C. K. Barrett).

Paul was desirous that this severe judgment should not result from his apostolic power alone, but that it should be the judgment of the whole church, acting under the power of Christ as Lord. They would not only meet in the name of the Lord Jesus, but with the intention of acting in obedience to Him as Lord and with His power underlying them. We must remember that grace as a dispensation or administration, had not yet fully come. The definite judgments of God among believers during the Acts period (as Ananias and Sapphira) are evidence for this.

What does handing over to Satan for the destruction of the flesh mean? It does not envisage perishing eternally for the spirit would be saved in the day of the Lord. It cannot mean the flesh as the sinful old nature, for only the cross of Christ can deal with this (Rom. vi. 6) and in any case it would not be in Satan's interest to destroy the old nature, for this is the very thing he seeks to work on and ensnare the believer. It can only mean the physical flesh, and in this case Satan would be permitted to inflict severe bodily suffering and possibly death. That Satan can attack the body of the believer with God's permission, Job and even Paul himself are sufficient evidence (II Cor. xii. 7). Just how far he can go is certainly by the Lord.

Here Paul was concerned for the final salvation of the erring member and also with the purity of the church as a whole.

We have seen, in the section of the epistle we are dealing with, that the Apostle Paul was concerned not only with the sinning member of the Corinthian assembly, but also with the effect on the church as a whole. He tells them that their boasting (glorying) is not good, and that sin is like an infection—it can spread:

> "Your boasting (glorying) is not good. Know ye not that a little leaven leaveneth the whole lump? Purge out the old leaven, that ye may be a new lump, even as ye are unleavened" (v. 6, 7 R.V.).

We have before noted that leaven or yeast in Scripture is always used in a bad sense, and is a picture of sin. The Apostle makes the same quotation in Gal. v. 9. Here he is about to introduce the illustration of the O.T. Passover feast, where leaven was not only prohibited in the bread, but had to be removed even from their houses (Exod. xii. 8, 15-20). In Matt. xvi. 6, 11, 12 the Lord Himself uses leaven to represent evil doctrine. In view of this, such popular phrases as the 'leaven of the gospel' used by some Christians must be avoided. It needs only a small amount of yeast to permeate a large lump of dough, and from this we can gather that the Corinthian believers were taking a light view of the sin in their midst. Just as the O.T. Israelite had to remove or purge out any yeast that had been introduced into the house before Passover, so the believers at Corinth must deal with this sin and remove the erring brother. They would then be like a fresh lump of dough without leaven and would approximate more nearly in practice to their 'unleavened' position in Christ. This could only be experienced because the true Passover Lamb had been sacrificed:

> "For besides, our Passover lamb, Christ, has already been sacrificed. So let us celebrate the feast not with old leaven, not with the leaven of malice and wickedness, but with the unleavened loaves of sincerity and truth" (v. 7, 8 C. K. Barrett).

There is no doubt that, primarily, man cannot atone for, or deliver himself from the bondage of sin. Still less can he do it for someone else (Psa. xlix. 7). God Himself must bear the burden of His people's guilt and He does so in the Person of Christ. All the believer in Christ can do is to give continual thanksgiving to God for this mighty act of deliverance from sin's slavery and penalty, and must express it not only in words, but in everyday life. It is quite likely that Paul was writing at Passover time, in which case his illustration would be more pointed.

From the next verse we can see that the Apostle had already written to the Corinthian church on the subject of immorality, but some there had misunderstood him. We need have no misgiving that part of inspired Scripture has been lost. It is not necessary to assume that every letter Paul wrote in his lifetime was "God-breathed" or inspired by the Holy Spirit. But every one that had this hall-mark has certainly been preserved by God in the N.T. He had previously written to them that they should not keep company with fornicators. This, in the absolute sense, would be impossible in a place like Corinth. To carry this out perfectly, one would have to go out of the world, which would be impossible:

> "No: what I now write you is that you should not mix with anyone known as a Christian brother who is a fornicator, or rapacious man, or idolater, or abusive man, or drunkard, or robber, with such a man you ought not even to eat" (v. 11 C. K. Barrett).

It is significant that Paul gives no encouragement to the monasticism that arose in the early centuries, the idea of which is that one can escape the world and its pollution by withdrawing into solitude or religious community life. What such people do not realize is that they take their greatest enemy in with them, namely their sinful old nature! In the same way the Lord Jesus prayed:

> "I pray not that Thou shouldest take them out of the world, but that Thou shouldest keep them from the evil" (John xvii. 15).

And if all God's children retired into monasteries, how could the testimony to His truth spread and His light shine out to a world of darkness? Paul now goes on to instruct the Corinthians that it is their duty to correctly assess and deal with the problem in their midst. This is what he means by the word 'judge', and this must not be done in any spirit of censoriousness or fault finding. This type of judgment is often too prevalent, alas, and must be avoided. Their concern should be towards 'those within' (i.e. the church, namely, believers). Those outside (unbelievers) must be left to the province of God to judge (verses 12 and 13). Meanwhile, they must exclude from their company the wicked person who was causing all this trouble (13).

Chapter vi. starts with another failure in the church at Corinth which had probably been reported to him by the household of Chloe, or through Stephanas and his friends. Believers were going to law with each other before pagan courts, and so giving a thoroughly bad witness to an unbelieving world. This should not be necessary for (1) they should be able to settle their own disputes among themselves and (2) these disputes would never arise if they were walking in love and Christ-likeness. The Apostle commences with a strong word (tolmao) as Rom. v. 7 and xv. 18 show:

> "Does any one of you dare, when he has a suit against his fellow, to go to law before the unrighteous and not before the saints?" (vi. 1 C. K. Barrett).

The 'unrighteous' and the 'saints' are clearly the unsaved and the saved. The N.T. writers do not use the word 'unrighteous' (adikos) for a believer in Christ. When such slip into sin, Paul describes them as 'carnal'; they are walking according to the sinful old nature. The sin itself is of course unrighteous. One must not glamorize sin. The 'unjust' or 'unrighteous' (either of these translate adikos) are those who know nothing of righteousness imputed by God, as set forth in the epistle to the Romans. They are the unsaved; whereas the saved are righteous in Christ, in the sense that Romans uses the term and 'holy' in Him (i.e. saints) although, like the Corinthians, they may be far from holy or righteous in their walk day by day.

Paul now follows with an astounding statement:

> "Or know ye not that the saints shall judge the world? and if the world is judged by you, are ye unworthy to judge the smallest matters? Know ye not that we shall judge angels? how much more, things that pertain to this life?" (vi. 2, 3 R.V.).

Here is what is known as a majori ad minus argument. If at some future time God's children are going to join with Him, not only in the tremendous task of judging the world, but angels too, then what a poor thing if they could not settle their petty differences amongst themselves here and now! These angels doubtless include those who are being reserved in everlasting chains for the future judgment of "the great day" (II Pet. ii. 4; Jude 6). Not only are the sinning angels being reserved for this future judgment, but Peter assures us that the unrighteous (adikoi) are being likewise reserved for the day of judgment to be punished (II Pet. ii. 9), and he gives a vivid description of some of these throughout the chapter.

When the Corinthians realized that they were to take part in such future judgment as that of angels, Paul hopes that they would be ashamed of themselves in their resort to heathen courts:

> "I say this to move you to shame. Is it so, that there cannot be found among you one wise man, who shall be able to decide between his brethren, but brother goeth to law with brother, and that before unbelievers?" (vi. 5, 6 R.V.).

Such conduct was absolute failure in Christian practice ('fault' A.V., 'defect' R.V.). It would have been much better for them to suffer wrong and put up with the consequences. If it meant being defrauded, this was better than bad spectacle of believers quarreling in a public court before a pagan, unbelieving world. To do wrong is the greater evil, to suffer wrong the less. The Apostle could have referred to the Sermon on the Mount as confirmation of this (Matt. v. 39-42), but he does not do so. In any case he spoke with the Lord's authority. They were indeed 'doing wrong' (8), and now he vividly reminds them in verse 9 that wrong doers such as he lists in verses 9 and 10 cannot look forward to possessing any future inheritance in the Kingdom of God. Some of them in their pre-conversion days had been in this category.

> "But ye were washed, but ye were sanctified, but ye were justified in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, and in the Spirit of our God" (vi. 11 R.V.).

The R.V., as is often the case, is more accurate in rendering the Greek tenses, for the cleansing, sanctification and justification look back to the moment of salvation and quickening into spiritual life, resting, as it does, upon the finished work of the Lord Jesus at Calvary. Paul now works back to the theme of sexual license which he left at the end of chapter v.:

> "All things are lawful for me; but not all things are expedient. All things are lawful for me; but I will not be brought under the power of any" (vi. 12 R.V.).

"All things are permitted me." It would seem that this was a phrase used at Corinth and it seems very up to date! Paul quotes it with certain definite reservations. He was the first to champion Christian freedom (Gal. v. 1) but this was always to be encircled by Christian love, and never meant that the believer was free to do just whatever he liked and to indulge in sin. Such a phrase might well have been used as a watchword by a pre-gnostic party in the Corinthian church. We know that the developed gnosticism of the second century sometimes moved in the direction of asceticism and sometimes in that of libertinism. Its disparagement of the material led to an indifference to morality—the body was material and therefore its acts did not really matter—"all things were lawful", and this spirit could easily have invaded the Corinthian assembly. A believer could be a glutton or immoral; it did not really matter. Food is for the stomach and the stomach for food (verse 13), but, far from this, the body as a whole is for the Lord and therefore not for fornication or for uncontrolled gratification of its desires. "I will not be overpowered by any of them" is the Apostle's attitude, for if this is so, it nullifies redemption from bondage and brings back the old slavery. If the Lord has redeemed us, and purchased us for Himself, this includes our bodies, and we have no right to act as though they were exclusively our own possession. This the Corinthians had yet to learn.

No.8. pp. 148 - 152

Having made it quite clear that the "all things are permitted me" did not include anything sinful, the Apostle now shows that, as redemption includes our present bodies, fornication is not only a sin against the Lord but against the body itself:

> ". . . . . Every sin that a man doeth is without the body; but he that committeth fornication sinneth against his own body" (vi. 18 R.V.).

Such a person certainly sins against the Lord, for the Holy Spirit indwells him (19). The human body of itself is neutral; it can either be dominated by the sinful old nature, or controlled by the Spirit of God. To whichever of these it yielded, it becomes united, either for evil or good:

> ". . . . . know ye not that he that is joined to a harlot is one body (with her)? . . . . . But he that is joined unto the Lord is one spirit" (vi. 16, 17).

Thus the Corinthian believers are urged to flee from fornication (18), and to learn to glorify God even in their bodies (20). It is to be noted that Paul calls things by their proper name. He does not falsify matters by calling immorality "making love" as is done today, thus putting a glamour upon sin, and turning it from black to white and making it appear respectable and desirable. One of the most insidious things around us at the present time is this deliberate falsifying of standards of conduct, making wrong appear right, and right appear wrong. This is Babylonianism coming right out into the open. No wonder individual, national and world problems are increasing apace. A society which permits this sort of thing is sowing the seeds of disintegration and destruction.

Paul now turns to behaviour within marriage, for this is one of the problems concerning which the church at Corinth had written for guidance (vii. 1). A married couple have equal conjugal rights (verses 3 and 4), which should not be denied, lest they should be tempted to fornication (2). Incidentally, verse 2 is a prohibition against polygamy, which finds no place in the N.T. The Apostle goes on to refer to himself and to state:

> "Yet I would that all men were even as I myself" (vii. 7 R.V.).

This does not mean that celibacy is necessarily ideal. What Paul desired was that all had the capacity for resistance to sensual allurements that he himself possessed. Yet he recognized that this was not so, and that it was "better to marry than to burn" (in desire, verse 9). However, there was a far more important reason even than this, and that was the possibility of the early return of the Lord, according to the conditions and promises of Acts iii. 19-26. There was little point in taking on the obligations of marriage if the Lord might come at any time. If one was unmarried, it was far better to remain so providing continency was maintained. On the other hand, marriage was not a sin:

> "Art thou loosed from a wife? seek not a wife. But and if thou marry, thou hast not sinned; and if a virgin marry, she hath not sinned" (vii. 27, 28 R.V.).

But as the end of the age was near with its tribulation, such would have 'trouble in the flesh' (28). If the problem of separation arose, owing to one of the partners being an unbeliever (one being saved after marriage), providing the unbeliever was willing, such separation should be avoided (verses 12-14). Divorce between believers must be avoided at all costs. Paul uses two words in this context, chorizo separate, and aphiemi divorce. In Judaism only the husband had the right to divorce, but here the Apostle uses the word for both sexes, ". . . . . and that the husband divorces not his wife" (11), ". . . . . and the woman which hath an unbelieving husband, and he is content to dwell with her, let her not divorce her husband" (13). A word must be said concerning the difficulty of verses 14 and 15:

> "For the unbelieving husband is sanctified in the wife, and the unbelieving wife is sanctified in the brother: else were your children unclean; but now are they holy" (R.V.).

It is surely obvious that Paul was not teaching that an unbelieving partner in marriage was automatically saved by being so linked with a believer, nor that children of such a marriage were likewise automatically saved, for this would be entirely contrary to all his teaching regarding salvation by grace and faith in Christ and the tenor of the N.T. generally.

The uncleanness here is the ceremonial uncleanness of the O.T. The reader should note the argument on such uncleanness in Hag. ii. 11-13. The linking in marriage with a foreigner in O.T. days would have resulted in uncleanness and being cut off from the covenant relationship. The Apostle is now saying that the O.T. principle of the communication of uncleanness does not hold in this case. And there was also the possibility that the believing partner might be the means of leading the unsaved one to a saving knowledge of Christ (16).

In any case, the general principle, youching every sphere of life, is to abide in one's calling, providing this was straightforward and acceptable to God (18-24). Even slaves were advised to be willing to stay as they were (21, 22). This was the wisest way of being prepared and ready for the imminent coming of the Lord, which was the overriding consideration.

A new section now commences. The peri de indicates that an answer follows to another of the church's problems, concerning which they had written him. Three groups are now dealt with (1) the unmarried young (25-35); (2) the parents or engaged couples (36-38); and (3) widows (39, 40). With the Lord's coming in mind, celibacy was desirable but not enforced. The single man was wiser if he did not marry. Conversely a married man should not seek release from marriage (27, 28). In giving his advice, Paul had only one thing in mind, sparing them trouble and anxiety (28). If wars, rumours of wars, earthquakes, pestilence and famine, were at hand, as the Lord Himself predicted before His second coming (Mark xiii. 7, 8, 17), then to take on the obligations of marriage was a foolish act tending to multiply difficulties.

> "But this I say, brethren, the time is shortened . . . . ." (vii. 29).

The end of the age was near. In chapter x. 11 the Apostle asserts that the 'conclusion of the ages' had arrived. The Apostle John in his first epistle stated that it was the "last hour" (literally ii. 18), and Peter, that "the end of all things is at hand" (I Pet. iv. 7). There can be no doubt that the age was drawing to a close, and the end, which would be terminated by the Lord's coming, was imminent. It behooved every believer to be on the alert, waiting for the Son from heaven (I Thess. i. 10), and to see to it that they were as loose as possible to all earthly relationships and cares that would distract them from their final witness and service for the Lord, so that they might "attend upon the Lord without distraction" (35). In the married state the tendency is for the married man to be anxious (careful R.V.) as to how he may please his wife, and likewise the wife her husband (32-34), whereas the unmarried can more easily be taken up with the things of the Lord and how to please Him first and foremost.

Verses 36-38 creates a problem. What dos the word 'virgin' mean in this context? At least three ideas have been put forward (1) a father and his unmarried daughter is in view. (2) A spiritual marriage in which people went through a form of marriage, and yet lived together as brother and sister. We know that such relationships existed later in the history of the church, though it is very doubtful if it took place as early as this, and also it is difficult to conceive that such a union would have received Paul's approval. (3) An engaged couple who are in doubt as to whether they should marry or not under the circumstances. As for (1) the father had control of his daughter's marriage and this interpretation is possible, though "his virgin" is a peculiar way of referring to his daughter. The second interpretation (2) can be discounted. Taking everything into consideration, the fewest difficulties seem to be raised by the third view (3). If such a couple found the unmarried state too much of a strain, then marriage was desirable and not a sin. On the other hand, were they able to exercise self-control, to stay as they were would be better, for the reasons given before.

The Apostle now deals with the problem of widows. Marriage is a life-long tie (39), but it a woman loses her husband by death, she is perfectly free to marry again, though the then exceptional times made it better if she did not do so (40). It is very important to note that Paul limits her marriage and choice of a husband to being "only in the Lord". This means that she can only marry a believer and further than that, a believer who was the Lord's will as far as she was concerned. In his second letter marriage with unbelievers is expressly forbidden:

> "Be not unequally yoked with unbelievers: for what fellowship have righteousness and iniquity? or what communion hath light with darkness? And what concord hath Christ with Belial? or what portion hath a believer with an unbeliever?" (II Cor. vi. 14, 15 R.V.).

We need to remember that God's prohibitions are not with the object of denying us pleasures, or anything of value. They are to save us trouble, anxiety, and misery; and to keep us in the best conditions to serve Him fully and faithfully. Never was this Divine rule for the marriage of believers needed to be stressed more than now. We have seen so many cases of tragedy, life-long unhappiness and spiritual fruitlessness in young people result from its disobedience, and to everyone who is contemplating marriage with an unbeliever, we would say don't. The unsaved one may be very attractive in many ways and the believer may delude himself into thinking that after marriage "it will all come right" and such a one will be saved, but this is just wishful thinking and nothing more. Marriage must never be looked at as a kind of god to which everything must be sacrificed. How can the Lord bless a union which He has forbidden? And how can there be any lasting happiness for a believer in a life-long relationship without His blessing? For it needs to be stressed that God's children cannot take the lax view of marriage and divorce that the unbelieving world does. If every detail of our lives is a concern to the Lord (and it surely is), then we can say with absolute certainty that such an important and lasting step as marriage must be controlled by Him and He will certainly indicate His will in this matter, if we will only have patience and wisdom to await His leading and providing. Failure to do this not only means unhappiness and frustration, but spiritual decline and backsliding, and a life of no real testimony for the Lord Who has redeemed us.

This may sound harsh and unsympathetic, but it is not really so. As with Paul of old, we wish to save believers from "trouble in the flesh". Is not the Lord worth trusting in this matter, and for everything else in this life?

In chapter viii. Paul deals with another theme which apparently had been raised in the Corinthians' letter to him, concerning food which had been sacrificed to idols; and he returns to it again in chapter x. 14-33. This was a problem confined to apostolic times, but nevertheless a pressing one for believers. Much of the food offered for sale had passed through the rites of heathen temples. Being associated with idolatry, it was offensive to the Jewish mind, but would not be a particular problem to a Gentile. What was the answer to this difficulty in a close community consisting of Jews and Gentiles? First of all, the Apostle deals with knowledge as a whole, possibly with special regard to a 'gnostic' section in the Corinthian church, which held a conceited idea of their intellectual attainments. Knowledge without divine love is valueless. It merely "puffs up" the old sinful nature, and therefore can be dangerous:

> "Now concerning things sacrificed to idols: We know that we all have knowledge. Knowledge puffeth up, but love edifieth. If any man thinketh that he knoweth anything, he knoweth not yet as he ought to know; but if any man loveth God, the same is known of Him" (I Cor. viii. 1-3 R.V.).

Love builds up, and is the antidote to a barren knowledge which merely puffs up. Moreover, it is the sign that God has taken the initiative. It is His love that comes first, just as John wrote in his first epistle, "We love Him: because He first loved us" (I John iv. 19). But returning to the theme of idolatrous food and idols themselves, Paul writes "we know that no idol is anything in the world, and that there is no God but one" (verse 4 R.V.). This does not mean that idolatry was not a reality, but it was the conception of the idolater that was wrong. There was not an idol in the sense such a person regarded it, for the gods they thought the idols represented were nothing more than demons. The word god was in common use in the ancient world, which was thickly populated with so-called divine beings who, though their natural home was thought to be in heaven, from time to time appeared on earth. But these 'many gods' and 'many lords' had no real existence, and were in direct conflict with the stern monotheism of the Scripture (viii. 4, 5). This thought the Apostle now expands:

> "Yet to us there is one God, the Father, of (ek) Whom are all things (ta panta), and we unto (eis) Him; and one Lord, Jesus Christ, through (dia) Whom are all things (ta panta), and we through (dia) Him" (viii. 6 R.V.).

From the prepositions used, the Father is brought before us as the source, and the Lord Jesus as the mediator of creation and redemption. We must be very careful to avoid the idea that the mediatorial position of Christ gives Him a lower place as regards the Godhead than the Father. In a similar passage in Col. i. 16 we read "all things (ta panta) were created by (dia) Him (Christ), and FOR or UNTO (eis) Him (as the goal)". In Rev. iv. 8-11 the (R.V.) ascription of praise is to "The Lord God, the Almighty, which was and which is and which is to come (Christ, i. 8) . . . . . for Thou didst create all things (ta panta), and because of Thy will they were, and were created". It should be noted too that in neither of these contexts do we find the plain panta, all things. This could include evil. The more defined expression, ta panta, excludes this, and either refers to creation in its perfected form, or is limited to whatever the context is dealing with, and then means all (these) things.

Now, wrote the Apostle, all men have not this knowledge (7), and some who are in this category are weak in the faith and they must be considered by those who are stronger and more advanced. This is real love—love and consideration for others in practice. The weak ones, when eating food which had been consecrated and sacrificed to an idol, would have a distressed and defiled conscience. Others who are stronger and with more knowledge could eat such food without any objection, realizing that such a thing as food in itself will not bring us under condemnation with God. They would be neither better nor worse before God as regards what they ate (verses 7 and 8). However, there was one thing that the stronger ones must consider, which should influence their actions, and that is the effect of their conduct on the weaker brother. Take care, said the Apostle, lest this authority (liberty A.V.) of yours becomes a stumbling-block to those who are weak (9). The word exousia, authority, obviously means the authority to eat any kind of food. Paul now gives a concrete illustration:

> "For if someone sees you, who have knowledge, sitting at table in an idol-shrine, will not his conscience be fortified to eat things sacrificed to idols? For the weak man perishes by your knowledge, your brother, for whose sake Christ died. And so, by sinning against your brothers, and wounding their conscience, weak as it is, you sin against Christ" (viii. 10-12, C. K. Barrett).

Nothing is clearer from this than the fact that our conduct affects other people. We may stress our liberty and stress it wrongly, for liberty must always be regulated by love. If the Lord loved the weaker brethren enough to die for them, then the strong ought to love them well enough to be willing to forego some of their rights. They should be ready to do this, not because the weak demand it, but rather, that this is the way of self-effacing love as the Lord has loved. The word 'perish' is strong and may refer to the 'sin unto death'. If the weak brother continually offended his conscience, he would be persistently sinning, for "whatsoever is not of faith is sin" (Rom. xiv. 23, and the whole of this chapter should be read as it deals with a similar context). Paul brings his argument to a climax by saying:

> "And thus, sinning against the brethren, and wounding their conscience when it is weak, ye sin against Christ. Wherefore, if meat maketh my brother to stumble, I will eat no flesh for evermore, that I make not my brother to stumble" (viii. 12, 13 R.V.).

Let us face the fact that by pushing our liberty too far, we can sin not only against fellow-believers, but against the Lord. We are not bothered today with the problem of food sacrificed to idols, but the principle of all this is still true. The mature Christian's attitude to Sunday and various pleasures for instance, needs to be constantly examined in the light of this, and we should always remember the practical example of the Apostle, who was even willing to curtail his rights rather than cause someone weaker in the faith to stumble.

Chapter ix., on the surface, seems to change the theme, but if we carefully consider what underlies these verses, we shall see this is not so. Paul now makes it clear that even an apostle should be ready to renounce his rights for the sake of the truth of the gospel and those to whom he ministers. He could say:

> "Nevertheless we did not use this right . . . . . that we may cause no hindrance to the gospel of Christ . . . . . that, when I preach the gospel, I may make the gospel without charge, so as not to use to the full my right in the gospel . . . . . to the Jews I became as a Jew . . . . . to the weak I became weak, that I might gain the weak; I am become all things to all men, that I may by all means save some" (ix. 12, 18, 20, 22 R.V.).

This is a summary of the section now before us. How different Paul's ministry and witness would have been if he had continually insisted on his rights as an apostle and leader! But as always, he was willing to put self into the background with a view to the blessing and building up of others. Doubtless at Corinth there would be some who would not be pleased with his teaching concerning the restriction of Christian liberty, specially those whose watchword was freedom at all costs, irrespective of the effect on other people. Such would question Paul's own authority and say that, if he were a true apostle, he would not allow himself to be restricted in this way. It is certain that the Apostle would hardly have spent so long on the subject of apostolic rights, if this had not been queried at Corinth. He deals with this situation by a series of challenging questions, as though in debate:

> "Am I not free? Am I not an apostle? Have I not seen Jesus our Lord? Are not ye my work in the Lord?" (ix. 1 R.V.).

Do you think (you Corinthians) that because I limit my freedom out of love, my freedom does not exist? Is not my apostleship real? An apostle must have personal dealings with the risen Christ to be a true witness. I have actually seen Jesus Christ our Lord and been commissioned by Him! And as a practical result of my apostleship, you Corinthians are the product of my labours! Even if others do not recognize my apostleship, yet at least to you I should be a real apostle, for you are the seal of my apostleship in the Lord!

So Paul reasons with them in a way that was unanswerable to those who were willing to face facts. He deals now directly with his critics:

> "My defense against those who would like to cross-examine me is this"
> (ix. 3 C. K. Barrett).

Again, he throws at them a series of rhetorical questions:

> "Have we no right to eat and to drink? Have we no right to lead about a wife that is a believer, even as the rest of the apostles, and the brethren of the Lord, and Cephas (Peter). Or I only and Barnabas, have we not a right to forbear working? What soldier serveth at his own charges? Who planteth a vineyard, and eateth not the fruit thereof? Or who feedeth a flock, and eateth not of the milk of the flock?" (ix. 4-7 R.V.).

What he says in effect is this. As true apostles, Barnabas and I have the right to (1) have our food provided by the Christian community. (2) We could bring wives with us as other apostles do and claim that they should also be supported by the community. (3) We need not work for our living, but have a right to maintenance from the churches. As soldier on service expects to be maintained. Why not an apostle? The owner of a vineyard expects nourishment from the ground on which he bestows his labour. Why not an apostle? A herdsman who looks after cattle expects some of the milk the flock yields. Why not an apostle? These human analogies are right to the point. But there is something even stronger, namely, the teaching of Scripture:

> "Saith not the law also the same? For it is written in the law of Moses, Thou shalt not muzzle the ox when he treadeth out the corn. Is it for the oxen that God careth, or saith He it altogether for our sake" (ix. 8-10 R.V.).

It was only natural that an animal when threshing should take what mouthfuls of food it wanted while it was working. God had this in mind in the law, but also something more. Is He not speaking simply on our account, asks the Apostle? If the farm worker expects practical results from his labours, should not an apostle, who has sown spiritual things, expect the necessary material things? If others share in authority over you Corinthians, should not I the more? (who was the means used for the founding of the church at Corinth?). "Nevertheless we did not use this right; but we bear all things (i.e. endure hardship, etc.), that we may cause no hindrance to the gospel of Christ" (verse 12 R.V.).

At last Paul comes to his main point. If he did not claim the full rights of an apostle, it was no reflection on his true apostleship. He refrained in the interests of the Gospel itself. Others might appear to make a good thing out of their missionary work at Corinth and so give a bad impression to the outsider. The Apostle took great care that this kind of conduct could never truthfully be leveled at him. He would rather work night and day with his own hands at tent-making and so be independent, rather than the enemies of truth should make capital out of the exercise of his apostolic rights.

How wise was this man! True wisdom is what we all need in abundance if our Christian witness is not to be spoiled by human failing or short-sightedness.

The Apostle Paul sums up the section of the epistle we have been dealing with, relative to the believer's rights and his voluntary limitation of these for the sake of weaker brethren, by saying:

> ". . . I am become all things to all men, that I may by all means save some" (ix. 22 R.V.).

His utter unselfishness and consideration for others made such an attitude a constant experience with him. As long as there was no compromise with truth, he was willing to go as far as possible with both Jew and Gentile in spite of their totally opposite backgrounds, with one object, that some of them would be won for Christ (20, 21). We notice that Paul gives no hint of universal salvation. He knew only too well that in spite of his faithful proclamation of the gospel of Christ, only some would respond; nevertheless he did everything for the sake of the gospel, that in it we might be a joint-partaker (23 R.V.). It was a privilege indeed to have any share in its witness, and this led on to the thought of service and its outcome. The Corinthians seemed to believe that as long as they were saved, this was all that mattered. The Christian life and service afterwards counted little with them, otherwise they would never have tolerated the condition that existed in their midst. Now the Apostle has to remind them that, although salvation is by grace, quite apart from works, the practical response after salvation would be taken account of by the Lord and all would be finally answerable to Him for this. So once again he introduces the teaching concerning reward for faithful service, as he had already done in chapter iii. (iii. 10-15), and for this uses the illustration of the games which would be universally understood in the Greek world. Paul is fond of using the "race course" as a concrete example of what faithful Christian witness should be like. He does so in Hebrews (xii. 1, 2), Galatians (ii. 2; v. 7), Philippians (iii. 13, 14) and II Timothy (ii. 5; iv. 7, 8), and to these we might add Acts xx. 24.

The believers at Corinth evidently thought that there was an automatic connection between running and winning; in other words, to be saved meant automatically being rewarded by the Lord, and there are not wanting today Christians who think likewise. Some even reject the possibility of reward entirely and so stress grace that reward is impossible. Such should carefully ponder the Apostle's argument here:

> "Do you not know that all the competitors in the stadium run, but only one of them receives the prize? Run in such a way that you may win it. Everyone who takes part in the contests disciplines himself in every way. They do it to receive a perishable crown, we to receive an imperishable one" (ix. 24, 25 C. K. Barrett).

The entry into any race does not in itself guarantee a prize either in athletics or in Christianity. But we must not deduce from Paul's illustration that only one believer can win God's prize, or one out of each group. The point at issue is that the believer must not only start correctly. He must continue correctly, press on, and reach the goal. No runner can afford to drop out of the race for any reason if he desires to breast the tape and win. Likewise for the believer, the whole of human life is like a racecourse. Service for the Lord is not for a part of our lives on earth, it must absorb the all of it, from salvation to either death or the realization of our hope in glory.

As we are not machines or puppets, but moral creatures who have the inestimable benefit of being freed from the dominion of sin by redemption, we are thereby accountable to the Lord for our practical response to Him day-to-day. If this were not so, the command to 'walk worthy' would be empty indeed. The Word of God makes it quite clear that, while all of His children are His servants, some are good servants and others are bad ones. Some are faithful, while others are unfaithful. It matters not whether we are dealing with the O.T., the Gospels or Epistles, this is most clearly taught. Now a God of righteousness and justice will surely take account of this, and if such justice must be seen to be done (and this certainly will be so), then there must be a reckoning day for all the Lord's servants (II Cor. v. 9, 10; Rom. xiv. 10-12).

Paul reminds the Corinthians that every athlete disciplines himself in every way in rigorous training. This was not a hardship to any keen runner. He regarded it as the greatest of privileges to do so, and possibly to obtain the wreath of pine with all the honour attached to it as a symbol of victory. The Corinthians therefore must take stock of themselves and realize that (1) God's prizes are worth having, and (2) that they are not obtained cheaply.

The Apostle now transfers the figure to himself and not only alludes to the controlled effort needed in a race, but the purposeful energy used in a boxing match:

> "So, for my part, that is how I run—not as if I did not know where I was going; that is how I box, not as though I were beating the air. But I buffet my body, and bring it into slavery, lest, when I have preached to others, I should myself prove to be rejected" (ix. 26, 27 C. K. Barrett).

The successful runner does not wander aimlessly. He keeps his eye on the course and the tape at the end, and presses straight towards it with all speed. Likewise, the believer cannot afford to be negligent with regard to his service and witness for the Lord. There can be no holidays from this, or periods when he can afford to slack. It is useless being a spasmodic runner. It is only consistent effort that finally wins. Or take a boxer. He does not waste his strength in dealing ineffectual blows, for this would be just beating the air and would achieve nothing. Every blow must tell. And the one whom Paul is fighting is not another person, but himself. He buffets or disciples his body, so that it becomes his slave. He is in complete control of himself as he takes God's grace and strength so to be. Too many of us are ruled by our bodies. They can be the most demanding of masters, and unless we are careful, their whims can turn us this way and that, and so affect our running in the heavenly race.

To some, verse 27 is a problem, for, on the surface, it seems as though Paul feared lest he could lose his salvation at the end. The A.V. 'castaway' is too strong. "Rejected" or "disapproved" is better. The word adokimos is the negative of dokimos, approved, occurring in II Tim. ii. 15, "Study to show thyself approved unto God, a workman that needeth not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the Word of truth". Here again the context is dealing with a good workman; in other words it speaks of service. When the Lord finally tests "every man's work of what sort it is" (I Cor. iii. 13), all will be in two categories: faithful, with the Lord's approval, or unfaithful, with His disapproval. The former will receive the Lord's eternal reward, symbolized by a prize or crown, the latter will be denied it (II Tim. ii. 11-13). This doctrine then is to be distinguished from salvation by grace, apart from works. It is additional to salvation and must never be confused with it. Failure to do this has resulted in the teaching of being saved today and possibly lost tomorrow. Such an idea undermines the whole redemptive purpose of God and would make this dependent on the creature, rather than on the almighty power and wisdom of the Creator and Saviour of men.

On the surface, it looks as though the subject changes at the beginning of chapter x., but a careful examination shows that this is not so. Having clearly taught that a believer can be securely saved, yet lose the Divine prize through slackness or unfaithfulness, the Apostle now illustrates this by appealing to Israel's past history in the wilderness:

> "For I would not, brethren, have you ignorant, how that our fathers were all under the cloud, and all passed through the sea; and were all baptized unto Moses in the cloud and in the sea; and did all eat the same spiritual meat; and did all drink the same spiritual drink; for they drank of a spiritual rock that followed them: and the rock was Christ. Howbeit with most of them God was not well pleased: for they were overthrown in the wilderness" (I Cor. x. 1-5 R.V.).

Nothing was more certain than that all Israel were delivered from the bondage of Egypt and typically redeemed. Yet it is equally clear that only two out of the great multitude who were rescued from Egypt attained the promised land, i.e. Caleb and Joshua. The Epistle to the Hebrews tells us why. They could not enter because of their unbelief (Heb. iii. 16-19). And unbelief means more than not believing; it includes active disobedience. Entering the promised land was equivalent to "going on to maturity" of Heb. vi. 1, and represents the prize element which they lost.

In these verses one should note the stress on all, and then contrast it with most of them in verse 5. All the Israelites enjoyed the privileges of redemption, i.e. freedom from bondage and the provision of all their pilgrim needs in respect to food, drink, clothing and protection. All of them ate the manna, so wondrously provided every day by the Lord. This was spiritual food, as likewise the water from the smitten rock was spiritual drink, and the rock itself was spiritual (verses 3 and 4). This is an interesting and instructive usage in the Scriptures of the word "spiritual". So many seem to think that this word always designates something shadowy and unreal, but the manna and the water were definitely literal and material. They were 'spiritual' as well, which shows that they had a further significance in addition to their material function as food and drink. In other words they were typical; they represented spiritual truth as the Lord's great discourse in John vi. 30-42 clearly shows.

The O.T. record sets forth the ten times Israel provoked the Lord by reason of which they lost their prize—entry into the promised land. The Corinthian believers were therefore to take warning. They need not think that they would escape such a penalty if they provoked God in a similar manner. Their fathers lusted after evil things. They became idolaters and fell into vice (verses 6-8). They tempted the Lord and perished through the snake bites (9). They tried to see how far they could go into sin without the Lord intervening. They continually grumbled about the Lord's leading and dealings with them. We may think that grumbling is not nearly so bad as idolatry, but the Lord took a different and solemn view of this. They wearied Him with their constant complaints and dissatisfaction. It is no wonder that we, as members of the Body of Christ are warned against this sin, and we should note that it is in the epistle concerning the prize, namely Phil. ii. 14, that we are told: "Do all things without murmurings and disputings".

The Apostle sums up by saying:

> "Now these things happened unto them by way of example; and they were written for our admonition, upon whom the ends of the ages are come" (x. 11 R.V.).

Some of the Corinthians apparently thought that, because they were saved, they could get away with idolatry and sin, so that this was of little account in their estimation. Paul is at pains to show the falsity and danger of such a conception.

No.11. pp. 204 - 208

In x. 11 Paul uses the striking expression, "the end of the ages". The whole verse translated literally would read, "Now these things happened to them by way of example; and they were written for our warning, upon whom the ends of the ages have arrived". Such a drastic expression can only be understood in the light of the early Second Coming of the Lord as a possibility during the Acts period (Acts iii. 19-26). Nothing less than this would warrant such an expression, which would otherwise be a gross exaggeration. The Apostle had already stated that the "time was short" (vii. 29), and he instructed believers to wait daily for the return of the Saviour. We have seen that this was the united testimony of all the early epistles and it is difficult to understand how this has been ignored by expositors and believers generally over the centuries.

It is true to say that the early epistles cannot be understood properly without a recognition of this tremendous fact and its implications at the time of writing. The Apostle has been stressing the responsibility to the Lord that Truth brings, and the need for its practical outworking, in terms of a heavenly race. This was to counter the complacency of some of the Corinthian believers. However, to balance things up, lest this responsibility should appear too great, he now brings forward a Divine promise of great encouragement:

> "No testing has fallen upon you but what is the common lot of men: But God can be trusted not to allow you to be tested beyond your power; on the contrary, along with the trial He will provide also the way out, so that you may be able to endure" (x. 13 C. K. Barrett).

God knows even better than the believer just how much testing he can endure, and never will He allow the burden to become too great. Sometimes we may feel that we have come to the limit of our capability of endurance, but if this promise is true, this is not really so, otherwise the Lord would have lightened the burden. He indeed can "suit the burden to the back", and if we can see behind it all our need for His loving discipline, we shall not fail Him by becoming impatient or bitter. The second part of the promise is given a wrong slant in the A.V. If a "way to escape" is made for us, then we are not bearing the trial. Ekbasis, literally way out, can mean the end, issue or outcome, and the word only occurs twice in the N.T. (here and Heb. xiii. 7). The promise means that He Who has led us into the trial has all of it, and its outcome, securely under His control. It will not continue one moment longer than is necessary, and we can be brought out of it "more than conquerors" by His grace and strength. This gives great assurance even though there may be details of the trial we cannot understand.

Paul now sums this section up: "Wherefore (or the conclusion of this) my beloved (is), flee from idolatry. I speak as to wise (or sensible) men; judge ye what I say" (verses 14 and 15 R.V.). Idolatry must be avoided at all costs and therefore there should be no direct contact with it if it could be avoided. "Run away from it", said the Apostle. In direct contrast to this was the New Covenant feast, the Lord's Supper.

> "The cup of blessing which we bless, is it not a communion (sharing) of the blood of Christ? The bread which we break, is it not a communion (sharing) of the body of Christ?" (x. 16 R.V.)

The cup of blessing was one of the cups of wine which were drunk at the Passover meal. As many may not be familiar with the procedure which prevailed at the time of Christ we give a summary:

(1) Those celebrating the feast gathered together with the head of the house blessing the cup of wine which all partook.
(2) The followed washing of the hands accompanied with a benediction.
(3) The table was set with the Passover lamb, unleavened bread, bitter herbs and sauce.
(4) The head of the house, and then the others, dipped a portion of bitter herbs into the sauce and ate them.
(5) The dishes were then removed and a cup of wine brought, followed by an interval for asking questions concerning the feast, and then the wine was drunk (see Exod. xii. 26, 27).
(6) The table was again set, the head repeating the commemorative words which opened what was strictly the paschal supper, and Psalms ciii. and civ. were sung (the first part of the Hallel).
(7) The second washing of the hands followed with a short blessing, breaking one of the two cakes of unleavened bread, with thanks. The bread was partaken, after dipping it, with the bitter herbs, into the sauce.
(8) The flesh was then eaten with the bread and another blessing, together with a third cup of wine, known as "the cup of blessing".
(9) Then came the fourth cup, with a recital or singing of Psalms cxv.-cxviii., from which this cup was known as "the cup of the Hallel", or of the Song.
(10) There might be, in conclusion, a fifth cup, provided that the great Hallel was sung over it (possibly Psalms cxx.-cxxxviii.).

In connection with all this, the student should read Exod. xii. 1-27 which gives the original instructions concerning the Passover.

When we compare the above ritual with the institution of the New Covenant feast by the Lord, we find it throws a certain amount of light on the procedure, although we cannot be certain of every detail. To (1), (5) or (8) we may refer the first words and the first distribution of the cup (Luke xxii. 17, 18); to (4) or (7) the dipping of the sop (John xiii. 26); to (7) or an interval during or after (8), the distribution of the broken bread (Matt. xxvi. 26; Mark xiv. 22; Luke xxii. 19; I Cor. xi. 23, 24); to (9) or (10) "after supper" (Luke xxii. 20); then the thanksgiving and distribution of the cup, and the hymn with which the whole was ended.

There have been differences of opinion as to whether the meal which the Lord instituted was actually the Passover or an anticipation of it. But it seems quite clear from the Gospel narrative, that it was the actual Passover (Matt. xxvi. 2, 17, 18, 19; Mark xiv. 1, 12, 14, 16; Luke xxii. 7, 8, 11, 13, 15); and that the Lord was giving it an added significance with a view to His impending death and sacrifice of Himself, and connecting it with the New Covenant of Jer. xxxi. 31-37 made with Israel and Judah. It should be noted that the Passover was celebrated once a year only, and the Lord gave no direct indication of the frequency of the new feast ("Do this as oft as ye drink it", I Cor. xi. 25). Even if it could be proved that it was definitely kept once a week by the early disciples, there was certainly no Divine command so to keep it.

Another factor which must be recognized and without which a correct assessment cannot be made of this meal, is its early connection with the agape or love-feast. One great feature of the original Pentecost of Acts ii. was that the disciples learned to share everything, their possessions and even their food (see also Acts iv. 32). This was indeed a Divine communism with Christ in the centre. What we see today called "communism" is the Devil's counterfeit without Christ. The newly saved gathering of Acts ii. expressed their brotherly love in this practical way:

> "And fear came upon every soul: and many wonders and signs were done by the apostles. And all that believed were together, and had all things in common (i.e. shared); and sold their possessions and goods, and parted them to all men, as every man had need. And they, continuing daily with one accord in the temple, and breaking bread from house to house, did eat their meat (food) with gladness and singleness of heart" (Acts ii. 43-46).

The 'breaking of bread' was a common Jewish idiom for simply partaking of a meal. It is quite a mistake to limit it, as some do, to the Lord's Supper. The flat, round Jewish loaves were always broken and not cut, hence the origin of the phrase (see Matt. xv. 36; Mark vi. 41; Luke ix. 16). In Acts ii. 46 "breaking bread from house to house" is explained by the next phrase "did eat their food with gladness", and shows this was a communal meal and came to be known as an agape, a love-feast. There were other practical expressions of brotherly love, such as almsgiving, and the kiss of greeting of man to man, and woman to woman (I Pet. v. 14; Rom. xvi. 16; I Cor. xvi. 20; II Cor. xiii.12; I Thess. v. 26). By the time of Acts vi. 1 the growth of the Jerusalem assembly led to the appointment of the seven to serve tables, which apparently included the responsibility for arranging the common meals. Early the practice arose of ending the communal meal with the Lord's Supper, though again this was done without any Divine command recorded in the N.T. Soon this began to be abused. There was over-eating and gluttony and this necessitated the sharp rebuke of the Apostle in I Cor. xi. Jude 12 likewise warns of these excesses ("There are they who are hidden rocks in your love-feasts" R.V.), and possibly II Pet. ii. 13, where there is a variant reading of agapais, love-feasts, for apatais, deceivings. The church Fathers refer to these feasts, among them Ignatius, Tertullian, Clement of Alexandria and Chrysostom.

The love-feast later on became separated from the Lord's Supper. Such edicts as that of Trajan against secret societies, led to this. The agape was adjudged by the Emperor to pertain to secret clubs. By the fourth century the agape came into disfavour through various reasons such as disorders and the increasing emphasis placed upon the Eucharist — which finally degenerated into the Roman Mass. The Council of Laodicea (363), the third council of Carthage (393), and the second council of Orleans (541) led to finally prohibiting feasting in churches, though the rite still persisted in the Eastern Church. John Wesley introduced the practice within Methodism, but it has not survived. The practice of the Sovereign distributing Maundy money is a relic of the agape.

It is important to note that the Lord Jesus, either substituted or added the 'washing of the feet' to the Passover ritual. He may have substituted this for one of the hand washings of this Service. Now we are often told that "all the commands of Jesus" are binding on the church today and that, in instituting the Supper, He was giving an example for all time to believers. If we notice carefully what He said in connection with that wondrous and lowly act of washing the disciples' feet, we shall indeed wonder why those who talk like this have turned a blind eye to this important part of the Supper:

> "He riseth from Supper, and laid aside His garments, and took a towel, and girded Himself. After that He poureth water into a bason, and began to wash the disciples' feet, and to wipe them with the towel wherewith He was girded . . . . . He said unto them, know ye what I have done to you? Ye call me Master and Lord, and ye say well: for so I am. If I then, your Lord and Master, have washed your feet, ye also ought to wash one another's feet. For I have given you an example, that ye should do as I have done to you" (John xiii. 4-17).

There can be no doubt as to the meaning of the Lord's words. He was expressly giving an example for the disciples to follow. Why has not the professing church been keen to put this into practice then? Can it be that washing people's feet is too lowly an act and is not nearly so thrilling as sipping wine and engaging in all the ritual that has accumulated through the centuries and obliterated the real meaning of this simple feast?

Coming back to I Corinthians, we shall not find it easy to distinguish between the love feast and the Lord's Supper, but it is essential to have this background of knowledge if we are to understand properly the situation at Corinth with which Paul was dealing. There is no doubt that, because of human failing and infirmity, all ritual can become dangerous and finally gain an importance that it was never meant to have. The senses are entertained by it, and finally feeling is substituted for faith. We should be grateful that we belong to a heavenly calling where all shadows have vanished and we have all the fullness and spiritual reality in Christ.

Having glanced at the connection of the agape, the love-feast or communal meal, with the Lord's Supper, we return to the Apostle Paul's argument in I Cor. x. 16:

> "The cup of blessing which we bless, is it not a communion (sharing) of the blood of Christ? The bread which we break, is it not a communion (sharing) of the body of Christ? Seeing that we, who are many, are one bread, one body: for we all partake of the one bread" (x. 16, 17 R.V.).

In the last study we pointed out that the cup of blessing was a technical Jewish term for the cup of wine drunk at the end of the meal with an appropriate grace: "Blessed art Thou, O Lord our God, Who givest us the fruit of the vine". In the Passover meal, this was the third of the four cups that had to be drunk. The Apostle is now going to argue that the symbols of the wine and broken bread set forth the broken body and shed blood of the Lord Jesus, the redemptive benefits of which they all shared together by faith in Him; this fact binding them into one body or company of believers. This was set forth pictorially, by their drinking the cup and eating the broken bread. In this sense they had a common participation in the body and blood of Christ. The phrase 'one body' used here is explained: "Because there is one loaf, we, many as we are, form one body, for we all partake" (verse 17 C. K. Barrett). The common participation bound them into one company, and so, as Rom. xii. 5 later expressed it, they were "one body IN Christ, and every one members one of another". Note, Paul does not say they were the Body OF Christ. In Christ is positional, such as we have it used in II Cor. v. 17. The joint-Body (sussoma) of Ephesians was a later revelation: the latter word is not used in the Acts epistles, and we need to be very accurate in our reading of the context we are studying. Let us not forget that the discussion concerning the Passover meal and the Lord's Supper arose from the warning to flee from idolatry (x. 14), and to avoid as far as possible food offered to idols. Any participation in these things after sharing in the tremendous benefits that flowed from the Lord's death, symbolized by the broken bread and the wine, would be treachery indeed.

Paul now points to an analogy to re-inforce his argument:

> "Behold Israel after the flesh; have not they which eat the sacrifices communion with the altar?" (x. 18 R.V.).

In some of the O.T. sacrifices, the priests and the offerer shared together in the eating of the sacrifice. They were "partners at the altar" and equally partook of the benefits. But no such idea of blessing could be read into idolatry:

> "Well: what do I mean by this? That food sacrificed to an idol is anything? Or that an idol is anything?" (x. 19 C. K. Barrett).

Idolatry was dangerous from many aspects, but chiefly because behind all idolatry was demonism and Satan worship: "the things which the Gentiles sacrifice, they sacrifice to demons (devils), and not to God; and I would not that ye should have communion (fellowship) with demons (devils, verse 20)". Let us not forget that there is only one Devil or slanderer, but there are multitudes of demons, evil spirits, under his control. All idolatry, whether ancient or modern, is only another form of the worship of Satan, and is the very thing that he covets most of all. The very thought of sharing in the redemptive blessings that flow from Calvary and sharing in Satan worship was abhorrent in the extreme:

> "You cannot drink the cup of the Lord, and the cup of demons; you cannot partake of the table of the Lord, and of the table of demons. Or are we to provoke the Lord? Are we stronger than He?" (x. 21, 22 C. K. Barrett).

We must remember that many of the Corinthian church were formerly pagans who had enjoyed the heathen sacrificial worship in their temples. Possibly this still had a fascination for them. But, said the Apostle, there must be a clean break. Eating food which had been sold in the market, after previously being used at an idolatrous feast, was one thing; but direct participation in such feasts was quite another. Furthermore, they had the warning of the provocation of the Lord of Israel of old, and the punishment that followed. Did they think they could provoke the Lord and get away with it?

In the section that follows, the Apostle sums up his teaching concerning food offered to idols which was one of the problems the Corinthian church had written to him about. There was a situation in which it might be harmless to eat food which had previously been offered to an idol. On the other hand it might be wrong so to do. The circumstances in each case must be taken into account, with the over-riding consideration of "his neighbour's good" (24).

> "Whatsoever is sold in the shambles (market), eat, asking no question for conscience sake; for the earth is the Lord's, and the fullness thereof. If one of them that believe not biddeth you to a feast, and ye are disposed to go; whatever is set before you, eat, asking no question for conscience sake. But if any man say unto you, this hath been offered in sacrifice, eat not, for his sake that shewed it, and for conscience sake: conscience, I say, not thine own, but the others . . . . ." (x. 25-29 R.V.).

The sense of these verse is clear. Meat sold at the markets would almost surely contain a proportion which had been sacrificed in heathen worship. The Christian was not under any obligation to make a searching enquiry as to the origin of such food. In the final sense it was the Lord's, Who is the Creator and to Whom all things of the earth belong. In these circumstances there was nothing wrong in buying and eating it. But if anyone pointed out that a particular portion of meat or food of any kind had definitely been used in idol worship, then a believer must abstain for the sake of the informant, whoever he was. It was really a case of practical Christian witness and self-limitation so as not to cause anyone else to stumble, which conduct has been previously emphasized by the Apostle. In passing, we should note that the words in verse 27 "to a feast" are supplied and are not in the original. It is better to limit the word to "invite", that is, to give an invitation to a meal in another person's home.

Verses 30 and 31 are difficult in their connection with what has gone before. It may be they are an interjection by someone with a strong conscience, asking why his liberty must be regulated by someone else's attitude of mind, and why should his action be misinterpreted? The answer is of course practical love, which ever considers the effects of one's actions on other people, and is willing to forego rights for the sake of others. The summing up is:

> "Whether therefore ye eat, or drink, or whatsoever ye do, do all to the glory of God. Give no occasion of stumbling, either to Jews, or to Greeks, or to the church of God: even as I also please all men in all things, not seeking mine own profit, but the profit of the many, that they may be saved" (x. 31-33 R.V.).

How near this man must have been walking with the Lord to be able to say without self-advertisement: "Be ye imitators of me, even as I also am of Christ" (xi. 1)! This verse belongs more naturally with the end of chapter x. and should be kept with it. Paul gives a similar injunction in Phil. iii. 17; I Thess. i. 6, and II Thess. iii. 7, 9. Would that all of us who profess to know Christ could do likewise.

In chapter xi. the Apostle deals with the public worship in the assembly, either touching problems concerning which they had written him, or what he realized they needed, judging from the reports he had received of their actions and spiritual condition. We have seen that when he can praise and encourage, he always does so. He is glad to know that they were holding fast the tradition of truth which he himself had delivered to them, that is, his oral teaching; and this method occupied a very important place in passing on the truth before the written Word was completed. This is tradition in a good sense, and is used similarly in II Thess. ii. 15; iii. 6. It is only when extra-Scriptural things are taught as being truth, that tradition becomes so dangerous and blinding to those who receive such ideas. Modern Christendom is rife with this sort of thing, and the progressive Christian continually has to disentangle the Truth of the Scriptures from it.

Before he deals with some aspects of their behaviour in their assembly, Paul defines the God-given relationship between man and God, and man and woman:

> "But I would have you know, that the head of every man is Christ; and the head of the woman is the man; and the head of Christ is God" (xi. 3 R.V.).

How are we to understand the word "head" here? It can represent metaphorically the outstanding part of a whole, or in the Greek usage, the origin of things. The Lord Jesus Christ, as Creator and last Adam, is the "head" of the human race. Man is the "head" of the woman. Paul does not teach that man is woman's lord, or that there is inequality in the sexes mentally or morally; but man is the origin of the woman, as Gen. ii. 18-23 shows. He is the explanation of her being. The position of the Messiah in the Godhead is explained by "the head of Christ is God". Thus a chain of relationships is set up—God, Christ, man, woman. This is the foundation for the regulations he is going to give respecting public prayer and prophecy. If a man prays (publicly) with his head covered, he dishonours or disgraces his head (4). Does the second occurrence of "head" refer to his head physically, or metaphorically to Christ (the Head)? If it is the former, then the meaning is that his uncovered head is a mark of his relationship to God as his Head, and it would be wrong for this to be concealed with a covering. If the latter, then the sense is that the man who is a believer, with his unveiled head, reflects the glory of Christ. If he covered it (like Moses was compelled to do) he would hide this glory. It is difficult to decide which is correct. It is possible that there is a combination of both meanings. What is clear is that men must be bareheaded in public worship. What of the women?

> "But every woman praying or prophesying with her head unveiled dishonoureth her head: for it is one and the same thing as if she were shaven. For if a woman is not veiled, let her also be shorn: but if it is a shame to a woman to be shorn or shaven, let her be veiled. For a man indeed ought not to have his head veiled, forasmuch as he is the image and glory of God: but the woman is the glory of the man" (xi. 4-7 R.V.).

This passage is without meaning unless women from time to time took part in the worship of the assembly, and this in spite of xiv. 34, 35 which will be considered in its place. If it had been wrong for women so to do, the Apostle would certainly have forbidden the practice. He reminds the Corinthians that man came originally from God and displays typically the authority and glory of God on earth. Woman came originally from man, with the express purpose of being a helper for him, and she finds her fulfillment in this. As such she is "the glory of the man" (verses 7-9). From this the Apostle goes on to deduce:

> "For this cause ought the woman to have a sign of authority on her head, because of the angels" (xi. 10 R.V.).

This verse is indeed difficult to interpret. What does Paul mean, and how does this fit in as a reason from what has gone before? There are at least two differing explanations of the reference to angels. (1) They are the wicked "sons of God" of Gen. vi. (2) They are good angels who are the guardians of God's people (Heb. i. 13, 14) and they would be offended by any improper behaviour in worship. We will consider this in our next article and seek the true meaning in relationship to the passage.

The Early Centuries and the Truth

No.7. The early leaders of the Brethren Movement and their understanding of the Mystery.

pp. 7 - 12

In 1870 Richard Holden, a leader in the Brethren movement, wrote a work entitled The Mystery, the Special Mission of the Apostle Paul. The Key to the Present Dispensation. In it we find the following:

> "To make all see what is the dispensation, or in other words, to be divinely appointed instructor in the character and order of the present time, as Moses was in the dispensation of law, is that special feature in the commission of Paul in which it was distinct from that of the other Apostles . . . . . If then it shall appear that, far from seeing 'what is the dispensation of the Mystery' (Eph. 3:9 R.V.) the mass of Christians have entirely missed it, and, as the natural consequence, have almost completely misunderstood Christianity, importing into it the things proper to another dispensation, and so confounding Judaism and Christianity in an inexpressible jumble; surely it is a matter for deep humiliation before God, and for earnest prayerful effort to retrieve, with God's help, this important and neglected teaching."

This writer evidently saw clearly the distinction between Israel and the great Secret made known by God through the prison letters of the Apostle Paul concerning the Body of Christ. Would that the present day followers in this movement could see things so clearly and give such a testimony!

Perhaps the most striking of all of the original founders of the Brethren is the witness of C. H. Mackintosh. In the last chapter of volume five of his Miscellaneous Writings (this has been republished by Loiseaux Bros. Of New York and is obtainable now in this country and we quote from this edition), he gives a remarkable testimony to the dispensational character of the Acts of the Apostles, and the revelation given through Paul, the prisoner of Christ Jesus for us Gentiles (Eph. iii. 1) as follows:

> "Every system of doctrine or discipline which would connect the Church with the world, either in her present condition or her future prospects, must be wrong and must exert an unhallowed influence . . . . . the doctrine of the Church's heavenly character was developed in all its power and beauty by the Holy Ghost in the Apostle Paul. Up to his time and even during the early stages of his ministry, the divine purpose was to deal with Israel . . . . . the thought of a church composed of Jew and Gentile, 'seated together in the heavenlies', lay far beyond the range of prophetic testimony . . . . . John the Baptist . . . . . told the people what they were to do in that transition state, into which his ministry was designed to conduct them, and pointed to Him that was to come. Have we anything of the Church in all this? Not a syllable. The Kingdom was still the very highest thought."

Coming to the ministry of Peter to Israel in Acts iii., he quotes the exceedingly important speech recorded in verses 19-26 and then writes:

"Have we here the development of the Church? No, the time had not yet arrived for this . . . . . The Church as seen in the opening of the Acts exhibits but a sample of lovely grace and order . . . . . but not anything beyond what man could take cognizance of and value. In a word it was still the Kingdom, and not the great mystery of the Church. Those who think that the opening chapters of Acts present the Church in its essential aspect, have by no means reached the divine thought on the subject."

Coming to Peter's vision recorded in Acts x. he comments:

"Here we are taught that the Gentiles, as such, are to have a place with the Jews in the Kingdom. But did the council at Jerusalem apprehend the truth of the Church, of Jews and Gentiles so truly formed in the one Body that they are no more Jew and Gentile? I believe not . . . . . Peter never received a commission to unfold the mystery of the Church. Even in his epistles we find nothing of it . . . . . it was reserved for the great Apostle of the Gentiles, to bring out, in the energy and power of the Holy Ghost, the mystery of which we speak."

Commenting on Acts xxviii. and Paul's gathering together the chief of the Jews at Rome, and giving them a last opportunity to respond, he writes:

"He (Paul) found himself in the midst of the wide Gentile world—a prisoner at Rome and rejected of Israel . . . . . he must therefore set himself to bring out that holy and heavenly mystery which had been hid in God from ages and generations—the mystery of the Church as the Body of Christ united to its living Head by the Holy Ghost . . . . . Thus closes the Acts of the Apostles which, like the Gospels, is more or less connected with the testimony to Israel. So long as Israel could be regarded as the object of testimony, so long the testimony continued; but when they were shut up to judicial blindness . . . . . the testimony ceased."

He goes on:

"Let us see what this 'Mystery' this 'gospel' . . . . . really was, and wherein its peculiarity consisted. To understand this is of the utmost importance, what therefore, was Paul's gospel? Was it a different method of justifying a sinner from that preached by the other Apostles? No, by no means . . . . . the peculiarity of the gospel preached by Paul had not so much reference to God's way of dealing with the sinner as with the saint; it was not so much how God justified a sinner as what He did with him when justified. Yes, it was the place into which Paul's gospel conducted the saint that marked its peculiarity . . . . . Paul's gospel went far beyond them all (i.e. other servants of God). It was not the Kingdom offered to Israel on the ground of repentance, as by John the Baptist and our Lord; nor was it the Kingdom opened to Jew and Gentile by Peter in Acts three and ten; but it was the heavenly calling of the Church of God composed of Jew and Gentile, in one Body, united to a glorified Christ by the presence of the Holy Ghost."

"The Epistle to the Ephesians fully develops the mystery of the will of God concerning this. There we find ample instruction as to our heavenly standing, heavenly hopes and heavenly conflict . . . . . 'He hath raised us up together and made us sit together in heavenly places in Christ Jesus'. It is not that He will do this, but 'He hath' done it. When Christ was raised from the dead, all the members of His Body were raised also; when He ascended into heaven, they ascended also; when He sat down, they sat down also; that is, in the counsel of God, and to be actualized in the process of time by the > Holy Ghost sent down from heaven . . . . . Believers did not know this at the first; it was not unfolded by the ministry of the twelve, as seen in the Acts of the Apostles, because the testimony to Israel was still going on, and so long as earth was the manifested scene of divine operation, and so long as there was any ground of hope in connection with Israel, the heavenly mystery was held back; but when earth had been abandoned and Israel set aside, the Apostle of the Gentiles from his prison at Rome, writes to the Church and opens out all the glorious privileges connected with its place in the heavens with Christ."

C. H. Mackintosh goes on to comment on the fact that so few believers have had "eyes to see" and ability to grasp such exalted and wonderful teaching. The blinding power of tradition and the pull earthwards of the senses all combine to prevent this:

> "We have seen how long it was ere man could take hold of it . . . . . and we have only to glance at the history of the Church for the last eighteen centuries to see how feebly it was held and how speedily it was let go. The heart naturally clings to earth and the thoughts of an earthly corporation is attractive to it. Hence we may expect that the truth of the Church's heavenly character will only be apprehended and carried out by a very small and feeble minority . . . . . to understand all this requires a larger measure of spirituality than is to be found with many Christians."
> ". . . . . Those who will maintain Paul's gospel find themselves, like him, deserted and despised amid the pomp and glitter of the world. The clashing of ecclesiastical systems, the jarring of sects, and the din of religious controversy will surely drown the feeble voice of those who would speak of the heavenly calling and rapture of the Church . . . . . I am deeply conscious of how feebly and incoherently I have developed what I have in my mind concerning the doctrine of the Church, but I have no doubt of its real importance and feel assured that, as the time draws near, much light will be communicated to believers about it. At present, it is to be feared, few really enter into it."

We make no apology for these lengthy quotations from this remarkable chapter. They are so true, and in some respects prophetic. The writer sees clearly the dispensational character of the Acts, with the people of Israel coming first right up to the last chapter. He realizes that the truth of the great secret (Mystery) revealed through Paul the prisoner for the Gentiles was not known or commenced at Acts ii. Neither is the ministry of Peter or The Twelve connected with it. Rather the first unfolding of this Divine secret is after Israel's rejection at Acts xxviii., and made known in the first epistles written after that event, namely those to the Ephesians and Colossians. It is all the more remarkable when one remembers that this was written and taught a hundred years ago. How comes it then that this teaching is dubbed as "ultra-dispensational" by many of the present day followers of the movement to which C.H.M. was attached, and looked upon as a concoction of Dr. C. I. Schofield, Dr. E. W. Bullinger and Charles H. Welch? If any belonging to this same movement happen to be reading these words, we earnestly ask them to consider these things afresh, earnestly and prayerfully. Either one of their much loved and revered leaders was hopelessly wrong and teaching error, or he was ministering supreme truth; there can be no half-way position. For ourselves we have no doubt as to the answer.

Knowing something of the activity and devices of the evil One, who, as the god of this age, blinds the minds of those who do not believe, lest the light of the good news of the glory of Christ should shine unto them (II Cor. iv. 4), we are not surprised at what followed after such a clear-cut testimony to the riches of this heavenly Secret. He came in as the divider of the brethren, split the movement, and thereby prevented any united testimony to the highest and most favoured of all callings of the redeemed.

We are sometimes asked the question "If what you teach is truth, why is it not generally known amongst Christians?". We hope our short survey of the early centuries and afterwards has made this quite clear. The answer is perfectly simple; it was largely lost before the one channel through whom it was made known, died, namely the Apostle Paul, and it has never been recovered in anything like its fullness till comparatively recently, though doubtless individuals responded to it from time to time, but of this we have no record. Even now we do not profess to have the last word on it, but enough of its glories and spiritual riches are seen to make us feel humbled and utterly thankful, and at the same time to feel the responsibility to make it known to others. The great Apostle's aim was to "enlighten all" as to what is this dispensation of the Secret (Mystery R.V. Eph. iii. 9), and Col. i. 27 informs us in addition that God wishes to make it known, with its riches of glory relating to Christ among us Gentiles, who once were outcasts, aliens from Israel's commonwealth and strangers from the covenants of promise, now so exalted in Christ Jesus, that God sees us as seated together in Him in the heavenly places where He is enthroned in the glory. Who feels that this is a challenge and wants to explore and apprehend something of this spiritual wealth? A hundred years ago, C.H.M. lamented that only few responded to such teaching, and those who held to it faithfully and sought to make it known would be despised and deserted. He was to a great extent right in his forecast. What amazes us is that so many of God's people are content with so little, when all these riches are waiting in His Word of Truth to be explored and appropriated by faith. History informs us that generally speaking, it has always been so. In O.T. days only two out of the thousands of God's earthly people, namely Caleb and Joshua, were ready to believe all that God had revealed of the riches of Canaan and were willing to go up, explore, and possess the promised land. The rest not only refused to believe their testimony, but were prepared to stone and murder them.

What of us who profess to have had the necessary enlightenment of the Holy Spirit regarding this heavenly and holy calling? We need to be delivered from any complacency and any tendency to be secret disciples, which is largely due to the fear of man that bringeth a snare. We need to manifest the same missionary spirit to testify to this truth as the Apostle Paul did in his day. We need believers, specially the young, who have been given a glimpse of this heavenly 'promised land', and who are prepared to fully dedicate themselves to the Lord, the gospel and to this 'good deposit' of truth. They must be ready to take time and effort to get grounded in it; to be alert to every opportunity for witness; to have wisdom and patience in presenting it to others and to back it up behind the scenes with persistent labouring in prayer and intercession for all, such as Epaphras did (Col. i. 24-29; iv. 12). Only in this way can we discharge our responsibilities to the Lord Who has showered upon us such riches of grace and glory.

The days darken as the age gets nearer its close. The challenge and the need is great. WHO ARE READY AND WILLING TO RESPOND?

The Goal of God.

(I Cor. xv. 28).

No.14. Conformed to the Image of His Son.

pp. 1 - 3

We have seen that the heavenly image is to take the place of the earthly, the legacy of the first man with its corruption and weakness giving place to the glorious gift of incorruption and power at the resurrection. We have further seen that this change is anticipated in the transition from law to grace, and now we turn to the third of these references concerning 'change' which is found in the epistle to the Romans.

> "For whom He did foreknow, He also did predestinate to be conformed to the image of His Son, that He might be the firstborn among many brethren. Moreover, whom He did predestinate, them He also called;; and whom He called, them He also justified; and whom He justified, them He also glorified" (Rom. viii. 29, 30).

"LIBERTY", "SPIRIT" and "SONSHIP", which are important features of II Cor. iii. and iv., are key words of Rom. viii.

We found it useful to discover the structure of I Cor. xv., and we shall help ourselves toward an understanding of Rom. viii. 29, 30 by seeing where it comes in the general outline.

Romans viii. 1 - 39.

A | 1-5-. No condemnation. God sent His Own Son.
B | -5-15-. Led by Spirit. Sons now.
C | -15-17-. Spirit itself. Sonship (adoption).
D | -17-21. Suffering and Glory. Sons manifested.
C | 22-28. Spirit itself. Sonship (adoption).
B | 29, 30. Conformed to image of His Son, future.
A | 31-39. Who condemns? God spare not His Own Son.

Wonderful and glorious as this chapter is, we must resist the temptation to explore and must concentrate our attention on the reference to the image. Flesh and Spirit alternate in the member denominated "B | -5-15-.", which is the experience of the believer now, and this balances the member "B | 29, 30.", the blessed experience awaiting the believer in the future, when "the quickening of the mortal body" (Rom. viii. 11) which is the anticipatory experience of the believer now, will be fully realized when the earthly image is laid aside and the redeemed at last stand satisfied in the likeness of the Lord.

The analysis of the passage is as follows:

A | Predestination. Steps leading to Conformity.
B | Purpose. Christ. Firstborn among many brethren.
A | Predestination. Steps leading to Glory.

Predestination is the link that goes back into the timeless past. Glory is the link that reaches on to the ages of the ages. Calling and Justification are the links that unite past and future and belong to the present time. Conformity to the image of Christ must include justification, for righteousness is a fundamental necessity; it is the value behind all values, without it even Divine Omnipotence would be unable to attain the goal of the ages. The Greek word summorphos 'conform' is found only in Rom. viii. 29 and Phil. iii. 21.

"Conformed to the image of His Son."
"Fashioned like unto His glorious body."

In these references, the work is the Lord's, and lest this should escape us, Phil. iii. 21 ends with the words:

"According to the working whereby He is able even to subdue all things unto Himself."

The word morphe 'form' gives us 'conform' and 'be conformed', and schema 'fashion' found in Phil. ii. 6-8, gives us metaschematizo 'change' in Phil. iii. 21. This reference to His work is not thrown in just to round the passage off. It is a special aspect of His work that is in view, namely that which "subdues all things". Paul uses the same word here, hupotasso that he uses six times over in I Cor. xv, 27, 28 translated "put under", "subdue", and "subject". Transfiguration is an integral part of the process that has the goal of the ages in view.

Here therefore we have 'purpose', for it is written that He makes all things work together for good to them that love God, to them who are called according to His purpose, and whoever is "predestinated", of them it can be said:

"Being predestinated according to the purpose of Him Who worketh all things after the counsel of His Own will" (Eph. i. 11).

The practical approximation of the truth is suggested by the use of the verb summorphoomai in Phil. iii.:

"That I may know Him, and the power of His resurrection, and the fellowship of His sufferings, being made conformable unto His death" (Phil. iii. 10).

Here the Apostle looked back to the cross, whereas in Phil. iii. 21 and Rom. viii. 29 he looked forward to the glory. The doctrine of 'the cross' is so vast that it is necessary to take the matter further. The particular aspect of the subject is found in Phil. ii. 6-8:

"Who being in the form (morphe) of God . . . . . taking the form (morphe) of a servant . . . . . made in the likeness of man . . . . . found in fashion (schema) as a man, He humbled Himself . . . . . even the death of the cross . . . . . Wherefore God also hath > highly exalted Him . . . . . Wherefore, my beloved . . . . . work out your own salvation" (Phil. ii. 6-12).

In other words the picture includes the 'mind' of Christ now (Phil. ii.); the 'body' like unto His then (Phil. iii.). Christ is to be the firstborn among many brethren, and this 'likeness' must be 'deeper than the skin'. In the day of glory He will stand as the "Firstborn" among many brethren (Rom. viii. 29); the "Firstborn" from the dead (Col. i. 18; Rev. i. 5), even as He became for us men and for our salvation, the "Firstborn" of the Virgin (Matt. i. 25), Who Himself was before time, > "The Image of the Invisible God, the Firstborn of every creature" (Col. i. 15).

He must have the pre-eminence, the first place, even as He must be the Firstborn among many brethren.

The Inspiration and Canon of the Scriptures.

No.1. pp. 216, 217

The philosopher and the sceptic say "What is Truth?" The believer who has tasted that the Lord is gracious replies: "God's Word is truth". Even the sceptic may agree to this proposition but would ask "Has God spoken?" and if so, where is it to be found? When deal with what is called "natural religion" we shall discover that "day unto day uttereth speech, and night unto night showeth knowledge" (Psa. xix. 2); but our quest is for something higher—a revelation of God Himself to man concerning Himself, His purpose and man's failure; His grace and man's response. This the Christian has discovered in that collection of writings called "The Scriptures", or "The Bible", and it is with a view to establishing their inspiration and consequent truth and authority that we devote this series of studies.

As these studies are intended to help the believer, we will not spend time attempting to prove that which has already been accepted. We trust that those who read these article are already resting for eternal peace on the finished work of Christ.

> "It is enough for the disciple that he be as his Master" (Matt. x. 24, 25).

What therefore is viewed as "Scripture" by Christ, will be "Scripture" to His disciples. Here is His challenging statement:

> "For had ye believed Moses, ye would have believed Me, for he wrote of Me. But if ye believe not his writings, how shall ye believe My words?" (John v. 46, 47).

To adopt the attitude of the Higher Critic is to reject Christ. But there is something more.

> "He that rejecteth Me, and receiveth not My words, hath One that judgeth Him: the word that I have spoken, the same shall judge him in the last day. For I have not spoken of Myself: but the Father which sent Me, He gave Me a commandment, what I should say, and what I should speak" (John xii. 48, 49).

It is evident therefore that to set aside the testimony of Christ, is to set aside the testimony of Him that sent Him, and to do so is to overthrow the faith, leaving all men without hope and without God in the world.

We now take our investigation a stage further. We consider in detail just how far the testimony of Christ extends.

(1) The Law, the Prophets, and the Psalms (Luke xxiv. 44).
The O.T. as a whole. This is the ancient threefold division of the O.T. (Proofs and details come later under the heading: "The Canon of the O.T.".)

(2) Individual writers and prophets.

The Saviour has definitely named and cited "Moses" (John v. 46, 47); "Isaiah" (Luke iv. 17-21); "Daniel" (Matt. xxiv. 15, 16); "Jonah" (Matt. xii. 39-41); "David" (Luke xx. 42). He has also cited as of God, Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, Deuteronomy, Samuel, Kings, Jonah, Daniel, Isaiah, Hosea, Jeremiah and the Psalms.

(3) The Lord's continual reference to the Scriptures.
In the hour of temptation He relied upon it (Matt. iv.—"It is written"). At the opening of His public ministry He drew attention to its fulfillment (Luke iv. 16-21). In the hour of death, He was careful that the Scriptures should be fulfilled (John xix. 28). His birth, His birthplace, His public ministry, His betrayal, the manner and accompaniments of His death, His resurrection, are all referred to Scripture as prophetic and as fulfilled.

While no man can be justified by his own works of law, the Lord made it clear that He honoured the Law and that it should be fulfilled (Matt. v. 17, 18). The 'jot' is the Hebrew "yod", and equivalent to the Greek "iota", and the English letter "i". It is the smallest letter in the Hebrew alphabet. Some Bibles print it over the section of Psa. cxix. that commences with verse 173. The 'tittle' is a small decoration added to certain letters, possibly as aids to memory.

"As by faith we gaze at that Cross, as we see indissolubly linked together the finished work of Calvary and the finished Word of God, there we take our stand, and with heart and life declare that our Saviour's Bible is our Bible, that His deep reverence for the written Scriptures shall be our example, and that we shall look upon all adverse criticism or denial in the light of that cross, and see behind the pen of the critic the hand of the wicked one." (The Berean Expositor, Volume XX, page 96).

No.2. pp. 232 - 235

"All Scripture is given by Inspiration of God" (II Tim. iii. 16). The testimony of Christ settles for every believer the question of the Truth and Authority of the O.T. Scriptures. We now ask two questions and discover the answers to them:

(1) How were the Scriptures given?
(2) How did the Scriptures come?

The answer to these two questions appear in the writings of two men of God who knew that they were about to die for the sake of Christ and His Truth (II Tim. iv. 6, 7; II Pet. i. 14). Here, if ever, we shall have unbiased and unflinching testimony.

Paul.	How was Scripture given?	"By inspiration of God" (II Tim. iii. 16).
Peter.	How did Scripture come?	"Holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Spirit" (II Pet. i. 21).

Paul's Testimony:

"From a child thou hast known the holy Scriptures, which are able to make thee wise unto salvation through faith which is in Christ Jesus. All Scripture is given by inspiration > of God, and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness: that the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works" (II Tim. iii. 15-17).

Two titles are given to the Scriptures:

(1) "Holy Scriptures" Hiera Grammata or "sacred letters".
(2) "Scripture" Graphe or "writing".

Grammata indicates a letter of the alphabet (Gal. vi. 11); or a letter (Acts xxviii. 21), and particularly the books known as the Holy Scriptures.

> "How knoweth this man letters (grammata), having never learned?" (John vii. 15).

Grammata looks to the component parts of writing; Graphe to the Scripture as a whole.

Graphe is familiar to the English ear. Photo*graphy*, geo*graphy*, refer to some form of writing. Gegraptai "It is written", refers in the Scriptures, not to any writings, but to THE writings par excellence "The Scriptures".

The O.T. abounds in references to writing and to books. The foundation of our faith is a written testimony.

Inspiration. The words "given by Inspiration of God" are expressed by the one Greek word theopneustos. Theos—God. Pneo—to breathe. Pneuma—spirit. The association of the word translated "inspiration" with "breathing" will be seen in such English words as pneumatic or pneumonia, as also the words "inspire", "respire" and "perspire".

Paul's testimony therefore is that "all scripture", namely that which was written, "is given by inspiration of God" or God-breathed. If that which was "written" was "breathed" by God, there could be no interval for the writer to give a vision of his own heart.

While the personality of the writer is stamped upon every page of Scripture, Moses differing from Isaiah, Peter from Paul, Matthew from John, yet each and all were instruments in the hand of their God.

> "God at sundry times and in divers manners spake in time past unto the fathers by the prophets" (Heb. i. 1).

Peter's testimony:

> "We have also a more sure word of prophecy; whereunto ye do well that ye take heed in your hearts, as unto a light that shineth in a dark place, until the day dawn, and the day star arise" (II Pet. i. 19).

Peter had had a sublime unique experience. He had stood upon the Mount of Transfiguration. He had heard the voice from heaven. Yet he declares that we have something "more sure" than the sublimest experience. We have the "Word of prophecy". The human element and agency is subservient; all is of God.

> "Knowing this first, that no prophecy of the Scripture is of any private interpretation, for the prophecy came not in old time by the will of man; but holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost" (II Pet. i. 20, 21).

"Private Interpretation", Private is idios "own". "Interpretation" is epilusis and occurs nowhere else in Scripture. The word means "letting loose", "breaking open", "unfolding". "Is" is here ginomai "to come into being". Peter does not here speak of systems of interpretation, but of the trustworthiness of Scripture itself. "No prophecy of the Scriptures came into being of its own unfolding." He then goes on to explain. "For prophecy was not brought (phero) at any time by the will of man, but holy men of God spake being borne along (phero) by the Holy Ghost."

In Acts xxvii. 15 and 17 we may see the force of this word phero. "We let her drive", "strake sail and so were driven". Just as the sailors were helpless in the grip of the storm, so the prophets had no control in the matter and moment of inspiration, although this did not blot out their personal style. The subject matter of the Scriptures demands revelation. The wisest are baffled in their attempt to solve the riddle of the universe, the nature and being of God, the plan of the ages. The R.V. translates II Tim. iii. 16 thus:

> "Every scripture inspired of God is also profitable."

Did Paul intend Timothy to understand that "Some Scriptures are not inspired?" When translating I Tim. iv. 4, another text by the same author, the R.V. keeps to the accepted rules of grammar, and so rule their peculiar translation of II Tim. iii. 16 out of court.

> "Every creature of God IS good, and nothing IS to be rejected", etc.

Here, as in II Tim. iii. 16 there is no verb "IS" in the original, it has to be supplied to make good English. Why did they not render I Tim. iv. 4.

> "Every creature of God, if it is good, is also nothing to be rejected.

Why? Simply because it is foolish, false and a violation of Greek syntax.

The Greek writers Chrysostom, Origen, Basil, Athanasius, who knew their own tongues, render II Tim. iii. 16 as the A.V.

"And God spake all these words"

While Paul teaches us that all Scripture is "God-breathed" and Peter teaches us that "Holy men of God spake as they were borne along by the Holy Ghost", there is no formal statement in Scripture as to the precise mode of inspiration. It does not follow moreover, that because all Scripture is "God-breathed", that every writer was inspired in the same manner. Heb. i. 1 assures us that "God spake" by the prophets, however "diverse" the "manner" of their inspiration may have been.

Leaving therefore the question of "how" unanswered, let us acquaint ourselves with the claims that the Scriptures themselves make to their Divine Authorship. "God spake" to Noah (Gen. viii. 15) and to Moses (Exod. xxxiii. 9). A recurring phrase is "The mouth of the Lord hath spoken it", or "Hear the Word of the Lord". Again we read many times "The word of the Lord came" to one or another of the prophets. Further, there are specific statements to the effect that God put His words into the "mouths" of His prophets. Peter refers to this in Acts three times, once speaking of the "mouth" of "David", and twice of "All His prophets".

> "It is very evident from this testimony that, whoever the individual speaker may have been, the mighty Moses, or the lowly Amos, the Royal Seer, or the runaway Jonah, the ungodly Balaam, or the wicked Caiaphas, it was God Who spoke, and it is His word that we hear" (True from the Beginning, page 37).

The Prophets were channels not originators.

> "Now all this was done, that it might be fulfilled which was spoken BY (hupo) the Lord THROUGH (dia) the prophet" (Matt. i. 22; ii. 15).
>
> "For thus it hath been written THROUGH (dia) the prophet" (Matt. ii. 5).
>
> "That it might be fulfilled which was spoken THROUGH (dia) the prophets" (Matt. ii. 23; xiii. 35; xxi. 4).

In these references, the names of the prophets are not given, they are Isaiah, Hosea, Micah, A Psalm of Asaph, and Zechariah. These men lived at different times and were possessed of individual character, yet the same formula is used of them all.

In the following references the same preposition dia is used but the name of the prophets "Isaiah" and "Jeremiah" is given (Matt. iv. 14; viii. 17; xii. 17; xxvii. 9).

The Apostle writing to the Corinthians said:

> "Which things we speak, not in the words which man's wisdom teacheth, but which the Holy Ghost teacheth" (I Cor. ii. 13).

To the Thessalonians he wrote:

> "When ye received the word of God which ye heard of us, ye received it not as the word of men, but as it is in truth, the word of God" (I Thess. ii. 13).

To the Ephesians he said:

> "After that ye heard the word of truth, the gospel of your salvation" (Eph. i. 13).

To the Romans he wrote:

> "The gospel of God, which He had promised afore by His prophets in the Holy Scriptures" (Rom. i. 1, 2).

The Lord's Day and the Day of the Lord.

Does "the Lord's day" (Rev. i. 10) refer to the prophetic "Day of the Lord", or to the "First day of the week"?

pp. 61 - 64

This query concerns the interpretation that Wetstein, Dr. Bullinger, Dr. Maitland, Dr. Todd and others have put upon Rev. i. 10, making "the Lord's Day" the prophetic "Day of the Lord", and containing no reference to "the first day of the week". It is admitted by all, that there is no Scripture which says "The Lord's day is the first day of the week", or that teaches:

> "Seeing that the Jewish Sabbath has no place in Christian worship, the first day of the week has taken its place and this day is called The Lord's Day."

The only authority for calling the first day of the week "The Lord's day" is that of the early Fathers, but there is much in the Fathers that is evidently tradition, and if not unscriptural, is extra or non-scriptural; much that those who believe that the Lord's day means Sunday, cannot possibly accept as truth, and so we are forced to consider Rev. i. 10 on its own merits.

First of all let us examine the phrase "The Lord's day", and see whether there is any difference between that expression and "the day of the Lord". In English, there is no essential difference. If "a wooden house" be assessed for value at a certain figure, it would be a waste of time lodging an appeal because one chose to describe it as "a house of wood". The term "Lord's day" and "Day of the Lord" are interchangeable.

In I Cor. x. and xi. we read "The cup of the Lord", "the Lord's table", "the Lord's death" and "the body and blood of the Lord". These all translate one and the same Greek grammatical construction, and as we have said, no one would dream of maintaining that there could be any difference. The R.V. alters "The Lord's table" to "the table of the Lord", but retains "the Lord's death", showing that no essential difference can be held to be intended in the two phrases.

This however is not a full statement of the matter. In the ordinary way, the expression "The day of the Lord" would be in the Greek He hemera kuriou, but in Rev. i. 10 the original reads Te kuriake hemera "The day pertaining to the Lord". Kuriake occurs in but one other passage, namely, "The Lord's supper" (I Cor. xi. 20). No one would disassociate the supper that pertains to the Lord, from the table of the Lord, the death of the Lord, or the cup of the Lord, and yet in the original the phrases vary as indicated above. It is admitted by all, that there can be no essential difference in the two English phrases "The Lord's day" and "The day of the Lord". In English it would be but a matter of emphasizing in the former phrase "The Lord" and in the latter "the day", whereas, strangely enough, the emphasis would be entirely reversed in the original, "Lord's" being an adjective throws the emphasis forward on to the word "day".

In I Cor. xi. 20, however, we meet a new construction; "the Lord's supper" is in the Greek kuriakon deipnon instead of the more usual to deipnon tou kuriou, "the supper of the Lord". Now it is this unusual form that meets us in Rev. i. 10. In I Thess. v. 2 the original reads He hemera kuriou, whereas in Rev. i. 10 it reads Te kuriake hemera, "the Lord's day" instead of "the day of the Lord". Kurios is a noun, kuriakon is an adjective, and instead of putting the emphasis upon "Lord's" as would be normal in English, the emphasis is upon the word "day" in Rev. i. 10.

Is there a scriptural reason for this peculiar mode? Are we to assume that John did it for the sake of variety? Must we fall back upon the traditional Sunday? No, there is waiting for us a complete parallel and perfect reason for this change. To illustrate and explain this, we must ask the reader to turn aside to what may appear at first sight, an irrelevant subject.

The word generally translated "man" in the N.T. is anthropos and when Paul wished to speak of "the wisdom of men" (I Cor. ii. 5) or "the heart of man" (I Cor. ii. 9) or even "every man's conscience" (II Cor. iv. 2), or when Luke wished to speak of one of "the days of the Son of Man" (Luke xvii. 22), they adopted the same mode as in the phrase "The day of the Lord". We find however that whereas in I Cor. ii. 5, Paul speaks of "the wisdom of men", in I Cor. ii. 4, he speaks of "man's wisdom". Is there any one who would seriously advocate the interpretation that Paul referred to two distinct things in these adjacent verses? Nevertheless, in I Cor. ii. 4 he does not use the word anthropos, but the word anthropinos, exactly equivalent with kuriakos in Rev. i. 10. When we come however to I Cor. iv. 3 we arrive at the true reason for the change in Rev. i. 10:

> "With me it is a very small thing that I should be judged of you, or of man's judgment . . . . . judge nothing before the time, until the Lord come" (I Cor. iv. 3-5).

It is obvious that "man's judgment" is set over against "The Lord's judgment". Now, the margin reveals that the original has no word in I Cor. iv. 3 for "judgment" but reads "day" and refers the reader back to I Cor. iii. 13 "For the day shall declare it". "Day" therefore is used interchangeably with "judgment". Further, the Greek reads anthropines hemeras, exactly like the construction of Rev. i. 10. Consequently, if the language of I Cor. iv. 3 cannot be made to refer to any ordinary "day" but refers to "man's day of judging", which is now, then in perfect correspondence, and as a complete answer to this, Rev. i. 10, together with I Cor. iv. 5 and I Cor. iii. 13, must refer to "The Lord's day of judging" which is yet future. If Rev. i. 10 refers to the first day of the week, will any reader tell us which of the "week days" I Cor. iv. 3 refers to?

This, however, is not all. There is further proof in the book of the Revelation that Rev. i. 10 refers to a future prophetic day. John said:

> "I was in the spirit on the Lord's day."

We might as well be accurate and remove all additions to the original that warp our judgment. There is no "the" before "spirit", and "on" is the Greek en and should be translated "in".

Who would tolerate "on the evil day" in Eph. vi. 13, or "on the days of Noah" (I Pet. iii. 20)? and why change the translation of en "in" to "on". "I was in the spirit on the Lord's day"? This looks as though the translators were unconsciously biased toward the interpretation of Rev. i. 10 as of the first day of the week, and so they did not realize that they were, however so slightly, "adding" to the word of the prophecy of this book. "I came to be in spirit in the Lord's day" is a literal rendering, which acknowledges every feature while neither adding nor omitting anything. This expression egenomen en pneumati "I came to be in spirit" occurs again in Rev. iv. 2. In this passage we are not left in doubt as to the "time" in which this vision is set.

> "I will shew thee things which must be hereafter" (Rev. iv. 1), and in order to see these future things, John "came to be in spirit". This being so, we should read Rev. i. 10 in the same way:

> "I came to be in spirit in the (yet future) Lord's day."

In two other passages, the words "in spirit" are associated with the verb "to bear" or "to carry".

> "I will shew unto thee the judgment of the great whore . . . . . so he carried me away in spirit into the wilderness" (Rev. xvii. 1, 3).

Whatever interpretation the reader may entertain of this symbol, all must agree that it was future to John. In Rev. xxi. 9, 10 we have the same expression, and we are all agreed that what John then saw was future, for the Lamb's wife has not yet descended from heaven. In all this, we have not yet alluded to the prophecies of the O.T. which are in process of fulfillment in the Apocalypse, and which cluster round "the day of the Lord". To collect and ponder the teaching of these prophecies alone, is to be practically convinced that Rev. i. 10 cannot refer to Sunday or the first day of the week, but to the great prophetic day of the Lord. When we assemble, as we have done, the proofs from grammatical usage, and see the perfect balance of "Man's day" with the "Lord's day", and supplement that with the four references to "in spirit" that occur in the book of the Revelation, we feel that no one, unless under the influence of the most fettering bias, can possibly think that in the majestic introduction of this mighty prophecy, John suddenly leaves the throne of God, the kingdom of Priests, the prophecy of the coming of the Lord in clouds and the waiting of all the tribes of the land, the glorious titles of Alpha and Omega, beginning and ending, the One Who was and is to come, to tell his reader that he was:

> "In a spiritual frame or ecstasy on the first day of the week."

PHILEMON

No.3. pp. 12 - 16

Before a verse by verse exposition of this epistle can be undertaken, there are some points of interest which demand attention.

Was Philemon written from Rome?

The answer to this question may not at first sight seem to be of any importance, but when it be considered that the letter was probably composed at the same time as Colossians and Ephesians, and that some commentators have alleged it to have been written from Caesarea, then it takes on a different light. Paul's Caesarean imprisonment was pre-Acts xxviii., before the postponement of the hope of Israel and the words. "The salvation of God is sent unto the Gentiles" (Acts xxviii. 28). If Colossians and Ephesians were written during the period alleged, then their message must be included within the limitation set by Acts xxvi. 22, "None other things than those which the prophets and Moses did say should come", and the "dispensation of the mystery", which was "hid in God" (Eph. iii. 9 R.V.), is also to be found in the O.T. The seriousness of this question will then be appreciated by all who are acquainted with the implications of the above points.

First let it be demonstrated that there is evidence to indicate that the three epistles, Ephesians, Colossians and Philemon, as regards time and place of writing, cannot be separated. Ephesians and Colossians are connected by their similarity of contents and their common bearer Tychicus (Eph. vi. 21; Col. iv. 7-9); Colossians and Philemon by the salutation which both have in common:

> "Aristarchus . . . . . Marcus . . . . . Epaphras . . . . . Luke . . . . . and Demas greet you" (Col. iv. 10-14).
>
> "There salute thee Epaphras . . . Marcus, Aristarchus, Demas, Lucas" (Philem. 23, 24).

Also the mission of Onesimus, whose name appears in Col. iv. 9 and is the subject in Philemon, is evidence that Colossians and Philemon were sent jointly.

All three epistles were written during a time of imprisonment (Eph. iii. 1; iv. 1; vi. 20; Col. iv. 3, 10, 18 and Philem. 1, 9, 10, 13, 23), the question being which imprisonment. Philemon is valuable in that it provides evidence in deciding whether or not Ephesians and Colossians were written from Rome, by reason of its links with those epistles. The eminent theologian Dr. H. A. Meyer, following some of the earlier German scholars, decided in favour of the captivity at Caesarea as the place and time of composition. His arguments are briefly summarized thus:

(1) It is more natural and probable that Onesimus fled from Colosse to Caesarea, than that he undertook a long sea voyage to Rome.

(2) If Philemon, Colossians and Ephesians were sent from Rome, why is there no mention of the name of Onesimus in the Ephesian epistle, commending him to the assembly there, for Tychicus and Onesimus traveling from Rome to Colosse would have arrived at Ephesus first.

(3) The presence of kai, 'also', in Eph. vi. 21, suggests that when Tychicus should come to Ephesus he would already have made known Paul's affairs to others—hence Ephesus would be his last stop, favouring a journey from Caesarea rather than Rome.

(4) In Philem. 22 the Apostle begs Philemon to prepare him a lodging, apparently for 'speedy' use, and this fact presumes that his imprisonment was much nearer to Colosse than distant Rome. Also Paul was planning, on his release from Rome, to journey to Macedonia (Phil. ii. 24), not Colosse.

(If the above points are obscure, the reader is advised to consult a map showing the relative positions of the places under review.). Taking the points in order it is noted:

(1) Onesimus had taken money or goods (Philem. 18) and so would have no trouble in boarding a ship in order to take refuge in the great metropolis of Rome. And surely this would be more likely to place him beyond the search of the "fugitivarii", whose sphere of activity would not be likely to extend in strict organization over the whole empire. (The "fugitivarii" were those who sought runaway slaves.)

(2) Onesimus would probably not have been known to the Ephesians anyway, and Paul was certainly not one to broach the subject of his defection unnecessarily. His presence with Tychicus was commendation enough.

(3) Much depends on the rendering of kai. It may, as Dean Alford suggests indicate, "As I have been going at length into the matters concerning you, so if you also on your part, wish to know my matter . . . . . Tychicus shall inform you".

(4) Alford's words are much to the point—"There is nothing inconsistent in the two expressions of Phil. ii. 24 and Philem. 22, with the idea of the Apostle projecting a land journey through Greece to Asia Minor; or at all events a general visitation . . . . . which should embrace both Philippi and Colosse". The idea of the lodging at Colosse being for 'speedy' use takes no cognizance of the fact of its being a comparative term. Philemon would be aware how long it would take Paul to journey to him and 'prepare' accordingly, so this does not constitute an argument either way.

On the other hand, point in favour of Paul being in captivity in Rome are:

(1) Paul was not expecting to be released from Caesarea. Felix knew that he had traveled to Jerusalem with money and hoped that Paul might pay him for his release (Acts xxiv. 17, 25, 26). Felix also sought the favour of the Jews (Acts xxiv. 27 R.V.), a fact which Paul must have noticed, and which would not suggest to him the possibility of release. Later, before Festus (who also sought the favour of the Jews, Acts xxv. 9 R.V.), Paul appealed to Caesar and so must go to Rome—hence he would not be expecting release at this time either.

(2) When in Caesarea, Paul's acquaintances were allowed to minister to him, but in the light of attempts already made on his life, it is to be wondered if Onesimus, a stranger, would have been allowed access to him (Acts xxiii. 12-15; xxiv. 23). In Rome, Onesimus would certainly have freedom of access (Acts xxviii. 30).

(3) Eph. vi. 19, 20 suggests that Paul had a certain amount of freedom in making known the gospel; a fact more consistent with Rome, when he received all, than Caesarea, when only his acquaintances (who were surely already believers) came to him (Acts xxiv. 23 with xxviii. 30).

It seems from the above that (a) Ephesians, Colossians and Philemon were 'companion' epistles and (b) that they were written from Rome during Paul's "two years" of captivity there (Acts xxviii. 30).

Philemon compared with the letter of Pliny.

The younger Pliny, died 113A.D., wrote letter to his friend Sabinianus to intercede for an offending freedman, and this letter has often been compared with that of Paul to Philemon. It may be of interest to the reader to note certain points of difference which only go to emphasize the change that the grace of God can make in men's lives. The following is a translation from the Latin as given by Dean Farrar:

"C. Plinius to his Sabinianus, greeting:

Your freedman, with whom, as you had told me, you were vexed, came to me, and, flinging himself at my feet, clung to them as though they had been yours. He wept much, entreated much, yet at the same time left much unsaid, and, in short, convinced me that he was sincerely sorry. I believe that he is really reformed, because he is conscious of his delinquency. You are angry, I know; justly angry, that too I know; but gentleness is most praiseworthy exactly where anger is most justifiable. You loved the poor fellow, and I hope will love him again; meanwhile, it is enough to yield to intercession. Should he ever deserve it you may be angry again, and all the more excusably by yielding now. Make some allowance for his youth, for his tears, for your own kindly disposition. Do not torture him, lest you torture yourself as well, for it is a torture to you when one of your kindly nature is angry. I fear you will think that I am not asking but forcing you if I join my prayers to his: I will, however, do so, and all the more fully and unreservedly in proportion to the sharpness and severity with which I took him to task, sternly threatening that I would never say a word for him again. That I said to him because he needed to be well frightened; but I do not say it to you, for perhaps I shall say a word for him again, and again gain my point; provided only my request be such as it becomes me to ask and you to grant. Farewell!"

This letter of Pliny has its grace and touching moments, but "it stands for beauty and value far below the letter to Philemon" (Farrar). "If purity of diction be expected, there will hardly be any difference of opinion in awarding the palm to the Christian Apostle" (Bishop Lightfoot).

The first obvious difference between the two epistles is that Paul's is on behalf of a runaway slave, but that of Pliny for a freedman. And yet in spite of the more subservient position of Onesimus, Paul's confidence in Philemon's reception of him, is far greater than that exhibited by Pliny in Sabinianus. Pliny is also in some doubt about the future behaviour of the freedman, whereas Paul is sure of Onesimus, that, having been touched by the grace of God, he will now be 'profitable' to his master. Paul does not find it necessary to plead that Philemon should not punish his slave, but Pliny fears, and begs against, the young freedman being tortured. Sabinianus, described as 'justly angry', is asked to make allowance for his freedman's "youth" and "tears", but Paul's whole letter is written around the principle of, "Forgiving each other, even as God also in Christ forgave you" (Eph. iv. 32 R.V.).

Pliny had threatened the young freedman of Sabinianus that he "would never say a word for him again", a threat which he did not intend to keep (he would break his word if necessary), but Philemon is devoid to all such inferences. There is a fine touch in Pliny's letter where he writes, "Gentleness is most praiseworthy exactly where anger is most justifiable", but at best the letter is that of an excellent Pagan, and falls very far short of the masterpiece from the hand of Paul, which became part of Holy Scriptures.

The structure of the epistle.

The following arrangement may help to throw the main points of the epistle into prominence:

A | 1-3. Opening salutation.
B | 4-7. Bowels of the saints refreshed—thy love and faith.
C | a | 8-10. I might order—I exhort for love's sake.
b | 11. Onesimus, once unprofitable, now profitable.
c | 12. Receive him that is my bowels.
d | 13. I would have retained (him).
a | 14. Not of necessity, but willingly.
d | 15, 16. Thou receive him for ever.
c | 17. Receive him as myself.
b | 18, 19. Onesimus—If he wronged thee, or oweth thee ought—I pay.
B | 20-22. Refresh my bowels—thy obedience.
A | 23-25. Closing salutation.

Apart from the opening and closing salutations, the epistle falls into three main divisions: B |, C |, B |. The first of these concerns Philemon, and Paul's thankfulness for his life and witness; the third expresses Paul's desires that the refreshment extended by Philemon "toward all (the) saints" should be further extended toward himself (verses 5, 7, 20). The middle section is taken up with the proper object of the epistle, Paul's intercession on behalf of Onesimus. The attitude of Paul "the Apostle" is of particular note in this central portion, for instead of leaning upon his apostolic authority, "I might enjoin (order)" (8), he appeals to love and beseeches. In the balancing member again, he prefers willingness to necessity (14). The reader might also note the following other characteristics:

(1) The use of the word 'bowels' splankna three times (verses 7, 12, 20)—only eleven occurrences total in the N.T.—related to splanknizomai ("moved with compassion" Matt. ix. 36, etc.).
(2) The "refreshment" provided by Philemon (anapauo "rest" Matt. xi. 28; xxvi. 45, etc.), used in connection with the preceding word and deriving from Philemon's "love . . . . . faith . . . . . acknowledging of every good thing . . . . . obedience" (5, 6, 21).
(3) The double reference to the "possession" of Onesimus—"I (Paul) would have retained (katecho) with me . . . . . thou (Philemon) shouldest receive (apecho) him for ever" (13, 15).
(4) The possible play on the word onemi (verse 20 "joy" better "profit") from which Onesimus is derived. Compare also verse 11.
(5) Paul's confidence in the effectiveness of prayer to "change things", not simply psychologically but in reality, verse 22—"I trust that through your prayers I shall be given unto you".
(6) The letter was also an I.O.U. from Paul on Onesimus' behalf (18, 19).

Other points will come to light during the exposition of the epistle.

No.4. pp. 30 - 34

"Paul, a prisoner of Jesus Christ (R.V. Christ Jesus)" (1). This expression, which also occurs in verse 9 (R.V.), is very similar to Eph. iii. 1, and demonstrates the attitude of Paul towards his confinement. Not a prisoner of man, but "of Christ Jesus". No other epistle of Paul actually begins with the words, desmios Christou Iesou, and all with the exception of Philippians (which has "servants [douloi] of Christ Jesus") and I & II Thess. (which have no title), begin with 'apostle'. The reason for this is evidently to be found in the contents of the epistle, for Paul is not writing from the standpoint of an apostle, but "for love's sake" (9); he looks not to 'necessity' but for 'willingness' (14).

> "and Timothy our (lit. the) brother" (1).

Timothy is associated with Paul in II Corinthians, I & II Thessalonians, Philippians, Colossians and here in Philemon, in the opening addresses to these epistles. In Philippians he is immediately forgotten and Paul continues, "I thank my God . . . . . in every prayer of mine . . . . ." (i. 3), but in Colossians the plural is maintained, "We give thanks . . . . . since we heard, etc." (i. 3, 4), until verse 23 is reached. Philemon follows the pattern of Philippians in immediately dropping the plural "I thank my God . . . . . in my prayers etc." (4). Nevertheless, the inclusion of Timothy must be seen as indicating his 'amen' to its contents and request.

> "unto Philemon our dearly beloved, and fellow labourer" (1).

"Philemon" is evidently related to philema, kiss, used of the form of greeting practiced among believers, "Greet one another with an holy kiss" (II Cor. xiii. 12). That he was a Colossian appears from Col. iv. 9, insofar as his slave is mentioned as belonging to that place. He became a believer under the ministry of the Apostle (Philem. 19) although under what circumstances is not known, for Paul, at this time, was apparently unknown by face in Colosse (Col. ii. 1), and there is no record of his having visited the place. The long sojourn at Ephesus has been suggested as the period during which the event occurred and this seems most likely.

The appellations predicated of Philemon, "our dearly beloved" (literally "the beloved"), and "fellow-labourer" are probably to be read together as Moffatt and others, "our beloved fellow-worker". The word fellow-labourer, sunergos is almost exclusive to Paul, occurring only in III John 8 outside of his writings, although the verbal form is used once each by Mark and James. In Mark xvi. 20 it is used of the Lord Himself Who was 'working with' the disciples, and in I Cor. iii. 9 of Paul and Apollos "labourers together with" God. The circumstances which occasioned its use of Philemon are not known, unless it be the period already referred to at Ephesus. It is certainly possible that Paul could be using the word to imply "labourers in a common cause", even though the parties might be in reality miles apart.

> "And to our beloved (texts 'sister') Apphia" (2).

"Apphia the sister" (R.V. margin) would appear to have been the wife of Philemon, who being the mistress of the house would naturally be involved in the reception of a runaway slave. Indeed Bishop Lightfoot writes:

> "The letter introduces us to an ordinary household in a small town in Phrygia. Four members of it are mentioned by name, the father, the mother, the son, and the slave" (Introduction to Philemon).

He evidently refers to Philemon as the father, Apphia as the mother, Archippus as the son and Onesimus as the slave, which is certainly a possibility. Whether Archippus (2) was the son or no, he would certainly seem to have been a member or friend of the family circle.

> "and Archippus our fellowsoldier" (2).

This man has one other mention in Scripture, in Col. v. 17:

> "And say to Archippus, Take heed to the ministry which thou hast received in the Lord, that thou fulfil it."

The word translated "take heed", blepo is rendered 'beware' in the same epistle (ii. 8) and is evidently intended as a warning. What the 'ministry' was, and why the church was to be responsible for relating Paul's words rather than the apostle himself, can only be a matter of conjecture. The words, "the ministry . . . . . that thou fulfil it" are reminiscent of Acts xii. 25:

> "And Barnabas and Saul returned from Jerusalem, when they had fulfilled their ministry."

Here the ministry is known, for it concerned the sending of "relief unto the brethren which dwelt in Judaea" (Acts xi. 29), a special mission, rather than a continuous service.

On the other hand consider the exhortation of Paul to Timothy:

> "Do the work of an evangelist, make full proof of (fully carry out) thy ministry" (II Tim. iv. 5), which seems to imply a continuous ministry. Whether the ministry given to Archippus was continuous or a special service only, it is possible that the duty of the Colossian church was to "keep him up to it", hence Paul's word to Archippus via them. Does not this duty divulge upon all the members of the body of Christ, to lovingly see that those who minister to them, "take heed that they fulfil their ministry"?

Archippus is called, in Philemon, "our fellowsoldier" sustratiotes, a word used in one other place only of Epaphroditus (Phil. ii. 25), who for the work of Christ was "nigh unto death". It is evident that Paul did not use the word lightly, for the contexts of its cognate words speak of "enduring hardness" and non-commitment in the world, of "overthrowing strongholds" and "leading every thought captive unto the obedience of Christ" (II Tim. ii. 1-4; II Cor. x. 3-5). Whatever "the ministry" of Archippus was it deserved the association of warfare, into which only those of "full age", and whose "house is in order", may enter. Compare the O.T. qualifications for a soldier, which set forth in principle what is stated in II Tim. ii. 4, and implied in Eph. vi. (after the instructions concerning the home).

> "From twenty years old and upward (mature), all that are able to go forth to war" (Numb. i. 3).
>
> "What man is there that hath built a new house, and hath not dedicated it . . . . . planted a vineyard, and hath not yet eaten of it . . . . . betrothed a wife, and hath not taken her . . . . . that is fearful and fainthearted? Let him go and return unto his house" (Deut. xx. 5-8).

Every soldier needs encouragement and support, and Archippus, Paul's and Timothy's "fellowsoldier", was no exception; the church at Colosse was to remind him to "take heed to the ministry", for it had been received "in the Lord".

> "and to the church in thy house" (2).

The church in the house is mentioned in Rom. xvi. 5; I Cor. xvi. 19; Col. iv. 15. Acts xii. 12 also has some bearing upon these references, where in the house of John Mark's mother, Mary, "many were gathered together praying".

During the Acts period, whilst the "hope of Israel" prevailed, believers continued to worship in the temple (iii. 1) and to enter the synagogues (xiii. 14, 15; xv. 21), for the intention was not to overthrow these institutions, but, by the preaching of the truth, to reform them from within, so preparing the congregations for the return of the Messiah. The early epistle of James actually assumes the existence in a synagogue of believers in a position to say to others, "Stand thou there, or sit here" (James ii. 1-3 where the word 'assembly' is actually 'synagogue'). Believers during this period were looked upon as a Jewish sect. But there were towns where no synagogue existed (Philippi seems to have been one such, Acts xvi. 12, 13), and even where they did, the synagogue service could hardly have given much satisfaction to those in possession of the key to the O.T. Also the newly-formed 'sect' came to be "everywhere spoken against" (Acts xxviii. 22).

These facts would naturally lead to the meeting of believers in houses, thrown open for this purpose by the wealthier brethren. They would not supersede the synagogue services, but supplement them, for the reason already given above.

With the passing of Israel's hope at Acts xxviii. 25-28 and the coming in of a different hope, and especially with the passing of the "first place" of the Jew, emphasized previously by his position in temple and synagogue, the connections with these institutions would gradually cease. True they might at first be used, if opportunity arose, to announce the new calling, but it can hardly be expected that many, if any, would be kindly disposed towards the idea of Israel's having become Lo-Ammi, "not My people". Since no buildings existed at this time for Christian worship (Bishop Lightfoot says, "There is no clear example of a separate building set apart for Christian worship within the limits of the Roman Empire before the third century") then it was natural that apartments in private houses would be devoted to this purpose. Hence "the church in the house" would come into prominence.

The letter to Philemon is addressed then, "to the church in thy house", and as such suggests how it could be said of Philemon, "the saints are refreshed by thee, brother" (7). Also, those who met together "in thy house" would be involved in fulfilling Paul's desire for Onesimus, that he might be received as "a brother beloved' (16).

> "Grace to you, and peace, from God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ" (3).

Dr. John Eadie writes, "Eirene—Peace, is the Greek equivalent of the Hebrew shalom . . . . . It was the formula of ordinary courtesy at meeting and parting . . . . . it is the result of the previous charis (grace) . . . . . As the West embodied its wishes in charis, and the East in shalom—eirene,—so the apostle, in catholic fullness, uses both terms in their profoundest Christian significance: no ordinary greeting, or 'as the world giveth', but a prayer for all combined and fitting spiritual blessings" (from his commentaries on Galatians and Ephesians).

There has been some disagreement amongst expositors as to the true disposition of the next verses and consequently the meaning of the apostle. The A.V. reads:

> "I thank my God, making mention of thee always in my prayers, hearing of thy love and faith, which thou hast toward the Lord Jesus, and toward all saints; that the communication of thy faith may become effectual by the acknowledging of every good thing which is in you in Christ Jesus. For we have great joy and consolation in thy love, because the bowels of the saints are refreshed by thee, brother" (4-7).

The view held by Bengel, H. A. Meyer and others is that verse 6 attaches itself directly to verse 5, "specifying the tendency of" the love and faith of Philemon. So that the words, "that the communication of thy faith . . . . .", are not the subject of Paul's prayer but the tendency of Philemon's "love and faith". This conception is roughly expressed thus:

> "I am always thankful to God when I mention you in prayer, because I hear of your love and faith towards the Lord Jesus and the saints, in the exercising of which you have in view the goal of fellowship—to make every good thing in us effective for Christ Jesus by acknowledgment, for I have great joy . . . . ."

The alternative view, followed by many commentators and suggested by a number of translations (e.g. R.S.V., Moffatt, Weymouth, N.E.B., etc.), requires the supplying of the ellipsis "praying" at the beginning of verse 6, making the following words the subject of Paul's prayer, thus:

> "I thank my God, making mention of thee in my prayers . . . . . praying that the communication of thy faith may become effectual . . . . ."

The latter disposition appears the most natural and is supported by the weight of opinion; it is however possible to admit either view.

Thanksgiving and prayers are characteristic of the opening sections of Paul's epistles and Philemon is no exception:

> "I thank my God, making mention of thee always in my prayers" (4).

Paul was a great man of prayer and his prayer-list, involving as it did "the care of all the churches" (II Cor. xi. 28), would probably have put most believers to shame. But then the apostle had a confidence that prayer changes things, as he later expressed in the same letter:

> "I trust that through your prayers I shall be given unto you" (22).

Prayer does not simply change things in the mind of the supplicator, it can affect outward circumstances, it can move mountains (Matt. xvii. 20). "Right division" is of course as necessary with respect to prayer as with any other subject of Scripture, but the power of prayer remains unchanged, as is evident from Paul's continuing confidence in its practice. (See Rom. xv. 30; II Cor. i. 11; Phil. i. 19 and note the efforts of Epaphras in Col. iv. 12.). Those who 'strove' or 'laboured fervently' in prayers evidently expected mighty things to be wrought, and it would appear that they were not disappointed. Here is a lesson worthy of the attention of all believers of all ages.

No.5. pp. 52 - 56

The previous article ended with a comment on the confidence of the apostle Paul and others in prayer. Paul's thanksgiving (an essential part of all prayer) was based upon the reports he had received of Philemon's love and faith:

> "Hearing of thy love and faith, which thou hast toward the Lord Jesus, and toward all saints" (5).

If the figure chiasm is here employed then the disposition of this verse is:

> "the faith which thou hast toward the Lord Jesus, and love toward all the saints."

Faith may also rather refer to faithfulness, although a due recognition of the change of prepositions in the verse does not make this necessary. "Toward the Lord" is pros ton kurion whilst "toward all saints" is eis pantas tous hagious, and the change from pros to eis is surely significant. The Companion Bible note on these prepositions is:

> "pros . . . . . with a view to anything—as an end (with the accusative)."
> "eis . . . . . denotes motion to or unto an object, with the purpose of reaching or touching it" (Appendix 104).

Faith which is exercised "with a view to" the Lord Jesus finds its complement in a love which "reaches out unto" all the saints. "Faith worketh by love" (Gal. v. 6).

> "That the communication of thy faith may become effectual by the acknowledging of every good thing which is in you (text 'us') in Christ Jesus" (6).

Three words demand attention before the meaning of this verse may be considered: "communication", "effectual" and "acknowledging".

"Communication", koinonia is the word normally translated 'fellowship' or 'communion'. Paul uses a cognate word koinonos in verse 17, 'partner'. It is quite wrong to imagine that the word is limited in meaning to fellowship in spiritual things, as Acts ii. 42-45 makes clear:

> "And they continued stedfastly in the apostles' doctrine and fellowship (koinonia) . . . And all that believed were together, and had all things common (koinos); And sold their possessions and goods, and parted them to all men, as every man had need."

Consider also Rom. xv. 26, 27:

> "For it hath pleased them of Macedonia and Achaia to make a certain contribution (koinonia) for the poor saints which are at Jerusalem. It hath pleased them verily; and their debtors they are. For if the Gentiles have been made partakers (koinoneo) of their spiritual things, their duty is also to minister unto them in carnal things."

Philemon's fellowship was of this nature; his love reached out and he had refreshed the bowels of the saints (7), which would involve him in carnal (fleshly) things. In days when the church was "in the house" such hospitality was a necessity (I Tim. iii. 2; Titus i. 7, 8) and was commended by the Apostle.

"Effectual", energes suggests activity, work, vigour. Here is the word which expresses the action of faith when it manifests itself in love—"faith worketh (energeo) by love" (Gal. v. 6). Faith is not passive but active; "faith apart from works (ton ergon) is barren" (James ii. 20 texts).

The third word under consideration must be reviewed at some length and so deserves of a separate heading.

Epignosis.

This word, translated in the A.V. "knowledge", "acknowledgment" and "acknowledging", is difficult to define and distinguish from gnosis, "knowledge". How is the prefix epi to be understood; as "upon", "after" or as intensifying knowledge to "full knowledge"? Dr. Bullinger, in his Critical Lexicon, defines epignosis as,

> "A knowledge that lays claim to personal sympathy, and exerts an influence upon the person."

Culverwell in Spiritual Optics has the following note quoted by Trench in his Synonyms of the New Testament:

> "Epignosis . . . . . bringing me better acquainted with a thing I knew before; a more exact viewing of an object that I saw before afar off."

He evidently has in mind I Cor. xiii. 12 where both gnosis and epignosis occur in their verbal forms and therefore provide a useful comparison.

> "Now I know (ginosko) in part; but then shall I know (epiginosko) even as also I am known (epiginosko)."

The Apostle is contrasting (in the context) the present experience, which he likens to "seeing through a mirror enigmatically", with the "face to face" of the future (xiii. 12). The A.V. "glass" gives a false impression, as the reference is undoubtedly to "the imperfectly reflecting metal mirrors of the ancients" (H. A. Meyer), and the presence of the Greek ainigma (Prov. i. 6 LXX 'dark saying') tends to confirm the idea of obscurity. The present knowledge is "in part" and is connected with "prophecies" which shall be done away and "tongues" which shall cease, when "that which is perfect is come" (xiii. 8-10). (It should be remembered that "the present" refers here to the Acts Period.). The partial knowledge—"now I know (ginosko) in part" is contrasted with what "I shall know (epiginosko)", when "that which is perfect (teleios, complete) is come". This suggests a goal, a thought present also in the usage of this word in Eph. iv. 13:

> "Till we all attain unto the unity of the faith, and of the knowledge (epignosis) of the Son of God" (R.V.).

Compare also II Tim. iii. 7 where although some are "ever learning", they are "never able to come to the knowledge (epignosis) of the truth". It ought also to be noted that the knowledge (epignosis), to which Paul refers in I Cor. xiii., is in harmony with the Lord's knowledge of the believer:

> "Then I shall know according as also I have been known" (verse 12 lit.).

Consider now other references to the verb epiginosko:

> "Ye shall know them by their fruits" (Matt. vii. 16, 20).
> "Elias is come . . . . . and they knew him not" (Matt. xvii. 12).
> "When she (Rhoda) knew Peter's voice" (Acts xii. 14).
> "When they (the Ephesians) knew that he was a Jew" (Acts xix. 34).

The idea of recognition is resident in the above usage—Rhoda could not see Peter but she recognized his voice; false prophets may come in sheep's clothing but they may be recognized as wolves by their fruits. In the first of these examples the evidence for knowledge is hearing; in the second, hearing might well lead the believer astray (they are false prophets) and doing is appealed to (the evidence of sight).

What conclusion may then be drawn from this usage of epiginosko? Two thoughts must influence any attempted definition of the word: (1) the idea of a goal and (2) the evident meaning of "recognition". The writer was encouraged to find that these two thoughts had been brought together n the definition of J. Armitage Robinson, D.D. (in his St. Paul's Epistle to the Ephesians), in the following manner:

> "So far then as we are to distinguish between gnosis and epignosis, we may say that gnosis is the wider word and expresses 'knowledge' in the fullest sense: epignosis is knowledge directed towards a particular object, perceiving, discerning, recognizing: but it is not knowledge in the abstract: that is gnosis . . . . ."

"Knowledge directed towards a particular object" appears to represent the nearest definition of epignosis, with the added thought that it is more personal and exact than gnosis, involving "recognition" and its natural outcome, "acknowledgment". This meaning must now be applied to the passage in question:

> "That the communication of thy faith may become effectual by the acknowledging (epignosis) of every good thing which is in us in Christ Jesus" (6).

In the light of what has been learnt about "communication" (fellowship), "effectual" (suggesting activity) and "acknowledging" (personal, exact and directive knowledge), the following seems to express the Apostle's meaning.

> By a due recognition, and exact personal knowledge and acknowledgment of the good in us (which is in us for, or towards [eis] Christ Jesus) the sharing of faith becomes effective towards the saints. Consider Eph. ii. 10—"We are His workmanship, created in Christ Jesus for (epi) good works, which God prepared before in order that we should walk in them" (lit. rendering).

The sharing of faith, in Philemon's case, involved (verse 7)—hospitality:

> For I had much joy and comfort in thy love, because the hearts of the saints have been refreshed through thee, brother."

"Comfort", paraklesis allied to parakletos, "Comforter" (the Holy Spirit, John xiv. 26) is rendered "encouragement" in Moffatt's version, which seems nearer to the truth expressed by the word. Comfort is more than consolation, it should strengthen—Latin cum "together", fortis "strong". Paul was both strengthened and given great joy in Philemon's love to the saints, and resting upon this confidence now reaches the point of his epistle—"Wherefore".

> "Wherefore, though I might be much bold in Christ to enjoin (order) thee that which is convenient (becoming), yet for love's sake I rather beseech thee . . . . ." (8, 9).

Paul does not appeal to Philemon from the authority of an apostle, but for love's sake, and remembering that he is now "such an one as Paul the aged, and now also a prisoner of Christ Jesus" (R.V.). The greatness of this man is nowhere more evident than here, and especially if the suggestion of Lightfoot is correct that, "in the common dialect presbutes (here rendered 'aged') may have been written indifferently for presbeutes (an ambassador) in St. Paul's time". Rather than remember his authority as an apostle, he chooses to look behind the office and remember that he too is under orders—he represents another as "an ambassador".

> "Paul an ambassador, and now also a prisoner of Christ Jesus" (9).

An ambassador (II Cor. v. 20; Eph. vi. 20) and a prisoner (Eph. iii. 1; iv. 1; II Tim. i. 8, etc.), of Christ Jesus.

The bonds and afflictions of the Apostle only served to emphasize the grace extended toward him.

> "Lest I should be exalted above measure through the abundance (surpassingness) of the revelations, there was given to me a thorn in the flesh . . . . . My grace is sufficient for thee" (II Cor. xii. 7-9).
>
> "The Holy Ghost witnesseth in every city, saying that bonds and afflictions abide me. But none of these things move me . . . . . so that I might finish my course . . . . . to testify the gospel of the grace of God" (Acts xx. 23, 24).
>
> "Paul, the prisoner . . . . . if ye have heard of the dispensation of the grace of God which is given me . . . . ." (Eph. iii. 1, 2).
>
> "In my bonds, and in the defence and confirmation of the gospel, ye all are partakers of my grace" (Phil. i. 7).
>
> "Remember my bonds. Grace be with you" (Col. iv. 18).

It is one thing to represent a country (or in this case a person) as an ambassador, but much more to suffer for that country as a prisoner.

> "We are therefore ambassadors for Christ (huper Christou) . . . . . we beseech for Christ (huper Christou) . . . . ." (II Cor. v. 20 lit.).
>
> "To you it was granted (charizomai; charis = grace) for Christ (huper Christou), not only to believe in Him, but also to suffer for Him (huper autou)" (Phil. i. 29 lit.).

Paul's position as a prisoner reminded him of the grace given to him, and so he beseeches for love's sake, laying authority aside.

> "I beseech thee for my child, whom I have begotten in my bonds, Onesimus, Who was aforetime unprofitable to thee, but now is profitable to thee and to me" (10, 11 R.V.).

Onesimus is called (12) "him, that is, mine own bowls". A connection between 'begetting' and 'bowels' is observed in Gen. xv. 4:

> "He that shall come forth out of thine own bowels shall be thine heir."

The Apostle looks upon himself as both a father (I Cor. iv. 14, 15) and a mother (Gal. iv. 19) of those whom he considers his own children, begotten by means of the Gospel. Onesimus, in particular, "was doubly dear to the Apostle, as being the child of his sorrows" (Lightfoot), because begotten "in his bonds". The Apostle completely identified himself with Onesimus:

> "Receive him as myself" (17).
> "If he oweth thee ought, put that on mine account . . . . . I will repay" (18, 19).

Paul also had a great confidence in "his child". In time past Onesimus had not lived up to his name (Onesimus means profitable); now the grace of God had changed that—"profitable to thee and to me". This confidence is exhibited in action:

> "Whom I have sent back to thee in his own person" (12 R.V.).

Onesimus appears to have been accompanied in this journey by Tychicus (Col.iv.7-9) but had he so desired, would no doubt have had opportunity to escape during the journey. The preservation of this letter is evidence in favour of his having not done so, and also of his acceptance by his master. Paul was confident in both matters (12, 21). The grace of God can turn even a despised Phrygian slave into "a brother beloved" (16).

No.6. pp. 72 - 76

The apostle Paul, demonstrating his confidence in the grace of God as having touched Onesiums, "his child", begotten in his bonds, sent him back from Rome to Colosse accompanied by Tychicus (Col. iv. 7-9; Philem. 12). In doing this he waived his authority as an apostle, and subordinated his own desire to retain Onesimus, to "the mind" of Philemon:

> "Whom I would have retained with me, that in thy stead he might have ministered unto me in the bonds of the gospel: but without thy mind would I do nothing: that thy benefit (thy good) should not be as it were of necessity, but willingly" (12-14).

The Apostle assumes that Philemon himself would perform this ministry to him, had he been present, and was of a mind to keep Onesimus on his behalf, but again the greatness of the man showed itself—not "of necessity, but willingly". Paul was concerned that ministry should come from the heart, a lesson for all believers of all times.

The more that is read of this wonderful epistle, the more it is realized that it was written with a pen "dipped in grace". There is never compulsion, and the only debt is "to love one another" (Rom. xiii. 8); yet when this has been said, it only serves to emphasize the truth of I John iii. 16:

> "Hereby know we love, because He laid down His life for us: and we ought to lay down our lives for the brethren" (R.V.).

Paul could quote examples of those who possessed this spirit:

> "Greet Priscilla and Aquila my helpers in Christ Jesus: who have for my life laid down their own necks" (Rom. xvi. 3, 4).
>
> "Epaphroditus . . . . . for the work of Christ he was nigh unto death, not regarding his life, to supply your lack of service toward me" (Phil. ii. 30).
>
> "Onesiphorus (no doubt at great personal risk remembering that Paul was in the 'death cell' at this time) . . . . . sought me out very diligently . . . . . and in how many things he ministered unto me in Ephesus, thou knowest very well" (II Tim. i. 16-18).

The obligation of such 'love' is perhaps never more felt than in this most personal of Paul's epistles. The comfort such ministry must have brought to the Apostle cannot be gauged at this distance in time, but the value he put upon it, is some indication. He gave up this comfort when he sent Onesimus back to Philemon. Here is true greatness, for Philemon was in debt to Paul (19) and the Apostle might well have considered it his right to retain this minister to offset such a debt. The 'good' (agathos) of verse 6 is recognized; the 'benefit' (agathos) of verse 14 is to be exercised 'willingly'.

The Apostle now indicates his belief that behind the whole affair may be observed the work of God.

> "For perhaps he was therefore parted from thee for a season, that thou shouldest have him for ever" (15 R.V.).

This conviction strengthens the determination of Paul to send back Onesimus, and it is interesting to conjecture whether or not the Apostle had in mind Deut. xv. 16, 17:

> "And it shall be, if he (the now free servant, verse 12) say unto thee, I will not go away from thee; because he loveth thee . . . then . . . he shall be thy servant for ever."

The parting (note—"he was parted from thee") and the service lost, at the most a few short months, could not compare with the lasting fellowship now assured through the change wrought in Onesimus. ("For ever" is the translation of aionios, a word used only three times in the Prison Epistles—other occurrences: II Tim. i. 9 "world"; ii. 10 "eternal"). The attitude of the Apostle to the parting is reminiscent of Joseph's attitude to his brethren. Although they had sold him into captivity yet he said:

> "Now therefore be not grieved, nor angry with yourselves, that ye sold me hither: for God did send me before you to preserve life" (Gen. xlv. 5).

There was a recognition by both Joseph and Paul that "all things work together for good to them that love God, to them who are the called according to His purpose" (Rom. viii. 28). "Ye thought evil against me; but God meant it unto good" (Gen. l. 20).

But the reception of Onesimus was now to be on a different ground:

> "No longer as a servant, but more than a servant, a brother beloved, specially to me, but how much rather to thee, both in the flesh and in the Lord" (16 R.V.).

The Apostle gives no hint of manumission—not once in the epistle is there the slightest suggestion that Philemon is under an obligation to give Onesimus his freedom—but rather does he remind him of his obligation as one believer to another. The external relationship of master-slave remains the same (and Paul would expect compliance with his words in the accompanying epistle, Col. iii. 1 - iv. 1) but the ethical relationship has become a higher one, "both in the flesh, and in the Lord". Two spheres are affected by the change in Onesimus; that pertaining to the material needs of man, and that associated with fellowship "in the Lord"—both are important. The words referred to above, which appear in the Colossian epistle, would be a corrective to any false notions by either party.

Philemon is to receive Onesimus as he would have done Paul himself (17):

> "If thou count me therefore a partner (one with whom thou canst have fellowship—koinonos), receive him as myself."

How closely Paul identifies himself with the runaway slave, so much so, that for Philemon not to receive Onesimus becomes equivalent to a break down in fellowship with the Apostle himself. Philemon is reminded of their "common" ground, the basis of fellowship. But this does not mean that Paul is not mindful of the possible harm suffered by the defect of Onesimus.

> "But if he hath wronged thee at all, or oweth thee aught, put that to mine account; I Paul write it with mine own hand, I will repay . . . . ." (18, 19 R.V.).

The fault of Onesimus consisted of more than merely running away, with its consequent neglect of service, it would appear also to have involved theft. The slave would have need money to get as far as Rome, and Paul's words indicate that such a debt had been incurred. Onesimus would now hardly be in a position to pay back what was owing (it could be made up later of course in loving service) and so Paul again identifies himself with the slave and his need—"I will repay". The suggestion would be almost laughable were it not for the evident grace behind the words. How could the Apostle, himself in great need in a Roman prison, make up the debt? Nevertheless to demonstrate his sincerity he takes up the pen (Paul dictated his letters normally, Rom. xvi. 22) and signs the I.O.U. The words "I Paul" should not be lightly glossed over but recognized as weighty, as in other contexts (II Cor. x. 1; Gal. v. 2; Eph. iii. 1; Col. i. 23; I Thess. ii. 18).

Here again the Apostle reveals his greatness. Strictly he could have appealed to the lasting debt owed him by the recipient of this letter a debt which money could never repay, but he will not impose upon any man.

> "Albeit I do not say to thee how thou owest unto me even thine own self besides" (19).
> "I say nothing of the fact that you owe me even your own self" (Weymouth).

This debt had been incurred through the ministry of Paul which had brought salvation to Philemon. Could such a debt, "even thine own self", ever be repayed? Compare Luke ix. 25:

> "What is a man advantaged, if he gain the whole world, and lose himself . . . . .?"

It must be remembered that Paul looked upon himself as the spiritual father of both Onesimus (10) and Philemon (19). Only with such a conception could any man be looked upon as owing him his own self. This is no denial of I Cor. vi. 19, 20:

> "Ye are not your own, for ye are bought with a price."

Note also, in the context of masters and slaves, I Cor. vii. 22, 23, where there can be no doubt as to whom the debt is owed.

The next verse contains a play on the name Onesimus:

> "Yea, brother, may I have profit (onemi) of thee in the Lord" (20 lit.).

Paul is in effect saying, "I am sending back to thee Onesimus (profitable), therefore let me have profit of thee". This profit is looked upon by him as the reception and refreshment of Onesimus:

> "Refresh my bowels in Christ" (20 texts).

Onesimus is called "my bowels" in verse 12, and Paul's profit is that such should be received and refreshed, for in doing so, he himself (being so closely identified with 'his child') would benefit. The cause of Onesimus is the cause of Paul, and the Apostle has great confidence in the outcome:

> "Having confidence in thine obedience I write unto thee, knowing that thou wilt do even beyond what I say" (21 R.V.).

"Beyond what I say"—the details are left for Philemon to fill in. Would manumission be included? Possibly, but the master is under no compulsion, either here or in any other part of the epistle, to set his slave free. Rather does the next verse suggest hospitality, "as a brother beloved", than freedom.

> "But withal prepare me also a lodging" (22).

"Also", as well as Onesimus. Had Philemon during the absence of his slave obtained another to meet his need? If so then the 'also' takes on a stronger meaning—"prepare him a lodging—me also".

The Apostle's confidence of release is based upon "your prayers"; not perhaps simply Philemon's, but of the whole of the Colossian assembly. This confidence in prayer has been already touched upon in a previous article, and may be seen more clearly by emphasizing the preposition in verse 22:

> "I trust that by means of your prayers I shall be given unto you."

Paul apparently planned upon his release to lodge at Colosse, having visited Philippi in Macedonia (Phil. i. 24-26) and probably a number of other churches, who would 'bring him on his way'. His earlier plans to travel west to Spain (Rom. xv. 23, 24) had been, for the time being, put on one side. That he did however during this period of freedom visit Spain at least, is attested strongly by tradition (see Lightfoot's Biblical Essays). This change of plan no doubt accorded with the revelation received after his letter to the Romans (Eph. iii.), when his first concern would be to establish the existing churches in the new stewardship, rather than break the virgin ground of the extreme west. This change of plan may also largely have been influenced by the Colossian heresy (Col. ii.) which was at this time giving the Apostle some concern. He would wish, at the first opportunity, to visit Colosse and establish the church there. Hence his journey eastwards.

The letter closes with salutations:

> "There salute thee Epaphras, my fellow prisoner in Christ Jesus; Marcus, Aristarchus, Demas, Lucas, my fellow labourers" (23, 24).

All five persons are also mentioned at the close of the Colossian letter and "Jesus, which is called Justus" is added (Col. iv. 11). Of this latter nothing is known, except that together with Aristarchus and Marcus (iv. 10) he was "of the circumcision". The distinction would seem to imply that Epaphras, Demas and Luke were not of the circumcision.

"Epaphras", his full name would be Epaphroditus, is probably not to be confused with one of the same name, a messenger to the church at Philippi (Phil. ii. 25), for the name was a common one. He has two mentions in the Colossian epistle (i. 7; iv. 12) which suggest he was a teacher and a great man of prayer. When Philemon was written he shared Paul's imprisonment (Philem. 23).

"Marcus", undoubtedly John Mark, whose association with Paul in his missionary efforts led to such serious consequences. He was a cousin of Barnabas (Col. iv. 10) and cause of the contention between him and Paul (Acts xv. 36-40). His bad start however was more than amended for later, and he is seen again here with Paul, and is later highly commended by the Apostle (II Tim. iv. 11). His connection with Rome is interesting, especially since his Gospel views the Saviour from the point of view of a servant (a viewpoint well understood by the Romans with their system of slavery) and accords with an early tradition that it was written to the Romans.

"Aristarchus" has three mentions in Acts (xix. 29; xx. 4; xxvii. 2). He was a "Macedonian of Thessalonica" and fellow traveler with Paul. On one occasion he appears to have narrowly escaped death n the theatre at Ephesus.

"Demas", mentioned three times altogether (Col. iv. 14; II Tim. iv. 10; Philem. 24), a "fellow labourer" at the time of Paul's first imprisonment, was possibly also a Thessalonian. He forsook the Apostle at his hour of greatest need "having loved the present age".

"Lucas"—"Luke, the beloved physician", writer of the Gospel bearing his name and the Acts, and in contrast to Demas, remaining faithful to the Apostle right up to the end (II Tim. iv. 11). As a doctor his association with Paul must have been of great comfort to him and may be the reason for this being described as "the beloved (one)" (Col. iv. 14). Paul's motive in referring to him as a physician may not be to distinguish him from others of the same name, but rather as a reminder of his own obligations to him. Was he behind the exhortation of I Tim. v. 23?

> "Drink no longer water, but use a little wine for thy stomach's sake and thine often infirmities."

Did he have any part in the recovery of Epaphroditus, used by God as the earthly channel (Phil. ii. 25-28)? The answers must remain a matter of conjecture. It ought to be noted however that his activities were not confined to medical work—he is called "my fellow-labourer" (Philem. 24) and as such undoubtedly had a share in the gospel.

The usual salutation (II Thess. iii. 17) finally closes the epistle:

> "The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with your spirit" (25).

No.25. The Epistle to the Ephesians (5).

pp. 16 - 20

Having stressed the inestimable privilege of uninterrupted access to the Father, for both Jewish and Gentile believers in this Body, Paul now informs the latter that they are no more strangers and foreigners but fellow citizens of the saints (literally) and of the household of God (ii. 19). "Fellow-citizens of the saints" is a strange expression, but when we realize that the word translated "saints", can mean holy things as well as holy people, and that in Heb. ix. 8 it is rendered "holiest of all", we can see that the Apostle is stating something more wonderful than that the Gentile is now being blessed with the Jew, for this had been clearly revealed as God's purpose through Abraham and was always true of Gentile proselytes. He is now revealing the supreme truth that Gentiles, once so far off and distant from God and from blessing, are now so near that they belong to the very holiest of all, the most holy place in heaven where the ascended Christ has now entered (Heb. vi. 19, 20). What an overwhelming change God's abounding grace had made! It sounds too good to be true!

The Apostle continues "having been built (literally) upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets". Does this mean the foundation laid by the apostles and prophets, or are they themselves the foundation? In chapter iv., verses 8-11 make clear that at His Ascension the Lord Jesus gave a new order of apostles and prophets which must not be confused with the calling of the twelve apostles in His earthly lifetime. The ministry given through the new apostles, of which Paul was chief, was a foundation ministry, built of course upon the one foundation, Jesus Christ (I Cor. iii. 11), and He is the chief cornerstone upon Whom the whole Temple building rests, the Greek term being derived from the Septuagint of Isa. xxviii. 16. It is important to note that the emphasis here is not on this Temple's magnificence, like Solomon's, but upon the fact that it is a home. The words "household", "built", "building", "builded together", and "habitation" all contain the Greek word for "home". This means that the great purpose of God which lies behind the preparation and erection of this edifice, is to provide a permanent home for Himself. Up to this point God has had temporary homes. The material heavens He spread out as a tent to dwell in (Isa. xl. 22) and later on, when His earthly people were journeying from Egypt to Canaan, He dwelt in another tent, in the holy of holies of the Tabernacle. But as the figure suggests, these were only temporary homes. It is not too much to say that God desires a permanent home, and this home will be provided by this church, now described as the Body of Christ. When this calling is taken to the highest heavens, completed, and the figure changes from Body to a Temple, a dwelling place for God, and each believer, Jew or Gentile, is likened to a living stone, "fitly framed together" by the great Architect and Builder. Chapter ii. 5, 6 is going to tell us that God sees this edifice completed in Christ and seated together in the heavenly places where He is now exalted (i. 20, 21).

We need to pause here, meditate and ask for the ability to grasp as far as it is possible this stupendous goal, for it is the high water mark in Scripture for the redeemed. God has nothing higher or more wonderful, for who can get higher than God Himself, or any nearer to Him than this church? We can be sure this was not lost on Paul, for he immediately ceases to give further revelation, but falls on his knees and prays (iii. 1, 14) not only for himself, but for the Ephesian believers that this very ability to understand this great truth may be given them through the Holy Spirit's working. It would be a good thing for all of us if we were to do the same thing and not rush on to read the rest of the epistle, for if we miss what God has for us here, we shall have missed God's best.

The third chapter commences with the Apostle describing himself as Christ's prisoner on behalf of the Gentiles. As we have seen in our past studies, the nation of Israel dominates the scene from Abraham to the end of the Acts, and the far-off Gentile only comes into the picture when they are blessed in and through Israel. After the Acts, Israel is laid aside in unbelief and now we have a special ministry and revelation of truth which is directed to the Gentiles, quite apart from the Jewish nation. Paul's prison ministry, concerning which Ephesians is the first letter, is not addressed to the covenant nation with all their Divine privileges (Rom. ix. 3-5), although individual Jews who were believers could respond by faith to the riches Paul was the channel in revealing. This new ministry was primarily and mainly Gentile, a complete reversal of what had been the normal up to this time. With what interest then should all of us, who are Gentiles, give attention to God's messenger and God's message!

Verse 2 with its "if so be that" does not imply that the Ephesian saints had possibly not heard of the dispensation or stewardship of grace that God had given to Paul for them. It is only a rhetorical way of reminding them what they already knew. The wonders that the Apostle was going to commit to writing had as their basis nothing but grace, which occurs no less than 25 times in Paul's prison letters. The gospel which saved them originated with riches of grace (i. 7) and the new heavenly calling looks forward to nothing less than exceeding riches of grace in the ages to come (ii. 6, 7). Grace is the favour of God shown to the undeserving, and this is how God is dealing with every member of the Body of Christ all the time.

The Apostle continues "how that by revelation He made known unto me the Secret (mystery)". We have seen that 'mystery' is not a good translation of the Greek word, for the English word suggests something that is puzzling and difficult to understand, whereas 'secret' comes much nearer to the meaning of the original, that is something that is hidden and cannot be known until it is told or revealed. Paul was a steward of the secrets of God (I Cor. iv. 1) and Peter, James, John and Jude could write their epistles and give the truth that God willed they should do, without using this word once.

It is true that the last book in the Bible uses it, but this is not an epistle, but looks forward to the end of the age when the mystery or secret of iniquity is rife and worldwide. In His wisdom God purposely keeps some aspects of His purpose hidden, so that the great enemy Satan shall not have the advantage. In the realm of human affairs, during periods of war and times of stress a similar thing happens. Knowledge that would be valuable to the enemy is kept secret.

There is another reason too, namely that there is a right time or season for the revelation of a particular phase of truth. Before this time or after it, would be wrong or out of keeping with such truth, and we may be sure that God makes no mistakes in His time-table. Satan must have thought that he had rendered a deadly blow to the purpose of God, when, through his hardening and blinding power, Israel became unusable at Acts xxviii. But God then saw fit to reveal His brightest jewel, related to part of His age-long plan that He had kept hidden in Himself up to this point, namely, the calling out of a heavenly people that were to form an everlasting habitation for Himself. This secret He first imparted to the Apostle Paul and then commissioned Him to make it known from his prison, and it is these prison letters that disclose this previously hidden truth which completes the Word of God and fills out the gap between the laying aside of Israel in unbelief at Acts xxviii. and their being taken up by God at the end of the age at Christ's Second Coming (Rom. xi. 25-29).

We note that Paul in Eph. iii. 3 writes about "the secret" without any qualification. Previously he had dealt with other Divine secrets, such as the secret (mystery) of iniquity (II Thess. ii. 7), the secret of Israel's blindness (Rom. xi. 25), the secret of the instantaneous change of the living believer at the Lord's Coming (I Cor. xv. 51, 52). But here in Ephesians it is THE SECRET par excellence which contains the greatest and most profound truth that God seeks to make known to saved sinners (Col. i. 26, 27).

When the Apostle states "as I wrote afore in few words", he is not looking back to his epistles written during the Acts, and we shall search these in vain for such teaching, but the reader is being referred back to what has already been stated in the Ephesian letter. "Whereby, when ye read, ye can perceive my understanding in the secret (mystery) of Christ" (iii. 4). Some have assumed that the mystery of Christ of verse 4 is the same as the mystery of verse 3, but this cannot be because the latter was known in some degree in past ages, but not to the extent that was being divulged through this prison letter (5), whereas the mystery or secret itself "hath been hid in God from the beginning of the world (lit. from all ages)" and was therefore not known by anybody (9). In other words, we have two secrets here, one concerning Christ the Head, and another concerning the church, His Body, and once this is seen, there is no contradiction and one statement supplements the other.

The secret concerning Christ starts in Eden with the promise of the Seed that would bruise the serpent's head (Gen. iii. 15) and gradually through the unfolding of type and shadow, and the ministry of prophet, priest and king, the revelation of the Lord Jesus Christ, as the centre and circumference of the divine plan of the ages touching earth and heaven, grew like a great river and came to its climax in the captivity epistles of Paul which portray Him as seated far above all heavens, as Head over all things to the church, and to principalities and powers, the One Who has the first place (pre-eminence) in all things whether in heaven or earth (Col. i. 15-18).

The Secret relating to the church which is Christ's Body and Fullness was never made known in O.T. times or at any time before God gave it to the channel through whom He willed it to be revealed, namely, Paul the prisoner of Christ Jesus. It was indeed completely hidden in God, not even hidden in the Scriptures. It is quite surprising how many expositors have never gripped this fact, for they explain the Mystery as being the blessing of the gospel going out to the Gentiles and the Gentiles then being blessed with the Jew. But this was never a Secret. As early as Gen. xii., God revealed to Abraham that through his seed all families of the earth would be blessed. Although Israel was so favoured and for centuries took the first place in God's dealings, yet this was only to prepare them to be the channel for world-wide blessing (Acts xiii. 47). Those who think this is the Mystery take a view which contradicts Scripture and shows that they have never understood what this special Secret is about.

However, Eph. iii. 6 gives some of its peculiar characteristics, "that the Gentiles should be joint-heirs, a joint-body, and joint-sharers of the promise in Christ Jesus through the gospel whereof I was made a minister, according to the gift of that grace of God which was given me according to the work of His power" (6, 7). As the A.V. fails to bring out the meaning of the Greek, we offer an alternate translation. Three times in connection with the words "heirs", "body" and "partakers (sharers)" the Holy Spirit uses a preposition that means "on an equality with". In this new calling the Jewish believer ceases to have priority. It is no longer "to the Jew first". The status of a Jew in special covenant relationship with God ceases, and if he comes into this calling by grace, he does so as an ordinary saved sinner like the Gentile believer. The Gentile Christian also loses his status as an outsider, far off, as described in chapter ii., and out of these two companies God creates something entirely new, a NEW MAN, in which there is neither Jew nor Greek (Gentile—Col. iii. 10, 11), each member being on a perfect equality for the first time. This is one of the unique characteristics of this great Mystery or Secret now so fully revealed. Other details are given in this glorious epistle and also that to the Colossians. Paul states his great aim in Eph. iii. 9 "to make all see what is the dispensation (stewardship) of the Mystery (see R.V.) which from all ages has been hid in God", hidden for so long, but now made known. Was Paul's aim achieved? How many responded in his lifetime and how many have responded since? We ask the reader to look round on modern Christendom and estimate how much this great secret is proclaimed from the pulpits and elsewhere today and how many are rejoicing in its exceeding riches? We fear they will get a shock. What has gone wrong?

No.26. The Epistle to the Ephesians (6).
pp. 37 - 40

Having unfolded in iii.6 some of the characteristics of the great secret (mystery A.V.) which God had revealed to him as its human channel, the Apostle Paul links it with the "gospel whereof I was made a minister" (verses 6 and 7). It is a profound mistake, made by many, that the word 'gospel' always means the same thing wherever it is used in the N.T. and denotes no more than the good news of God's salvation of the sinner by faith in Christ as Saviour. True it is that this is always the beginning of God's dealings with man, but to restrict it to this would wipe out much of the deeper riches of truth that God wants to make known to His saints and is therefore 'good news' indeed (Col. i. 27). Here Paul is not referring to the gospel of salvation, but to this stewardship of the mystery which is the subject of the context. This should be good news to every believer! The past phrase of verse 6 must not be divorced from verse 7. This aspect of God's good news was peculiarly linked with his ministry and no one else's. It is futile to try and find such revelation in the ministry of Peter, James, John (Gospel and epistles) or Jude and it is significant that these servants of the Lord could faithfully discharge their service to Him without featuring the word mystery or secret. (The book of the Revelation looks in fulfillment to the future Way of the Lord.)

This special ministry of Paul's had its basis in the limitless grace of God. The grace that had saved him, was the same grace that enabled him to be a faithful witness and servant of the Lord. This and the mighty resurrection power of Christ was all-sufficient, and the more he thought about it, the more he marveled; that he of all people should have been chosen as the chief steward of such spiritual riches, was beyond his fathoming. In I Cor. xv. 9 he described himself as "the least of the apostles . . . . . not meet to be called an apostle, because I persecuted the church of God". In Eph. iii. he takes even a lower place in real humility, and describes himself as "less than the least of all saints" (verse 8). Perhaps he thought how rightly he had been named Paul (from the Latin Paullus, 'little'), and through him God was pouring out undreamed riches to the despised far-off Gentile, who was a believer in Christ.

He now states his great aim: "to make all (men) see (literally, to enlighten all) what is the dispensation of the Mystery (secret) which from all ages hath been hid in God Who created all things" (R.V.). This divine stewardship of the great secret, unfolded in the creation of the New Man, the joint-Body with its untold spiritual wealth, the Apostle earnestly longed to pass on to others, to all those who had been chosen in Christ before the foundation of the world (i. 4). For this he knew the necessity for "opened eyes" or enlightenment (i. 17, 18) for without such Divine enlightenment, the human mind would be totally unable to grasp the unsearchable riches connected with this secret.

We may say that Paul had at least two great object to achieve: (1) to preach the gospel of God's gracious way of salvation to the sinner, Jew or Gentile, which had been given to him by direct revelation of the Lord Jesus (Gal. i. 11, 12), concerning which he said

"woe is unto me, if I preach not the gospel!" (I Cor. ix. 16). This is the good news of God to the sinner, and (2) the making known of the great secret we are now considering. This is God's good news to the saved. In the mercy of God, we still hear (1), but what about (2)? In the evangelical world we are glad to say there are still those who faithfully preach the gospel of God's grace. But where in the same evangelical world do we ever hear the proclamation of this secret with all its wonders which eclipse all other truth? We have before pointed out the fact that it is God's will and His wish that this should be done (Col. i. 25-27) so there is no holding back on His part. The more one considers this, the more astounding and tragic it becomes, and one seeks to discover the reason or reasons for such a situation. There are undoubtedly a number of them, of which we can state:

(1) The almost total lack of knowledge among leading preachers and teachers, due to blinded eyes and the ecclesiastical set-up of modern Christendom into which the Mystery and its out-working could not possibly fit.
(2) The immature condition of most believers which, like the church at Corinth, limits truth to the ABC, the milk of the Word (I Cor. iii. 1, 2) and makes further revelation impossible.
(3) The confusion between the Hebrew church, formed on the Day of Pentecost which was a fulfilling of O.T. prophecy (Acts ii. 16-21) and was therefore not a secret and the New Man, the Joint-Body of Ephesians which was a secret, which we are now considering.
(4) The fear of man that bringeth a snare. We are convinced that some Christian Leaders who do know the truth of this great Secret, keep quiet because they are afraid of offending their congregations and other leading teachers. Their standing in evangelical circles must be kept at all costs and they realize that if they gave a full and faithful witness to this truth, they would be dubbed as being in error and then dropped from well-known platform. Their reputation would be gone. This is too big a price to pay and so they kept silent.

This is tragic enough from the human standpoint, but what about the future judgment seat of Christ, when all actions will be made known and assess by the righteous Judge, and the possibility of disapproval by Him? (I Cor. ix. 27). Such a condition of things makes the unfettered witness of this little magazine and that of its individual supporters all the more necessary, and by God's grace we seek, as Paul did, to declare all the counsel of God, to keep back nothing (Acts xx. 20, 27), and to deviate neither to the right hand or to the left.

The Apostle, in Eph. iii. 10 R.V., give us another reason for his desire to "enlighten all", He states "to the intent that now unto the principalities and powers in the heavenly places, might be made known through the church the manifold wisdom of God". In other words, there are heavenly scholars as well as earthly ones. How vastly important this part of God's great plan must be when we realize that the very aristocracy of heaven is learning by the out-calling and building up of this company of the redeemed! They are watching and noting every detail of this masterpiece of God's manifold wisdom. Paul uses a rare word in "manifold". It literally means "many-coloured" or diversified. Nothing less than this could have conceived such a Creation, and all of it is "according to the eternal purpose (the purpose of the ages, R.V. margin) which He purposed in Christ Jesus our Lord" (11). God not only brought into being the physical creation; He also made the great platform of time, subdivided into ages, upon which He is working out this vast redemptive plan which embraces the highest heaven as well as the earth, and the Word of God is the written record of this plan which is centred in Christ Jesus. It is when one realizes this and has some insight into it, that the Bible is transformed as far as we are concerned. Without such knowledge it is just a haphazard collection of books in one volume and alas this is how it is seen by many professing Christians. God has an eternal plan to which He is working, with a goal of perfection and glory that finally nothing can frustrate. What an unspeakable privilege to have any part in it, and yet this can be true of all the redeemed, whether the earthly or the heavenly people of God.

Not only is this so, but the Body of Christ has the tremendous boon of unrestricted access to God at all times: "In Whom we have boldness and access with confidence by the faith of Him" (12). What a contrast to Israel who, in spite of their unique position as a nation, never enjoyed such a favour! In contrast, this church can come into the holy presence of God at all times through Christ Jesus the Mediator, the one go-between or Way back to God. This means that all other intermediaries, whether religious or otherwise, are dispensed with, and away goes all Romish pretensions of human priesthood and glorified saints on the one hand or the false mediation of Gnosticism, whether in ancient or modern dress.

Verse 12 not only assures us of continual access through Christ, but tells us that in coming unto this most holy Presence we do not have to fear or cringe, but have 'boldness' and 'confidence'. This does not mean we can swagger into the presence of God. There must always be deep reverence and consciousness of what we are doing, and this will be easier to preserve if we constantly remember that it is all "through the faith of Him", that is, the Lord Jesus Christ, and without Him, such an approach would be unthinkable and impossible. We believe it is a mistake to translate the phrase "by the faith of Him" as "by our faith in Him" for this would shift the basis of access away from the Lord to ourselves and our puny faith. And what happens to access if our faith should fail or turn to unbelief? No, the truth of our access to the Divine Presence rests on Christ's faithfulness (the thought behind the word 'faith') not on anything we are or can do.

The Apostle has now finished his great digression in which he explains what lay behind his prison ministry for the Gentiles (iii. 1) and he now picks up the thread in verse 14 from verse 1, "for this cause", that is, the greatness and wonder of God building in this church a dwelling for Himself (ii. 20-22). This leads immediately to his second great prayer, just as the revelation of the Father's choice and will, the Son's redemptive work, and the Spirit's present witness led to the first prayer in chapter i. (16-23). We compared these two prayers in an earlier study and noted that the direction of the first prayer is upward and largely concerns the ascended Christ in the heavenly places. The second prayer has a downward direction, bringing before the Ephesian saints and all who follow, what this highly exalted Christ can be to each member of His Body; the fact that He can dwell in their hearts by faith and fill them up to the brim with His fullness.

Before the second prayer commences, Paul expresses a desire: "Wherefore I ask that ye faint not at my tribulations for you, which are your glory" (iii. 13 R.V.). The extraordinary point here is that the Apostle is not contemplating the possibility of his fainting under the pressure of his prison tribulations, but rather the Ephesian believers doing so. He himself knew only too well the exalted Saviour and Head who had called, equipped and sent him as His mouthpiece to the Gentile world, and the great resurrection power which worked in him mightily, causing him to triumph over every trial and difficulty. He was however concerned that the Ephesians should not be discouraged or misunderstand his imprisonment as being something contrary to God's will. They could then learn to glory in his sufferings as he himself did. When he wrote to the Colossian church Paul asserted that these tribulations, were "the afflictions of Christ in my flesh, for His Body's sake, which is the church, whereof I am made a minister" (Col. i. 24, 25). They were a necessary part in the outworkings of the Divine Plan for the Body and so the Apostle was ready to experience them to the full. That they were the Lord's sufferings as well as his, he had learned on the Damascus road when the Saviour, identifying Himself with His tested people, said "Why are you persecuting Me?" (Acts ix. 4). A man who can regard suffering and privation like this, is one who has learned to triumph over all circumstances, and while we are never likely to suffer as he did, the same great discovery can be ours, that the Lord is our sufficiency for every experience or trial that can come our way and never will He allow us to be tested above what we are able to bear (I Cor. x. 13).

No.27. The Epistle to the Ephesians (7).
pp. 56 - 60

Having seen the link between the second prayer of Ephesians in chapter iii. with the great climax of chapter ii., we are now in a position to consider this prayer's great features. "For this cause", says the Apostle, "I bow my knees unto the Father, from Whom every family in heaven and on earth is named" (iii. 14, 15 R.V.). "Every family" is better than "the whole family" A.V., which would require the definite articles in the Greek. The R.V. margin points out that the word family is more literally "fatherhood" which better shows the link in the original of the two words "Father" and "fatherhood". All fatherhood is derived in character from the Fatherhood of God, although the human version is often so far off from the Divine original. God's great family here has its earthly and heavenly sections, neither of which gives the complete picture by itself and we need to take care that we do not narrow down the Plan of the ages to either earth or heaven, as so many theological schemes do.

Verse 16 continues: "that He would grant (give) you, according to the riches of His glory, that ye may be strengthened with power through His Spirit in the inward man". Again Paul begins to pile up words which emphasize the greatness of the experience he desires the Ephesian believers to share. They would need Divine strengthening for what follows. Human strength and ability would be less than useless here. This empowering would be measured by no less than the overwhelming riches of God's glory, which measure defies description and explanation. The "inward man" is a phrase describing the new nature given to the believer, "the new man" as opposed to the old nature or the flesh. This great preparation by God is with a view to Christ dwelling in our hearts by or through faith (17). To dwell means to take up one's abode, and here is an anticipation of the permanent dwelling of Christ, the holy Temple which He is now building and will occupy when it is complete. Each individual member of that Temple need not wait for that future day; every one of us who are members by grace of the Body of Christ, can be miniature temples into which He is graciously pleased to enter and make His home.

Let us not pass over this lightly. It is all very well to teach young people who are unsaved to sing "Come into my heart, Lord Jesus, there is room in my heart for Thee". But such a tremendous experience is not for the unsaved, or even the immature believer, but for those children of God who are growing up spiritually and have had this necessary preparation of Divine strengthening, for without this who would be adequate to receive such an exalted Guest? We do well too to remember the practical consequences of this indwelling. We may be sure that the Lord Jesus Christ will not take up His abode within us in any other place than the first. In other words He is coming in to take His rightful place as Lord, and as such must take control of us completely. Are we willing to accord Him this pre-eminence, the first place in our lives? (Col. i. 18).

One might think that the indwelling Lord would be the climax, but there is a further purpose in view: "to the end that ye, being rooted and grounded in love, may be strong to apprehend with all the saints what is the breadth and length and height and depth" (17, 18 R.V.).

In ii. 21 we have the two figures of building and growing and similarly here the Apostle uses "rooted" as of a plant, and "founded" (better than grounded) as of a building. Col. ii. 7 is a parallel passage. In Eph. iii. 17 the rooting and the grounding is in and upon love, the love of God shed abroad in our hearts. Here is no sentimental thing. The great characteristic of Divine Love is that it continually gives and spends itself for others and this is shown best of all in the greatest of all gifts, the unspeakable gift of God's beloved Son (John iii. 16; II Cor. ix. 5). It is upon such love as this that the believer is founded and rooted and it is only in this way that he can come to a personal experience of this great prayer, and get to know "the love of Christ which passeth knowledge" (19) with its breadth, length, depth and height. Here is veritable limitless ocean which no one can fully plumb. It "exceeds (passeth) knowledge". Yet the Apostle prays that the saints at Ephesus may know it for themselves. Here is a seeming paradox, yet it is clear what Paul is seeking to convey. While it is impossible to fully grasp what is infinite, yet each one of us can be filled up to our capacity in understanding, whatever sized vessel we are. This is expressed in the last phrase of this prayer: "that (in order that) ye may be filled unto all the fullness of God" (19 R.V.).

Here the R.V. is much to be preferred to the A.V., "filled with all the fullness of God". How can any puny sinner contain all the fullness of God which is limitless? Not even principalities and powers could experience this or any other created being. We are filled unto or with a view to all the fullness of God, and nothing less than this is God's will for us individually, for this shows forth in miniature the great goal of the ages when the fullness of God shall fill the whole of the new heaven and earth. In Col. ii. 10 the Apostle states: "ye are filled full (complete) in Him". In the ascended Head, each member of the Body has been filled to the full by the Lord Himself. Here in Ephesians the desire is that each one may increasingly realize this in their experience. This is the high water mark of Christian realization beyond which no one can go in this life. Professor F. F. Bruce well sums it up in these words: "Filled unto all the fullness of God—nothing can exceed this; here every other blessing is comprehended and crowned". No wonder Paul closes the doctrinal section of the epistle with a glorious doxology: "Now unto Him Who is able to do exceeding abundantly above all that we ask or think, according to the power that worketh in us, unto Him be the glory in the church and in Christ Jesus, unto all generations for ever and ever (literally unto all the generations of the age of the ages). Amen."

The Apostle has not finished with his superlatives. If anyone feels that all this language is far above them and beyond their comprehension, he reminds them that they are dealing with One Who is able to do superabundantly and transcend all our asking and thinking. God is able and willing to do infinitely more than all our imagination and He does it by the mighty resurrection power revealed in i. 19-23, the power that now energizes (works in) us. It is therefore only fitting and right that the last thought should be of His glory, both in the church and in Christ Jesus unto the coming age—the age of the ages. Well may Paul write "Amen"—"Truth". This goal is the Truth, and shall surely be attained in spite of Satan and the powers of darkness, man's sin and the dominion of death and everything that opposes the will of God!

With chapter iii. 21 we reach the climax of Divine revelation. Instruction must now give place to practice. If God's truth is anything at all, it is balance; not all doctrine and little or no practice; or all practice and little or no doctrine. Both, by themselves would be lop-sided. God first of all instructed us in His truth. This is doctrine. Then He expects a practical response from what we have learned. This is Christian practice. The rest of the Ephesian epistle is largely concerned with the practical response that should result from the teaching of chapters i. to iii. This being so, we are not surprised that chapter iv. starts with the word "therefore"—"because of all that has gone before", a worthy walk should most surely result. Paul describes himself as the Lord's prisoner, a title of Christ relating to practical issues—(compare iii. 1) the One Who is and should be our Controller. He beseeches, not commands, the Ephesian saints to exhibit a worthy walk, one that balances the Divine calling. This is indeed a "holy calling" (II Tim. i. 9) and demands a daily walk in correspondence with it. This worthy walk is exhibited by four Christian graces, humility, meekness, patience and forbearance. Real humility is foreign to the thinking of the world. It is the very opposite of pride and self-assertion—the parent sins which God hates (Prov. xvi. 5; James iv. 6), being the cause of Satan's downfall, and they have wrought so much havoc ever since. As far back as O.T. days God revealed that He sought the humble (Isa. lvii. 15; lxvi. 2) and this quality was most fully seen in His beloved Son, the One, Who though so great, was essentially meek (Matt. xi. 28-30; xxi. 5; II Cor. x. 1). The unbelieving world, not understanding, confuses meekness with weakness! Patience and forbearance with others is best realized when we continually remember how patient God has been with us! He is indeed the God of patience (Rom. xv. 5) not only with us, but with the world at large (I Pet. iii. 20; II Pet. iii. 8, 9). We shall certainly need patience in our daily walk and witness, and in our dealing with others. The impatient person will get little or no result in Christian service. How much witness for the Lord has been ruined by impatience! Like the gardener and the farmer, we may have to wait a long time for results, after sowing the seed of Truth and it is patient endurance that we shall need to prevent us from being discouraged and perhaps giving up in despair.

"Giving diligence to keep the Unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace" (iv. 3 R.V.). "Giving diligence" is the same word as "study" in II Tim. ii. 15, and has no primary reference to study with books, but is rather "showing keenness". As believers we may be keen in all sorts of ways, but here is a "must". If we desire to walk worthily of our high calling, we must be keen to jealousy guard the seven-fold unity of the Spirit which has been created by God and entrusted to us (iv. 3-6). This seven-fold unity is held together by the "bond of peace" and this is not just any kind of peace, but is that specifically mentioned in ii. 14, 17. Love is the other great bond (Col. iii. 14) that ties all the members of the Body together, and should therefore be exhibited constantly towards each other. If this is not realized, discord will result which only gives Satan an excellent opportunity to do his deadly work of upsetting and dividing the people of God and their united witness to the Truth. The seven-fold Unity of the Spirit has a disposition well known in Hebrew parallelism, namely of introversion:

A | One Body.
B | One Spirit.
C | One Hope of the calling.
D | One Lord.
C | One Faith.
B | One Baptism.
A | One God and Father.

It is significant that right in the middle stands the One Lord Who alone makes the other items real and possible so far as we are concerned. Firstly, there is One Body. This is the creation in the mind and purpose of the Father before the foundation of the world as i. 3-6 makes clear. It is the newly created New Man as ii. 14, 15. This is evidently why the One Body balances the One God and Father in the above structure. The phrase "one Body" had been used before by the Apostle in the Acts (Rom. xii. 5), but, as we have seen, the church connected with the Secret and made known by Paul the prisoner in Ephesians, was uniquely "a joint-Body", where every member is equal doctrinally and dispensationally, which was not true of the church in the Acts, otherwise Rom. xi. with the symbolism of the olive tree and the wild olive grafted in (Gentile believers who stand by faith), grafted in to the olive tree of Israel, could never have been given. All man-made bodies and groups pale into insignificance beside this Divinely created company. This is the first aspect of the Spirit's unity to guard.

There is one Spirit, Who gives us the earnest of our heavenly inheritance and seals us to God and through Him (the Spirit) we have access to the Father (i. 13, 14; ii. 18). The One Body of Christ identified with Him as the Head, is seen to be seated in the heavenly places in Him (ii. 6). The one hope, sure and certain, will be the realization, in experience, of this position they now hold by faith. This will be by resurrection if death has intervened, or by change if alive. The manifestation of Christ's glory in the heavenlies will be shared by His Body. For this blessed hope they ardently wait (Titus ii. 12, 13). The One Lord, as we have noted before, stands in the middle and holds the seven-fold unity together by reason of His redemptive work on the cross and His resurrection and ascension to the highest glory at the Father's right hand. He is the one Lord of the Old and New Testaments. Indeed, He is the Lord of Lords (I Tim. i. 17; vi. 15; Rev. xix. 16), and one day, in the future, every knee shall bow, in heaven, on earth and under the earth, and every tongue shall confess Him as LORD and at last, although once despised and rejected of men, He will come into His own and the whole creation will manifestly give Him His rightful place.

No.28. The Epistle to the Ephesians (8).
pp. 77 - 80

In further consideration of the seven-fold Unity of the Spirit the Lord charges us to guard, we come to one faith. Sometimes in the N.T. the word faith is equivalent to truth: ". . . . . and a great company of the priests were obedient to the faith" (Acts vi. 7, and see also xvi. 5, Gal. i. 23 and Jude 3). The one faith in Ephesians is the "good deposit" of truth passed on to Paul from the risen Christ. It is this body of truth that Timothy is exhorted to guard (II Tim. i. 14). The same deposit occurs in II Tim. i. 12, and note the R.V. margin, Greek "my deposit". It is, as Paul describes it, "the form of sound words, which thou hast heard of me" (II Tim. i. 13), and never once does Paul refer Timothy to the truth given through Peter, James, John or Jude. This is most significant. We can never understand the Apostle's constant reference to himself, unless we see that he is not thrusting himself forward, but pointing specially to the unique and exalted truth of the Lord given through him as the channel. Note the "I" and "me" in II Tim. i. 5, 11, 13, 15; ii. 2, 8, 9, 10; iii. 10; iv. 17. This faith or body of truth has special features, not to be found in the ministry of any other N.T. servant of the Lord. As we have seen, it is directed to us far-off Gentiles (Eph. iii. 1), and this is why the careful study of Paul's ministry is so essential if we who are saved Gentiles are to understand, live and witness for its marvelous content. Faith and truth go together like a coin; they are two sides of the same thing. The "one faith" then that the Lord exhorts us to guard is the whole content of truth relating to the Body of Christ of which Paul was divinely chosen to be the minister (Col. i. 24-27; Eph. iii. 4-7).

The next item is the one Baptism. We do not intend to deal with this exhaustively, for we have already dealt with the subject in the pamphlet Baptism. The fact remains that in the ministry of John the Baptizer, there was one baptism, that of water, the baptism of the Spirit being yet future. During the Acts there were two, water and Spirit. Afterwards we come to Ephesians and there is but one again. Which is it to be? The type or the reality? The shadow or the substance? We cannot juggle with the word "one" and make it two, for then by the same process we could have in the context two Lords or two Heavenly Fathers. The only person who can consistently maintain that the one baptism of Ephesians is that of water, is the person who believes in baptismal regeneration, a doctrine rightly rejected by sound evangelicals. We have before pointed out that water baptism did not form part of Paul's apostolic commission. This is on his own testimony:

> "For Christ sent me not to baptize, but to preach the gospel" (I Cor. i. 17), and this was during the Acts when water baptism obtained! If this was true for Paul's earlier ministry at this time, how does it happen that water baptism becomes part of his prison commission after the Acts, in a dispensation which is pre-eminently spiritual and where all shadows have vanished in exchange for the substance? And this without a word of explanation on his part! Those who wish to introduce water baptism in Col. ii., must be hard put to it in a context that speaks of the burial in baptism being carried out by God and not man (the working [operation] of God, Col. ii. 12) and the doing away of all shadows (food, drink, holydays, sabbath day) because now we can enjoy the reality that the shadow stood for ("the body is of Christ", ii. 16, 17). Water baptism at its best is only a type, a picture of identification with Christ in death, burial and resurrection as Rom. vi. clearly teaches. To insert a type or a shadow here in a passage that speaks of each member of Christ's Body "being filled full in Him" or "complete in Him", is to insert an intruder. What can a shadow add to this Divine completeness? There cannot be degrees in completeness. We are either, in this calling, complete in Christ spiritually or we are not. If the type of water baptism must be added to make this completeness real then this context is to say the least most misleading for it says nothing about such an addition. The circumcision mentioned in the passage is not the type, but the spiritual reality (verse 11). So is everything else that is brought forward, otherwise the argument of verses 16 and 17 would be completely nullified.

Part of the misunderstanding that has arisen over the place of water baptism is due to the shifting away from the Scriptural explanation of identification with Christ, to that of a witness to the world of unbelievers. We cannot find one passage in the N.T. dealing with water baptism that clearly teaches it to be a witness to unbelievers. What the world is watching is our words, our actions, our lives. This is the most effective witness, not ritual, which the world cares little or nothing about.

Coming back to the One baptism of Eph. iv., we unhesitatingly believe that it cannot be two, otherwise words have no meaning, and as it is one, it must be the reality which is absolutely essential, and not the picture or shadow that set it forth previously. We do not judge other believers who seek to justify water baptism, but they cannot do it legitimately from this chapter or Col. ii. They must go elsewhere to other Scriptures dealing with another dispensation or stewardship. We repeat that on Paul's own testimony water baptism did not form part of his apostolic commission by the risen Christ (I Cor. i. 17), and though he baptized occasionally during the Acts period, the context here shows he did not deem it to be important; in other words, it was not a necessary part of the ministry the Lord had given him. For ourselves we are content to leave the matter here. Let no one judge us for this, any more than we judge them (Col. ii. 16).

The seventh item is "one God and Father of all, Who is over all, and through all, and in all" (Eph. iv. 6 R.V.). We have to be very careful with the word "all" in Scripture. Too many false doctrines have been erected on the presumption that "all" is equivalent to "universal", whereas it is always limited to the context. One could easily use verse 6 to teach the popular idea of the universal Fatherhood of God, but this doctrine is not only foreign to this verse, but to the whole of the Bible. "But as many as receive Him (Christ), to them gave He the right to become children of God" (John i. 12 R.V.). Only those who have received Christ by faith as Saviour have the privilege of becoming members of God's family and being able to call Him Father. The "all" of Eph. iv. is obviously limited to the members of the Body. It is the Lord Jesus Who makes the Fatherhood of God possible and known to us (John xiv. 9, 11).

While we do not find the word "Trinity" in the Scriptures, the fact is there in many passages, and none clearer than this one—One Spirit, One Lord, One God and Father. Sometimes the concordance can be misused and become a menace. We have frequently come across arguments based on the non-occurrence of a word in the Bible, as demonstrated by the concordance, the person putting forth such arguments, either deliberately ignoring, or being blind to the fact being there even if the word is not and this is a case in point with the Trinity. If we refuse to use the word "Trinity" because of its non-occurrence in Scripture, we have to invent something else to take its place to represent the three-fold expression of the Godhead in Father, Son and Holy Spirit, and what is it going to be?

Paul now leaves the Body as a whole, and comes to each individual member:

> "But unto each one of us was the grace given according to the measure of the gift of Christ" (iv. 7 R.V.).

In the body physical, the various members are not alike either in size or importance, but all are necessary for its proper and healthful functioning. Likewise with this church; every redeemed member has been placed in it according to God's will and all have a part to play in its outworking. Whether they are small, medium or large vessels is not their responsibility. What they should seek to know is exactly what work the Lord has called them to do and then to remember that all-needed grace is available for the task and therefore they can fulfil it and are responsible to Him to carry it out loyally. There must be no mistakes here. In our physical bodies it would be disastrous if one member ceased to do its own work and attempted the function of another. Fortunately, in health, this is impossible, but alas it is possible in the Christian realm. Some attempt to do Christian work for which they are not fitted, and not realizing their limitations, they only cause trouble and difficulty. One thing is certain and that is, if the Lord calls a person for a certain kind of work, He equips that person for the task. If He needs a teacher, a speaker or a writer, He will choose some one who has an aptitude for these things—"apt to teach" (II Tim. ii. 24). However, there are plenty of other ways of serving the Lord and what we all need is not wishful thinking, or trying to be like someone else, but to honestly say, "Lord, what wilt Thou have me to do?" (Acts ix. 6).

Before the Apostle deals any further with the question of gifts for service, the time element of His special gifts to the Body of Christ is stressed. This is related, not to the earthly life of the Saviour, but to His ascension:

> "Now this, He ascended, what is it but that He also descended into the lower parts of the earth? He that descended is the same also that ascended far above all the heavens, that He might fill all things. And He gave . . . . ." (iv. 9-11 R.V.).

There should be no difficulty with the phrase "the lower parts of the earth". This could either means (1) the sepulcher into which the Lord's body was placed, (2) Hades, the state of being in the grave, grave-dom, if one could invent such a word, or (3) the earth, being looked upon as the lower parts from the standpoint of heaven. (1) and (2) are permissible, but the third view seems more natural in thinking of the Lord leaving the heaven that was His in order to descend to the earth for our redemption. The ascension means exaltation to the place for highest supremacy, as i. 19-23 has already stressed. Note the phrase "all heavens". Sometimes in Scripture "heaven" is used in the singular, but we must not deduce from this that heaven is just one place. It is complex. "All heavens" must embrace at least three, and shows us that we are not dealing with heaven and heavenly things. The object of the Ascension is likewise profound: "in order that He might fill the all things" (literally). We have seen that "filling" and "fullness" in relation to Christ, are characteristic of the completion of the purpose of the ages, which purpose is now being preshadowed in the Body (i. 23). The Lord Jesus, at the goal of the ages, will fill the whole universe in a way we are unable to fully grasp at the present time. He will have the supreme place that He now occupies, manifestly recognized by every being in heaven and earth (Phil. ii. 9-11), for it is the Divine will that He should have the first place in everything (Col. i. 18). The expressed purpose then of Eph. iv. 10 is stupendous and should not be passed over without careful reflection.

It is clear that the gifts of the ascended Christ are not things but persons:

> "And He gave some to be apostles; and some prophets; and some evangelists; and some pastors and teachers" (iv. 11 R.V.).

Also it should be obvious that these apostles cannot be the same as the Twelve that He appointed when on earth (Matt. x. 2-4) who are so closely linked with the people of Israel. The apostles and prophets of Eph. iv. are the same as those referred to in the second chapter.

They had a foundation ministry which was unique while the N.T. was in process of being written, and in some respects took the place of the canonical scriptures. Now we have a completed Bible, we do not need such apostles and prophets. All Scriptural service is now being covered by the succeeding three: evangelists, pastors and teachers.

No.29. The Epistle to the Ephesians (9).
pp. 96 - 100

Having seen that apostles and prophets, as gifts of the ascended Christ, are foundational and therefore not repeated, we pass on to evangelists, pastors and teachers. The evangelist in early Christian times was a pioneer, often going into new territory, sometimes with great hazards, and so this type of witness had to have a toughness about it. Pastors are really shepherds, and shepherds pre-suppose sheep. Those who believe that the figure of 'sheep' denotes the people of God of all times without distinction, will lean to the view that shepherds and teachers represent one class of ministry. But many years study of the Scriptures has made it clear to us that the Holy Spirit uses figures and symbols with exactness and does not mix His metaphors as men often do. For the most part 'sheep' are a description of the people of Israel (Psa. lxxviii. 52; lxxix. 13; xcv. 7; c. 3; Jer. l. 17). Matt. xxv. 32 is an exception, and there are 'other sheep' whom the Lord will gather and finally unite with restored Israel to form "one flock" (John x. 16). This is a wide ministry, as John's Gospel shows, and we see no reason to believe that the calling out of the Joint-Body of Ephesians is the only thing God is doing in this present age; rather the reverse, when one looks around on the present Christian scene the world over and also contemplates it in its past history. There is need therefore for a shepherd ministry, and the Lord has been raising up such all down this age.

Teachers play an important part in the building up and development of those already saved. There is sometimes a false emphasis put upon evangelists and they are then considered to be much more important than teachers. This idea is usually held by those who think that all Christian witness is summed up by preaching the Gospel to sinners and "getting them saved". Whether such go on to grow up spiritually to maturity seems to be of little concern or importance. The result is that not only do we see around us many churches that are spiritually dead, but also others that are filled with spiritual infants. These become a liability rather than an asset, for they do not go on to become full grown believers who are really pulling their weight in Christian warfare and witness. It is significant that a bishop or overseer in the N.T. had to possess the qualification of being "apt to teach" (I Tim. iii. 2), and Paul enjoins Timothy to pass on the sacred deposit of Truth to "faithful men, who shall be able to teach others also" (II Tim. ii. 2). Some have the erroneous idea that people are not saved under a teaching ministry, but this is quite contrary to the true facts. The faithful teacher constantly points away to Christ as Saviour as well as Lord and Head, and many are truly saved who have never had a Gospel invitation put to them.

The goal of all ministry, whether that of the evangelist or teacher is stated in Eph. iv. 12, 13 R.V.:

> "For the perfecting of the saints, unto the work of ministering unto the building up of the Body of Christ:
> Till we all attain unto the unity of the faith, and of the knowledge of the Son of God, unto a full-grown man, unto the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ."

The ‘perfecting’ here does not mean to go on to maturity as it usually does. A different word is used which means adjustment, mending or equipment. The people of God, after Israel’s setting aside in unbelief at Acts xxviii., certainly needed adjusting to the new revelation of the Mystery and they needed equipping for the making known of this climax truth, or, as the verse states, “unto the work of ministering (or serving)” which would include every member of the New Man, the joint-Body of Christ, and not to be confined to a special number, “those in the ministry”, as the word is used today. This service has in view the “building up (edification) of the Body of Christ”, a constructive work which is of the first importance. The word here has in its make up a word meaning “house”, and this enters into at least eight important Greek words used in the N.T., to say nothing of seven compounds with prepositions. To keep this series as simple as possible we refrain from quoting Greek or Hebrew words, but we mention these facts in order to show the reader how important is this building up into the Truth.

It is so easy to be destructive, and this can often be done quite easily and quickly, but ‘edification’ is very different. It takes effort, time and patience in coming before the Word of God and getting it firmly established in our minds, which are so often cluttered up with other things. The only lasting ministry is that which builds up with the aim:

> “Till we all attain unto the unity of the faith, and of the knowledge of the Son of God, unto a full-grown man, unto the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ” (iv. 13 R.V.).

The goal is reached by a three-fold “unto”, just as the context gives us three measures (iv. 7, 13, 16). We find here a seven-fold unity of the faith. We have before seen that faith is sometimes used as the equivalent of a body of truth (see Acts vi. 7; xiv. 22; I Tim. iv. 1; II Tim. iv. 7) and here we have a further revelation of what constitutes the “good deposit” of truth committed by Christ to the Apostle Paul to make known to us Gentiles and all who have ears to hear. Just as the seven-fold unity of the Spirit has the one Lord (Christ Jesus) in the centre, likewise the unity of the faith. “Till we all attain . . . . . and of the knowledge of the Son of God” (13). Here “knowledge” would be better rendered “acknowledgment”, as it is several times by the A.V. (I Cor. xiv. 37; xvi. 18, etc.). We should remember that the early English of the Authorized Version uses knowledge and acknowledge interchangeably. To really know the Truth, and the One Who is the truth, is not just filling the mind with facts about Him and the Bible. Anyone can do that. In the Word of God there can be no true knowledge without acknowledgment. Only as we acknowledge a truth can we be said to know it, and we need to bear this in mind continually. It is by practically acknowledging the Son of God, the One Lord, with all His claims upon us, that we grow spiritually and this is confirmed by Col. i. 10 where a more accurate translation is: “growing by the acknowledgment of God”. The goal of natural and spiritual life is adulthood, maturity in body and mind. Anything less than this is tragic, and while it is obvious in the physical world, it is not quite so obvious in the realm of Christian values, yet it is equally true here.

So few today are prepared to obey the Divine rules that ensure spiritual growth, and no wonder we see around us in Christendom spiritual infants who cannot receive the highest and best God has to reveal, and even antagonize and misunderstand those who seek to press on to maturity (Heb. vi. 1).

The word 'man' is really 'male' and rendered "husbands" in v. 25. As "husbands" it is used of Christ in II Cor. xi. 2: "I have espoused you to one Husband, that I may present you as a chaste virgin to Christ". It would indeed be mixing metaphors to say that the church which is the Bride, at the same time has its goal to be the perfect Husband. Yet those who confuse and amalgamate the Body and the Bride do this very thing, but are unable to see any inconsistency in it! During the Acts period, the Bride was in formation. With the revelation of the New Man from Paul's prison after Acts xxviii., we have the figure suitably changed to a "full grown male". Spiritually we are part of the Bridegroom, He the Head and this church His Body, and His members.

"Stature" can mean age as well as height as John ix. 21, 23; Heb. xi. 11 show. It is another word that indicates full growth. Classical Greek used it of the prime of life. "Fullness" is one of the great words of Ephesians and Colossians as we have already shown. In the purpose of God, the Body is already the fullness of Christ (i. 23). Here it goes on to attain this fullness by its spiritual life and growth in answer to the prayer of iii. 19: "that ye might be filled unto all the fullness of God".

The Apostle now in absolute contrast gives the opposite which must be avoided at all costs:

> "That we may be no longer children, tossed to and fro and carried about with every wind of doctrine, by the sleight of men, in craftiness, after the wiles of error" (iv. 14 R.V.).

These are strong words of warning to believers. If such an one will not grow spiritually, but remains in infancy, then he is an easy prey for Satan and his great system designated in Scripture as THE LIE. Having no stability in the truth, he eagerly runs after the latest religious fads. These "winds of doctrine" do not blow by chance. They are directed by the father of lies and so attractively presented by his dupes that the spiritual baby clutches at them readily and is completely deceived. There seems to be no middle or neutral position between truth for the growing believer and the Devil's deception for the stunted. This is what makes spiritual growth so important and lack of it so dangerous for the Christian. Verse 15 (R.V.) continues:

> "but speaking truth in love, may grow up in all things unto Him, which is the Head, even Christ."

"Speaking the truth" does not adequately represent the word Paul uses here. The R.V. margin has "dealing truly", which seeks to show that this verb means more than talking about the truth. It is rather living and acting in truth that the Apostle has in mind. This is the antidote to the spiritual duplicity of the previous verse. There should be works as well as words, but both must be "in love". It is possible to put the truth over in a hard way, to be very correct in doctrine, but to show a complete lack of love in presenting it. This nullifies its power and spoils its witness. This however will not happen if each member of the Body keeps in close union to the Head—"holding the Head" as Col. ii. 19 expresses it.

In Eph. iv. 16 Paul puts it in this way:

> "From Whom all the Body fitly framed and knit together through that which every joint supplieth, according to the working in due measure of each several part maketh the increase of the Body unto the building up of itself in love" (iv. 16 R.V.).

"Fitly framed together" is the same word as is used in ii. 21 of the spiritual Temple. This close union with the Head, the Lord Jesus Christ, is absolutely necessary for spiritual life, light, nourishment and adequate functioning of each member of the Body. For any member not to realize this, but in practice to seek to function on their own, is to court failure and fruitlessness. The same important truth was given by the Lord to the Twelve under the figure of a Vine and the branches (John xv. 1-6). Strictly speaking "which every joint supplieth" is rather misleading, for literally it is "every joint of the supply". The 'joints' supply nothing of themselves. This alone comes from the Head, but each member can be a channel through which the Divine supply can flow to another member.

This stresses the importance of practical unity and shows that unnecessary isolation is out of the Lord's will. We should seek to grow together, each one like the individual organs of the body, all contributing something to the growth of the Body as a whole. "Till we all attain", and apprehending "with all the saints" (iii. 18) stresses this. The three unities of Eph. iv. are God's creation and not man-made, but we who embrace them by faith must see to it that we do nothing to cause a practical breakage, for this only plays into the hands of the Enemy who loves to try to divide and disrupt what God has united and so upset His people and hinder His work.

No.30. The Epistle to the Ephesians (10).
pp. 117 - 120

The Apostle now approaches the worthy walk of members of the Body of Christ from a negative standpoint. In iv. 1 he tells us how to walk positively; in the 17th verse he shows us how not to walk:

> "This I say therefore, and testify in the Lord, that ye no longer walk as the Gentiles also walk, in the vanity of their mind, being darkened in their understanding, alienated from the life of God because of the ignorance that is in them, because of the hardening of their heart" (iv. 17, 18 R.V.).

In Rom. i. 21 Paul had already shown the terrible darkness that the pagan world sank into because, in rejecting God as Creator, they became "vain in their imaginations, and their foolish heart was darkened". This is what invariably happens when man turns his back on God. Left to himself he sinks into utter darkness and deception, yet at the same time imagining himself to be wise and capable of arriving at the heights and depths of truth through his own intellectual capacity. Having rejected the true light, how great must be that darkness! And this is not a whit less true today than in century one. We see all around us a world that for the most part has rejected Christ and the Truth, and a Christendom that is largely impotent, having merely a form of godliness without its essential power (II Tim. iii. 5), an evil age that is hastening to its tragic end as foretold in the Scriptures. The Apostle tells us that the darkened Gentiles are "alienated from the life of God". This shows very clearly that, apart from Christ, man has nothing immortal; he is a stranger to God's endless life, and furthermore his ignorance leads to hardness of heart or mind and so initiates his thinking.

Ignorance can be of two kinds, blameworthy or excusable, and the remoter context of Romans makes it clear that this ignorance is the former, for "they refused to have God in their knowledge" (Rom. i. 28 R.V.) and the result, a callousness and utter indifference to the things of God. Such is the sure result of persistent rejection of God's claims. Verse 19 further describes their condition as being "past feeling". The word literally means "to have lost the sense of pain". When men deliberately choose darkness rather than light, God's judgment allows them to go the way they prefer, with its awful consequences. We read three times that "God gave them up" in Rom. i. 24, 26, 28, as a consequence of their deliberate giving up God.

This was the state that redemption had rescued some of the Ephesian believers from, and now Paul reminds them that their daily Christian walk must be free from such an outlook and practice. He wrote:

> "But ye did not so learn Christ; if so be that ye heard Him and were taught in (or by) Him, even as truth is in Jesus" (iv. 20, 21 R.V.).

We note that the Apostle did not say "you did not so learn the truth, or learn the gospel", but "you did not so learn Christ", for He alone is the embodiment of truth and every good thing that the human heart needs. Moreover, Paul does not bring himself or the other apostles forward as the teachers of the Ephesian saints, but Christ Himself—"if so be that ye heard Him and were taught in (or by) Him". It was most improbable that anyone living at Ephesus at that time had ever actually heard Christ in His earthly ministry, yet the Apostle asserts that the Lord Himself had been their Teacher! This only goes to show that Paul was only the means that the Lord Jesus was using to instruct His people. How foolish then to separate the teaching of Christ from the teaching of Paul as some do, and to imagine that the record of the Gospels is more important than the epistles!

The Apostle goes on to use a phrase which is often misquoted as though it reads: "the truth as it is in Jesus". This suggests there can be truth apart from Christ, but Paul never suggests such a thing, for it would be completely untrue. "Even as truth is in Jesus" is what he wrote, and this but confirms John xiv. 6: "I am the Way, the Truth and the Life". The use of the name Jesus by itself is unusual in Paul's epistles. Practically always, the N.T. apostle give Him a title of respect. For them He is not just "Jesus", an outstanding man which is the way most professing Christians of today regard Him and name Him. To them, the apostles, He is Lord and God, and they do not forget it when they talk or write about Him. He Himself said "Ye call Me Master and Lord, and ye say well; for so I am" (John xiii. 13). Would that all who profess to own Him as Saviour and Lord would remember this! Jesus was His earthly name (Matt. i. 21) of His humbling and also as the perfect Man, and it is significant that in the context we are considering in Ephesians the emphasis is on the new man, the perfect new nature which God gives to each of His redeemed children:

> ". . . . . that ye put away, as concerning your former manner of life, the old man, which waxeth corrupt after the lusts of deceit; and that ye be renewed in the spirit of your mind, and put on the new man, which after God hath been created in righteousness and holiness of truth" (Eph. iv. 22-24 R.V.).

The "old man" is the sinful old nature we all inherit from fallen Adam. Fundamentally God dealt with this at the Cross, for then our old man was crucified with Him (Rom. vi. 6). Now each member of the Body is exhorted to count on this by faith and so make it experimental day by day. The old nature can never improve, or be reformed or changed. God gives it over to death and implants into His children the perfect thing he requires. This now can renew and control the mind with its thinking and planning through the Spirit's work. It is a new beginning, a transformation of the mind as Rom. xii. 2 declare, it is called "the new man" and manifests in practice the mind of Christ, and the actions that spring from it are the fruits of the Spirit (Gal. v. 22, 23). This is the new man "put on" (Eph. iv. 24), the mind of Christ in action and it is this way of thinking and living that must now characterize each member of Christ's Body.

Paul now shows how this work specifically:

> "Wherefore, putting away falsehood, speak ye truth each one with his neighbour" (iv. 25 R.V.).

The word "putting away" is the same as used in verse 22. Falsehood is one of the main characteristics of the old nature and comes directly from the father of lies (John viii. 44). As we are members one of another, in the close relationship that grace has placed us, falsehood and deceit must have no place. For if it does, it is bound to break in practice this divine relationship to each other. It is difficult, if not well nigh impossible, to have dealings with deceitful people.

The Apostle now passes from deceit to anger, and we ask the question; can a believer indulge in righteous anger? That there is such a thing, the Scriptures testify, for the wrath of God is a solemn fact that the book of Revelation stresses (vi. 16, 17; xi. 18; xiv. 8, 10, 19; v. 1 7; xvi. 1, 19; xviii. 3; xix. 15). God is righteous and there is no question but that His anger is just. But can we who are sinners indulge in it without sinning ourselves? In view of verse 31, "let ALL bitterness, and wrath, and anger . . . . . be put away from you", it is surely better to avoid anger under any condition, and read verse 26 as a question "Are ye angry and do ye not sin?" In any case, anger should never be prolonged, for this is dangerous; "let not the sun go down upon your wrath" Paul insists, and many quarrels and differences between believers could have been avoided had this wise injunction been carried into effect.

Those who nurse their grievances do not realize that they are "giving place to the devil" (verse 27). They are giving him room to operate in their lives, which he will not be slow to use with deadly effect.

> "Let him that stole steal no more: but rather let him labour, working with his hands the thing that is good, that he may have whereof to give to him that hath need" (iv. 28 R.V.).

Stealing was not regarded as being a particularly bad sin in N.T. times, but however lightly the Ephesians had regarded this in their pre-conversion days, such sin could no longer hold now they were believers. Rather were they to work and earn an honest living, not only to maintain their own homes and families, but to have a surplus to pass on to any who were in real need. Paul himself worked at his trade, so that he was not a burden to his converts (Acts xx. 33, 34; I Thess. ii. 9), so he, as always, was practicing what he preached to others.

> "Let no corrupt speech proceed out of your mouth, but such as is good for edifying as the need may be, that it may give grace to them that hear" (iv. 29 R.V.).

In Col. iv. 6 the Apostle wrote that the speech of believers should be always "seasoned with salt". Salt is a preservative against putrefaction, and Christian speech should always partake of this quality. This does not mean that the language of believers must be dry or dull. There is a proper place for wholesome humour, but anything that tends to corruption must be avoided at all costs. In these manifestations of the sinful old nature, Paul has stressed the bad effect that indulgence will have on the relationship between believers. Now he reminds us that such actions will affect our relationship with God:

> "And grieve not the Holy Spirit of God, in Whom ye were sealed unto the day of redemption" (iv. 30 R.V.).

This is one of the verses that clearly teaches the personality of the Holy Spirit. Some who deny this, teach that the Holy Spirit is but a manifestation of God's power. But one cannot grieve a force. One can only grieve a person, and indulgence in the works of the flesh grieves God and spoils the consciousness of our close relationship to Him.

The Holy Spirit has put His divine seal upon our redemption (i. 13), showing that Calvary's work is indeed finished and we belong now to the Lord for eternity. How careful then we should be not to bring grief upon the One Who has made all this possible at such tremendous cost! Indeed, as verse 31 states, all manifestations of the old nature must be renounced, and in their place must be the Christian graces of kindness, tenderheartedness, and full forgiveness, remembering constantly how great is the debt that the Lord has forgiven us. We do not now forgive in order to be forgiven (Matt. vi. 12, 14, 15; xviii. 35). Rather we freely forgive because we have been forgiven (Eph. iv. 32) and the word 'forgive' means "to graciously forgive", not the ordinary word for remission. Let us constantly keep this before our minds in our dealings with each other, and so glorify the Lord.

No.31. The Epistle to the Ephesians (11).
pp. 137 - 140

The Divine injunctions regarding a "worthy walk", a daily practical manifestation of the superlative Truth revealed in Ephesians i.-iii., is continued by the Apostle Paul in chapter v.:

> "Be ye therefore imitators of God, as beloved children, and walk in love, even as Christ also loved you, and gave Himself up for us, an offering and a sacrifice to God for an odour of a sweet smell" (v. 1, 2 R.V.).

As the R.V. margin points out, many ancient authorities read "us" instead of "you" at the end of iv. 32, as they do in v. 2. These include the Chester Beatty Biblical Papyrii which did not become known until 1931. The pronunciation and spelling of hemeis (we) and humeis (you) was practically identical in the first century, so one can easily understand that a copyist could easily put one for the other. "Us", which would include the Apostle, is most probably the correct reading.

It should hardly need to be stressed that only a believer in Christ can "imitate God". A false gospel of works may urge the unbeliever to try to be like Jesus, but this is fatal as a means of salvation, and quite impossible to achieve. Only the truly saved who are quickened can spiritually walk in the Saviour's footsteps (I Pet. ii. 21), and when we realize what this entails, it will be a lifetime's endeavour which will surely keep us fully occupied. To "walk in love" might mean almost anything to the human mind, but we are not left in doubt here, as it is explained practically as the way Christ loved and gave Himself up for us. Here is a life of absolute unselfishness and self-renunciation, and this, said the Apostle, should characterize the daily Christian walk. Anything less than this is not "worthy" of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus.

This offering of Christ, the giving up of Himself for us, is described in the Levitical terms of the sweet savour offerings, for the two Greek words here ("offering" and "sacrifice") are used in the Greek O.T. for the meal or cereal offering and the peace offering. These were offerings which had a fragrant smell and represented not so much sin and short coming, as a whole-hearted response in service to God which was fragrant and well pleasing to Him. We might stop to ask ourselves, "are our lives fragrant to the Lord? Does He get pleasure as He regards our thoughts and actions day by day?" This is what is behind the context in Ephesians, and we may all find it very challenging. The Philippian believers showed their practical love for the Lord and for Paul by sending him a gift which rejoiced his heart in his Roman prison. This, he said, was "an odour of a sweet smell, a sacrifice acceptable, well pleasing to God" (Phil. iv. 18). Would to God that all our lives and actions were as fragrant and attractive as this.

Completely contrary to us and to be shunned is a threefold uncleanness in action and word:

> "But fornication, and all uncleanness, or covetousness, let it not even be named among you, as becometh saints; nor filthiness, nor foolish talking, or jesting, which are not befitting: but rather giving of thanks" (v. 3, 4 R.V.).

A light view of impurity was often taken in pagan circles. Those who had been saved and brought by grace into the Body of Christ must remember that they had been translated into an entirely different sphere, the kingdom of the Son of His love (Col. i. 13 R.V.) where such conduct was completely foreign. We would hardly link covetousness with fornication, but God's ideas of sin are very different to ours. One great antidote is a thankful heart directed to the Lord. Minds which are so engaged will not lend themselves to thoughts and actions which dishonour Him. God's wrath is directed against such conduct in the sons of disobedience, and believers who do not realize this and become "partakers with them", will lose any inheritance in the Kingdom of Christ (verses 5, 6).

Paul now describes this, as John sometimes does, in terms of light and darkness. Believers are "rescued from the authority of darkness" (Col. i. 13) and brought into close contact with Him Who is the "Light of the world" (John viii. 12). Once they were not merely in darkness but were darkness. Now they have become light in Him and they must walk "as children of light" (8). Practical Christian walk is likened to fruit "for the fruit of the light is in all goodness and righteousness and truth" (9 R.V.). The A.V. reads "the fruit of the Spirit", but the weight of textual evidence and that of the context is in favour of the R.V. reading. "Goodness, righteousness and truth" are the concrete expressions of what 'light' means, and this is in direct opposition to the darkness of paganism. The lesson is also written in nature, fruit is impossible apart from light. Only when we are walking in the light are we able to produce spiritual fruit and prove "what is well-pleasing unto the Lord" (10 R.V.), and to please Him should be the chief goal of the believer. This will mean having no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness and again Paul looks back to the sordid depths of pagan ways. God's light shows these up for what they are (verse 13).

> "Wherefore he saith, Awake, thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead, and Christ shall shine upon thee" (v. 14 R.V.).

The impersonal "it is said" of the R.S.V. is perhaps better here. The Apostle is not quoting a definite O.T. passage, but giving the sense of a number of them, such as Isa. lx. 1 and Mal. iv. 2, and applying them to the individual believer rather than to Israel as a whole, as many of the O.T. contexts do.

> "Look therefore carefully how ye walk, not as unwise, but as wise; redeeming the time, because the days are evil" (verses 15, 16 R.V.).

The Apostle urges a careful walk because of the many dangers around where a careless attitude could lead to stumbling, affecting not only oneself but others. Here, He tells us, we need Divine wisdom, and if we look back to his prayer in chapter i., we shall remind ourselves that the first thing he requests for the Ephesian believers is "the spirit of wisdom" (i. 17). Walking in a world of spiritual darkness that knows not the Saviour nor the Truth, how wise we need to be! Some Christian's walk may not be actually sinful, but it can be very unwise, and what problems this can cause! "Walk in wisdom toward them that are without" Paul urges in Col. iv. 5.

Not only this, but we should "redeem the time" or more understandably "buy up the opportunity" for Christian witness, because the days are evil and this is the only adequate antidote. This means we have to be wide awake and on the alert all the while not to miss opportunities that present themselves. How sad it is when we only recognize an opportunity for witness by its back! The times cry out for those who are bold enough to show Whose they are and Whom they serve. If we do this then we shall certainly be among those whom verse 17 describes as "understanding what the will of the Lord is".

The Apostle continues:

> "And be not drunken with wine, wherein is riot, but be filled with the Spirit; speaking one to another in psalms and hymns and spiritual songs, singing and making melody with your heart to the Lord" (v. 18, 19 R.V.).

Over indulgence in wine which leads to drunkenness is to be shunned. Rather than being filled with what would intoxicate, let the filling be by the Spirit of God. The last phrase has often been misunderstood and interpreted as though this is Pentecost repeated with all its miraculous evidential gifts. The parallel passage in Colossians makes it quite clear with what the believer is filled. "Let the word of Christ dwell in you richly in all wisdom; teaching and admonishing one another in psalms and hymns and spiritual songs, singing with grace in your hearts to the Lord" (Col. iii. 16). The Lord Jesus had said concerning the Holy Spirit: "He shall glorify me: for He shall receive of Mine, and shall show it unto you" (John xvi. 14). There can be no doubt that when the believer is filled with all that pertains to the ascended Christ, this is accomplished through the work of the Filler, the Holy Spirit, and it should be a continuous experience, as the present tense is used. The original does not say "Become full of the Spirit" as some think. Rotherham renders it literally "But be getting filled in Spirit", which does not describe a mighty upheaval in the senses, but an uplifting of Christ as Saviour, Lord and Head in the renewed mind of the believer through the operation of the Spirit of God, leading to the praise described in verse 19, "psalms, hymns, and spiritual songs". Psalms almost certainly point to the O.T. Psalter, but the difficulty for a number of the Lord's people is finding an acceptable and easy way of singing the prose of the Authorized or Revised Versions. The Anglican chant, used properly, comes the nearest to this. The metrical versions, as used in Scotland, often gets too far away from the original to be used as a translation, and is but a paraphrase of the Hebrew. It is not so easy to identify "hymns and spiritual songs". There is evidence from the early centuries that Christians praised God in singing, but we have no exact knowledge of the forms this took. We have a record of Paul himself singing hymns and that in the most unlikely circumstances, after he had been cruelly beaten and thrown into the Philippian gaol (Acts xvi. 23-25).

A praising heart will be the more easy when we constantly remember how much we owe to the Lord for His vast redeeming love and providential goodness:

"Giving thanks always for all things in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ to God, even the Father" (v. 20 R.V.).

"Always for all things" covers all time and all experience for the believer which is covered by the will of the Lord. Sometimes we may not know how to pray, but we can always praise and this never wearies the Lord! Not only this, but it will have a preserving effect on us, for we cannot truly praise and backslide at the same time.

"Subjecting yourselves one to another in the fear of Christ" (v. 21 R.V.).

"The fear of the Lord is the beginning of knowledge" the O.T. asserts (Prov. i. 7), and this reverential attitude is brought over to this dispensation in the verse before us. This leads us to give Him His rightful place as Lord and Controller of all we have and are, and to give, too, the rightful place to other believers. This we shall do as we seek to serve them in whatever way we can, always bearing in mind the example of the greatest Servant of all, our Saviour, Who took a towel and girded Himself so that He, though Lord of all, could perform the lowliest of service for each of His disciples (John xiii. 4, 5).

Verse 21 closes this section and now the Apostle turns to daily life in the home. Here is where truth in practice starts and this is what so many believers forget. It is sometimes easier to shine for Christ in the world than in the home, but it is here that the fragrance of Christ should first be experienced.

No.32. The Epistle to the Ephesians (12).
pp. 155 - 159

The Apostle Paul now turns from Christian practice in general to the home, for it is here that the 'worthy walk' should began. We should remember that in century one there were no special buildings for Christian worship. God's children met in the home, hence the importance of the practical out-working of the truth here. It is for this reason that leaders (bishops or overseers) had to have special domestic qualifications (I Tim. iii. 1-5), for it is quite obvious that an unruly home, or one that was un-Christian in any way, would have been a most unsuitable meeting place for believers.

The Apostle first deals with Christian husbands and wives, urging the wives to take their relationship to their husbands that Christ has ordained. The word 'subjection' does not carry with it any abject idea of slavery. In v. 21 Paul had shown that it was the Lord's will that all should be "subjecting yourselves one to another in the fear of Christ" (R.V.). The basic idea is to take the place assigned by God. There is a divinely ordained position of men and women to each other in creation; but this does not mean that there is inferiority, either naturally or spiritually, of women to men. In I Cor. xi. 3 Paul had written:

> "The head of every man is Christ; and the head of the woman is the man; and the head of Christ is God."

Thus we have a divinely relationship ascending from woman through man, and through Christ to God. If the head of the woman is the man, and the Head of the Church is Christ, then there is an analogy between a wife's relationship to her husband and the Church's relation to Christ. Once this is seen, the conception that men are better than women, or that women are expected to render them slavish obedience, vanishes. The husband has a tremendous responsibility, for he prefigures Christ as the Body's Head and Saviour, and is enjoined to love his wife "even as Christ also loved the church, and gave Himself up for it" (25 R.V.). This goes much deeper than attraction or affection, and involves his unceasing and self-sacrificing concern for her well-being, thus safeguarding her dignity and welfare. And when wives constantly receive this sort of consideration, are they going to experience any difficulty in being in subjection to such a man? Surely this deference will be the natural outcome of such a high relationship.

But the Apostle now leaves the husband-wife relationship behind, for he goes on to state that, not only did the Lord give Himself up for His body, but He did this in order that "He might sanctify it, having cleansed it by the washing of water with the word" (26 R.V.). We have a double figure here for cleansing—water and the Word of God. One is immediately reminded of Ezek. xxxvi. 25-27 when, at the future re-gathering of Israel, God says:

> "Then will I sprinkle clean water upon you, and ye shall be clean: from all your filthiness, and from all your idols, will I cleanse you."

Obviously here the water is not literal. The cleansing is not that of the body, but that of the mind. "A new heart also will I give you, and a new spirit will I put within you" (xxxvi. 26). Later on, in the N.T., we find the Lord saying, "Now ye are clean through the word which I have spoken unto you" (John xv. 3). Ritualists must be hard put to it to try and make Eph. v. 26 refer to water baptism. Had Paul meant to teach this, the phrase "by the Word" would have been omitted. In any case, as we have already seen, the ONE baptism of iv. 5 precludes that of the type and shadow—literal water—and must refer to the abiding spiritual reality, the work of the Holy Spirit Himself. The only other occurrence of the word rendered "washing" is Titus iii. 5, where we have the "washing of regeneration", once again clearly not alluding to literal water, and this guides us in interpreting Eph. v. 26.

This divine cleansing is in order that:

> "He might present the church to Himself a glorious church, not having spot or wrinkle or any such thing; but that it should be holy and without blemish" (v. 27 R.V.).

This great presentation day is often forgotten by believers. The future glory for the Body must not be looked at exclusively as the realization of the hope of each member. Let us not forget what that day will mean for the Lord as well—the receiving to Himself of His complete and perfected Body. This is what the Father had in mind when He chose this company in Christ before the foundation of the world "that it should be holy and without blame (blemish) before Him in love" (i. 4) and it is only through the redemptive work of the Son, providing this holiness, that this great goal can be realized.

Paul now returns to the married relationship "Even so ought husbands also to love their own wives as their own bodies" (28 R.V.). From the standpoint of the Word, a believer's wife is an extension of himself and "no man ever hated his own flesh, but nourisheth and cherisheth it" (29 R.V.), and this is an illustration of the relationship between Christ and the Church, His Body (30). How strange that with the argument so clearly expressed, some will persist in teaching from this passage that this Church is the Bride! The Apostle goes back to Eden to stress the oneness of Adam and Eve, where Adam greets Eve, not so much as his bride, but "bone of my bones, and flesh of my flesh" (Gen. ii. 23), "For this cause shall a man leave his father and mother, and shall cleave to his wife: and the twain shall become one flesh" (31 R.V.). The teaching of these verses is perfectly plain. Husbands are to love their wives as their own bodies, as Christ loved the Church, His Body. Here is perfect balance in argument which is upset if one introduces the bridal Church, and Paul is careful to do no such thing. Symbols and figures are used with precision and accuracy by the Holy Spirit, and He certainly does not "mix His metaphors", as many make Him do, by confusing these two callings.

Paul's thought now travels back to the great revealed Secret (Mystery) of chapter iii. That there is underlying truth in the marriage relationship is perfectly true. "But (note the disjunctive: Paul is not now referring to husband and wife) I speak in regard of Christ and of the church" (32). This is the great Secret which he was privileged to receive from the Lord by revelation and commissioned to make known from his prison (Eph. iii. and Col. i.). "Nevertheless (he concludes) do ye also severally love each one his own wife even as himself" (33), and the thought is still that the man is to love his wife, not because she is his bride, but because she is, as it were, part of himself, as the church, the Body, is to the Head, the Lord Jesus Christ. "And let the wife see that she fear (reverence or respect) her husband."

The Apostle now passes to the duties of children and parents and he still has the Christian home in view. "Children, obey your parents in the Lord: for this is right." Disobedience, the refusal to be controlled or to exercise self-control, is typical of past degeneracy (Rom. i. 30) and the terrible darkness of the perilous times of the last days of this age (II Tim. iii. 2). One great characteristic of these times, which we now see all around us, is lawlessness or rebellion. The Lord marked this out as a sign of the end of the age. "Lawlessness (iniquity) shall abound", He said (Matt. xxiv. 32) and this characteristic is not confined to any one country, but is world-wide at the present moment. All this is but a prelude to the revelation of the final Satanic world dictator, the man of lawlessness (II Thess. ii. 3, 4) who will sum up in himself this terrible characteristic. Christian parents who allow disobedience to enter their homes are only contributing to this terrible state of affairs, and if a child never learns the meaning of obedience, how is he ever going to learn to obey the Lord?

Paul now quotes the fifth commandment, the importance of which is emphasized because it not only is the first commandment with a promise attached, but the only one in the Decalogue to have a promise at all. The Apostle quoted the whole of Exod. xx. 12 which includes the promise which obtained at that particular time, "that thy days may be long upon the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee". Not that this promise is necessarily brought over into this dispensation, for we are not Israelites, nor in the land of Canaan which the Lord gave to Abraham and his descendants; but its importance in God's sight is stressed by this added promise when the law was given to Israel.

Eph. vi. 1 states that such obedience and honouring of parents is right, and Col. iii. 20 that it is "well-pleasing to the Lord". The Word of God, however, is not one-sided. Parents have their Christian duty and responsibility to their children. They are warned not to provoke their children to wrath (4) and Col. iii. 21 adds "lest they be discouraged". Many a child has failed to respond to the Truth by unreasonableness and unwise and unsympathetic handling on the part of the parents. Such parents do not deserve their children's obedience. Christian parents will need all the wisdom, patience and tact that it is possible to have, so that in these dark and perilous days their family may be brought up in the discipline (chastening) and instruction (admonition) of the Lord. The absolute need for such discipline is made clear in Heb. xii. 5-11. This, though sometimes unpleasant, is a mark of love not displeasure (Heb. xii. 6). The wise parent will not hesitate to administer such chastening (not to be confused with the word "chastisement"), realizing full well that if this is not done the child is being prepared to be ensnared by the delinquency of these and the darkening future days.

Lastly, Paul deals with slave and masters; and slaves were exhorted to obey their masters, even though they were not believers. Such a situation would be difficult indeed, but such slaves or servants of any kind, were given special Divine encouragement. They were asked to do their work as though the Lord had requested them to do it, which would put quite a different light on the situation (5). They, like the Apostle himself, were bond-slaves of Christ, hence they were not to be clock-watchers and put on a show of working hard just when the earthly master was watching. This would be 'eye-service' and would bring the truth into disrepute. They were to serve with Christ in view as the final arbiter and rewarder of their work (8). Equally masters were to do the same things to their servants without threatening or bullying, remembering that they themselves were but servants, and their Master, the Lord Jesus Christ, to whom they would finally have to give account.

If only such wise relationships were possible today in the commercial world! Very few problems, if any, would arise, and the turmoil and strikes that we see all around us would be non-existent. But we know that unregenerate man will not learn these lessons in this age. This awaits the coming age with its peace and righteousness.

No.33. The Epistle to the Ephesians (13).
pp. 173 - 177

Paul now comes to the final section of the epistle, which gives a revelation of the unseen and unfelt spiritual warfare that is constantly going on behind the scenes between God and the spiritual forces for good, and Satan and the powers of darkness that antagonize the Divine plan every inch of the way. But for the complete protection that the Lord has provided, the believer would have good cause to be afraid. The panoply of God, however, is all-sufficient for such a dangerous situation:

> "Finally, be strong in the Lord, and in the strength of His might. Put on the whole armour of God, that ye may be able to stand against the wiles of the devil" (Eph. vi. 10, 11 R.V.).

Every member of the Body of Christ is reminded here where his true strength lies for this tremendous conflict. It is not in self, or on the human plane in any way. Mere human power would be less than useless against such spiritual enemies. Nothing less than the mighty resurrection power of Christ mentioned in chapter i. 19-23 is sufficient, plus the protective armour that He provides, which covers the believer from head to foot.

The Apostle had used a similar figure in I Thess. v. 8 ". . . . . putting on the breastplate of faith and love; and for a helmet, the hope of salvation". There is the possibility that Paul goes into greater detail here, because he had an object lesson constantly with him in the person of the Roman soldier to whom he was chained and who guarded him day and night. He reminds us that our warfare is not with our fellow human beings:

> "For our wrestling is not against flesh and blood, but against the principalities, against the powers, against the world rulers of this darkness, against the spiritual hosts of wickedness in the heavenly places" (vi. 12 R.V.).

Principalities and powers are the highest rank of heavenly being's, the very aristocracy of heaven. Angels are apparently heaven's servants. They are "serving spirit" (Heb. i. 14). Some of these principalities acknowledge the lordship of Christ, and come under His Headship (Col. ii. 10). Others have rebelled, possibly at the fall of Satan and the triumph of Calvary not only dealt with human sin and death, but procured victory over these spiritual foes:

> "Having put off from Himself the principalities and the powers, He made a show of them openly, triumphing over them in it" (Col. ii. 15 R.V.).

The word translated "world-rulers" is important. Occasionally the Word of God draws aside the curtain, as it were, and lets us see things that are going on in the spiritual world around us, which are unperceived by our senses. In the tenth chapter of Daniel, for instance, we are introduced to two angel princes who impede the one who was being sent to Daniel to assist him and he was hindered for three weeks (Dan. x. 13, 20). Later on, Michael, the archangel, is introduced, who has the responsibility of the interests of the people of Israel (xii. 1). From this and other places, including Eph. vi., we can see something of the great battle that is being fought between God and Satan and the powers of darkness. It would appear that Satan has his emissaries over every nation, affecting their policies and actions, and so has the Lord. Three times the Lord Jesus referred to Satan as the "ruler (prince) of this world" (John xii. 31; xiv. 30; xvi. 11) and Paul calls him "the god of this age" (II Cor. iv. 4). There is no doubt that the present world system is being run by him, for "the whole world lieth in the evil one" (I John v. 19 R.V.). As the instructed Christian looks at world affairs all this throws light on what he sees going on around him.

Now it is with this flood of evil spiritual rulers that Eph. vi. tells us that our wrestling engages, not with our fellow man. Satan appears to have malignity against the Body of Christ, for he sees in the heavenly destiny of this church a rival to his high ambitions in the heavenlies. The more we appreciate the whole of this situation, the more we can see the danger we are in "of ourselves", and how utterly hopeless it would be for us to try and meet it in our own puny strength. However, we need not fear if we avail ourselves of the armour which God has provided for our complete protection; and with this and Calvary's work in mind, our final victory, through Him Who loved us is assured (Rom. viii. 37-39).

As we study this spiritual armour in detail, we note it consists of five pieces for defence and one for offence. We might have expected seven, but we must remember we are in a very imperfect age, and not until God's perfect kingdom is realized will the spiritual meaning of "seven" be realized. The Apostle goes on to describe each piece of the armour and its uses. It is significant that the first is truth and without this all the rest is ineffective. This constant seeking for truth, the understanding of the rightly-divided Word of God, must be the continued quest of the believer, if he wants to count in this great struggle. Satan is the liar and the father of lies, some of which have permeated Christendom today and the wise Christian will constantly check all he hears and reads by the great Divine standard of the Word. There is no other way that he can be proof against the deception of the evil one, and Christian witness and activity is fruitless divorced from the truth of God. Of what can we be witnesses, if it is not God's truth?

Righteousness is to be the believer's breastplate. In Isa. lix. 17 God Himself is represented as putting on "righteousness as a breastplate, and an helmet of salvation upon His head", so Paul probably had these symbols in mind when he was writing this part of the Ephesian letter. Righteousness in action, as well as imputed righteousness, is meant here. These items of the spiritual armour are really the fruits of the Spirit (Gal. v. 22, 23), and unless these are manifested in our lives, we are in a dangerous position indeed, for we are right open to the enemy's attack with his "fiery darts".

The feet, which speak of our walk, are shod with the "preparation of the gospel of peace" (vi. 15), not only that good news of peace with God which comes from being justified by faith in Christ (Rom. v. 1), but that God-given peace between each member of the Body (Eph. ii. 15) which should constantly be manifested. In addition to these (not above all these [A.V.], as though faith was more important than the foregoing graces) the shield of faith, like the large body-shield that the Romans used, must be constantly used as a protection against all the fiery darts of the enemy. There can be no shield if any element of unbelief enters our minds, and it is Satan's constant aim to try to get us to doubt God's Word, just as he did in Eden when he whispered to Eve "hath God said?" (Gen. iii. 1). Israel lost the promised land through unbelief (Heb. iii. 19) and the only effective antidote to this dangerous thing is complete trust in all God has said and revealed, for "faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the Word of God" (Rom. x. 17). "And take the helmet of salvation" continued the Apostle, using the same figure as he did to the Thessalonian church (I Thess. v. 8).

Lastly, we come to the only offensive weapon that the believer is allowed, which is "the sword of the Spirit, which is the Word of God" (Eph. vi. 17). Heb. iv. 12 R.V. reminds us that the "Word of God is living, and active, and sharper than any two-edged sword" and this weapon is the only thing Satan fears. We remember how effectively the Lord Jesus used it against the onslaught of Satan in the wilderness temptation. His one reply to each of Satan's attacks was "It is written" (Matt. iv. 1-11). He could have demolished the evil one's craftiness by His divine power, but how glad we are that he did not do so, but instead gave us all a practical exhibition of the "Sword of the Spirit" which caused Satan to retire defeated.

Now it is useless having a weapon if we do not practice with it, so that we are expert in its use. Imagine anyone needing to use a revolver in a state of emergency, who had never handled one! To use any weapon effectively, constant practice is essential, and we must have "the Word of Christ dwelling in us richly in all wisdom" (Col. iii. 16), this wisdom guiding our use of the divine Sword, which can accomplish all God's purpose and rout the hosts of darkness, which continually seek to thwart His plan.

We need to remember that the modernist who refuses to acknowledge the full inspiration of the holy Scriptures from Genesis to Revelation, leaving a book that is inspired only in parts, has only a broken sword which Satan does not fear and is useless in this spiritual warfare. Outstanding witnesses for Christ in this age have been men of the Word, and later on, when writing his last thoughts to Timothy, Paul declares that the God-breathed Scriptures are the complete equipment of the believer (II Tim. iii. 16, 17), sufficient for all the needs of the Christian pathway.

Having described the panoply of God under which His children are perfectly safe, though going through a time of danger with the unseen spiritual warfare ever raging around them, Paul now stresses prayer and supplication. These are not part of the armour, and it is not Spiritual to speak of "prayer warfare". As we have seen before, we have not been commanded to attack, but to stand and withstand all the enemy's onslaughts and not yield an inch (vi. 13). However, prayer and intercession are of the utmost importance if we are to accomplish anything worthwhile for Christ. There must be constant intercession, guided by the Word of Truth and a personal knowledge of the Lord's will and this must be continual. "Men ought always to pray and not to faint" (Luke xviii. 1), and the non-ceasing intercession of the Apostle is an example to us all. The prayer-less Christian is an ineffectual and defeated one. Let us also watch, for the Lord not only said "pray", but "watch and pray" (Mark xiv. 38). We must be alert to see the Lord's hand working in our sphere of witness and service.

Last of all, Paul asks prayer for himself for "utterance" and "boldness, as I ought to speak". The message was the "mystery of the gospel" (Eph. vi. 19, 20), not just how God can save a sinner, though that is wonderful. What a lot believers and expositors miss who put this one meaning on the word 'gospel' wherever it occurs in the N.T. The Lord has good news for His redeemed children as well as for sinners. The tremendous revelation given to the Apostle and made known in Eph. iii. and Col. i. goes far beyond salvation, although it rests upon it. So wonderful was it that Paul's one aim was to "enlighten all" (iii. 8, 9) as to its content and riches, and in the Colossian letter we are told that God wishes this to be made manifest to His saints (Col. i. 26, 27). It was this 'good news' hitherto kept secret (a mystery) that Paul asked for prayer that he might boldly proclaim and make known, and it was for this truth he was "an ambassador in chains" (20). Instead of looking at himself as the prisoner of Nero, he preferred to see the situation from the Divine standpoint, and regard himself as God's representative at the imperial court of Rome.

He now assured the recipients of this epistle that Tychicus would visit them and give all the up-to-date news concerning his circumstances. This is almost identical with Col. iv. 7 and shows that Tychicus was evidently the bearer of the Colossian epistle as well as this one. He was a native of the province of Asia according to Acts xx. 4, and here he is Paul's special envoy to the churches of this region. The Apostle closes the epistle with peace, love, faith and grace; wondrous spiritual gifts upon which it is indeed profitable to reflect and to experience. His last words are "Grace be with all them that love our Lord Jesus Christ in uncorruptness" (24 R.V.). He finishes as he began with grace, and leaves as his last thought, that of resurrection, for "uncorruptness" is practically synonymous with "immortality", and is put on at resurrection (I Cor. xv. 53, 54). It is in resurrection when the exceeding riches of this epistle will be enjoyed by those who are graciously favoured to be members of the Body of Christ. The height, depth, length and breadth of revelation in this epistle are not eclipsed by any other part of Scripture, and nothing less than this is what God wants His child to embrace by faith, rejoice in, and live out in practice day by day, according to His rules laid down in chapters iv. to vi. This is a challenge indeed, which believers can only ignore to their eternal loss. Are we willing to honestly face up to it day by day?

No.34. The Epistle to the Philippians (1).
pp. 192 - 197

The ministry of the Apostle Paul at Philippi marks the entrance of the gospel into Europe and is described in Acts xvi. 12-40. The city, which was a Roman colony, first received its name from Philip of Macedon who took it from the Thasians around B.C.360. In B.C.168 it became part of the Roman empire. Luke describes it as "a city of Macedonia, the first of the district, a Roman colony" (Acts xvi. 12 R.V.). There was a dignity in this title, for this permitted the use of the Roman law in local affairs, and sometimes exemption from tribute and taxation. Even more than this the Ius Italicum gave them the privilege by which ownership, transfer of land, payment of taxes, local administration, and law, became the same as if they were on Italian soil.

Luke, in the Acts, makes it clear that a Jewish community existed there before the Apostle's visit, and it is interesting to note the high status of women in Macedonia. W. Tarn and G. T. Griffith in Hellenistic Civilization, pp. 98, 99 state "if Macedonia produced perhaps the most competent group of men the world had yet seen, the women were in all respects the men's counterparts; they played a large part in affairs, received envoys and obtained concessions for them from their husbands, built temples, founded cities, engaged mercenaries, commanded armies, held fortresses, and acted on occasion as regents or even co-rulers". Jewish women, we know, met for prayer at Philippi, of which Lydia, a proselyte of Judaism was one.

Date and Place of Composition.

The traditional dating of the epistle is associated with Paul's imprisonment at Rome. This view was current in the second century, and was virtually unchallenged until the end of the eighteenth century. From this time onwards two other places have been advanced as the origin of this letter. They are Caesarea and Ephesus. Oeder of Leipzig in 1731 first propounded the Caesarea origin, though today it has been practically abandoned. We will, however, consider it. Later, Ephesus was put forward as the place where the epistle was written by Adolf Deissman in 1897 and is sponsored by some modern scholars like Dr. G. S. Duncan. The reader may ask if this is of vital importance, and the answer is "yes", for a Caesarean or Ephesian origin for the Philippian epistle would remove it from the prison epistles written after Acts xxviii. relating to the Mystery and put it into the Acts period, where Israel and Israel's hope are still dominating.

Those who uphold the Caesarean origin make much of the word praetorian, translated 'palace' in the A.V. of Phil. i. 13, and point out that this word describes Herod's official residence at Caesarea. But the same word is used of Pilate's residence as Roman procurator at Jerusalem, and it is also used of the Emperor's palace on the Palatine hill in Rome (as A.V.), and it could equally refer to the residence of the proconsul of Asia in Ephesus, or any governor of a province. This argument therefore cancels out, and no secure foundation can be based on it.

There is another side to this, however. Praetorian can also be used of the praetorian guard, and 'all other' need not mean 'places' which is added in the A.V. It can refer to a personal reference, "among the rest" of a group of people, and so the R.V. renders it "throughout the whole praetorian guard, and to all the rest". To this J. B. Lightfoot and other scholars concur and link it with Rome. Professor F. W. Beare states "it scarcely needs to be said that the nine cohorts of the Praetorian Guard were usually concentrated at Rome, after Liberius built them a great barracks; and any detachments found in a provincial capital would be nothing more than a guard of honour for the proconsul" (The Epistle to the Philippians, p.22).

We should note too that the "saints of Caesar's household" (iv. 22) would not refer to the family of the Emperor or members of the court circle, but rather of the servants and slaves of the Emperor's household which were in the nature of civil servants and with whom Paul had had some contact, and in the case of the praetorian guard this would certainly be true in the course of their supervisory duties, and "all the rest" (i. 13 R.V.) describes the wider circle who came to hear of Paul's imprisonment.

We know for certain that Paul was imprisoned at Rome for at least two years and in conditions that admitted of his receiving visitors and of preaching the Kingdom of God and teaching the things concerning the Lord Jesus Christ with all freedom, without hindrance. It is not known that he was ever imprisoned at Ephesus. On this Luke is silent, and this weighs heavily against the Ephesian hypothesis. It is by no means certain that at Caesarea he enjoyed the same liberty of action as at Rome. At Caesarea he was detained in Herod's praetorium; in Rome he was allowed to live in his own rented dwelling. At Caesarea, moreover, he was in no danger of death. Felix would have released him at any time on the payment of a bribe. It was very unlikely that the issue of life and death described in the Philippian epistle referred to the enmity of the Jews, for Paul had faced this from the commencement of his ministry and in II Corinthians he had stated that he was "in death oft" (II Cor. xi. 23). Moreover the Lord had definitely promised that he should go to Rome and reach there unharmed (Acts xxiii. 10, 11), so the Apostle would have no fear of his countrymen in this respect at Caesarea.

Regarding the Ephesian or Caesarean theory of the place of writing Professor Beare writes: "It must also be shown that the conditions of the imprisonment were such as to allow the Apostle to receive friends, to direct the movements of his associates, and to receive and write letters. Let us remember that the writing of letters involves the admission of a scribe to the prison, and the provision of papyrus at the prisoner's expense. It was not every prisoner who would be free to turn his cell into an executive office for the propagation of a religion of doubtful legality! It must be emphasized again that it is only for Rome that we have documentary evidence for a prolonged imprisonment which allowed Paul such freedom for his apostolic activities" (op.cit.p.23).

He further states that it was hard to believe that at Caesarea he would be so completely abandoned by the Jerusalem church, to which he had just brought generous gifts from Macedonia and Achaia, that he would require aid from the Philippian church 1,200 miles away.

One of the difficulties that we have in connection with Rome as the place where Philippians was written is the long distance of Rome from Philippi and the number of journeys mentioned in the epistle which must be fitted in. This also militates against Caesarea, for such a journey would involve a trip of 1,200 miles overland, taking even longer than the journey to Rome, for communications through Asia Minor were not equal under the best conditions to those between Rome and Philippi, and for several months of the year the roads were impassable over the Taurus mountains. The journey by sea would take several weeks, judging by the fact that Paul, leaving Philippi immediately after Easter, feels that he cannot take time to stop over in Ephesus if he is to be in Jerusalem for Whitsuntide (Acts xx. 16).

The number of journeys mentioned in Philippians are as follows: four trips are presupposed between Rome and Philippi:

(1) A message is sent from Rome to Philippi, telling that Paul is in prison.
(2) Epaphroditus comes from Philippi to Rome bringing gifts.
(3) Word is sent from Rome to Philippi that Epaphroditus has fallen ill.
(4) Message comes back from Philippi, telling of the Philippians' distress at the news.

The return of Epaphroditus with the epistle would make a fifth journey and it is to be followed by the sending of Timothy. Paul himself hopes to visit Philippi some time afterwards. The distance between Rome and Philippi was nearly 800 miles, following the Appian way for 360 miles to Brindisium (Brindisi), and then by boat across the Adriatic to Dyrrhachium (Durazzo), a two-day trip, provided the weather was favourable. From Dyrrhachium the Egnatian Way would be followed for 370 miles to Philippi. Sir William Ramsey has calculated that the average distance of a day's travel overland, on foot, would not be above 15 miles [HDB, v, art. Roads and Travel (N.T.), p.386]. Reckoning like this, the one-way journey would take over seven weeks, and allowing for rests between trips and delays on the way, we should have to allow about five months for the return trip or ten months for the four journeys.

This period could be cut in half if the Philippians heard of Paul's appeal to Caesar soon after it was made, and sent their messenger to meet him with supplies on his arrival. We should still have to allow four or five months for exchanges of correspondence before the dispatch of the epistle. Since Paul was under house arrest at Rome for two years, there was clearly time for all these journeys, so Rome cannot be turned down because of its distance from Philippi.

Certainly, the journey from Ephesus to Philippi would be much shorter, taking 10-12 days in each direction, but there are many problems which this supposition produces which cannot be overcome. No less an authority than Professor C. H. Dodd has critically examined the Caesarean and Ephesian hypotheses and rejected them in favour of the Roman origin of Philippians (N.T. Studies). Professor F. W. Beare concludes his survey by writing, "Taking everything into account, the ancient hypothesis that Philippians was written from Rome must be allowed to hold the field. A precise date cannot be established. We must be content to place it between 60A.D. and 64, probably toward the later date. The Philippians are Macedonians. These, having received the word, stood firm in the faith, and did not receive false apostles. The Apostle praises them, writing to them from Rome, from prison, by Epaphroditus' (The [Latin] Marcionite prologue to the epistle, dating from the second century)". See The Epistle to the Philippians by Professor F. W. Beare, p.24.

Professor C. H. Dodd points out that Paul, as a Roman citizen, was not in danger of suffering the extreme penalty as the result of any sentence of a provincial court such as Ephesus, since he could always play his trump card, an appeal to Caesar. Rome alone was the place that imprisonment could end immediately in death. Prof. A. T. Robertson, one of the foremost N.T. Greek scholars, writes "the argument (of the Ephesian origin propounded by Dr. G. S. Duncan) is more ingenious than convincing. It is not possible here to review the arguments pro and con that convince me that Paul was in Rome when he wrote this letter to Philippi" (Word Pictures of the N.T., p.433). Donald Guthrie sums up the situation thus: "If the Roman hypothesis were proved untenable, the Ephesian would probably be unchallenged as an alternative theory. But the grounds for disputing the Roman theory are far from conclusive, and in view of this uncertainty and the fact that the Acts' silence about an Ephesian imprisonment must be a certain embarrassment to the Ephesian theory, it seems better to give the preference to Rome as the place of dispatch" (N.T. Introduction, The Pauline Epistles, p.153). No less an authority than J. B. Lightfoot firmly supported the Roman origin, and others could be named, so at least we are in good company from a scholastic standpoint in adhering to Rome as the place where the Apostle Paul wrote his letter to the Philippians, and we should remember that this subject is largely one of scholarship and research.

But there are two more important points which must be considered, namely, the make-up of the N.T.; and the dispensational viewpoint. (1) If Philippians was written from Rome after Acts xxviii., then we get a perfect arrangement of the N.T. epistles in groups of sevens. Seven of Paul's epistles during the Acts: Galatians, Hebrews, I & II Thessalonians, I & II Corinthians and Romans (we have given our reasons elsewhere for maintaining the Pauline authorship of Hebrews despite its unpopularity today). Seven of Paul's epistles after the Acts: Ephesians, Colossians, Philippians, Philemon, I Timothy, Titus and II Timothy. Seven general epistles or epistles of the circumcision: James, I & II Peter, I, II & III John and Jude. This is so obviously of Divine origin that we should need very strong positive evidence indeed to take any other position. If we put Philippians into the Acts, this perfect balance is upset, and not only this, but the inter-relationship of the Prison epistles themselves; Ephesians and Colossians making known the Mystery and Philippians and II Timothy the prize and crown attached to it. (2) Nothing is surer than the miraculous gift of healing is prominent all through the Acts as one of the sign gifts of the earthly kingdom related to Israel. It is as prominent in Acts xxviii. as at the beginning. How comes it then that Paul laments in Philippians that he cannot heal his beloved friend Epaphroditus who practically lost his life through serious illness (if he wrote this at Ephesus or Caesarea), yet later at Acts xxviii. his gift of miraculous healing is quite unimpaired (Acts xxviii. 8, 9)? This certainly must be faced from Scripture, and we should like to know the answer.

It has been asserted that because the word "mystery" does not occur in Philippians, the epistle cannot be written after Acts xxviii. By the same argument II Timothy, Paul's last letter, would have nothing to do with the Mystery, for likewise the word does not occur there! The word 'sanctification' does not occur in Philippians. Are we to conclude then, that this church was not sanctified? Let us face the fact that an argument from silence is exceedingly weak unless accompanied by strong positive evidence. If Paul had to mention every basic or important truth in every letter he wrote, he would have been compelled to have written long volumes concerned with doctrine rather than letters. Those with dispensational leanings who place Philippians in the Acts should weigh over very carefully what they are losing in precious truth belonging to the Body of Christ as against anything they think they are going to gain by so doing.

We have said nothing about the question of "bishops and deacons" (Phil. i. 1) as this is no problem as related to the Mystery when viewed Scripturally: but we hope we have made it clear that we have good ground for placing the epistle to the Philippians after Acts xxviii. and written from Paul's house-imprisonment in Rome.

No.35. The Epistle to the Philippians (2).
pp. 212 - 216

Having given our reasons for believing that this epistle was written from Paul's imprisonment at Rome, and therefore circulated after the Acts, we note that it is a letter pre-eminently of unselfish service, in connection with the gospel and the fullness of Truth made known after Israel's defection. This letter does not go over the ground again of Ephesians. There was no need to do this. Philippians deals with the responsibility that comes from receiving the riches of grace and glory that are revealed in Ephesians and Colossians, the working out of our salvation with a prize or Divine reward in view, and thus it balances II Timothy with its similar emphasis on a crown (II Tim. iv. 8 and cp. ii. 12).

We are not surprised therefore to find service stressed in the first verse:

> "Paul and Timothy, servants of Christ Jesus, to all the saints . . . . . at Philippi, with the bishops and deacons" (R.V.), and it is the only epistle of Paul's to begin in this way. The word 'servant' is literally 'slave', and on the surface it seems extraordinary that the champion of liberty (Gal. v. 1) should so describe himself. But ever since his conversion, the Apostle's conception of redemption was that he had been purchased by the Lord and thus he was entirely the Lord's property, as his very first question showed (Acts ix. 6). Only those who have this experience and realize its implications to the full know what real freedom is. Before we go any further we will set out the structure of the epistle, and for this we are indebted to Mr. C. H. Welch:

A | i. 1, 2. Salutation. Saints in Christ Jesus.
B | i. 3-26. Fellowship in gospel from the first day.
C | i. 27 - ii. 5. Conversation here. Stand fast. Mind of Christ. Now.
D | ii. 6-11. Sevenfold humiliation of Christ. Example.
E | ii. 12-17. Exhortation. Work out.
F | ii. 17-30. Example of Paul, Timothy and Epaphroditus.
E | iii. 1-3. Exhortation. Beware.
D | iii. 4-19. Sevenfold loss of Paul. Example.
C | iii. 20 - iv. 10. Conversation there. Stand fast. Body of glory. Then.
B | iv. 11-20. Fellowship in beginning of the Gospel.
A | iv. 21-23. Salutation. Saints of Cæsar's Household.

The structure is an introversion and is self-explanatory. There are many parallels with the epistle to the Hebrews. In each case a race is envisaged, and maturity as the goal (Phil. iii. 12-15; Heb. vi. 1; xii. 1, 2), and we should not be surprised at this when we realize that Hebrews is the 'prize' epistle of the Acts period, as Philippians is to the church of the Mystery revealed after the Acts.

Some find the mention of 'bishops and deacons' in verse 1 a problem, but, rightly regarded, this is not so. We feel this may have come about through the idea that organized assemblies only existed during the Acts period; and afterwards, when the great secret of Ephesians and Colossians was revealed, such united witness finished and churches somehow were dissolved and thus ceased to be. When one tries to examine the basis for such an idea, one searches in vain for any solid reason. Even later on, when so many deserted the Apostle (II Tim. i. 15 R.V.), this did not stamp out the various churches, unless one assumes that all these people became atheists! There was still plenty of Christian witness left, even though it was largely devoid of the truth of the sacred 'deposit' given to Paul by the ascended Christ. In the sub-apostolic period we know for certain that the churches at Corinth and Philippi were still in existence because Clement wrote to the former and Polycarp to the latter and we have their letters today. (See The Early Centuries and the Truth).

Now it is God's will that things be done "decently and in order". The Apostle Paul was constantly concerned that this should characterize the various groups of believers. A pagan world was watching and only too ready to pounce on any irregularity among the Christian churches. We can thus understand that the provision of leaders was a necessity in all circumstances, and the lowly but valuable office of bishops (overseers) and deacons (servants of the church) were a gift from the Lord to this end. We must cast out from our minds any modern conception of a bishop. In Paul's day these were just humble and faithful believers, whose homes were examples of what Christian homes should be, and therefore a fit place for believers to meet with one another in study, praise and worship (I Tim. iii. 1-13).

If this was true during the Acts, then the need certainly did not cease afterwards when the Mystery was revealed with its new calling and walk. The need and importance of such leadership would be even greater, and the fellowship in the house-church even more necessary than before so that the new Truth could be studied together and the Body grow as a whole (Eph. iv. 13, 15, 16). The very fact that instruction concerning bishops and deacons was given after Acts xxviii., when Paul wrote his first epistle to Timothy proves this.

Some have tried to give an earlier date for I Timothy and place it in the Acts period, but this is impossible, and even if it were so, there is still the same problem with the epistle to Titus. A. M. Stibbs in The New Bible Commentary writes (p.1063) "It is generally agreed that it is impossible to fit these epistles (the Pastorals) within the limits of Paul's life as we know it from the Acts of the Apostles. For their explanation they demand the recognition, indeed they themselves provide the most decisive evidence, that Paul was released from the imprisonment of which we read at the end of Acts (Phil. ii. 24; Philemon 22) . . . . ."

The duties of an overseer (bishop) are clearly set out in Acts xx. 28:

> "Take heed therefore unto yourselves, and to all the flock, over which the Holy Ghost hath made you overseers (bishops), to feed the church of God, which He hath purchased with His own blood."

These believers are also called "elders" in verse 17, showing that these two titles referred to the same office. The need for nourishing the people of God (who were enlightened to the new calling of Ephesians) certainly did not cease at Acts xxviii. Deacons (diakonoi) appeared to be responsible for certain welfare duties connected with the assembly. The house of Stephanas had appointed themselves for service (diakonian) to the saints (I Cor. xvi. 15), and was linked with others who helped and laboured together (17). There is no exalted ecclesiastical office in either of these titles. This was what they degenerated into as organized Christianity got further and further away from the original truth. It is worthy of note that there are bishops (plural) at the beginning, not one bishop ruling and superintending, which again was a declension from original truth, by the time of Ignatius.

From the standpoint of the Philippian letter, we see the church still organized in absolute simplicity, with the minimum of 'offices' to assure the orderly running of the new witness. Because Paul addressed his last letter to Timothy, again some have assumed that, in view of this, organized groups of Christians had ceased to exist. Most certainly this was not so, but we can well understand that the Apostle's last thoughts before his martyrdom would be for the young fellow, his dearly loved son in the faith, who was soon to take up the great responsibility of standing for all that made up "the good deposit" of truth which he (Paul) had received from the ascended Christ, and thus his last letter was a personal one for his correction and encouragement.

At the commencement of Philippians the Apostle gives his thanksgiving for the believers at Philippi. "I thank my God upon every remembrance of you" he said.

Isolated in his Roman imprisonment, we can well imagine that Paul's thoughts would continually travel to the various groups of God's children his faithful ministry had been the means of founding. At least the Roman Praetorian guard could not chain his thoughts, nor the Word of God! (II Tim. ii. 8, 9). Neither could they stop his Christian witness, as the rest of the chapter clearly testifies, for there was still abundant fruit, even though he was chained to a Roman soldier night and day. Every time he thought of the Philippian church he felt extremely grateful to God for them, not only because in their practical love for him they had sent him a gift, but also because they had shared in the work and witness of the gospel from the first day of the founding of their assembly by the Apostle. Thus they were constantly in his prayers with joy in his heart.

Although this is an epistle of suffering, testing, and sacrifice (i. 29, 30; ii. 17; iii. 7, 8), yet paradoxically it is the epistle of joy and rejoicing (i. 4, 18; ii. 16, 17, 18, 28; iii. 1; iv. 4, 10). This only goes to show that the believer need not be unduly affected by his environment. Trying though it may be, by the grace and strength of God he can rise above it and become "more than conqueror" (Rom. viii. 37). Joy is one of the fruits of the Spirit (Gal. v. 22), and this is not something that fluctuates from day to day as it does not depend upon anything external, but is an abiding possession given by the Spirit of God and centres around all the spiritual wealth that exists in Christ. Later on in this epistle Paul is going to reveal how he could be independent of all circumstances (Philippians iv. 11-13). A careful consideration of the occurrences of the word 'joy' will throw a flood of light upon this most attractive grace which advertises the Christian faith so well. Long-faced Christianity does not win new adherents! On the other hand, it is not the empty flippancy of the unbelieving world, which is so often mistaken for it.

The Philippian believers had shown the genuineness of their faith by their obedience to the truth and their constant labour to make the gospel known, which was a good deal more than the empty profession of words only. Paul was assured that this was an abiding work:

> "Being confident of this very thing, that He which began a good work in you, will perfect it until the day of Jesus Christ" (i. 6 R.V.).

Whatever God begins He finishes or perfects, and this is the final answer to those who say one can be saved today and lost tomorrow. Moreover we must remember that there are three tenses in salvation and redemption. We have been saved from the penalty of sin. We are now being saved from its power. In resurrection, when our hope is realized and we have the redemption of the body (Rom. viii. 23-25), we shall be saved from *its very presence, for we shall be presented "holy and blameless (Eph. v. 27).

This very fact shows that God will complete the work of salvation which He began. If this is not so, then Christ has died in vain. The two verbs 'begin' and 'finish' come together again in Gal. iii. 3, "Are ye so foolish? having begun (enarchomai) in the Spirit, are ye now made perfect (epiteleo) by the flesh?" Can the old sinful nature complete what the Holy Spirit, in the new nature given to the believer, has commenced? To ask the question is to answer it. In Philippians the completion will be realized in "the day of Jesus Christ", or "the day of Christ" (Phil. i. 10; ii. 16). In his last letter he just calls it "that day" (II Tim. i. 18; iv. 8). Previously, to the church at Corinth, he had declared that this future 'day' will be the resting time for our service (I Cor. iii. 13), and he placed it over against "man's day" of the present time (I Cor. iv. 3 margin). This period is one of the great prophetic "days" of Scripture which cannot be limited to twenty-four hours, and it is in harmony with the theme of Philippians, namely the practical working out of the truth (ii. 12), a goal to be reached, and the running of the race for a prize to be awarded at the end by the Lord (iii. 12-16).

In the section now before us (i. 3-26) we have three references to fellowship and furtherance (verses 5, 12, 25) and in between a three-fold confidence (pepoitha, verses 6, 14, 25). This can be set our as follows:

A1 | 3-5. Thanksgiving. Fellowship and defence of the Gospel.
  B1 | 6-8. Confidence.
A2 | 9-11. Paul's prayer. Furtherance of the Gospel.
  B2 | 12-18. Confidence.
A3 | 19-21. The Philippians' prayer.
  B3 | 22-26. Confidence.

No.36. The Epistle to the Philippians (3).
pp. 236 - 240

After asserting his confidence in the fullness and completeness of the Lord's gracious work on behalf of the Philippian believers (and all of the God's children for that matter), Paul states that it is only "right for me to be thus minded on behalf of you all, because I have you in my heart . . . . ." (i. 7 R.V.). Phronein, 'minded' is of frequent occurrence in this epistle. It occurs in ii. 2 (twice), 5, iii. 15 (twice), 16 (Received Text), 19, iv. 2, and 10 (twice), "care" and "careful". It is obviously one of the key-words. In fact the whole of the epistle revolves around the "mind of Christ" and its practical outworking in the believer. The word means much more than mental acknowledgment. Sympathetic concern is nearer the mark, the thought that touches the heart and the action in connection with others. This the Apostle had in abundant measure towards all his converts, making a close bond that distance could not affect or sever. "I have you in my heart", he says, and this is surely one of the warmest expressions he ever used. This bond also came about because he and the Philippians shared together in the "defence and confirmation of the gospel", and in the grace of God which imparted the necessary strength for this defence and confirmation (verse 7).

Just what does Paul mean by these latter words? He could mean faithfully proclaiming and defending the gospel in his oral and written ministry. Or he could be referring to his prison experience, for the two terms apologia and bebaiosis are legal terms which could be connected with his trial before the imperial court. Moulton and Milligan, on the evidence of the papyri, state that "bebaiosis must always be read with the technical sense in mind". In this case he would mean that whether he is in prison or brought before his judges for the gospel's sake, the Philippians all shared in the grace which was given to both, for they were suffering too (i. 29). Not only this, but he had an intense longing for them, doubtless sharpened by his imprisonment and separation. This was a reflection of the "tender mercies" (bowels, verse 8 A.V.) of Christ; that compassionate regard which the Lord showed to men in His earthly ministry and which He still bears today. If Paul cannot see the saints at Philippi, then he will pray for them, and the prayer that follows is outstanding in that every word should be carefully weighed if the fullness of the prayer is to be appreciated. Paul was concerned that their love should develop into "knowledge" or "acknowledgment" and "judgment", with the result that they might be able to "approve the things that are excellent"; leading on to being 'sincere' and 'void of offence' an 'being filled with the fruits of righteousness'. It will be seen that each stage leads to another and fuller development; "that" in each case being hina, "in order that", and the preposition eis expressing a goal ("that", "till" and "unto").

Love, to be practical and of any use, must issue in act or performance. Here its practical outworking leads to a daily acknowledgment and this in turn will lead to discernment. There can be no spiritual growth without a real response. Mental grasp of truth by itself is barren and lifeless. Eph. i. 17 tells us that by practical acknowledgment we receive illumination. Col. i. 10 instructs us that by such acknowledgment we grow. Phil. i. 9 assures us by the same acknowledgment we have the important ability to discern and weigh over thing so that we can obtain the best. The word 'judgment' is not to be linked with a law-court or with legal terms. It is aisthesis, perception or discrimination, by which one has the ability to weigh things up as regards quality, thus separating between good and bad, or the better and the best. A cognate word aistheterion is used in Heb. v. 14, "having the senses exercised to discern both good and evil", which has the same thought in view. Now this is very necessary in the affairs of everyday life. No one deliberately chooses what is poor in quality. He naturally desires the best that life offers, and this ability comes with mental development and experience. It is no less necessary in the Christian life if one wishes to lay hold of the best that God has to give. The A.V. margin has the alternative reading "that ye may try the things that differ" which, on the surface, does not seem to have much connection with "approving the things that are excellent", till one realizes that the latter phrase can only be true when the previous one has been put into operation. Things usually differ in quality, and it is only by perception and careful weighing over that what is better can be appreciated and received. Diapheronta (excellent) has this meaning in Matt. vi. 26 and x. 31 ("better than", "of more value than"), and I Cor. xv. 41 ("one star differeth from another star in glory").

Now this perception and ability to weigh things over in order to get what is "excellent" or the best, is just what is lacking in so many believers. There is no difference in truth so far as they are concerned. All is one and the same. They are the very opposite of Abraham whose eye of faith embraced the "better country" and heavenly city (Heb. xi. 10, 16). Abraham and his posterity had already been given an earthly country, a good land (Gen. xv. 18) which afterwards was described as "flowing with milk and honey". Yet he looked for something better! God had most evidently given him a glimpse of the heavenly Jerusalem, that, centuries later, the Apostle John was also to see and describe in all its glory and beauty (Rev. xxi.). Abraham was able to "weigh up" and "discriminate" and "to prove the things that are excellent" and, by faith, to embrace God's best for him. It is this ability and keenness that is so lacking today in Christian circles. Why should we "rightly divide the Word of truth"? they say. Why bother about three spheres of blessing in the Bible? Is it necessary to know this? We are saved and that is all that matters!

The example of Abraham and the worthies of Heb. xi. condemns this attitude. Overcoming faith wants the best that God has revealed. This is not presumption; it is honouring and valuing what God has been pleased to make known for the obedience of faith. The other is just spiritual laziness and unbelief, which can only result in loss for the believer who indulges in it. We are often amazed at how little of the fullness of God's revealed truth the average believer desires to receive.

Presently Paul is going to introduce the figure of a race, and here, therefore, the mind or thinking is all-important. Those who wish to be victorious in the race, must be "thus minded" with the Apostle (iii. 15). This quality then of spiritual perception is a mark of one who is pressing on in the race for the heavenly prize. All wrong attitudes of mind will only clog and slow up the runner and they must be rigorously discarded. This leads to the next clause in the prayer, "in order that ye might be sincere and without offence with a view to the Day of Christ" (literally, verse 10). The word sincere is eilikrines, which also occurs in II Pet. iii. 1. The noun eilikrineia occurs three times (I Cor. v. 8; II Cor. i. 12; ii. 17). The derivation of these words is doubtful, and neither of them are common in the papyri. There are two possible sources. (1) A derivation from eilein, to shake to and fro in a sieve, till all the foreign matter is extracted and only the pure substance left. This would describe the mind which has been purified and cleansed by the Word of God (John xv. 3; Psa. xix. 9). (2) Or they could be derived from two words, heile, sunlight, and krinein, to judge, and would describe something that could stand the test of sunlight and show no flaws. Both are searching ideas and would fit into the context. The successful runner in God's race is one who has been purified, has laid aside every weight and sin that so easily besets us (Heb. xii. 1, 2), and is running this race with patience, looking unto Jesus, the Beginner and the Finisher. Or he can stand the test of God, Who is light, and penetrates the innermost thoughts and motives of the mind and finds nothing there that is out of His will. Such a person is "pure" or "transparent" as Moffatt so aptly renders it.

He is also "without offence", that is, not causing offence or stumbling in other people; and so would be filled with the fruit of righteousness (note the R.V. margin, "fruit" is singular). This is practical righteousness in action, as the figure of fruit always indicates (Gal. v. 22) and this comes only "through Jesus Christ" (i. 11 R.V.). The athlete does not run a race by theorizing or merely thinking, but by intense action and effort, and the final goal is "unto the glory and praise of God". This is the acid test, not the glorification of man, or even of the believer, but the ultimate glory of God Himself. Every prize winner in the Day of Christ will contribute to this glory. For it is only by the grace and resurrection power of Christ that any saved sinner can press on to the goal, breast the tape, and receive the crown and the "well done" of the righteous Umpire (II Tim. iv. 8). Such a prayer was not only necessary for the Philippian saints. As members of the Body of Christ, each one of us needs it experimentally day by day and we need to continually ponder its every statement and its outworking in our lives.

A new section now starts in which Paul informs his Philippian friends that, in spite of his imprisonment and the hostility of enemies inside and outside the church, rather than all this hindering the truth, it was actually helping it! Christ was being proclaimed more and more, and this was producing real response from those who heard.

While therefore, on the human plane, he could have felt depressed, defeated and frustrated, he rather rejoiced, as he saw the wonderful way the Lord was working, "making all things work together for good" and for His glory.

> "Now I would have you know, brethren, that the things which happened unto me have fallen out rather unto the progress of the gospel; so that my bonds became manifest in Christ throughout the whole praetorian guard, and to all the rest; and that most of the brethren in the Lord, being confident through my bonds, are more abundantly bold to speak the word of God without fear" (i. 12-14 R.V.).

It may be that the Philippians had sent a message by Epaphroditus expressing their concern about his welfare. If so, then these verses give them up-to-date news of himself and his affairs. How glad he must have been to be able to tell them that the good news was advancing (prokope furtherance) in spite of all difficulties! Not only this, but his Christian witness in his imprisonment was having a stimulating effect upon believers in the locality. They were losing their fear, and giving a bolder testimony to God's Word. If fear is contagious, and it often is, so is its opposite, boldness! Paul's uncompromising testimony in word and action stirred up others around him and thus the truth was being proclaimed more and more, so much so that all the praetorian guard were getting to hear of it. This was another fact that gave him great joy.

However, some were preaching Christ with a very wrong motive. They seemed to have an animosity towards the Apostle, and even hoped to aggravate the irksomeness of his captivity. Perhaps they thought they could make him jealous by their success in preaching. There was a background of envy and strife, squabbling and rivalry. The meanness of such an attitude of mind seems hardly possible in a Christian, but there is no knowing what can happen when a believer comes under the domination of the old sinful nature, and the enemy working through it. If they hoped to overwhelm the Apostle, they were sadly mistaken. The glorious "What the?" of verse 18 rings out almost in defiance. What of it? he says, or as we might colloquially say, "so what?" Whatever is happening, Christ is being proclaimed, he said, and this is the chief thing. I therefore am rejoicing and will continue to rejoice in spite of all such opposition.

What can daunt a person who can surmount his adverse circumstances so magnificently? What an example to all of us! It takes so little to get some of us down, that we should feel ashamed as we contemplate the triumphant witness that this great servant of Christ gave in the most difficult of circumstances. Another thing that must have contributed to Paul's joy was the fact that he could count on two things: (1) The Philippians' prayers on his behalf. (2) The supply of the Spirit of Jesus Christ (verse 19). While in one sense the Apostle was independent, yet he valued so much the prayer support of his fellow-believers (Rom. xv. 30; II Cor. i. 11; Eph. vi. 18, 19; Col. iv. 3). He knew only too well what his continual prayers had accomplished for them, and he realized that he could be upheld in the same way. Let us never forget this all-important ministry of intercession. On the surface it may not appear to be doing much. There is no outward bustle or activity to impress, but it can "move the Hand that moves the world"!

Purpose, Promise and Performance.
No.1. pp. 221 - 225

The present Study arose out of an attempt to help a Bible Class leader to show how rational was the principle of "Right Division", by asking at the outset of any Bible study the questions Which? Who? When? and Where? but found that when the question "Why?" was put, a different category involving the question of Purpose was introduced. This is a matter for the most careful research, much exploration and illumination, and it is not at all unlikely that when we reach that last page we shall not have arrived at a complete answer. However, the Scriptures have been written as a revelation of all that may be known or should be known of the Divine Purpose. Providing we realize our limitations and avoid the attitude against which the Apostle warned the Colossians of "intruding into those things which he hath not seen", we cannot but be pleasing to our gracious God if we manifest a desire to understand something of His wonderful purposes, even though we limit our investigations to that phase which belongs to the dispensation of the Mystery.

Let us open our study with a salutary reminder or two. Zophar, one of Job's three friends, said:

> "Canst thou by searching find out God? Canst thou find out the Almighty unto perfection?" (Job xi. 7).

We quote next the A.V. and Moffatt's translation of Eccles. iii. 11, because of its ambiguity in most English versions:

> "He hath made everything beautiful in His time: also He hath set the world (Heb. olam 'age') in their heart, so that no man can find out the work that God maketh from the beginning to the end" (Eccles. iii. 11).
>
> "He assigned each to its proper time, but for the mind of man He has appointed mystery (olam Heb. a period of undefined limits, an age), that man may never fathom God's own purpose from beginning to the end" (Eccles. iii. 11 Moffatt).

The Scriptures themselves lead us to expect to be baffled, especially regarding the beginning and the end of God's purpose, but we remind ourselves with much comfort and assurance that Christ Himself is "the Beginning and the Ending", and to know Him will provide keys to unlock the hidden purpose of God. The Apostle also warned the Corinthian saying:

> "For what man knoweth the things of a man, save the spirit of man which is in him? even so the things of God knoweth no man, but the Spirit of God" (I Cor. ii. 11).
>
> "For we know in part, and we prophesy in part, but when that which is perfect is come, then that which is in part shall be done away . . . . . for now we see through a glass, darkly; but then face to face."

Or as Moffatt renders the passage:

> "At present we only see the baffling reflections in a mirror, but then it will be face to face" (I Cor. iii. 9-12).

The writer of this article has no fuller revelation given to him than to others, of the purpose of God which is being wrought out through the ages; he stands exactly where the reader himself stands. He has opened the Bible, and the opportunity to "search the Scriptures" must ever remind us of the limitation which those self-same Scriptures set upon our search.

Purpose in Old Testament.

The A.V. uses the English word "purpose" to translate eight Hebrew words, and two Greek words. The verb "to purpose" is translated by seven Hebrew and six Greek words. These original words mean a word, device, delight, thought, work, counsel, desire, foundation and intention. Whether we can hope to solve the problems that are associated with the outworking of this purpose or not, it is a comfort to realize that the Scriptures give us every assurance that, however inexplicable certain happenings and developments may appear to us, all are known, all are under control, and when the time is ripe we "shall know, even as we are known". With this limiting proviso in mind, we can now freely meditate on all that is written, and refrain from intruding where no explanation has been given.

First let Ecclesiastes speak:

> "To everything there is a season, and a time to every purpose under the heaven" (Eccles. iii. 1).

This is salutary. To know or to reveal any part of God's purpose before the appointed time could be disastrous and play into the hands of the great Enemy. This explains the evasive answer to the Apostle's question, recorded in Acts i. 6. It may be well to remind ourselves that the Serpent did not tempt Adam and Eve to commit some brutal or degrading sin, but to "be as God, knowing good and evil", which though forbidden while man was in his infancy, is the very mark of those who are "perfect" or "full grown" (Heb. v. 14). Moses desired to see the glory of God, but was told that he could only look upon His "back parts"; the time had not then come for the fuller revelations of God's purpose that are found in the N.T. Even there we are not given a complete revelation "from the beginning to the end", but are pointed on to a future day of complete revelation.

The word translated "season" in Ecclesiastes means an appointed and appropriate time, and is expanded in the words of Habakkuk, and although it is not the same Hebrew word that is there translated, it is an inspired commentary and a word to guide and assure when we feel baffled. We subdivide the passage so that each portion may speak clearly.

> "(1) The vision is yet for an appointed time,
> (2) but at the end it shall speak, and not lie:
> (3) though it tarry, wait for it:
> (4) because it will surely come, it will not tarry" (Hab. ii. 3).

There can be no altering or hurrying the fulfillment of God's purposes; our attitude is to rest assured that any appearance of delay is only because of our own ignorance and limitation. The attitude of heart that God looks for in the perplexed believer is that:

> "(5) The just shall live by his faith" (Hab. ii. 4), which is an exceedingly practical as well as a basic truth. Ecclesiastes speaks twice more about the purpose of God and its relation to time:

> "I said in mine heart, God shall judge the righteous and the wicked: for there is a time there for every purpose and for every work" (Eccles. iii. 17).
> "Because to every purpose there is time and judgment, therefore the misery of man is great upon him" (Eccles. viii. 6).

The context of these passages needs examining, but for the moment we are listing the different references to the Purpose of God in order that all that is said may be before us as we go into details. Another thing to remember is that the purposes of God are the results of "counsel". They are not the arbitrary dictates of a despot.

> "Without counsel purposes are disappointed" (Prov. xv. 22).
> "Every purpose is established by counsel" (Prov. xx. 18).

Here the essential feature is "counsel".

A specific purpose occupies Jeremiah's prophecy, that which deals with the overthrow of Babylon.

> "Therefore hear ye the counsel of the Lord, that He hath taken against Babylon, and his purposes, that He hath purposed against the land of the Chaldeans . . . . . At the noise of the taking of Babylon the earth is moved" (Jer. l. 45, 46).
> "Every purpose of the Lord shall be performed against Babylon" (Jer. li. 29).

Here judgment of evil and the certainty of its performance are stressed. This is true also of the Assyrian oppressor:

> "The Lord of hosts hath sworn, saying, Surely as I have thought, so shall it come to pass, and as I have purposed so shall it stand."
> "This is the purpose that is purposed upon the whole earth . . . . . who shall disannul it? And His hand is stretched out, and who shall turn it back" (Isa. xiv. 24-27).

Quite apart from what is purposed, we see from these verses that there can be no disannulling of the purposes of God, whether for judgment or for blessing, as Jeremiah and Isaiah declare.

> "Every purpose . . . . . shall be performed" (Jer. li. 29).
> "Declaring the end from the beginning . . . . . saying My counsel shall stand, and I will do all My pleasure" (Isa. xlvi. 10).

Purpose of the New Testament.

(1) Prothesis, something "set before" the mind, a resolution.
(2) Tithemi, the verb to purpose, to set or to place.
(3) Bouleuomai, to wish, to take counsel.
(4) Poieo. To make or to do.
(5) Proaireomai. To choose, to take one before another.

Let us acquaint ourselves with the context and usage of these words in the N.T., and become more acquainted with their inner meaning.

Prothesis. Four times it is used in connection with shewbread (Matt. xii. 41; Mark ii. 26; Luke vi. 4 and Heb. ix. 2) literally "The bread of setting before". It is used of Paul's own purpose and of others, but we are concerned with the purpose of God, so we read "the called according to His purpose" (Rom. viii. 28), which is followed by such terms as predestination. There is the danger of missing the sovereign will of God that lies behind His purpose, for we read in Rom. ix. 11, 12:

> "For the children, being not yet born, neither having done any good or evil, that the purpose of God according to election might stand, not of works, but of Him that calleth; it was said unto her, The elder shall serve the younger."

The Prison Epistles use this term three times, and their meaning and place in the overall scheme is too implicit to deal with at this stage. We will give these references, but wait for a fuller exposition, after we have considered the remaining terms that are set out before us:

> "In Whom also we have obtained an inheritance, being predestinated according to the purpose of Him Who worketh all things after the counsel of His Own will" (Eph. i. 11).
> "According to the eternal purpose which He purposed in Christ Jesus our Lord" (Eph. iii. 11).
> "Who hath saved us, and called us with an holy calling; not according to our works, but according to His own purpose and grace, which was given us in Christ Jesus before the world began" (II Tim. i. 9).

We leave the correction of one or two of these words in the A.V. until later.

Tithemi, which gives us the word Thesis in prothesis just examined, is variously translated appoint, set forth, lay down, ordain, to lay as a foundation, to put, as all enemies under His feet, all of which have a bearing on the question of purpose, to be considered presently.

Poieo. In one passage, namely in Eph. iii. 11, the clause "which He purposed" employs the word usually translated "to make or to do", which at first reads somewhat strangely when we read of the "eternal purpose which He MADE in Christ Jesus", but the word has wide significance. Dr. Bullinger's comment in his Lexicon is:

> "To make, i.e. to form, produce, to bring about, cause, spoken of any external act as manifested in the production of something tangible and obvious to the senses, and referring to completed action."

If that is what is purposed in Christ Jesus, how great is our joy and confidence.

It is not our intention to attempt to examine the whole purpose of God as it is unfolded in the Scriptures of the Old and New Testament, but we do feel some attempt is justified in considering under the three heads the references to Purpose, Promise and Performance that run through the Prison Epistles, and belong so intimately with our high calling and hope. Purpose is written large across Eph. i. 3-14, and is implied in such words as "chosen", "predestinate", "good pleasure of His will", "His good pleasure which He hath purposed in Himself", "Who worketh all things after the counsel of His own will". Arising out of this tremendous emphasis on "purpose" in these opening verses of Ephesians, comes the 'seal', 'promise', 'earnest', 'hope' and 'inheritance' (Eph. i. 13-18) concluding with that most wonderful characteristic and title of the Church which is His Body, namely:

> "The fullness of Him that filleth all in all" (Eph. i. 22, 23).

Will there be recognition in heaven?

pp. 34 - 37

When one has received a fair number of problems and questions, it becomes possible to sort them out into groups, and while such grouping may be far from scientific in its accuracy, it gives a rough and ready gauge whereby to work. Some problems will be purely dispensational, and the most vital help will be to lead the troubled believer to face the application of "right division". Other problems will arise out of unscriptural or inadequate conceptions of the finished work of Christ. Yet others will result from confusing things that differ, like the dangerous misconception that uses the running for the prize of Phil. iii. to urge believers to run and to win a place in the church of the One Body. Many problems arise from ambiguous or inaccurate translation; some can be solved by exhibiting the structure of the passage which contains the problem. None of these categories however seen to cover the question at present before us. This one seems to be the problem of certain temperaments, associated generally with a loose idea as to what actually is involved in recognition. Let us try to help any who are perplexed over this matter.

First let us face that matter squarely in the light we have of the character of God. It would be conceivable if our God were the cold, abstract, remote God of the philosopher, that He would arrange a heaven made up of perfect strangers, but our God is "Love", and not only so, His love has been manifested both in the gift of His Son to be the Redeemer, and by the revelation of Himself as Father. Now the redeemed are called by very homely titles; they are called "the Family" (Eph. iii. 15); they constitute a "Household" (Eph. ii. 19); the anticipation of glory is expressed by the prayer, that Christ may "dwell" (or "be at home") in our hearts by faith (Eph. iii. 17). Resurrection glory is expressed by the word "endemeo", translated in II Cor. v. 6, 8 "at home" and "to be present", a word that means literally "among one's people". Here in this most blessed cluster of homely terms, we may surely discover an answer to our question. A family that did not recognize one another, would cease to be a family. A Father whose family were utter strangers to one another would cease to be a father except in name. Further, it was the office of the Son to make the Father known, and He has assured us that He did nothing but what He saw the Father do. He is therefore in Himself and in His teaching a faithful Representative of the Father. The parable of the Prodigal Son was not given with the object of answering the question "Will there be recognition in heaven?", but if the Lord knew that there would be no recognitions in heaven, has He not given us too happy a picture of the prodigal's reception? The elder brother evidently "recognized" the prodigal, even if it were only to complain about him.

It is very probable that those who are troubled about this question of 'recognition' do not really understand all that 'recognition' involves. Shall we put the matter this way: Can I "recognize" others without "recognizing" myself? The answer obviously is "No". Now put it the other way round. Will anyone "recognize" themselves in resurrection glory? Lazarus died, Lazarus was buried, Lazarus was raised again, and there is not the slightest hint that Lazarus did not recognize Mary and Martha and the rest of his friends.

Many of the saints who were dead, arose at the time of the crucifixion, and these risen saints "went into the holy city, and appeared unto many" (Matt. xxvii. 53). Are we to believe that these risen ones had not the slightest recollection of the holy city, that they just wandered about like lost souls, and that they were utter strangers both to themselves, to one another and to the living at Jerusalem? Is not Christ Himself "the firstfruits" of them that have fallen asleep? We read that if the firstfruits be holy, the lump is also holy (Rom. xi. 16) and by analogy we can say that if Christ recognized His Own followers after He was raised from the dead, so also will they recognize one another when they too are risen from the dead. The Lord knew and spoke to Mary, Thomas and Peter by name, and they knew and recognized Him.

We may go back to the earliest statement in the Scriptures concerning resurrection, and find that recognition is most surely implied:

> "I know that my Redeemer liveth, and that He shall stand at the latter day upon the earth. And though after my skin worms destroy this body, yet in my flesh shall I see God: Whom I shall see for myself, and mine eyes shall behold, and not another" (Job xix. 25-27).

Could Job have uttered such confident words, if recognition in glory were impossible? We find too that the redeemed sing praises to the Lord, giving thanks for the deliverance and the grace that brings them safely home. If they know that they were redeemed while in this life, then they must remember, and it is impossible for any one of us to remember the affairs of our own lives without remembering all those other fellow sinners and fellow saints whose paths crossed and recrossed our own. If I do not remember the past, I shall not feel grateful for redemption. The redeemed child of God, is to stand before the judgment seat of Christ, and there "every one shall give an account of himself to God" (Rom. xiv. 12). Not only shall the believer give an account, but:

> "Every one may receive the things done in his body, according to that he hath done, whether it be good or bad" (II Cor. v. 10).
>
> "Knowing that of the Lord ye shall receive the reward of the inheritance: for ye serve the Lord Christ. But he that doeth wrong shall receive for the wrong which he hath done: and there is no respect of persons" (Col. iii. 24, 25).

It is impossible to judge or award either reward or punishment to any one who is suffering from a total lapse of memory. With some, the problem of recognition in glory is an offshoot of another problem. They feel that it is simply to recognize loved ones while still here in flesh and blood, but a spiritual body, seems to them so intangible, so unreal, so much like a passing vapour, that their heaven is but cobweb and mist. We must attempt to deal with that problem in another article in this series.

Let us, for the moment, sum up our argument in favour of recognition in glory. The redeemed are and will be a "family", with God Himself as their Father. God is love, and it is the love that exists, however slightly in the heart of the child of God, that yearns to be assured of this recognition. If therefore our puny love cannot feel satisfied with heaven where there will be no recognition, how much more would the God of love be unsatisfied? The Lord Jesus Christ, in resurrection, recognized His Own and was recognized in turn by them. Further He called a number of them by their private names.

We shall, therefore, all be recognized by Him in glory, and should there be any lack of recognition on our part, will that not instantly be rectified in His presence? Recognition of others, is vitally connected with our own personal identity. If I shall be the same person in glory, that sinned and believed on earth, then I shall remember it and know it, otherwise my identity will be a myth. Without memory, identity is impossible. But I cannot remember my past life without remembering others, and if this be so, my own identity being preserved in glory, guarantees the recognition of other identities too. So, we say to all to whom this matter has been a problem:

> "Let not your heart be troubled . . . . . in My Father's house are many mansions, if it were not so I would have told you" (John xiv. 1, 2).

We can surely expand this comforting note to cover other things "If it were not so", if there be no recognition in heaven, He Who knows our hearts and our legitimate longings, He "would have told" us.

The Resurrection of Christ and of the dead

No.1. The Witness of the Old Testament.
pp. 21 - 25

The Book of Job.

What has been called "the oldest question in the world" is found in the book of Job:

> "If a man die, shall he live again?" (Job xiv. 14).

This "consummation devoutly to be wished", is denied or explained in all the philosophies of the Ancient, and in the religious beliefs of those outside the pale of Christianity. Only within the pages of Scripture has it been found possible to include in the list of Divine titles, that which is ascribed to Abraham's faith:

> "Even God, Who quickeneth the dead" (Rom. iv. 17).

In Athens, the home of philosophy (Acts xvii. 18), the attitude of many of the Apostles' testimony to the resurrection was that they "mocked":

> "And when they heard of the resurrection of the dead, some mocked" (Acts xvii. 32).

To Agrippa Paul said:

> "Why should it be thought a thing incredible with you, that God should raise the dead?" (Acts xxvi. 8).

And when the Apostle reached the words:

> "He should be the first that should rise from the dead."

Festus, the Roman Governor cried:

> "Paul, thou art beside thyself: much learning doth make thee mad" (Acts xxvi. 23, 24).

Neither Greek 'wisdom' nor Roman 'power' can contemplate the possibility of resurrection. Nevertheless, the mind of man was still haunted with the age-old question "If a man die, shall he live again?" and entertained ideas that involved the immortality of the soul, reincarnation, the denial of the fact of death, saying with the poet "There is no death, what seems so is transition". To all such fancies begotten of fear and ignorance, the Scripture replies with certainty and finality, "Death is an enemy" that cannot be circumvented.

We return therefore to Job xiv. and consider his search and his findings. First let us remember Job had no Bible. His three friends manifest a wisdom and knowledge that still holds the best of us in thrall, yet not one made the remotest approach to the answer of Job's question "If a man die shall he live again?" Although Job had no written revelation from God, this book abounds with references to the phenomena of nature, sun, moon, stars, animal and vegetable life, storm, snow, wind, rain, are all explored and employed. So we find Job in chapter xiv. turning to his "Bible". "There is hope of a tree" (xiv. 7). Job uses the word "hope" of a tree once again in Job xix. 10 "Mine hope hath he removed like a tree", but, as in Job xiv., so here Job moves on to the great confession of verses 25, 26 where personal, literal resurrection is again acknowledged and believed:

> "There is hope of a tree, if it be cut down, that it will sprout again" (Job xiv. 7).

This figure "to be cut down" is used of a flower also:

> "He cometh forth like a flower, and is cut down: he fleeth also as a shadow, and continueth not" (Job xiv. 2).

The two words are not the same in the original. Moffatt preserves the distinction, saying of the flower "it fades", and of the tree "it is felled", but the end is the same. Job apparently pondered the fact that a tree though thus cut down and its root should wax old, and the stock thereof die in the ground, will live again, but from the story of the tree, he turns to the tragedy of man and asks:

> "But man dieth, and wasteth away: yea, man giveth up the ghost, and where is he?" (Job xiv. 10).

The complete process of thought that passed through the mind of Job is not recorded, but he seems to have suddenly changed his attitude, as though he said "If there is hope for a tree, will not God also think of His greater creature, man?"

"So man lieth down, and riseth not." That at first seems final. But Job continues:

> "Till the heavens be no more, they shall not awake, nor be raised out of their sleep" (Job xiv. 12).

Here, however, we pause. "Awake", "sleep" are words to call a halt.

Let us go back to chapter iii., where Job cursed the day in which he had been born. Had he but died at birth, Job says:

> "I should have slept" (Job iii. 13).

Later, when thinking of his terrible sufferings, and imagining that he was being punished for his sins, he said:

> "I have sinned . . . . . Why dost Thou not pardon my transgression, and take away mine iniquity? for now shall I sleep in the dust: and Thou shalt seek me in the morning, but I shall not be" (Job vii. 20, 21).

This is as far as Job got in the extremity of his misery. He would "sleep in the dust" and even God, though he sought him in the morning, would not find him, for said Job, "I shall not be". Annihilation however is the philosophy of despair. The same man, Job is now moving on, his own words have struck a spark:

"Till the heavens be no more." "Thou shalt seek me in the morning."

Is it possible that He, God, "will seek"? If so, surely that means a deeper interest in the fate of man than Job had hitherto entertained. "Till"—while it visualizes a great stretch of time, does have a limit. What will take place when the "heavens are no more"? Job turns his cogitations into prayer:

> "Oh that Thou wouldest hide me in the grave, that Thou wouldest keep me secret, until Thy wrath be past, that Thou wouldest appoint me a set time, and remember me" (xiv. 13).

The operative words here are not "the grave" or "wrath" but "hide me", "keep me secret", "appoint me", "remember me". Job got no farther than "the grave"—it took the coming of Christ and the revelation of the mystery through the apostle Paul to speak of one's "life" being "hid with Christ in God" (Col. iii. 3); but Job could ask the Lord "to hide" him. Job uses the word 'hide' which is used later of the preserving, sheltering care of the mother of Moses (Exod. ii. 2, 3), and of the shelter given by Rahab to the spies (Josh. ii. 4), and the language of Job here, is given fuller meaning in Psa. xxvii. 5:

> "For in the time of trouble He shall hide me in His pavilion; in the secret of His tabernacle shall He hide me";

and in Psa. xxxi. 20:

> "Thou shalt hide them in the secret of Thy presence from the pride of man: Thou shalt keep them secretly in a pavilion from the strife of tongues."

"The set time" which Job envisaged is the same word in the original as "the decree" of Psa. ii., the Psalm of Resurrection:

> "I will declare the decree . . . . . this day have I begotten Thee" (Psa. ii. 7).

It seems to have slipped the notice of many scholars, that in all this Job has still in memory "The hope of tree, if it be cut down", for the word "sprout again" (Job xiv. 7) and "change" (Job xiv. 14) are the same in the original! If God will cause the dead stock of a tree to "sprout again", then He may cause Job to "change", that is to live again too. This reasoning is intensified by the following verse, namely:

> "Thou shalt call, and I will answer Thee: Thou wilt have a desire to the work of Thine hands" (Job xiv. 15).

The word "desire" is rich in its implications. In its noun form it is the word translated "silver" in Job iii. 15. The Hebrew translation 'silver' is derived from a word meaning to become "pale", even as the Greek word for silver, namely argurion is derived from the word argos meaning 'white'. The word is then used to speak of the emotions, in which one "turns pale" with the intensity of feeling:

> "My soul longeth, yea even fainteth for the courts of the Lord" (Psa. lxxxiv. 2).

We may make as great a discount as we please, and remind ourselves that these figures of speech which ascribe human emotions to God are to be used with great discretion. We are sure, that Job, in his perplexity and fear that God had forsaken him or was antagonistic to him, would heave a sigh of relief if God's "desire" unto the work of His hands was so intense, that it could justly figure that He "turned pale" with its intensity; for then the whole aspect would be changed. He could wait, and wait with joy until his change comes.

We move now with Job to chapter xix., a chapter that contains those well known and wondrous words: "I know that my Redeemer liveth".

We say "well known", but we have been surprised to find how few, comparatively, are aware of the wealth of teaching that this word "Redeemer" contains, for it is really "A Kinsman-Redeemer", an office with several features of vast import. To appreciate the wealth of Job's acknowledgment here, in chapter xix., we must turn back to his earlier sense of need. One of the complaints of Job in his deep distress, was the infinite distance that must necessarily intervene between a man of flesh and blood, and the Almighty:

> "If he will contend with him, he cannot answer him one of a thousand" (Job ix. 3).

He moves mountains; He shakes the earth; He commands the sun; He doeth great things past finding out (Job ix. 4-10);

> "How much less shall I answer Him, and choose out my words to reason with Him?
> If I had called, and He had answered me; yet would I not believe that He had hearkened unto my voice" (Job ix. 14, 16), and so Job goes on bemoaning the distance that was necessarily between the finite creature and the Almighty Creator. He brings his complaint to a conclusion, which contain in its questioning, the answer of the ages—The Kinsman-Redeemer.

> "For HE IS NOT A MAN, as I am, that I should answer Him, and we should COME TOGETHER in judgment" (Job ix. 32).

One of the translations of the Hebrew word for 'together' is "alike"; it is also translated "be joined" and "unite" as in the well known passage:

> "Behold, how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity" (Psa. cxxxiii. 1).

Job would have no problem about brethren dwelling together in unity, his problem was how can MAN and GOD come together? The coming of Christ and His glorious Gospel has answered this once for all for the believer, and modern teaching has taken from "the man in the street" the wholesome fear of the Almighty that is expressed in Job. Job continued:

> "Neither is there any Daysman betwixt us, that might lay his hand upon us both" (Job ix. 33).

Moffatt renders this verse:

"Oh for some umpire over both of us, who might decide our case."

The 'Daysman' would have been understood at the time the A.V. was being translated. He was a lawyer who attended court, and was at the disposal of any litigant who needed advice or arbitration. The Hebrew word yakach translated "Daysman" is found in Job 17 times. It is used in Isa. i. 18 "Come now, and let us reason together". Later in Job, after he had realized that he had a Kinsman-Redeemer, he said, using this same word:

> "Will He plead against me with His great power? No: but He would put strength in me (there is no word for 'strength' in the original, Moffatt renders it, 'No, He would listen to me'). There the righteous might dispute with Him; so should I be delivered for ever from my Judge" (Job xxiii. 6, 7).

No.2. The Witness of the Old Testament.
pp. 41 - 47

We have gone to some length in the endeavour to impress upon the reader the extreme need felt by Job for a Mediator Who could represent both God and man. Later in the book Elihu steps forward and says to Job:

> "If thou canst answer me, set thy words in order before me, stand up. Behold, I am according to thy wish IN GOD'S STEAD: I also am formed out of the clay. Behold, my terror shall not make thee afraid" (Job xxxiii. 5-7).

While Elihu was only a type or foreshadowing of the one Mediator between God and man, the Man Christ Jesus, he does lead Job on into fuller light, as we shall see when examining Job xxxiii. 23-25, but we must return to the nineteenth chapter, and see how what we have learned bears upon the title 'Redeemer' there introduced. In a simpler society than our own, where the police were unknown and tribal law was ascendant; a man in trouble could call upon his next of kin for succour, and that is what Job had in mind when he said "I know that my Redeemer liveth".

First let me tabulate the principle duties of the Kinsman-Redeemer.

(1) To recover property alienated or forfeited, by sale or mortgage (Lev. xxv. 25).
(2) To deliver a kinsman taken into captivity, or sold into bondage (Gen. xiv. 4-16).
(3) To avenge the death of a murdered kinsman (Numb. xxxv. 12).
(4) To marry the widow of a deceased brother who was childless (Deut. xxv. 5-10 and Ruth).

In Job xix. 7 Job says "I cry out of wrong" but the margin says "violence". Indeed, Job was calling out for his kinsman in view of possible murder, and Moffatt has seen this, rendering the verse:

"I cry out 'murder'!—there is no reply;
I call for help, and get no justice . . . . .
My clansmen have abandoned me,
My friends are all estranged,
My kinsmen will not own me, and my guests ignore me . . . . .
Still, I know One to champion me at last . . . . .
My heart is pinning as I yearn to see him on my side, see Him ESTRANGED no longer" (Job xix. 7, 13, 14, 25, 27).

Job warns his failing friends, "Be ye afraid of the sword" (Job xix. 29), for the Kinsman-Redeemer was also The Avenger of blood.

In chapter xiv. we traveled with Job on his quest, and read:

> "If a man die, shall he live again? All the days of my appointed time will I wait, till my change come. Thou shalt call, and I will answer Thee: Thou wilt have a desire to the work of Thine hands" (Job xiv. 14, 15).

The need for the Kinsman-Redeemer Who should act as the Mediator is hinted at in the four occurrences of the word that means "to estrange".

"Mine acquaintances are verily estranged from me . . . . .
They that dwell in my house . . . . . count me for a stranger . . . . .
My breath is strange to my wife . . . . .
Mine eyes shall behold and NOT A STRANGER' (Job xix. 13, 15, 17, 27).

The words "and not another", margin Heb. "a stranger", carry the thought on from the failing kinsman to the Lord Himself.

We have made a big detour from our theme, Resurrection. The reader may wonder how the text should be read in verse 26 "and though after my skin", and in the margin, "After I shall awake". The R.V. ignores this alternative, and so do nearly all commentators.

We believe nevertheless that the margin in the A.V. contains the true record of the words of Job, and although it may seem a little like presumption on our part to express a very definite opinion, in view of the silence of so many scholars since the A.V. was first presented, we believe we have discovered a way of demonstrating its truth that will appeal to all readers. The words "my skin" are treated in the A.V. margin as though they were a part of the verb "to awake" and both of these words are expressed by the same letters in the Hebrew, ayin, vav and resh, written in English ur. Unaided reason fails to provide a solution, but a conviction that all Scripture is inspired, led us to collect every occurrence of the verb "to awake" in Job. The first occurrence of this verb is Job iii. 8, where we read:

> "Let them curse it that curse the day, who are ready to raise up their mourning."

The margin of the A.V. and the text of the R.V. read instead of "their mourning" the word "leviathan". Barnes believes that here is a reference to necromancy and the calling up for fierce monsters "from the vast deep". It is not our present concern to explore this problem, but only to register the joy of having made a definite start for the last reference to "awake" competes the correspondence, where again "leviathan" appears:

> "None . . . . . dare stir him (leviathan) up" (xli. 10).

The complete arrangement of the occurrences in Job of ur "to awake" or "to raise" are here presented. It will be seen that the passage in xiv. 12-14 demands its corresponding member, which is none other than the disputed passage in Job xix.:

The Hebrew ur, to raise, in Job.

A | iii. 8. Raise up leviathan.
B | viii. 6. Bildad's challenge.
C | xiv. 12-14.
"So man lieth down, and riseth not, till the heavens be no more they shall not awake, nor be raised out of their sleep . . . . . all the days of my appointed time will I wait till my change come."
D | xvii. 8. The innocent raised up against the hypocrite.
C | xix. 26, 27.
"After I shall AWAKE, though this body be destroyed, yet out of my flesh shall I see God."
B | xxxi. 29. Job's answer.
A | xli. 10. None dare raise him (leviathan) up.

Job's question "If a man die shall he live again?" is now vitally linked with the fact that he, the great Kinsman-Redeemer liveth, and will stand upon the earth at the latter day. Job advances no theories as to identity or persistence of being; he simply affirms his belief in this Redeemer to be such, that he can say "Whom I shall see for myself". And further, just as Job rejoiced to believe that God had a yearning desire toward the work of His hands, so he links his own desire:

> "Though my reins be consumed within me", or as Moffatt renders these words:

> "My heart is pining as I yearn to see Him on my side", or as Dr. Bullinger puts it in his metrical version:

> "Mine eyes shall see Him—Stranger, now, no more: (For this) my inmost soul with longing waits."

We move on from this most blessed testimony to examine the message given to Job by Elihu, which it may be remembered we before introduced, but now, in the light of chapter xix. we approach with anticipation.

In chapter xxxiii., Elihu speaks to Job of one whose soul draweth near unto the grave, and gives this heartening testimony:

> "If there be a messenger with Him, an interpreter, one among a thousand, to shew unto man his uprightness: Then He is gracious unto him, and saith, Deliver him from going down to the pit: I have found a ransom" (Job xxxiii. 23, 24).

The Messenger (Heb. malak). This word is translated "ambassador", "angel" and "messenger" in the A.V. In the book of Job itself malak occurs three times. Once it is translated "angel" (iv. 18) and twice "messenger" (i. 14; xxxiii. 23). There seems no reason to think that Elihu is speaking particularly of angelic ministry, but rather of the ministry of a "messenger" like Elihu himself, "made of the same clay". God uses means, and has actually raised the question "How shall they hear without a preacher?" (Rom. x. 14), which indicates the usual method of dealing with men by the Most High. This messenger is further called "an interpreter" (Heb. luts). The word luts, in the Arabic, means "to turn, twist; also to speak in obscure sentences". In the Hebrew it means "to scorn, to mock, to hold in derision", as an exclusive Hebrew would hold all "foreign speech". Accordingly it meant an ambassador from a foreign country (II Chron. xxxii. 31); and hence a "teacher" (Isa. xliii. 27), as well as an "interpreter". "They knew not that Joseph understood them, for he spake unto them by an interpreter" (Gen. xlii. 23).

Luts becomes in the Hebrew melitsah where it can mean "a mocking song" or a "taunting proverb", retaining its original meaning of treating a foreigner as a barbarian (Hab. ii. 6), or it can mean "interpretation" in the second sense, as in Prov. i. 6. Such a messenger, such an interpreter, mediator or daysman, Elihu describes as "one among a thousand". Job was acquainted with this figure, having used it himself, for he had complained:

> "If He will contend with him, he cannot answer Him one of a thousand" (ix. 3).

Dr. Samuel Lee cites an Arabic proverb which reads:

> "But as for me, a thousand of them are as one, and one as a thousand, if matter distresses."

Such a faithful messenger and mediator is looked upon as rare and all the more to be prized and heeded. Now what will be the "message" of this messenger?

> "To show unto man his uprightness" (xxxiii. 23).

How are we to understand this passage? Shall we say "His" uprightness, meaning God's, or "his" meaning man's? When first we considered this phrase in the light of the epistle to the Romans we wrote "The pronoun 'his' refers not to Job, but to 'Him' of Whom the message speaks". Ultimately this is true, but there is something more to be learned, which will be profitable to include. Supposing we leave the passage to teach that the Gospel preacher shows unto man "his own uprightness", surely, if this is seen in the searchlight of the throne of God, all self boasting must vanish.

Now this is exactly what happens, as recorded in this book of Job. The book opens with the description of Job "perfect and upright", and one would at first think that such a character was indeed righteous. Throughout the book Job maintained his integrity. Job ii. 3 was attested by God Himself, and Job himself said:

> "Till I die I will not remove mine integrity from me. My righteousness I hold fast, and will not let it go" (Job xxvii. 5, 6).

Reviewing his life, Job said "I put on righteousness, and it clothed me" (Job xxix. 14), and in chapter xxxi. he gives such a record of integrity that few since his day could hope to equal, and calls down judgment upon his own head if he had transgressed in his walk in life saying:

> "Let thistles grow instead of wheat, and cockle instead of barley. The words of Job are ended" (Job xxxi. 40).

Upon this, his three friends ceased to answer Job, because he was righteous in his own eyes (Job xxxii. 1), and if one analyses the argument put forward by these three, we can understand Job's vehement repudiation of underhanded licentiousness or dishonesty. He repudiated the suggestion of hypocrisy (Job xiii. 16), and said "I know that I shall be justified" (Job xiii. 18). There is one man who could have stood with Job in this claim of righteousness, and that is Paul, who wrote of himself:

> "Touching the righteousness which is in the law, blameless" (Phil. iii. 6).

Yet when Paul was 'shown' what his 'righteousness' looked like in the presence of the living God, he gladly discarded all such claim, and stood in the righteousness provided by grace, through faith in Christ, and Job eventually comes to the same place:

> "I have heard of Thee by the hearing of the ear: but now mine eye seeth Thee: Wherefore I abhor myself, and repent in dust and ashes" (Job xlii. 5, 6).

Returning for a moment to Job xxxiii. 23, 24, we now see the consequence of the message which revealed a Ransom, and consisted of the need of a righteousness greater than any obedience of fallen man could ever achieve. Here is the consequence:

> "Then He is gracious unto him, and saith, Deliver him from going down to the pit: I have found a ransom. His flesh shall be fresher than a child's; he shall return to the days of his youth" (Job. xxxiii. 24, 25).

Where we inserted the "H" in verse 23, reading "His uprightness" we can blessedly do so in verse 26:

> "And he shall see His face with joy: for He will render unto man His righteousness."

We have spent some time on these passages in Job, and have seen that Resurrection is the answer that covers all man's need and all God's requirements, for it assumes the provision of a Ransom, and the acceptance of the believer, and focuses attention on the Kinsman-Redeemer, Who, said Job, "After I shall awake, though worms destroy this body, yet in my flesh shall I see God".

The Psalms.

We pass from the testimony of Job to the Psalms, for although no explicit statement concerning Resurrection may be discovered by a superficial reading, there is evidence awaiting us that the Psalms like Job, ask and answer this basic question:

> "If a man die, shall he live again?"

Psa. i. compares and contrasts two kinds of men "the righteous" and "the ungodly", an concludes saying:

> "For the Lord knoweth the way of the righteous: but the way of the ungodly shall perish" (Psa. i. 6).

The expression "The Lord knoweth" means something more than mere knowledge of an event, for surely "the Lord knoweth" the way of the ungodly also. To know here, means to know with approval:

> "The Lord is good, a stronghold in the day of trouble: and He knoweth them that trust in Him" (Nah. i. 7).

When the foolish virgins were told "I know you not" (Matt. xxv. 12), or as in Matt. vii. 23, "Then will I profess unto them, I never knew you", disapproval, not lack of information, is implied.

We can often interpret a word, by observing its opposite. The two words 'knoweth' and 'perish' compel us to see in the Divine approval a hope of resurrection, even though it be but implied and not stated.

Turning to Psa. ii., we find that the words "This day have I begotten Thee" (verse 7) are referred to resurrection by the N.T. Thus the Apostle Paul testified:

> "But God raised Him from the dead:
> He was seen . . . . .
> We declare . . . . .
> God hath fulfilled . . . . .
> In that He hath raised up Jesus again,
> As it is also written in the second Psalm,
> Thou art My Son, this day have I begotten Thee" (Acts xiii. 30-33).

This reference to Psa. ii. is followed, in Acts xiii. 34-37, by quoting from Isa. lv. 3, "The sure mercies of David", which the Apostle couples with Psa. xvi. 10:

> "I have set the Lord always before me:
> Because He is at my right hand, I shall not be moved.
> Therefore my heart is glad, and my glory rejoiceth:
> My flesh also shall rest in hope.
> For Thou wilt not leave My soul in hell;
> Neither wilt Thou suffer Thine Holy One to see corruption.
> Thou wilt show Me the path of life:
> In Thy presence is fullness of joy;
> At Thy right hand there are pleasures for ever more" (Psa. xvi. 8-11).

The Companion Bible gives a structure of this passage which is useful:

A | Jehovah at My right hand (Life).
B | Rest in hope. Positive (Death).
B | Not left in Sheol. Negative (Resurrection).
A | I at His right hand (Ascension).

In the Psalm that follows, namely the seventeenth, there is a vivid contrast between the men of this world, and the believer, in relation to this question of the hope of resurrection. David speaks of:

> ". . . . . men of the world, which have their portion in this life, and whose belly Thou fillest with Thy hid treasure. They are full of children, and leave the rest of their substance to their babes" (Psa. xvii. 14), in contrast with those whose hope goes beyond to the day of resurrection. The word "world" here is the Hebrew word heled which speaks of transitoriness, as in Ps. xxxix. 5 and lxxxix. 47:

> "Behold, Thou hast made my days as an handbreadth; and mine age is as nothing before Thee."
> "Remember how short my time is."

This second reference is followed by the question:

> "What man is he that liveth, and shall not see death?
> Shall He deliver his soul from the hand of the grave?", showing that resurrection is in view once more.

The argument of David may be exhibited somewhat as follows:

A | Portion in this life. Transitory.
B | Belly filled. Their treasure.
B | With children. Satisfied.
A | Portion in this life. Left to babes.

The reader will doubtless acknowledge that the meaning of this section of the Psalm is not too obvious, but light comes when we discover that the word "full" is the Hebrew saba and the word "satisfied" in verse 15 is the Hebrew sabea which is but another form of the same word. Thus we can now take our exhibition of the argument a stage further:

(1) Men of the world—Satisfied with position, here.
(2) As for me—Satisfied with Thy likeness, there.

From earliest times, and among pagan, philosopher and believer, the desire for immortality is embedded in the nature of man. If he is an unbeliever, he will be attracted by the specious doctrines that are propounded as substitutes for the gift of immortality at Resurrection. One pathetic attempt to attain some form of immortality is here before us, an immortality by proxy, a frantic desire to have an heir "to perpetuate the name".

No.3. The Witness of the Old Testament.
pp. 64 - 67

What is the answer of God to this cold and impersonal conception of immortality?

> "This their way is their folly: yet their posterity approve their sayings. Selah." (Psalm xlix. 13).
> "As for me, I will behold Thy face in righteousness: I shall be satisfied, when I awake, with Thy likeness" (Psa. xvii. 15).

The word translated "behold" is the Hebrew chazah and is used by Job when he says:

> "Yet in my flesh shall I see God > Whom I shall see for myself" (Job xix. 26, 27), in connection with the Lord as the Kinsman-Redeemer. To awake in the likeness of the Saviour, sums up the hope of all callings. Those thus raised may find their inheritance in the earth, the New Jerusalem, or "far above all", but He will be "The Firstborn among many brethren", and they are predestinated to be conformed to His image (Rom. viii. 29). The great resurrection chapter, I Cor. xv. says:

> "And as we have borne the image of the earthy, we shall also bear the image of the heavenly" (I Cor. xv. 49).

This will take place when this mortal shall put on immortality and death will be swallowed up of life.

The Prophets.

We have entered, by faith, into the joy of the Psalmist, who said "I shall be satisfied, when I awake with Thy likeness". Let us now turn to Isa. liii. 10, 11, and by the self same faith, enter the joy of our Lord.

> "When Thou shalt make His soul an offering for sin,
> He shall see His seed,
> He shall prolong His days,
> And the pleasure of the Lord shall prosper in His hand.
> He shall see of the travail of His soul, and shall be SATISFIED" (Isa. liii. 10, 11).

Isa. liii. leaves us in no doubt but that the wounds, the bruises and the stripes whereby we are healed, were sufferings that ended in death.

> "He was cut off of the land of the living.
> He made His grave with the wicked, and with the rich in his death" (verses 8, 9).

His soul, which was made an offering for sin, was "poured out unto death". Yet the same passage says:

> "He shall see His seed, He shall prolong His days", which can only be possible in resurrection. In the Psalm of the King (Psa. xxi.) we read:

> "He asked life of Thee, and Thou gavest it Him, even length of days for ever and ever" (Psa. xxi. 4), which can only be realized in resurrection.

> "He shall see of the travail of His soul, and be satisfied."

Though we assemble all the words used in Holy Writ to describe the sufferings and the death of the Son of God we can never, at least in this life, apprehend their depth. Yet He Who bore our sins and suffered the just for the unjust, will actually "see of the travail of His soul and be SATISFIED"! Let it be observed, that He is not said to see the travail of His soul, but to see "of" the travail, to see the fruits of His sufferings, in other words "To see His seed . . . . . and be satisfied".

At the close of Daniel's prophecy, we learn of a resurrection in which Daniel himself is assured that he will "stand at the end of the days":

> "And at that time shall Michael stand up, the great prince which standeth for the children of Thy people: and there shall be a time of trouble, such as never was since there was a nation even to that same time: and at that time thy people shall be delivered, every one that shall be found written in the book.
>
> And many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt.
>
> And they that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament: and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars for ever and ever.
>
> But thou, O Daniel, shut up the words, and seal the book, even to the time of the end" (Dan. xii. 1-4).

Here is confessedly a passage of extreme difficulty, and the only way to feel assured of our interpretation is to see it squarely in its setting. These words quoted from Dan. xii., are the closing words of the heavenly visitor who appears in chapter x., before whose presence, Daniel fell on his face toward the ground. Let us see whether we can find some outstanding words or term that will link this great passage, including Dan. xii., together as a whole. As one reads through the insistent repetition of the word "stand" variously translated "stood", "stand up", "remained", "confirm", "continue", "establish", "set forth" and "withstand" which translate the Hebrew word amad, and which occurs 28 times in these chapters, one realizes that, as Daniel is told in the last verse of the book:

> "But go thou thy way till the end be: for thou shalt rest, and stand in thy lot at the end of the days" (Dan. xii. 13).

This word obviously cannot be ignored.

Michael, and conflicting kings, a raiser of taxes and a vile person "stand up", and the conflict ends with a time of trouble such as never has been known nor ever shall be again. Four separate attempts are revealed in which the evil One attempts to seize the opportunity to put his own man in office:

> "But out of a branch of her roots shall one stand up in his estate." "He shall not be found."
> "Then shall stand up in his estate a raiser of taxes." "He shall be destroyed."
> "And in his estate shall stand up a vile person."
> "But in his estate shall he honour the God of forces (or munitions). Yet he shall come to his end" (Dan. xi. 7, 19, 20, 21, 38, 45).

Over against this repeated abortive effort Daniel and his fellows are placed. During these terrible antichristian times, some will forsake the holy covenant, but they that understand among the people shall instruct many; some will be tried and purged "to make them white" (Dan. xi. 30-35). It is to this tried and tested company that Dan. xii. 3 refers:

> "And they that be wise (or are teachers, cf. 'instruct many' [Dan. xi. 33]) shall shine as the brightness of the firmament: and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars for ever and ever."

The references to "the book" and "the words" in Dan. xii. 1, 4 and 9 do not speak so much of the book of Daniel as a whole, but the book of life in which the overcomer's name has been written (Rev. iii. 5; xx. 15), and is probably the "Book of remembrance" spoken of in Mal. iii. 16 in a similar day of trial. No interpretation of Dan. xii. can be acceptable that ignores the context of the preceding chapter, and the peculiar character of the times in which these events occur prevent any extension, except in a very wide sense, to the subject of "the blessed hope" of the believer. As we cannot occupy space enough in this article to present the book of Daniel as a whole, we must perforce leave the matter with the hope that enough has been exhibited to point the way for any fuller and more intimate research. Let us bring our examination of the testimony of the O.T. to a close with the wondrous words of Hosea xiii. 14, words which were lifted out and placed in the conclusion of I Cor. xv., a chapter that must necessarily be laid under tribute when we come to the testimony of the N.T.:

> "I will ransom them from the power of the grave:
> I will redeem them from death: O death, I will be thy plagues; O grave, I will be thy destruction: repentance shall be hid from Mine eyes" (Hosea xiii. 14).

Redemption or Ransom in Gospel preaching is often limited to the forgiveness of sins, to conversion, salvation and other blessed features of redeeming love, but if sin only were touched and the bondage of death forgotten, then we should be, as the Apostle exclaims, "of all men the most miserable". In Heb. i. 3 we read that the Saviour "purged our sins" and in Heb. ii. 15 He delivers those who through the fear of death were all their lifetime subject to bondage. In the last epistle he wrote, the Apostle Paul speaks of Christ "Who hath abolished death, and hath brought life and immortality to light through the gospel" (II Tim. i. 10). Elihu told Job of a "ransom" that delivered man from the pit (Job xxxiii. 23-25), and so Hosea says of the Lord:

> "I will ransom thee from the power of the grave."

But this is not all:

> "I will redeem thee from death", for the Saviour said of His sheep "They shall never perish", and of those who attain to the resurrection in connection with eternal life, it is written "Neither can they die any more" (Luke xx. 36). Death moreover is the last enemy that shall be destroyed:

> "O death, I will be thy plagues;
> O grave, I will be thy destruction", and of this blessed consummation the Lord declared:

> "Repentance is hid from mine eyes."

There are types of resurrection which we have not included in our survey and many allusions and statements in Prophecy and Psalm that could supplement what is here presented. We have however, a richer field to explore, namely the N.T. where type, prophecy and promise find their fulfillment in the Person and Work of Him, Who at a graveside could declare:

> "I am the Resurrection and the Life."

No.4. The Witness of the Gospels.
pp. 81 - 86

We have passed in review some of the answers which the O.T. gives to the age old question "If a man die, shall he live again?" There are other types and somewhat obscure references which we have passed over, as our space is limited and our purpose simple. It may seem a strange question to ask, "With what books of the N.T. shall we start?" The natural answer will be "With the Gospels, of course". Before we do this there are one or two facts that must be recognized. The notes in Matt xxvii. 8 and xxviii. 15 "unto this day" are in harmony with the accepted view that Matthew's Gospel was not written until some years after the events recorded. It is even possible that the first literature of the N.T. was one of the early epistles of Paul. It is morally certain that the thousands who believed on and after the day of Pentecost, never saw one of the Gospels, for only seven weeks intervened. When Luke wrote his gospel he set forth in order a declaration of things which were already most surely believed among them, and in which his hearer had already been instructed.

The reader will know that with the best will in the world a complete harmony of the four Gospels is impossible. There are gaps in the narrative that anyone who had passed through the experience of the time could easily fill, but which remain unexplained and inexplicable to us at this later period. It is common knowledge that John wrote his Gospel last of all, but instead of seizing the opportunity to harmonize the accounts of the Resurrection given by Matthew, Mark and Luke, he supplies items of information that add further problems rather than reducing their number.

Neither we at a later date, nor the primitive church at the beginning, based their belief in the resurrection of the Lord on the Gospels, they based it squarely upon the accredited testimony of eyewitnesses, who in some cases suffered imprisonment for their faith, and in some cases sealed it with their blood. Instead of this being a disturbing factor, it should be an assurance that there was in the writing of these Gospels no collusion to deceive, and no attempt to produce an harmony by arrangement. The very so-called discrepancies show how innocent each evangelist must be held in this respect. It will further be observed that Luke actually tells us that his Gospel was:

> "Even as they delivered them unto us, which from the beginning were eyewitnesses" (Luke i. 2), and the reader will remember that in I Cor. xv., that great chapter on the Resurrection, the Apostle's opening testimony is to review the witness of Cephas, the twelve, above five hundred brethren at once, James, all the apostles, and last of all his own personal testimony. Whatever difficulties therefore, that there may be in the Gospel narratives, the fact of the resurrection is entirely unquestioned. We quote some helpful words from Appendix 156 of The Companion Bible:

> "That the first day of each of the three feasts, Passover, Pentecost and Tabernacles was 'a holy convocation', a 'sabbath' on which no servile work was to be done. 'That sabbath' and 'The High Day' of John 19:31 was the 'holy convocation', the first day of the feast, which quite overshadowed the ordinary weekly sabbath. It was called by the Jews yom tov (Good day) and this is the greeting on that day throughout Jewry down to the present time. This great sabbath, having been mistaken from the earliest times for the weekly sabbath, has led to all the confusion."

To this we may add the failure to realize that John uses Gentile time instead of Jewish; and the failure to remember that a Jewish day ends at sunset, has added to the confusion. We who read the four Gospels today, are already in possession of the history of the Acts of the Apostles, and of all the epistles, and our faith can no more be shaken by the inability to make a harmony of the four Gospels, than was the faith of the members of the early church. Many believe and teach that Paul borrowed from Luke when he wrote of the institution of the Lord's supper in I Cor. xi. 23-26 but the truth appears to be just the opposite. Luke had no first hand knowledge, he did not partake of the last supper, he wrote of that which had been "delivered" by "eye-witnesses". Paul, likewise, did not make one of the company that partook of that last supper, but he did not depend on the witness of others, he claimed that he had:

> "Received of the Lord that which also I delivered unto you."

The doctrinal significance of the resurrection belongs to the Epistles; the tragic yet triumphant history of that great event belongs to the Gospels. With this preparation, we turn to the Gospels to gather what they teach and what lessons we should learn concerning the blessed fact that "The Lord is risen indeed".

It is natural, when opening the Gospel of Matthew, to turn to the sign of the prophet Jonah given in chapter xii., but it should be remembered that while it speaks of "the Son of Man" being "three days and three nights in the heart of the earth", Matt. xii. 39, 40 does not reveal that at the end of that time He would rise from the dead. That is not a subject of revelation until the second half of Matthew is reached.

Jonah is mentioned nine times in the Gospels, and the point that is made at the mention of his name is that the Ninevites repented at his preaching, but a "Greater than Jonah" had been rejected (Matt. xi. 20-24; xii. 38-41).

The resurrection is not a subject spoken of in Matthew until the first half of the book has been closed. This may call for a note of explanation, and will be more easily visualized by seeing the structure.

Matthew

A | Genealogy.
B | Born King of the Jews.
C | Voice from heaven. threefold temptation of King.
D | From that time . . . . . began.

* * * * * * *

D | From that time . . . . . began.
C | Voice from heaven. threefold agony of Priest.
B | This is Jesus King of the Jews.
A | Resurrection.

This structure is not complete, but it throws into prominence the two time periods "From that time . . . . . began" (Matt. iv. 17 and xvi. 21). If the Lord "from that time began" to speak of His death and resurrection then He could not have spoken about it before, of which Peter's immediate reaction, xvi. 22, "Be it far from Thee Lord" is evidence enough.

> "From that time forth began Jesus to show unto His disciples, how that He must go unto Jerusalem, and suffer many things of the elders and chief priests and scribes, and be killed, and be raised again the third day" (Matt. xvi. 21).

In Matt. xvii. this forecast is given once again, with one addition,

> "The Son of Man shall be betrayed into the hands of men, and they shall kill Him, and the third day He shall be raised again" (Matt. xvii. 22, 23).

For the third time, with even fuller detail, He spoke to His disciples:

> "Behold, we go up to Jerusalem, and the Son of Man shall be betrayed unto the chief priests, and unto the scribes, and they shall condemn Him to death, and shall deliver Him to the Gentiles to mock, and to scourge, and to crucify Him, and the third day He shall rise again" (Matt. xx. 18, 19).

At the first revelation in Matt. xvi., Peter objected. At the second the disciples "were exceeding sorry"; at the third the mother of Zebedee's children came seeking favours for her sons in the future kingdom! The enemies of the Lord remembered that "that deceiver said while He was yet alive, After three days I will rise again" (Matt. xxvii. 63), but His disciples seem never to have grasped the significance of His words, for the two disciples with whom the Lord talked on the way to Emmaus could report how the chief priests and the rulers had delivered Him to be condemned to death, and had crucified Him. They could even add:

> "And beside all this, today is the third day since these things were done" (Luke xxiv. 20, 21).

They even recounted the report of the open tomb, the vision of angels and the declaration that He had been seen alive, without being conscious of their ignorance and lack of faith. What was Peter's attitude? "I go fishing." What was the response of the other apostles? "They say unto him, we also go with thee" (John xxi. 3). The attitude of the followers of the Saviour can be summed up in the words:

> "Then all the disciples forsook Him and fled" (Matt. xxvi. 56).

There can be no doubt that the disciples were a dispirited, disillusioned, timid and disbanded set of ineffectual pessimists.

Then a miracle happened, for nothing short of a miracle is an adequate explanation of the mighty change that came over them all. From being a scattered, timid, disheartened crowd, they were united in their stand FOR the fact of the resurrection and AGAINST the combined opposition, even unto death and imprisonment, of Rome, the Sanhedrin, Herod and all vested interests. Into the midst of the gathering to whom those who had met the Lord on the way to Emmaus gave their testimony, suddenly appeared the risen Lord Himself. They were terrified and thought they saw a spirit, but "He showed Himself after His passion by many infallible proofs", and in this case, He showed them His hands and His feet, and ate a piece of broiled fish, and an honeycomb. Some rather crude deductions have been made from the fact that the Lord did not say "flesh and blood" but "flesh and bones" in this demonstration, but if "blood" was actually excluded, the idea of eating food of any kind wants a deal of explaining, but more serious still, a precious truth is veiled by this speculation. It is assumed that the normal phrase would have been "Flesh and blood" but this is not so. The normal phrase in the O.T. is "flesh and bone". Adam said of Eve "This is now bone of my bones and flesh of my flesh" (Gen. ii. 23) but Adam was not satisfying himself that Eve was not a "spirit". He meant something more:

> "And Laban said to him (Jacob) Surely thou art my bone and my flesh . . . . . thou art my brother" (Gen. xxix. 14, 15).

Laban had no idea of disproving that Jacob was "a spirit", he was claiming him as a kinsman. So, with Abimelech in Judges ix. 2 and David in II Samuel xix. 12, 13; I Chron. xi. 1. The eating of the fish and honeycomb was a sufficient proof that He was bodily present, the "flesh and bone" would immediately help those who heard the words realize that here stood, the "Kinsman-Redeemer" Whom Job said would stand upon the earth in the latter days. We have no conception what the body of His glory will be like or how it will be composed. Luke xxiv. does not answer that question, but it provides one of the "infallible proofs" that brought about the mighty change in the attitude of the apostles. The skepticism of Thomas was overruled to provide a crowning testimony, for none exceeded his adoration, when he cried "My Lord and my God".

The testimony of John's Gospel to the Resurrection demands a study to itself, and we submit that the following items point to a wonderful revelation of doctrine. We start off by reminding ourselves that John's acknowledged purpose, and which led to the selection of material that he made, was to lead the believer to "Life through His Name" (John xx. 31). This life is vitally related to Christ as "The Son of God". Let us now go back to the opening chapter.

John i. 1-18 is in the nature of a prologue, and is divided into two parts:

John i. 1-4.	The Word before time.
John i. 5-18.	The Word made flesh, in time.

As the "Word" in the beginning, a Maker of all things, He had life in Himself, "In Him was life". Inherent life is the sole prerogative of "God that made the world". "The world was made by Him" (John i. 10) and all things therein ("all things" were made by Him), "seeing that He is Lord of heaven and earth, dwelleth not in temples made with hands, neither is worshipped with men's hands, AS THOUGH HE NEEDED ANYTHING, seeing He giveth to all life, and breath, and all things" (Acts xvii. 24, 25).

We then come to John i. 14 and read:

> "And the Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us, (and we beheld His glory, the glory as of the only begotten of the Father), full of grace and truth . . . . . and of His fullness have all we received" (John i. 14-16).

Keeping these words in mind, let us turn to chapter v. There the Son of God declared that He could "do nothing of Himself, but what He seeth the Father do", and in verse 26, we have a statement that makes us look back to chapter i. 4 "In Him was life".

> "Verily, verily, I say unto you, the hour is coming, and now is, when the dead shall hear the voice of the Son of God: and they that hear shall live. FOR as the Father hath LIFE IN HIMSELF; so He hath given to the Son to have LIFE IN HIMSELF; and hath given Him authority to execute judgment also, because He is the Son of Man" (John v. 25, 26).

This life in Himself, as the Son of Man, is connected in the context with the resurrection of the dead, the resurrection of life, of all that are in the graves. As the Word, before time began, He had life in Himself. As the begotten Son, having "emptied" Himself (Phil. ii. 7), all "fullness" on behalf of His redeemed people dwelt in Him, and the "life in Himself" was given Him on our account, and constitutes the gift of eternal life that is "In His Son", with the result that he that hath the SON "hath LIFE". So, in chapter vi. where the Manna is in view, He said:

> "As the LIVING Father hath sent Me, and I LIVE by the Father: so he that eateth Me, even he shall LIVE by Me" (John vi. 57).

No.5. The Witness of the Gospels.
pp. 101, 102

In John x. where the Saviour said "The good Shepherd giveth His LIFE for the sheep" (John x. 11) he also said:

> "Therefore doth My Father love Me, because I lay down My LIFE, that I might take it again. No man taketh it from Me . . . . . I have power to lay it down, and I have power to take it again. This commandment have I received of My Father" (John x. 17, 18).

The life given, the life laid down, the life taken again, this is "life eternal", the gift of God. So, when John wrote his first epistle, instead of going back to "the beginning", he said:

> "That which was from the beginning, which we have heard, which we have seen with our eyes, which we have looked upon, and our hands have handled of the Word of Life: (For the LIFE was manifested, and we have seen it, and bear witness, and show unto you THAT ETERNAL LIFE, which was with the Father, and was manifested unto us)" (I John i. 1, 2).

So again "God hath given unto us eternal life, and this life is in His Son. He that hath the SON hath LIFE" (I John v. 11, 12). John brings his epistle to a conclusion, much as he does his Gospel, where Thomas said "My Lord and my God". Here he writes:

"And we know that the Son of God is come	(step No. 1).
And hath given us an understanding	(step No. 2).
That we may know Him that is true	(step No. 3).
And we are in Him that is true	(step No. 4).
Even in His Son Jesus Christ	(step No. 5).
This is the True God	(step No. 6).
And Eternal Life."	(step No. 7).

Let there be no mistake as to the intention of John here. It is a characteristic of his to use the word translated "this", and a survey of its usage will leave us in no doubt as to his intention, when he says "This is the true God".

HOUTOS is the Greek word translated "this" and is found in John's writings as follows:

"The Word was God THE SAME (houtos) was in the beginning with God" (John i. 2).
"There was a man . . . . . THE SAME (houtos) came for a witness" (John i. 7).
"Upon Whom . . . . . the Spirit . . . . . THE SAME (houtos) is He" (John i. 33).
"His Son Jesus Christ THE SAME (houtos) is the true God" (I John v. 20).

We return to the Gospel of John for the crown and climax of its teaching concerning resurrection. He had declared in chapter v. that "the dead shall hear the voice of the Son of God", that all that were in the graves should hear His voice, and that they should come forth. This stupendous claim and its most blessed fulfillment constitute the seventh of the eight signs of John's Gospel. Lazarus, was not only dead, but dead and buried. Not only so but dead four days, and the tomb had to be sealed. When the Saviour said to Martha "Thy brother shall rise again", she replied, "I know that he shall rise again in the resurrection at the last day".

"Jesus saith unto her, I AM the resurrection and the life: he that believeth in Me, though he were dead, yet shall he live: and whosoever is living and believing in Me shall never die" (John xi. 25).

The "I AM" claims of Christ which come in the Gospel, have associations of life throughout:

I AM the Bread of Life (vi. 35, 48, 50, 51).
I AM the Light of the world . . . . . the light of life (viii. 12).
I AM the Door . . . . . I am come that they might have life (x. 9, 10).
I AM the Good Shepherd . . . . . I lay down My life (x. 14, 15).
I AM the Resurrection . . . . . the life (xi. 25).
I AM the Way, the Truth and the Life (xiv. 6).
I AM the Vine . . . . . fruit (xv. 5).

In each of these titles claimed by the Lord, we find life in association with Him and it is at the central one, that of the good Shepherd, that we read of the commandment He had received of the Father, to lay that life down, and to take it again. This life, laid down as the ransom for sin, taken again as the pledge of victory over the grave, that life, not the inherent life of Deity, but the life given to Him as "the Son of Man", is the eternal life, the gift of God, the life that cannot be disassociated from Him as "the Son".

We must leave the reader the blessed opportunity of assembling and studying all that is written in the four Gospels concerning the Resurrection and the Life, while we turn our attention to the testimony contained in the Acts of the Apostles.

No.5a. The Acts of the Apostles. Its testimony to the Resurrection.
pp. 102 - 106

Peter and the twelve.

Luke the writer of "the former treatise", i.e. Luke's Gospel, is careful to give a resumé of the last chapter of that Gospel, and to include a testimony to the resurrection, saying:

> "To whom also He showed Himself ALIVE after His passion by many infallible proofs, being seen of them forty days, and speaking of the things pertaining to the kingdom of God" (Acts i. 3).

They 'saw' and 'heard' and were convinced. They were also told to wait for the promise of the Father to be fulfilled, when they should "receive power, after that the Holy Ghost is come upon you: and ye shall be witnesses unto Me" (Acts i. 4, 8). When Peter would explain the happenings of the day of Pentecost, he linked it with the resurrection, saying concerning the prophecy of David:

> "He seeing this before spake of the resurrection of Christ . . . . . This Jesus hath God raised up, whereof we all are witnesses . . . . . He hath shed forth this, which ye now see and hear", concluding his testimony by saying:

> "Therefore let all the house of Israel know assuredly, that God hath made THAT SAME JESUS, Whom ye have crucified, both Lord and Christ" (Acts ii. 31-36).

On this day 3,000 were added to the number who already believed, and let it be remembered, that they were convinced by the Apostles' witness, for the Gospels were not then in existence. That this testimony was of God is made evident, for "many wonders and signs were done by the apostles" (Acts ii. 43) as a confirmation of their witness. The references to the resurrection that follow are:

(1) Those arising out of the healing of the lame man. (iii. 12-18, 22; iv. 2, 9-12, 33).
(2) Those arising out of the attitude of the Sadducees. (v. 17-32).
(3) Those arising out of the apprehension of Stephen. (vii. 52, 53, 56, 59).

In addition to the 3,000 of Acts ii. 41 who were convinced, we must include the 5,000 of Acts iv. 4 and the unspecified number of disciples, and priests who were obedient to the faith, and last but not least, the young man named Saul who heard and saw Stephen's testimony, and began to "kick against the goads" lest he succumb and believe.

To the testimony of the Apostle Paul, we must now give our close attention.

The Testimony of Paul.

The Acts of the Apostles is divided into two main features. In chapters i.-xii. Peter is the dominant character; in chapters xiii.-xxviii., Paul, with his distinctive ministry occupies the field, Peter's last appearance being in Acts xv., where he refers to a ministry entrusted to him "a good while ago" (Acts xv. 7). The section of the Acts that deals with Paul's ministry falls into three parts:

(1)	Acts vi. 12 - viii. 1.	Stephen and Paul.	\ Saul.
	ix. 1-22.	Saul's conversion.	/
(2)	xiii. - xxi.	Saul also called Paul.	Separated and free.
(3)	xxii. - xxviii.	Paul the Prisoner.	Imprisoned.

Saul of Tarsus was a citizen of no mean city, and a man who profited in the Jew's religion above many, who were his equals (Gal. i. 14), and who could write of himself in a later epistle, that if any man had confidence in the flesh, he could exceed them, "I more". From what has been written of Saul of Tarsus, there does not appear any likelihood that he, honoured as he was by the Sanhedrin, and having a reputation to maintain, would succumb to the claims of One Jesus of Nazareth, Who had (so far as he knew) ended his career on the cross, and whose followers were in the main the poor of the land and of little or no consequence. Yet, in an instant he believed! There are one or two steps indicated that led to this conversion. Stephen, as his murderers gnashed at him with their teeth, said:

> "Behold, I see the heavens opened, and the Son of Man standing on the right hand of God . . . . . And they stoned Stephen, calling upon God, and saying, Lord Jesus, receive my spirit, and he kneeled down, and cried with a loud voice, Lord, lay not this sin to their charge" (Acts vii. 55-60).

To all this, the young man named Saul was a witness. If we turn to Acts xiii. and note the way in which Paul summarized the history of Israel, we see how closely he followed Stephen's survey and application of this history of his people, introducing the typical stories of Joseph and Moses, who were both originally rejected, but at "the second time" acknowledged (Acts vii. 13, 35), and it would have been difficult for Saul to have disagreed with Stephen's application:

> "As your fathers did, so do ye" (Acts vii. 51).

It must have caused Saul great heart searchings as he realized that he was against a man who prayed for his murderers, and was for this rabble, who stoned a man whose face was as it had been the face of an angel (Acts vi. 15). The charge against Stephen was:

> "We have heard him say, that this Jesus of Nazareth shall destroy this place, and shall change the customs which Moses delivered us" (Acts xvi. 14), and this, his accusers called 'blasphemy' against the holy place and the law.

In Acts xxi. 28 Paul had to bear a similar charge laid against himself:

> "Men of Israel, help: This is the man, that teacheth all men everywhere against the people, and the law, and this place."

When we consider these parallels, we can the better appreciate something of the way in which the martyrdom of Stephen is linked with the conversion of Paul. The words "It is hard for thee to kick against the pricks" are omitted from Acts ix. 5 in the critical texts, but are found in Paul's own account in Acts xxvi. 14. Hosea iv. 16 is the figure that is in mind:

> "For Israel slideth back as a backsliding heifer."

The usual interpretation put upon the word "backslider" is one that slips or slides backwards "to lapse gradually from a spiritual or moral position formerly attained". This however cannot fit the case of Paul. He was not in danger of sliding back from the faith, he was "jibbing" as a horse or ox that moves restively sideways and backwards. Moffatt's rendering of Hosea iv. 16 is clearer:

> "Israel indeed is stubborn as a restive heifer."

The words translated "pricks" is better translated "goads", and the reference is to the long thin lance that was used with oxen at the plough, it being quite harmless while the oxen obeyed, but if they rebelled and jibbed, they themselves backed on to the goad. On the day of Pentecost, we read that some were "pricked in their heart, and said . . . . . what shall we do?" (Acts ii. 37) and they repented. In Acts vii. 54 we read that:

> "When they heard these things, they were cut to the heart, and they gnashed on him with their teeth."

Acts viii. 1 opens with the words:

> "And Saul was consenting unto his death."

When he described that moment, speaking on the stairs of the castle, he said:

> "And when the blood of thy martyr Stephen was shed, I also was standing by, and consenting unto his death, and kept the raiment of them that slew him" (xxii. 20).

To stifle the pricking of his conscience, and to show the Sanhedrin that he had no leanings to the new heresy, he desired letters to Damascus to the synagogues, that if he found any of this way, whether men or women, he might bring them bound unto Jerusalem, and on that road the miracle happened!

> "Who art thou, Lord . . . . . I am Jesus."
> "He was three days without sight . . . . . and straightway he preached Christ in the synagogues, that He is the Son of God" (Acts ix. 5, 9, 20).

Paul was, therefore, as were Peter and James and the twelve, an eye-witness:

> "Am I not an apostle? am I not free? have I not seen Jesus Christ our Lord?" (I Cor. ix. 1).
> "And last of all He was seen of me also, as of one born out of due time" (I Cor. xv. 8).

In his defence Paul rehearsed the visit of Ananias:

> "The God of our fathers hath chosen thee, that thou shouldest know His will, and see that Just One, and shouldest hear the voice of His mouth. For thou shalt be His witness unto all men of what thou hast seen and heard" (Acts xxii. 14, 15).

The whole of Paul's speech before Agrippa, recorded in Acts xxvi., should be read. Paul himself summed it up in verses 22, 23:

> "Having therefore obtained help of God, I continue unto this day, witnessing both to small and great, saying none other things than those which the prophets and Moses did say should come: That Christ should suffer, and that He should be the first that should rise from the dead, and should show light unto the people, and to the Gentiles."

The complete testimony of Paul to the Resurrection, as recorded in the Acts, is found in ix. 6, 20, 22, 29; xiii. 26-43; xvii. 3, 18, 30, 31, 32; xxii. 3-21; xxiii. 6-9, 11; xxiv. 10-21; xxv. 19; xxvi. 4-32; xxviii. 20.

This witness to the resurrection is overwhelming. Not only was it preached in synagogue and assembly, it was publicly affirmed before governors and kings, even as the Apostle said "This thing was not done in a corner". Pilate seems to have mocked the Pharisees when they demanded that the sepulcher be sealed, lest His disciples come by night and steal Him away, saying to them "Ye have a watch, go your way make it as sure as you can". When the watch reported that the stone had been rolled away and the body of the Saviour was gone, the assembled elders bribed the soldiers to say "His disciples came by night, and stole Him away while we slept", as if that dispirited, disheartened little band of men and women could have attempted such a thing! Every believer since that day can rebut all criticism by following the example of the man born blind:

> "One thing I know, that, whereas I was blind, now I see" (John ix. 25).

Peter who said "I go fishing", Thomas who said "I will not believe", Mary who stood weeping, the five hundred brethren who saw the risen Christ at one time, Saul of Tarsus and the thousands converted in the early Acts, could all, individually and collectively say "We are witnesses", and use the word martus (our word "martyr"), which means a witness ready if need be to seal his testimony with his life's blood, as many did. The gospel preached, the reformation that followed, the epistles and the Apocalypse would have had no existence, apart from the overwhelming conviction that Christ had risen from the dead.

No.6. The Witness of the Epistles.
pp. 121 - 127

There are, in the N.T. twenty-one epistles. Fourteen by Paul, three by John, two by Peter, and one each by James and Jude. Jude so closely follows the witness of II Pet. ii., that we can allow his epistle to pass, and II & III John are too short and too personal to provide a witness to the Resurrection, except by implication. Let us take the testimony of James, Peter, John and Paul in their order.

The Witness of James.

> "There is little doubt . . . . . that the writer was James 'the Lord's brother' (Gal. 1:19), he who was one of the 'pillars' (Gal. 2:9), he who gave the 'judgment' of the apostles and elders of the church at Jerusalem (Acts 15:13, 19)." The Companion Bible, p.1847.

This "brother" of the Lord wrote:

> "My brethren, have not the faith of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Lord of glory, with respect of persons" (ii. 1).

Other believers were to James "my brethren", but He Who in the days of His flesh was "the brother of James", is referred to by him as "The Lord of glory"; yet no writer in the N.T. is so severely practical as James. Later he urges patience "unto the coming of the Lord" (v. 7, 8), so while the doctrine or the historic fact of the resurrection does not appear, James evinces no hesitation in acknowledging the Lord, Who could have no second coming had He remained in the tomb.

The Witness of Peter.

Peter, however, introduces the Resurrection in the opening of this epistle saying:

> "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, which according to His abundant mercy hath begotten us again unto a lively hope by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead, to an inheritance incorruptible, and undefiled, and that fadeth not away, reserved in heaven for you" (I Pet. i. 3, 4).

The words "begotten", "lively", "incorruptible", "in heaven" are meaningless and cruel, if Christ be not risen from the dead. Neither could Peter urge patient endurance of manifold temptations in view of "the appearing of Jesus Christ" if Christ had not risen from the dead. In the same chapter Peter affirms that the spirit of Christ that was in the prophets:

> "testified beforehand the sufferings of Christ, and the glory that should follow" (I Pet. i. 11), and links this testimony on to the preaching of the gospel. Those who believe in God, believe that "He raised Him (Christ) up . . . . . and gave Him glory" (I Pet. i. 21). While Christ was "put to death in the flesh", He was "quickened by the Spirit . . . . . the resurrection of Jesus Christ, Who is gone into heaven, and is on the right hand of God: angels and authorities and powers being made subject unto Him" (I Pet. iii. 18-22). The second epistle of Peter is largely occupied with the Second Coming, and while it may not actually speak of the resurrection, necessarily pre-supposes it.

The Witness of John's Epistles.

Before any testimony that may be given in John's epistle to the resurrection, there can be no doubt but that he would know whether it was the Lord Himself that had appeared to the little gathering as recorded in the Gospel. Of this appearance he wrote:

> "That which was from the beginning, which we have HEARD, which we have SEEN with our eyes, which we have LOOKED UPON, and our hands have HANDLED, of the Word of life" (I John i. 1).

This same One is declared by John to be our "Advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous" (I John ii. 1).

> "Beloved, now are we the sons of God, and it doth not yet appear what we shall be: but we know that, when He shall appear, we shall be like Him: for we shall SEE Him as HE IS" (I John iii. 2).

In I John iv. 2 the Antichrist does not confess that Jesus Christ IS COME in the flesh (Moffatt "incarnate" I John iv. 2, 3). In II John 7, the reference is to the Second Coming. In the first reference, the verb is in the perfect participle "has come", whereas in the second reference, the verb is the present participle "is coming". This naturally implies the resurrection. The fullest testimony to the resurrection however, whether as to the historic fact of the resurrection, or to the doctrines associated with it, is found in the epistles of Paul.

We will not debate here, the question of the authorship of the epistle to the Hebrews, this we have done in the Alphabetical Analysis, Part two, pages 102-105, and the validity of its testimony to the resurrection does not depend upon its human authorship. Again, the order in which the epistles of Paul appeared has a great bearing upon the matter of callings and other dispensational differences, but the testimony to the resurrection is just as valid whether it be in Galatians, a pre-prison epistle, or Ephesians, a testimony of the Lord's prisoner. We shall see when examining II Timothy that while the Lord is "of the seed of David", His resurrection can have separate consequences, as the Apostle suggests saying:

> "Remember that Jesus Christ of the seed of David was raised from the dead according to my Gospel" (II Tim. ii. 8).

The testimony of Galatians.

Elsewhere we have given our reason for believing that Galatians is the first of Paul's epistles, and with this epistle we propose to open our examination of Paul's epistolary testimony to the resurrection. We meet it in the very first verse:

> "Paul, an apostle, (not of men, neither by man, but by Jesus Christ, and God the Father, Who raised Him from the dead)" (i. 1).

In the opening testimony, both the apostleship and the gospel preached by Paul is involved; both stand or fall together.

> "I certify you, brethren, that the Gospel which was preached of me is not after man. For I neither received it of man, neither was I taught it, but by the revelation of Jesus Christ" (i. 12).

The emphasis however in Galatians is placed on "a Tree" (iii. 13), the Cross (vi. 14) and the Crucifixion (ii. 20; v. 24). Before we come to the resurrection as a doctrine, we must be assured that the death of the cross was an integral feature in the plan of redemption, and that is forever settled by this initial epistle.

The testimony of I Thessalonians.

The "patience of hope" enjoined I Thess. i. 3 is expressed in i. 10 as waiting for God's Son from heaven "Whom He raised from the dead". After two chapters of loving interest and manifest care, the Apostle returns to the question of resurrection, this time, not so much to prove the historic fact of Christ's resurrection, but to comfort the heart of the believer as to his own participation in that glorious deliverance. "If we believe that Jesus died and rose again" is the spring and ground of what follows. The words "will God bring with Him" cannot refer to the saints coming with the Lord from heaven for the next verse tells us "the dead in Christ shall rise first: Then we which are alive and remain shall be caught up together WITH THEM . . . . . to meet the Lord in the air: and so shall we ever be with the Lord" (I Thess. iv. 17). "The coming of our Lord Jesus Christ WITH all His Saints" of I Thess. iii. 13 cannot refer to the church, for we have already seen that 'together' those that sleep and those that remain, await the coming of the Lord from heaven to the air. The reference is to Zech. xiv. 5 and to Jude 14:

> "And the Lord my God shall come, and all the saints (or holy ones, i.e. angels) with thee."

We read in Deut. xxxiii. 2 that at Sinai "He came with ten thousands of saints" which are, according to Psa. lxviii. 17 "thousands of angels . . . . . as in Sinai". Acts vii. 53 and Gal. iii. 19 reveal that the law of Sinai was given by the ministry of angels. To return however to our main quest, the matter of the resurrection, let us take this opportunity of noting the references in Paul's epistles to "sleep" as a figure of death, and "waking" as a figure of resurrection.

> I Cor. xv. 6, 18, 20, 51; I Thess. iv. 13, 14, 15 koimaomai to fall asleep.
> Eph. v. 14; I Thess. v. 6, 7, 10 katheudo to go to sleep, be drowsy.
> Rom. xiii. 11; Eph. v. 14 egeiro to rouse.
> I Thess. v. 6 gregoreo watch, 10 wake.
> Eph. ii. 6; Col. ii. 12; iii. 1 sunegeiro to rouse together.

The reader will note that there are two different words used in I Thess. iv. & v. and care should be taken in the translation of these passages and the inferences drawn from them. Let us attempt to make the distinctions obvious.

Koimaomai which occurs in the fourth chapter means to fall asleep involuntarily in death, whereas in the fifth chapter katheudo means to compose oneself to sleep, to be drowsy instead of watchful. A rather free summary of I Thess. v. 1-10 might help here:

> "Speaking of the times and seasons, let me remind you that the day of the Lord comes as a thief in the night. Now we belong to the day, not to the night or darkness. Therefore let us not go to sleep as do some; but let us be watchful and sober, for sleepers sleep by night and drunkards are drunk by night, but let us who are of the day be sober . . . . . Our Lord Jesus Christ died for us that whether we are watchful or drowsy, we should live together with Him", > but while this is so, unwatchfulness my cause you to miss the added crown.
>
>
> "Therefore I endure all things for the elects' sakes, that they may also obtain that salvation which is in Christ Jesus with eternal glory. It is a faithful saying:
> For if we have died with Him, we shall also LIVE with Him.
> If we suffer, we shall also REIGN with Him.
> If we deny Him, He also will DENY us.
> If we are faithless, He abideth faithful, He cannot deny Himself" (II Tim. ii. 10-13).

We must not allow ourselves to be carried away by this great theme, but leave the difference between "living" and "reigning", between falling asleep involuntarily as in I Thess. iv., and being unwatchful and drowsy in I Thess. v. to speak for themselves. As an extension of the words "we which are alive and remain" of I Thess. iv. 15, the Apostle writes:

> "And the very God of peace sanctify you wholly: and I pray God your whole spirit and soul and body be preserved blameless unto the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ" (I Thess. v. 23).

There is no direct reference to the resurrection in II Thessalonians, but the insistence upon the Lord's Second Coming necessarily assumes that the resurrection is a fact, and so is an added testimony.

The testimony of I Corinthians.

Without any disrespect for the teaching of all Scripture, there are some passages which stand out most prominently as "classics" in some one great doctrine. Exod. xii., Isa. liii., Psa. xxiii., Rom. viii. and Rev. xx. come to mind. There is one chapter, namely I Cor. xv. that stands out most prominently as the chapter on Resurrection.

I Corinthians xv.

This chapter of 58 verses deals with the subject of Resurrection under three headings:

1-11. EVIDENCE and EVANGELISTIC importance of resurrection.
12-34. FACT of the resurrection established.
35-58. MANNER of the resurrection discussed.

The opening section 1-11 begins and ends with the word "preach":

> "The Gospel which I preached unto you . . . . . whether it were I or they, so we preach, and so ye believed."

The opening eleven verses of this great chapter places the question of the Resurrection squarely upon "witness". Now a valid witness must be able to give a personal testimony. He must be an eyewitness and be able to say "I was there, I saw and heard with my own eyes and ears". In a court of law, the veracity of a witness, and the fact that he does not stand to gain anything by his testimony is taken into account, and a man's life or possessions may be forfeit upon such testimony. So is it here. What sort of person is this preacher named Paul? What does he stand to gain by affirming that Christ is Risen? Let us see. In Galatians, Paul enters the arena and meets the possible objection:

> "But though we, or an angel from heaven, preach any other gospel unto you than that which we have preached unto you, let him be accursed" (Gal. i. 18).

For a man that was a Jew, to thus speak of an angel, means that he was in deadly earnest, or beside himself with passion. This the Apostle realizes, and so repeats himself, saying:

> "As we said before, so say I now again", and then takes up the other possible objection "For do I know persuade men or God?" or as Moffatt puts it:

> "Now is that appealing to the interests of men or of God? Trying to satisfy men?"

He then proceeds to show the impossibility of the Pharisaic Saul ever evolving such a gospel as he preached.

> "For ye have heard of my conversation in time past in the Jew's religion, how that beyond measure I persecuted the church of God, and wasted it."

His conversion and his Gospel were consequent upon a "revelation":

> "I received it . . . . . by the revelation of Jesus Christ . . . . . when it pleased God . . . . . to reveal His Son in me, that I might preach him" (Gal. i. 12-16).

Not only would the rejection of his Gospel impugn the veracity of Paul himself, but that of Peter, James and John, who had given to him the right hand of fellowship, and preached the Resurrection also. Paul was very sensitive to the implications of unbelief:

> "If Christ be not risen, then is our preaching vain, and your faith is also vain" (I Cor. xv. 14).

That is one consequence, and if it be true, we are all of men most miserable. But there is another consequence:

> "Yea, and we are found false witnesses of God" (15).

It is evident from what the Apostle writes, that to deny the resurrection, sweeps aside the complete testimony of the Apostles, including the Baptism they received from "The Spirit of Truth" on the day of Pentecost, to empower them in their witness.

> "For I delivered unto you first of all THAT WHICH I ALSO RECEIVED" (3).

In chapter xi. Paul claimed to have received from the Lord particulars concerning the Lord's Supper, and these can be compared with the witness given in the Gospels by those who were actually present. At his conversion he was told by Ananias "The God of our fathers hath chosen thee, that thou shouldest know His will, and SEE that Just One, and shouldest HEAR the voice of His mouth. For thou shalt be His witness unto all men of what thou hast SEEN and HEARD" (Acts xxii. 14, 15). The Greek word translated "witness" is martur, which in English is the word martyr. In Rev. i. 5 Christ is called "The faithful WITNESS", while in Rev. ii. 13 the same words are translated "My faithful MARTYR". In Rev. xi. 3 we have "two witnesses", in xvii. 6 "martyrs". While a man may be a faithful witness without suffering actual martyrdom, the word implies that he would thus suffer, rather than betray the trust given to him. Paul paid the price; Peter and James paid the price, and such witnesses cannot be lightly set aside. Before enumerating the many witnesses who were available, the Apostle, following the example of his Lord, turns to the Scripture of the O.T.:

> "For I delivered unto you first of all that which I also received, how that Christ died for our sins according to the Scriptures; and that He was buried, and that He rose again the third day according to the Scriptures" (I Cor. xv. 3, 4).

The O.T. comes into the record later in his reference to Adam, and the quotation from the prophet Isaiah and Hosea. In Luke xxiv., we find the Risen Lord rebuking the unbelief of the disciples, saying:

> "O fools, and slow of heart to believe all that the prophets have spoken . . . . . and beginning at Moses" (Luke xxiv. 25-27).

Yet again He spoke to the eleven:

> "These are the words which I spake unto you, while I was yet with you, that all things must be fulfilled, which were written in the law of Moses, and in the Prophets, and in the Psalms, concerning me" (Luke xxiv. 44).

Returning to the matter of witness, the Apostle cites Cephas, the twelve, above 500 at once, James, all the apostles, and last of all "me also". It is probable that Paul had in mind the faction at Corinth who said "I am of Cephas" (I Cor. i. 12) and drew their attention to his testimony. We do not know the 500 brethren who saw the Lord at once, but it is evident from the Apostle's challenging words "of whom the greater part remain unto this present, but some are fallen asleep", that this reference is no fiction. And then after another reference to James, and to all the apostles, he says:

> "And last of all He was seen of me also, as of one born out of due time."

The Apostle is sensitive to the attitude some took to his claim to be an Apostle, and first acknowledges with commendable humility his unworthiness to be given such an office. Earlier in this epistle he had said:

> "Am I not an apostle? am I not free? have I not seen Jesus Christ our Lord?" (I Cor. ix. 1), and then turns to these very Corinthians and says:

> "If I be not an Apostle unto others, yet doubtless I am to you: for the seal of mine apostleship are ye in the Lord" (I Cor. ix. 2).

And again in the second epistle he wrote:

> "For I suppose I was not a whit behind the very chiefest apostles. But though I be rude in speech, yet not in knowledge . . . . ." (II Cor. xi. 5, 6).

Paul had already quoted:

> "For his letters, say they, are weighty and powerful: but his bodily presence is weak, and his speech contemptible" (II Cor. x. 10).

So, we may appreciate the attempt of Moffatt to give the Apostle's meaning in I Cor. xv. 8:

> "And finally He was seen by myself, by this so-called 'abortion' of an apostle."

At any rate, the Apostle sums up:

> "Whether it were I or they, so we preach, and so ye believed" (I Cor. xv. 11).

No.7. The Witness of the Epistles.
pp. 141 - 148

As we further consider I Cor. xv., we give the outline of verses 12-58:

A | 12. The FACT of resurrection. "How?"
  B | 13-33. ADAM and CHRIST. Death destroyed. "When"
    C | 34. AWAKE.
A | 35. The MANNER of resurrection. "How?" "With what?"
  B | 36-57. FIRST and LAST ADAM. Death swallowed up. "When?"
    C | 58. BE STEDFAST.

Members B | 13-33 and B | 36-57 contain the great argument of the Apostle, and in both sections the name "Adam" is significant.

It has become quite common to hear from pulpit, platform and press, that no intelligent man today can endorse as literal the early chapters of Genesis. It will therefore be sheer waste of time for anyone who considers that Adam is but a "myth", to pursue this subject further, for no one in his senses would argue "For as in Adam, who never existed, all die, even so . . . . ." Moreover we discover that the whole purpose of the ages "Then cometh the end", is based squarely upon the reference to Adam and the transfer of Headship to Christ.

If we now follow the Apostle in his argument as contained in verses 12-19, it will be seen that if the resurrection of the dead is denied, then the resurrection of Christ must also be denied, or if the resurrection of Christ is believed, then the resurrection of the dead must be accepted, and this interchange is crystallized in the word "firstfruits".

> "But now is Christ risen from the dead, and become the firstfruits of them that slept" (I Cor. xv. 20).

The Firstfruits. I Cor. xv. 20-23.

A | 20-. Now is Christ risen \ First coming.
B | -20. Type—Firstfruits. /
C | 21-. By man came death \
D | -21. By Man came resurrection \ The
C | 22-. In Adam all die / Kinsman-Redeemer
D | -22. In Christ all made alive /
B | 23-. Christ the Firstfruits. \ Second coming.
A | -23. They that are Christ's /

There are eight occurrences of the word aparche "firstfruits" in the N.T. Eight is the octave, the new start, the resurrection.

The Eight references to Aparche.

We which have the firstfruits of the Spirit. (Rom. viii. 20-23).
Life from the dead. Firstfruits and lump. (Rom. xi. 15, 16).
Firstfruits of Achaia unto Christ. (Rom. xvi. 5).
The firstfruits of them that slept. (I Cor. xv. 20).
Christ the firstfruits. (I Cor. xv. 23).
Firstfruits of Achaia. (I Cor. xvi. 15).
A kind of firstfruits. (James i. 18).
Firstfruits unto God and the Lamb. (Rev. xiv. 4).

The significance of the type is seen in Lev. xxiii. 10, 11. The bearing of the figure of the Firstfruits upon the doctrine of I Cor. xv. is a vital factor in the interpretation of the whole, and particularly in connection with the reference to Adam in verse 22. We can lift these words out of their context and say with some appearance of finality, "As in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive". "All" means "all" in both parts of this great statement and that is enough proof that universal salvation and resurrection is the goal of God.

The above statement, however, is not a complete quotation of I Cor. xv. 22. It omits the logical connective "for", and so isolates one member of a progressive argument. Further, if "for" links verse 22 with verse 21, "for" links both with verse 20. Christ is the FIRSTFRUITS of them that slept. Now those that sleep are not all men universally; they are defined for us in verse 18 as those are fallen asleep "in Christ". By no stretch of imagination can such a term include both saved and lost, sinner and saved, believer and unbeliever. We are here dealing with one class, those who are "In Christ". The same limitation is observed in the sequel,

> "But every man in his own order;
> Christ the Firstfruits:
> Afterward they that ARE CHRIST'S at His coming" (I Cor. xv. 23).

It is the essence of the type, that the "firstfruits" of a barley harvest, shall be the same kind, namely "barley". In this "field" which is the world, there are growing together "two seeds", namely "wheat" and "tares", and it is an outrage of common sense, to say nothing of its dangerous doctrinal implications, to make the risen Christ a firstfruits of BOTH wheat and tares! The false seed are excluded here. By man came death—by man therefore must come life. Who is this "man"? The first man is Adam (I Cor. xv. 47). Who is the other man by Whom came life? He is "the last Adam and the second Man" (I Cor. xv. 45-47). We may paraphrase the Apostle's words, and read:

> "For as sure as any one can be described as being 'In Adam' he must die, but as sure as any one can be described as 'In Christ' he shall be made alive."

By a series of wondrous steps, the goal of the ages will at length be reached. "Then cometh the end" (I Cor. xv. 24).

There is no word for 'cometh' in the original of verse 24. It simply read "Then the end". There is no justification for translating "The cometh the end rank", telos does not primarily denote termination with reference to time but a goal reached, as in James "Ye have seen the end of the Lord" (James v. 11).

We should read I Cor. xv. 24-28 like this:

```
THEN  THE  END    /  "When"  \
                 /   "When"    \     "For  He
                 \   "When"    /     must  reign" \  "When"   / THEN . . . . . GOD  ALL  IN  ALL.
```

All enemies, and all rule, whether "good" or "bad" will be set aside. Up to, and during the Millennium there will be a great deal of delegated authority:

> David will be raised from the dead to reign (Jer. xxx. 9).
> The Twelve Apostles will sit on twelve thrones (Matt. xix. 28).
> The Overcomers will be Kings and Priests (Rev. xx. 4-6).
> The Archangel Michael will make war (Rev. xii. 7).
> Mighty angels will lead up to the Millennial reign (Rev. vii.-xix.).

Yet the Millennium will not reach the standard set in I Cor. xv. 24. All delegated authority will be ultimately set aside, and "The Son" alone "reign" until "God shall be all in all".

Should the reader be bothered about "the baptism for the dead", a doctrine and practice that emanates from Salt Lake City, he should read the context, viz., I Cor. xv. 29 and 30-32. The Apostle's argument is that if Christ be not raised from the dead, and if the blessed goal is unattainable, then every one who is baptized, and so exposes himself to persecution and martyrdom, has been surely 'baptized' into death and danger.

> "Else (if what has been written be not so) what shall they do which are baptized? (They have been simply baptized for the dead) if the dead rise not. You see in my case I stand in jeopardy every hour 'I die daily', and have been exposed in the arena to the attack of wild beasts, which is meaningless 'If the dead rise not'."

Again do not misquote the close of verse 32. It does not say "Let us eat, drink and be merry: for tomorrow we die" such cannot even be "merry", the word is an intruder here.

We pass now to the second great division of this chapter,

> "How are the dead raised up?"
> "With what body do they come?"

NO ANSWER is possible to the first question. Even though God should condescend to tell us how identity can be preserved, how those who have been dead for centuries can be raised, we should be no more the wiser than an infant would be when attending its first day at school, supposing him to be instructed in the last words of science on the subject of nuclear fission, or what is implied by the fourth dimension.

With what body do they come? is answered by the words "Thou fool". We are directed to the everyday miracle of the sown seed, and the resultant grain, "to every seed its own body". This is a point which the Apostle desires to make. There are heavenly bodies, there are earthly bodies, with their associated glories.

> "So also is the resurrection of the dead" (I Cor. xv. 42).

Further, to ensure that in the realm of the spiritual we should feel inclined to eliminate any sort of "body", the Apostle says "There is a natural body, and there is also a spiritual body". Those whose destiny is the New Earth, who will have access to the Paradise of God, and to the Tree of Life. These will have resurrection bodies suitable to that sphere and inheritance. But those whose blessings are "all spiritual", and whose sphere of blessing is "in heavenly places", such will have "spiritual" or "heavenly bodies" (I Cor. xv. 40, 44). The earthly image must be exchanged for the heavenly, and though we shall not all "sleep", we shall all be "changed". Someone has said that the main purpose of most books is information, but the chief goal of the Bible is "transformation" (see Phil. iii. 20, 21). It seems so here.

Immortality is linked, not with the traditional "never-dying soul", but with resurrection,

"So when this corruptible shall have put on incorruption, and this mortal shall have put on immortality, THEN (and not before) shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, Death is swallowed up in victory" (I Cor. xv. 54).

This passage points us straight on to II Cor. v. 4 where we read:

"That mortality might be swallowed up of life", to which we must turn directly.

One of the reasons why death is spoken of as sleep for the believer, is that its "sting" has been removed:

"The sting of death is SIN,
The strength of sin is the LAW,
BUT
Thanks be to God, which giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ" (I Cor. xv. 55-57).

Earlier, at the close of the first section, the Apostle paused to speak of the practical outcome of the doctrine of the resurrection:

"Awake to righteousness, and sin not; for some have not the knowledge of God: I speak this to your shame" (I Cor. xv. 34).

At the close of the second great division, the Apostle once more calls for a practical response. Let us give these familiar words in a less familiar translation:

"Well then, my beloved brothers, hold your ground, immoveable; abound in work for the Lord at all times, for you may be sure that in the Lord your labour is never thrown away" (I Cor. xv. 58 Moffatt).

The interested reader may be pleased to observe, and to work out for himself, the fact that when we compare I Cor. xv. 13-33 with I Cor. xv. 36-57, we find the five items introduced in the one section receive amplification in the second, thus:

B | 13-33. ADAM and CHRIST. Death destroyed. "When"
B | 36-57. FIRST and LAST ADAM. Death swallowed up. "When?"

The Five Amplifications.

(1)	Differences in "order"	verse 23 with verses 37-44.
(2)	Relation with Adam	verses 21, 22 with verses 45, 47, 49.
(3)	Relation with Christ	verses 20-22, 28 with verses 45, 47, 49.
(4)	Destruction of Death	verse 26 with verse 54.
(5)	Time Periods	verse 24 with verse 54.

The testimony of II Corinthians.

No church had so full a testimony to the fact and consequence of resurrection as the Corinthians. This we have seen in I Cor. xv. It will not surprise us therefore, that in the second epistle to this same church, we find further references, and this we shall do when we come to chapter v. It is however helpful to see that in chapter i. the Apostle realized the immediate and personal effects of "that blessed hope" in action in his own affairs. God is spoken of as "The God of all comfort", a word closely associated with the hope and resurrection of the dead in I Thess. iv. There is also a parallel in the wording of both I Thess. iv. 13 and II Cor. i. 8-10 which is suggestive:

> "But I would not have you to be ignorant, brethren, concerning them which are asleep, that ye sorrow not, even as others which have no hope" (I Thess. iv. 13).
>
> "For we would not, brethren, have you ignorant of our trouble which came to us in Asia, that we were pressed out of measure, above strength, insomuch that we despaired even of life.
>
> But we had the sentence of death in ourselves, that we should not trust in ourselves, but in God which raiseth the dead:
>
> Who delivered us from so great a death, (the past)
> And doth deliver: (the present)
> In Whom we trust that He will yet deliver us" (the future).

The doctrine and hope of resurrection is no mere item of a creed. The God we trust, is:

> The Father of mercies,
> The God of all comfort,
> The God which raiseth the dead, and that for all time, > past; present spiritually as well as future, literally.

The Apostle returns to this aspect of truth in chapter iv. "We have this treasure in earthen vessels", which if "cast down" would, ordinarily be "destroyed", and only the "power of resurrection" could sustain us against so many odds:

> "Always bearing about in the body the DYING of the Lord Jesus. That the LIFE also of Jesus might be made manifest . . . . . in our MORTAL flesh" (II Cor. iv. 7-11).
>
> "But though our outward man perish, yet the inward man is renewed day by day" (II Cor. iv. 16).

We pause here to consider the bearing of such a passage on the question of death and resurrection for this reason. In the endeavour to counter the erroneous teaching of an intermediate "unclothed" state, which is supposed to intervene between death and glory, some have over-stressed the state of the blessed dead, and have swung to the other extreme.

There is no knowledge or device in the grave and this we believe. Death, at least for the believer, is described as "sleep", and resurrection as "awakening". There is however no need to overstate such a fact, as we have heard some enthusiasts do, by saying that when a believer is dead, he is to all intents and purposes annihilated. True, IF there be no resurrection, THEN "perished" is the word (I Cor. xv. 18) but as there is a resurrection of the dead, that word cannot be employed. When anyone "believes" the gospel he passes "from death unto life" (John v. 24). Is that nullified at death? "Your life HATH BEEN HID (kekruptai perfect passive) with Christ in God" (Col. iii. 3). Can THAT Life cease, or be destroyed? We do not say that the believer who falls asleep is conscious, but nothing can justify turning a blind eye on such wondrous statements of Scripture, in order to bolster up a man-made creed. Let us not put our hand to stay the ark of God.

So returning to II Cor. iv. 16:

> "Though the OUTWARD man is perishing (present passive), yet the INWARD man is renewed (present passive) day by day."

What happens to this renewed inward man? Does that perish also? From this standpoint, even we can understand that the list of sufferings enumerated in I & II Cor. can be spoken of as "our light affliction" (see I Cor. iv. 9-13; II Cor. i. 8, 9; iv. 7-12), for the Apostle follows that estimate "light" by a comparison which he calls "a far more exceeding weight"; the brevity of the suffering "but for a moment", being set off by the words "eternal . . . . . glory", and all this, and which leads on the exposition of resurrection and immortality which follows in chapter v. The last word of chapter iv. is the word "eternal" as set over against the word "temporal" or "transient" and this is picked up and developed in the opening verses of chapter v. The translation, "Our earthly house of this tabernacle" is somewhat cumbrous. The word "of" is usually the sign of the genitive case, and it might be a service, beyond the limits of this present study to acquaint the reader with the importance of this term and its varied applications. The word "genitive" indicates generation, and so possession and is called, in English grammar "The possessive case".

> "Whilst we look not at the things which are seen",

(1) The Genitive of character—Children of disobedience = Disobedient children.
(2) The Genitive of origin. The righteousness of faith.
(3) The Genitive of possession. The sword of the Spirit.
(4) The Genitive of Apposition. The house, that is to say, our tabernacle.

Appendix 17 of the Companion Bible gives nine varieties of this figure, and Figures of speech used in the Bible, by Dr. E. W. Bullinger devotes fourteen pages to its exposition. Its understanding is an important factor in true interpretation. The word translated "tabernacle" should be translated "tent", owing to the associations that the word tabernacle carries with it that cannot well be ignored. Abraham did not dwell in a "tabernacle", neither did Isaac or Jacob (Heb. xi. 9); they dwelt in "tents", the mark of a pilgrim, stranger and sojourner (Heb. xi. 9, 13) who seek a country. For such God has prepared a city (Heb. xi. 16), and that is an heavenly one. So we translate II Cor. v. 1, reading straight on from II Cor. iv. 16-18, where the outward man is perishing, but the inward man renewed daily:

> "For we know that if our earthly house, which is a tent, were dissolved, we have a building of God, an house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens" (II Cor. v. 1).

The modern usage of the word "dissolved", places the conversion of a solid to a liquid first in meaning, and while it could be rightly employed to speak of the dissolution of the body we can hardly use this word of a "tent". Kataluo, the Greek word used here, occurs in Matt. xxiv. 2 of the stones of the Temple that were to be "thrown down", and in

Matt. xxvi. 61 of "destroying" a temple. We should not be far removed from the intention of the Apostle if we read "If our earthly house, which is a tent, should collapse", for that would agree with the very tentative nature of a tent at the best of times. "We have a building." How are we to understand this? Can we not say "we have" here, exactly as we can say "our life hath been hid with Christ in God"? The eleventh chapter of Hebrews, already referred to, contains a happy thought in verse 1, where we read, "Now faith is the substance of things hoped for", especially when we learn from the papyri that, in the Apostles' day, hupostasis (substance) was used in a lawsuit to refer to "the title deeds" of a property. We may be living precariously today in a tent, and are ever moving on, but we carry with us title deeds to a building of God, an house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens. The Apostle continues:

> "For in this we groan, earnestly desiring to be clothed upon with our house which is from heaven."

The use of the words "to be clothed upon", when referring to a building or a house, sounds slightly incongruous; the word enduo, being once literally translated "endue" as with power (Luke xxiv. 49).

While enduo primarily means "to put on clothing" (Matt. vi. 25; xxii. 11; Luke xv. 22) there is a transition from the mere idea of clothes, to what clothes may stand for. To be clothed in fine linen, white and clean (Rev. xix. 14) is evidently but another way of saying "arrayed in fine linen clean and white" (Rev. xix. 8), which in this passage is explained as representing "the righteousness of the saints". In Rev. xix. 13 the coming King is said to be "clothed with a vesture dipped in blood", which can only be accepted if seen to be symbolical, as a reference back to Isa. lxiii. 1-4, together with Rev. xix. 15 will show. The word translated "arrayed" and "clothed" in verses 8 and 13 is the Greek periballo "to throw around". In Rom. xiii. 12 we are exhorted to "put on the armour of light", which when repeated in verse 14, becomes "put ye on the Lord Jesus Christ". So in Eph. iv. 24 and Col. iii. 10 & 12, we read of "putting on", or being clothed with the new man, and "putting on", or being clothed with bowels of mercies, and other graces. The references in II Cor. v. 3 however, looks two ways, as a contrast to being found "naked", and in verse 2, being "clothed upon with our house which is from heaven". This looks back to I Cor. xv. 53 and 54, where the resurrection of the believer in view, where, if all the references in both epistles be read together, all incongruity vanishes.

> "For this corruptible must put on (be clothed with) incorruption, and this mortal must put on (be clothed with) immortality."

To complete the tale, we draw attention to the occurrences of ependuo "to be clothed upon" in II Cor. v. 2, 4. The reader will find a number of passages in II Corinthians that are made the more understandable by linking with the primary occurrences in the first epistle, but this lies outside the present examination.

No.8. The Witness of the Epistles.
pp. 161 - 165

In the context we are studying (II Cor. v.), the Apostle Paul states twice that while we are "in this tent", i.e. our earthly house, "we groan", "being burdened". Most of us have known what it is to "groan", and the Scriptures make it clear that, not only does "the whole creation groan", but that those who have the firstfruits of the Spirit, they also "groan" within themselves, waiting for the adoption, namely "the redemption of the body" (Rom. viii. 22, 23). We shall find that this word "groan" is largely associated with the need felt for 'the glorious liberty' that can only be enjoyed when "this mortal shall have put on immortality" (I Cor. xv. 53). The essential meaning of the Greek word translated "groan" is "to be cramped", and it will be an enlightenment for many of us to give this our very careful attention. We may be sad or sorry or greatly moved by the misery, the poverty, the wretchedness of man, but that is not in view in this word 'groan' as we shall see. The words translated 'groan' in the N.T. are all derivatives of the Greek sten, except two, where the Greek word is embrimaomai, but every reference translated 'groan' except that of Acts vii. 34, is related to Resurrection, and even Acts vii. 34 refers to bondage that is typical in its character, namely the bondage in Egypt. The Greek sten enters into many scientific terms, narrow-footed, narrow-nosed, thin-necked, narrow-leaved and the like. Its most common and best known usage is in the word "Stenographer", which does not mean that a shorthand typist gets the "cramp", but that "short" hand-writing is "cramped" writing. Here are the words used in the original:

Stenagmos Acts vii. 34; Rom. viii. 26.
Stenazo Rom. viii. 23; II Cor. v. 2, 4.
Sustenazo Rom. viii. 22.

To these should be added stenochoreomai and stenochoria translated "distress" and meaning "cramped for space" II Cor. iv. 8; vi. 12; Rom. ii. 9; viii. 35; II Cor. vi. 4; xii. 10.

Stenos "strait", the strait gate, gives the primitive meaning. The 'groan' therefore is associated with the 'cramped' or 'frustrating' existence here in contrast with the 'glorious liberty' to be entered at resurrection. The narrow chrysalis and the emerging butterfly is nature's symbol. The 'groan' of II Cor. v. 2 and 4 is the result of being 'burdened' bareo. Those of you who have listened to weather reports will be acquainted with the term "isobars", or "lines connecting places on the map having the same barometric pressure". Hence "barometer", a measure of pressure. We shall appreciate the better the Apostle's use of this word bareo in II Cor. i. 8, where he says "We were pressed out of measure", in a context that speaks of "despairing even of life", and having "the sentence of death". On the other hand, we must not omit the exultant use of this same world, this time the noun baros as the apostle approaches II Cor. v., where he uses this term for pressure in the phrase "The far more exceeding eternal weight of glory" (II Cor. iv. 17). While the listing of the number of occurrences of baros and its derivatives may be outside our legitimate enquiry, this word is so used in II Corinthians as to warrant the following list before we pass on to other epistles.

Baros and its derivatives in II Corinthians:

Pressed out of measure. (i. 8).
Overcharged. (ii. 5).
Weight of glory. (iv. 17).
Being burdened. (v. 4).
Weighty. (x. 10).
Not being burdensome. (xi. 9).
I did not burden you. (xii. 16).

We return to our main theme, namely the varied aspects of resurrection that the Scriptures present, and consider the meaning of the Apostle when he said:

> "We are confident, I say, and willing rather to be absent from the body, and to be present with the Lord" (II Cor. v. 8).

These words are often incorrectly quoted as a proof text, "Absent from the body, is to be present with the Lord", as a proof that at death the believer immediately passes into an intermediate conscious state in glory. Let us first of all notice that at the introduction of this willingness, the Apostle says "We are confident". In this second epistle "confidence" can be a "persuasion" pepoithesis (II Cor. i. 15; iii. 4; viii. 22; x. 2), a substratum or ground hupostasis (II Cor. ix. 4; xi. 17), or courage and good cheer tharreo (II Cor. v. 6, 8; vii. 16). It is this last word that we have in II Cor. v. What was it that gave the Apostle this confidence and courage? He has been speaking about the contrasting facts, while here we live in a frail tent, in resurrection is awaiting us a "building of God". For this he earnestly waited, and expressly ruled out from his expectations "being UNclothed", which would apply to an "intermediate state". He waited for and desired the day when "mortality" should be swallowed up of life, when "This mortal shall put on immortality" in resurrection as I Cor. xv. has so clearly revealed.

> "Now He that hath wrought us for the self same things is God, Who also (i.e. before the day comes, and while we wait) hath given unto us the earnest of the Spirit" (II Cor. v. 5).

This power, purpose and earnest, gives us confidence, enabling us to walk by faith while here in the body and absent from the Lord, and willing rather:

> "to be absent from the body, and to be present with the Lord."

This was Paul's ardent wish, but if it turned out to be the Lord's will that he should remain here in the body, his confidence was unshaken. The earnest of the blessed hope was his, and as he wrote to the Hebrews:

> "Faith is the substance ('confidence', 'title deeds') of things hoped for" (Heb. i. 1).

It is strange that in a passage where the Apostle so strongly sets aside desire to be "unclothed", so many see a desire nevertheless for an intermediate state (that Scripture teaches must wait for the resurrection and the body of glory). II Cor. v. is an inspired expansion of I Cor. xv., and both agree together.

The testimony of Hebrews.

What is the teaching of the epistle to the Hebrews as to resurrection? The actual word "resurrection" occurs but twice, namely in Heb. vi. 2 and xi. 35. Anistemi 'to raise' is found in vii. 11, 15. Egeiro 'to raise' occurs in xi. 19. It would be, however, misleading to assume that the resurrection either of Christ Himself or of His redeemed people is not looked upon as vital and fundamental in this epistle, just because the actual words were not scattered all over its pages. Let us open the Book and commence reading at chapter i. 1. We do not go further than verse 3 before the resurrection, though not stated, is assumed.

> "When He had by Himself purged our sins . . . . . sat down on the right hand of the Majesty on high" (Heb. . 3).

How could the Saviour 'sit down' at the right hand of God after He had purged our sins, unless He had been raised from the dead? In chapter ii., Christ not only came to "destroy him that had the power of death, that is, the devil", but to deliver them who through fear of death were all their lifetime subject to bondage (Heb. ii. 14, 15). How could He accomplish this, unless He, and they who were to be delivered, were raised from the dead?

Chapter iii. calls upon us to consider Him, the Apostle and High Priest of our profession. The Apostle "came from God", the High Priest "went to God", and the Melchisedec Priesthood of Christ is placed in vivid contrast with the Aaronic order, in this one particular, they died; He ever lives.

> "And they truly were many priests, because they were not suffered to continue by reason of death: But this Man, because He continueth ever, hath an unchangeable (or an intransmissible) priesthood, and 'He ever liveth' to make intercession for His people" (vii. 23-25).

It is useless to exhort us to look unto Jesus Who endured the cross and despised the shame, unless we can add "And is set down at the right hand of the throne of God" (Hebrews xii. 2). And finally, the closing commendation of Heb. xiii. 20 demands His resurrection:

> "Now the God of peace, that brought again from the dead our Lord Jesus, the great Shepherd of the sheep, through the blood of the everlasting covenant, make your perfect in every good work . . . . ."

The fact of the resurrection of Christ is everywhere assumed and taught in this epistle, and we need not labour our proofs further. There are other references to resurrection that demand our careful attention, and two immediately come to mind:

"Therefore leaving the principles of the doctrine of Christ . . . . . resurrection of the dead" (Heb. vi. 1, 2).

"Women received their dead raised to life again: and others were tortured, not accepting deliverance; that they might obtain a better resurrection" (Heb. xi. 35).

These two passages are related together as "Hope" is to "Prize". If we are really exhorted to leave "the first principles", we can find, alas, many who would readily welcome us into their apostate ranks, but we are happy to say that Heb. vi. 1 teaches no such thing.

The fact that this chapter commences with the word "therefore" makes any interpretation that does not arise logically out of the preceding chapter of no value. In writing to the Corinthians, Paul had to say much the same of them as he here says of these Hebrews, and it will be sufficient to set this out before the eye, thus:

I Corinthians ii. & iii.		Hebrews v. & vi.
Babes	iii. 1	Babes	v. 13
Milk	iii. 2	Milk	v. 13
Meat	iii. 2	Meat	v. 14
Perfect	ii. 6	Perfect	v. 14
One Foundation	iii. 11	Foundation	vi. 1, 2
Fire	iii. 13	Fire	vi. 8
Six elements	iii. 12	Six elements	vi. 1, 2

The Apostle complained to the Hebrews, that though for the time they should have been teachers, they needed that one should teach them again "the first principles" of the oracles of God. This he likened to "milk", but urged that those "of full age" (Greek 'perfect') should go on to the solid food of an adult. "And this we will do", said the Apostle, "if God permit". The margin of the A.V. corrects the wrong impression that the translation "Leaving the principles of the doctrine of Christ" gives, for it reads:

"Leaving the Word of the beginning of Christ (to which we add) let us go on unto perfection, teleios, from telos 'the end'."

Here is no abandonment of first principles, but a recognition that there was much more in the will of God than those Hebrews realized. "The resurrection" still remained a basic and fundamental truth, but what did these believers know of a "better resurrection" (Heb. xi. 35)? This and all that goes with it is the theme of the Hebrews epistle. Not salvation, but "the things that accompany salvation". Believing God as "Rewarder" as well as Saviour (Heb. xi. 6), with Abraham and Moses as examples of those who gladly relinquish present joys for the better things, Abraham looking for "a better country", and Moses esteeming the reproach of Christ greater riches than the treasures of Egypt, for he had respect unto the recompense of the reward (xi. 10, 16, 24-26). Just as Philippians is the epistle of the "Prize" for the Body of Christ, so Hebrews is the epistle of the "Reward" for the church of the Acts period, and both are connected by the key words:

Philippians.		Hebrews.
Perfection	iii. 12	Perfection	vi. 1
Perdition	iii. 19	Perdition	x. 39
The Prize	iii. 14	The Race	xii. 1
The "out-resurrection"	iii. 11	The "better-resurrection"	xi. 35
Work in . . . His will	ii. 13	Work in . . . His will	xiii. 21
Enemies of Cross	iii. 18	Crucify afresh	vi. 6

[For a fuller comparison, see The Alphabetical Analysis, Part 3, p.162.]

We cannot conclude this survey without noting the reference to Abraham and Isaac in chapter xi.:

> "By faith Abraham, when he was tried, offered up Isaac; and he that had received the promises offered up his only begotten Son . . . . . accounting that God was able to raise him up, even from the dead; from whence also he received him in a figure" (xi. 17-19).

To conclude our testimony, we must now pass in review the Prison Epistles of the Apostle Paul, and then exhibit the witness of the book of the Revelation.

No.9. The Witness of the Epistles.
pp. 181 - 184

The Prison Epistles.

If this study was devoted to dispensational differences, we should have to set out the reasons why Paul's prison epistles must be segregated, as they deal with a parenthesis as it were in the outworking of the purpose of the ages, known as the "dispensation of the Mystery" (Eph. iii. 9 R.V.), and revealed through the Apostle Paul after the dismissal of Israel at the close of Acts xxviii. As it is, we are dealing with a subject that knows no dispensational boundaries, but is as universal in its need as is the death that necessitates it. However, it will be necessary to differentiate between the resurrection as it is used in Ephesians and Colossians, and that which the Apostle sought to "attain unto" in Phil. iii. 11.

The testimony of Ephesians.

The resurrection has been so firmly attested, and is so integral to both the Gospel of salvation and the consequent hope and destiny of the redeemed, that, writing to a church already established in the faith, the resurrection is in every reference assumed as a fact, and applied as a doctrine influencing practice.

After the revelation of Eph. i. 3-14 which sets forth the threefold basis or distinctive character of this dispensation which can be summarized as:

(1) The WILL of the Father (i. 3-6).
(2) The WORK of the Son (i. 7-12).
(3) The WITNESS of the Spirit (i. 13, 14).

The Apostle follows by a threefold prayer, which embraces:

(1) The Hope of His calling (i. 18).
(2) The Riches of His inheritance (i. 18).
(3) The exceeding greatness of His power (i. 19).

It is the last member that brings to bear the resurrection of Christ upon the believer:

> "That ye may know . . . . . what is the exceeding greatness of His power to usward who believe, according to the working of His mighty power, which He wrought in Christ, when He raised Him from the dead, and set Him at His own right hand, ... far above all . . . . ." (Eph. i. 18-21).

The word translated "exceeding" is the Greek word hyperballo which gives its name to a figure of speech hyperbole, meaning an exaggeration. Here, there is no exaggeration intended but something surpassing the common experience of man. Hyperballo is used three times in Ephesians, as follows:

(1) Exceeding power (i. 19).
(2) Exceeding riches (ii. 7).
(3) Exceeding knowledge (iii. 19).

No attempt is made by the Apostle to 'explain' the greatness of the miracles that resurrection involves. He applies it to the believer, saying "to usward who believe", and commencing with resurrection, he goes on to the Ascension, the Headship and the Fullness, for which, "exceeding greatness of power" was a necessity. We must not miss however the object of another power which had worked in the believer in his unregenerate days, "the prince of the power of the air, the spirit that now worketh in the children of disobedience" (Eph. ii. 1-3). Here the word "power" is exousia "authority", which is translated "power" in Eph. i. 21. The Ascension which necessitates the resurrection, figures prominently in Eph. iv. 8-12, where it is associated with gifts of ministry, and the concept of resurrection meets us once more in the exhortation:

> "Wherefore he saith, Awake thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead, and Christ shall give thee light" (Eph. v. 14).

In Colossians, where this same word "authority" is used:

> "Who hath delivered us from the authority of darkness", we find that the believer is said to have been "translated" (Col. i. 13). Here, in the sequel of Eph. ii. 6, we find the believer is:

> "raised up together and made to sit together in heavenly places in Christ Jesus" (Eph. ii. 6).

The testimony of Colossians.

Colossians, like Ephesians, speaks of "the hope" which is laid up for the believer. In the opening of the third chapter, Paul assumes that these believers are "risen with Christ", assures them that their life is hid with Christ in God, and that when Christ Who is our life shall appear, then shall we also appear "with Him in glory" (Col. iii. 4). What is potential in verse 1, "If ye then be risen with Christ", will be actual when our hope is fulfilled "at His appearing".

The testimony of Philippians.

The actual resurrection of Christ is not mentioned in this epistle. Knowing the teaching of the rest of Scripture, the resurrection is seen to be tacitly recognized in the reference "Unto the day of Jesus Christ" (Phil. i. 6), or again in the second chapter, where "the death of the cross" is followed, not by "He was buried, and the third day rose from the dead", but "wherefore God also hath highly exalted Him" (Phil. ii. 9). Common sense, apart from such references as Acts ii. 33, declares the resurrection is implied, though not stated. So also is it with the Apostle's desire (Phil. i. 23). Instead of this absence being looked upon as an omission to be regretted, we shall discover that it focuses our attention all the more on one aspect of resurrection, which it is the especial office of this epistle to elaborate. This is expressed in the words of chapter iii. 11-21:

> "That I may know Him,
> And the power of His resurrection,
> And the fellowship of His sufferings,
> Being made comformable unto His death;
> If by any means I might attain unto the resurrection of the dead" (iii. 10, 11).

The two words mostly translated 'to know' are seen in the Greek oida, meaning something seen or perceived, and ginosko, meaning obtain a personal insight into, so, as Dr. Bullinger, in his Lexicon put is:

> "Hence the force of (this word) in Matt. 7:23, 'I have never had a true and personal connection with you'."

The Apostle is here expressing a desire for a deeper, personal knowledge not merely of doctrine and dispensation, but of intimate association. The words that follow indicate the direction of his thoughts:

> "and the power of His resurrection."

No one could be more convinced of the historic fact of the resurrection of Christ than Paul, but here, he wants to know its "power". Once again, we must recognize that the Apostle has in mind some extraordinary experiences, for in his earlier epistles, the association of 'power' with the resurrection is emphasized:

> "Declared to be the Son of God with power . . . . . by the resurrection" (Rom. i. 4).
> "And God hath both raised up the Lord, and will also raise up us by His own power" (I Cor. vi. 14).

"Though He was crucified through weakness, yet He liveth by the power of God . . . . . we shall live with Him by the power of God . . . . ." (II Cor. xiii. 4).

"That ye may know . . . . . what is the exceeding greatness of His power to usward who believe . . . . . which He wrought in Christ when He raised Him from the dead . . . . . far above all" (Eph. i. 18-21).

The knowledge that the Apostle craved in Phil. iii. 10 was something special, it included the fellowship of His sufferings, and conformity unto His death. Koinonia "fellowship" is used three times in Philippians:

"Your fellowship in the gospel" (i. 5).
"If any fellowship of the Spirit" (ii. 1).
"The fellowship of His sufferings" (iii. 10).

In each there is some element of suffering and sacrifice, as the contexts will reveal (Phil. i. 5 with iv. 14-18). Fellowship with the 'sufferings' of Christ must not be confused with the substitutionary death of the Lord. In that, no man can participate, but Paul could write of himself, "Who now rejoice in my sufferings for you, and fill up that which is behind of the afflictions of Christ in my flesh for His body's sake, which is the church" (Col. i. 24), and even though he could thus write, he still realizes that there is something deeper, and possible, and he does not shrink from the prospect of taking these sufferings to the bitter end, "being made conformable unto His death" (Phil. iii. 10).

Morphe 'form', summorphoomai 'conform', summorphos 'fashioned', show the way in which this word is used in Philippians. It indicates the infinite condescension of the Lord Who, being in the "form of God", emptied Himself by taking on Him the "form of a servant", and the being found "in fashion" as a man, further humbled Himself, even to the death of the cross (Phil. ii. 6-8). This condescension is echoed in Phil. iii. 21:

"Who shall change	metaschematizo
our vile body	tapeinosis
that it may be fashioned like	summorphos to His body of glory."

Schema is rendered 'fashion' (ii. 8); etapeinosen "He humbled Himself" (ii. 8); morphe 'form' of a servant (ii. 7). The association of Phil. ii. 7-11, the Lord's humiliation and subsequent glory, is echoed in Phil. iii. 21, the believer's share in both the humbling and the likeness of His body of glory in resurrection.

In Phil. iii. 21, being made conformable unto the body of His glory is in view, whereas in Phil. iii. 10, it is conformity unto death that the Apostle envisaged. The 'death' which the Apostle had in mind is "the death of the cross" (Phil. ii. 8), and the particular aspect of this death is indicated by the reference to those whose walk constituted them as "enemies of the cross of Christ". This enmity was not so much the enmity of "sin", but in the opposition subsequent to the "following" of the "example" of both Paul and his Lord:

"Brethren, be followers together of me, and mark them which walk so as ye have us for an ensample. (For many walk, of whom I have told you often, and now tell you even weeping, that they are the enemies of the cross of Christ: whose end is destruction, whose God is their belly, and whose glory is in their shame, who mind earthly things)" (Phil. iii. 17-19).

No.10. The Witness of the Epistles. The Witness of the Book of the Revelation.
pp. 201 - 204

Let us now consider the approach to, and the actual goal which the Apostle had before him in Phil. iii. 11.

"If by any means I might attain unto the resurrection of the dead."

Eipos "If by any means" is used four times in the N.T. and in every case the contingency is very real and the possibility of failure is stressed:

"If by any means they might attain to Phenice" (Acts xxvii. 12).
"If by any means now at length I might have a prosperous journey" (Rom. i. 10).
"If by any means I may provoke to emulation" (Rom. xi. 14).
"If by any means I might attain unto the resurrection of the dead" (Phil. iii. 11).

In the A.V. there is no indication that the 'resurrection' about which the Apostle entertained some uncertainty was something special. "The better resurrection" of Hebrews xi. 35 and "the first resurrection" of Rev. xx. 4-6 carry with them this element of distinction, but the A.V. has not allowed the original of Phil. iii. 11 that right. The Received Text reads:

Ten exanastasin ton nekron "The out-resurrection from the dead".

The Critical Texts read:

Ten exanastasin ten ek nekron "The out-resurrection, that which is out from dead ones".

The presence of this word ek "out" is important, and indicates something over and above "the hope of the resurrection" as may be seen in the following occurrence. While we may admit that the Apostles, during the Lord's earthly ministry showed remarkable slowness to apprehend the truth, we can at least believe that they were as far advanced as to hold with the Pharisees the resurrection of the dead. How comes it then that when Christ said to them that they should tell no man what they had seen "till the Son of Man were risen from the dead" that they questioned one another "What the rising from the dead should mean" (Mark ix. 10)? If we turn to the original we shall see that it was the added "ek" that caused the problem. Till the Son of Man were risen "OUT FROM dead ones". We turn to Luke xx. 35 and take a step further in this quest,

"But they which shall be accounted worthy to obtain that world, and the resurrection, that which is out from the dead ones."

The word "obtain" is used in II Tim. ii. 10:

> "That they may also obtain that salvation which is in Christ Jesus with eternal glory", and is used again in Heb. xi. 35:

> "That they might obtain a better resurrection."

It is important to distinguish, moreover, between the word "attain" and "obtain", and this is not made clear in Phil. iii. 11, 12 A.V. but is recognized in the R.V. The A.V. repetition of the word "attain" in Phil. iii. 12 gives continuity to the Apostle's argument, but two different words are employed, katantao in verse 11, and lambano in verse 12. The change from 'attaining' to 'obtaining' reveals the change in the Apostle's objective.

(1) he sought to "attain" to the out-resurrection.
(2) he hoped subsequently to "obtain" the Prize.

This is made clear by a reference to I Cor. ix. 24, 25 where lambano occurs twice. "One receiveth the prize"; "to obtain a corruptible crown". This most blessed attainment is in view at the close of Phil. iii. In contrast with those whose walk was so contrary to their calling the Apostle says:

> "For our conversation is in heaven: from whence also we look for the Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ; Who shall change our vile body, that it may be fashioned like unto His glorious body, according to the working whereby He is able even to subdue all things unto Himself."

We might be helped by another translation of this passage, and Moffatt has brought out one or two significant features:

> "But we are a colony of heaven, and we wait for the Saviour Who comes from heaven, the Lord Jesus Christ, Who will transform the body that belongs to our low estate till it resembles the body of His glory, by the same power that enables Him to make everything subject to Himself."

We must now pass on to the book of the Revelation to complete this survey, and there we shall have a parallel case where the "first resurrection" of Rev. xx. is in the same category as "the out-resurrection" of Philippians, although the citizenship of the one is the New Jerusalem and the citizenship of the other is "Far above all where Christ sitteth".

The testimony of the Apocalypse.

The fact that the book of the Revelation speaks of a future day of the Lord, the day when He Who once wore a crown of thorns shall come with many crowns, "Kings of kings and Lord of lords", is of itself a testimony to the resurrection, for there could be no 'Second Coming' if the first coming of the Saviour had ended in the grave. The title of Christ, given early in the first chapter is:

> "The First begotten from the dead" (Rev. i. 5).

This title is found in Col. i. 18. Here in Rev. i., the title is followed by "The Prince of the kings of the earth", whereas in line with its distinctive teaching, this title is followed in Col. i. 18 with the words "That in all things (not only over kings on earth) He might have the pre-eminence".

The opening vision of the Saviour was such, that we read that John "fell at His feet as dead", but the Lord said:

> "Fear not, I am the first and the last: I am He that liveth, and was dead; and behold I am alive for evermore, Amen; and have the keys of hell and of death" (Rev. i. 17, 18).

Here the Risen One is seen vested with full authority, and these keys are seen in Rev. xx. 1. In keeping with his whole history we find the Evil one giving a travesty of the resurrection in chapter xiii. 3:

> "And I saw one of his heads as it were wounded to death, and his deadly wound was healed: and all the world wondered after the beast."

The word used here, "wounded", is the same that is used of the "Lamb as it has been slain" (Rev. v. 6); "marveling" or "wondering" (thaumazo) is associated with both the false and the true resurrection. "Marvel not at this" (John v. 28), the disciples 'wondered' (Luke xxiv. 41); for the raising of the dead is indeed a marvelous miracle. The special reference to resurrection however in the Revelation is that spoken of in chapter xx.:

> "And I saw thrones, and they sat upon them, and judgment was given unto them: and I saw the souls of them that were beheaded for the witness of Jesus, and for the Word of God, and which had not worshipped the beast, neither his image, neither had received his mark upon their foreheads, or in their hands; and they lived and reigned with Christ a thousand years. But the rest of the dead lived not again until the thousand years were finished. THIS IS THE FIRST RESURRECTION" (Rev. xx. 4, 5).

What does the Apostle mean by "the first resurrection"? The Greek word so translated is protos, and this same word is translated "former" in Rev. xxi. 4 where the reference is not to the primal creation of Gen. i. 1, but to the creation of the six days. So, Luke could not say "The first treatise have I made" (Acts i. 1) but "the former treatise" when referring to the Gospel under his name. Proteros and proteron in Ephesians iv. 22, Heb. x. 32 and I Pet. i. 14, refer to something earlier by comparison. In Rev. xx. 5, 6 two resurrections are in view, namely the resurrection of "the overcomers", who live and reign with Christ a thousand years, and "the rest of the dead" who do not live again until the thousand years are finished. On such as attain to this "former resurrection", the second death hath no power, but they shall be priests of God and of Christ, and shall reign with Him a thousand years. Judgment according to "works" is repeated seven times in the letters to the churches (Rev. ii. and iii.), and "the overcomer" is specially addressed with words of encouragement in each church:

Ephesus	Promise	Paradise (ii. 7 and xxii. 2).
Smyrna	Promise	Second Death (ii. 11 and xx. 6).
Pergamos	Promise	New Name (ii. 17 and xix. 12).
Thyatira	Promise	Rod of Iron (ii. 27 and xii. 5).
Sardis	Promise	Not blot out (iii. 5 and xx. 12, 15).
Philadelphia	Promise	New Jerusalem (iii. 12 and xii. 2).
Laodicea	Promise	Sit in throne (iii. 21 and xx. 4).

Let us examine a little more closely those passages in these letters to the seven churches that impinge upon the subject before us namely, the resurrection.

> "He that overcometh shall not be hurt of the second death" (ii. 11).

This assurance follows the reference to martyrdom:

> "Fear none of those things which thou shalt suffer: behold, the devil shall cast some of you into prison, that ye may be tried: and ye shall have tribulation ten days: be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown of life" (Rev. ii. 10).

It is impossible to read these two verses as though they said "You will have a crown—so do not fear Hell"! Why should such an assurance be necessary? Again in Rev. iii. 5 "He that overcometh, shall clothed in white raiment: and I will not blot out his name out of the book of life".

The Book of Life (Rev. iii. 5; xx. 12, 15).

If the book of life mentioned here contains the names of all the elect, the redeemed and the saved, such passages as Rom. viii. 31-39 and John x. 28, 29 preclude the idea that a believer can ever be "lost" or his name blotted out. If this book of life refers to the gift of eternal life, it is a gratuitous promise to tell the "overcomer" that he will not have his name blotted out of that book; the possibility does not arise. In Rev. xiii. 8 and Rev. xvii. 8 the book of life is linked with the words "from the foundation of the world", and a reference to Luke xi. 50, 51 will associate this period with martyrdom, thus:

> "That the blood of all the prophets, which was shed from the foundation of the world, may be required of this generation; from the blood of Abel . . . . ."

The book of life in the Revelation is the Lamb's "Book of Martyrs". Paul speaks of the book of life once, not in Romans or Ephesians, but in the epistle of the "Prize", namely Philippians. Epaphroditus had risked his life in service, and with "Clement" and other fellow laborers (not simply fellow believers) had their names in "the book of life". The "Lamb's" book of life in the context we are considering may be limited to the calling that is in view in the Apocalypse. If the Lord could promise the overcomer that He would NOT blot his name out of the book of life, for the Lord does not trifle with His people, it must mean that those who failed to overcome did run that risk. And inasmuch as the gift of eternal life could not be at stake, then a prize, crown or reward must be in view.

Here for the time we must stop. We conclude this study with the words of Col. iii. 4, "When Christ, Who is our life, shall appear, then shall ye also appear with Him in glory". Let us "live . . . . . looking for that blessed hope . . . . ." (Titus ii. 12-14).

THE RESURRECTION OF THE DEAD
The Saved only, or Saved and unsaved?

There is no doubt whatsoever that resurrection is one of the most important and basic doctrines of the Scriptures. Without it salvation is a mockery, and the whole Divine purpose of redemption falls to pieces. It is not therefore dispensational, that is, belonging to any particular stewardship of truth, but runs as a foundation throughout every dispensation. Each dispensation has a resurrection as the means of attaining its prize, and also as a means of attaining its hope, and these need to be distinguished, otherwise contradiction and difficulty will result.

However, we are not concerned at the moment to elaborate this, but to ask if the Scriptures teach that the unsaved will be raised from the dead? Some definitely assert that this is not so. Certain movements have held this as a doctrine for many years, so there is nothing new in this view. Others believe it because they say they cannot see any point in God raising unsaved sinners from the grave. Let us state this at the outset. Our knowledge or capacity to understand is no basis for truth. If it were so, many of us would have a very small Bible! There is one criterion and one only, namely, what saith the Scriptures? And so to the Word of God we turn.

To those whose minds are already made up, John iii. 36 settles the matter:

> ". . . . . He that believeth not the Son shall not see life, but the wrath of God abideth on him."

But what does John mean by "life"? Fortunately we need be in no doubt of this. He uses the word zoe, life, 36 times, alternating "life" with "eternal life":

Life (i. 4).
    Eternal life (iii. 15, 16, 36).
Life (iii. 36).
    Eternal life (iv. 15, 36; v. 24).
Life (v. 24, 26, 29).
    Eternal life (v. 39).
Life (v. 40).
    Eternal life (vi. 27).
Life (vi. 33, 35).
    Eternal life (vi. 40, 47).
Life (vi. 48, 51, 53).
    Eternal life (vi. 54).
Life (vi. 63).
    Eternal life (vi. 68).
Life (viii. 12; x. 10).
    Eternal life (x. 28).
Life (xi. 25).
    Eternal life (xii. 25, 50).
Life (xiv. 6).
    Eternal life (xvii. 2, 3).
Life (xx. 31).

A consideration of all these passages will surely show that not once does the writer use "life" as pertaining to this present life. The expression "eternal life" needs care, as sometimes it is used as a free gift, and in other cases as a reward, as in the Gospel of Matthew. But this is not our subject at the moment, nor whether we should render aionios everlasting or age-abiding. The life that John speaks of is resident only in Christ (John xiv. 6; I John v. 11), and is experienced only by the regenerate. This is the life that the unsaved will not see or enjoy. But this does not prove that there cannot be a resurrection to a different kind of life, or a restoration to natural life. Lazarus was both dead and buried, yet, at the command of the One Who said "I am the Resurrection and the Life", he came forth alive from the grave. But with what kind of life? Did he put on corruption and immortality? If so, he ought to be with us today? In Matt. xxvii. 52, 53 we read:

> "And the graves were opened; and many bodies of the saints which slept arose; And came out of the graves after His resurrection, and went into the holy city and appeared unto many."

Here is a similar resurrection to that of Lazarus, and on this occasion it touched many. In Heb. xi. 35 the writer states:

> "Women received their dead raised to life again; and others were tortured, not accepting deliverance; that they might obtain a better resurrection."

This verse sets two resurrections side by side, a resurrection to what we may call natural life, that is, the present one, and in this case it cannot be limited to the saved as previously. The other resurrection is "better", that is, contrasted with the previous natural life, in that it gives incorruption and immortality and leads to a prize or crown. To get the truth on this subject balanced and complete, we must completely keep these two kinds of resurrection in mind.

Charles H. Welch, who was one of the profoundest students of Scripture of this century, after careful examination, rejected the doctrine of the non-resurrection of the unsaved. Not that he claimed infallibility, but at least, if we want truth, we should give attention to and test what he has written. Those who have The Alphabetical Analysis Part 7 should carefully read pages 203-210. For those who do not have this we will summarize. John v. 27-29 reads:

> ". . . . . the Father . . . . . hath given the Son to have life in Himself and hath given Him authority to execute judgment also, because He is the Son of Man. Marvel not at this; for the hour is coming, in the which ALL THAT ARE IN THE GRAVES shall hear His voice, And shall come forth; they that have done (practiced) evil, unto the resurrection of damnation."

Before we go any further, we must stress one golden rule of interpretation and that is, a text can only be understood in the light of its context. This rule never varies, and if broken, will only lead to error and disaster. It has been suggested that those who are raised to the resurrection of condemnation or judgment are saved people who are carnal, such as some of the Corinthians were (I Cor. iii. 1, 3). But we search in vain for any such idea in this passage. Rather is it an expansion of the truth of salvation offered to all who believe in Christ, not the service of those already saved:

> ". . . . . He that heareth My word, and believeth on Him that sent Me, hath everlasting life, and shall not come into condemnation; but is passed from death unto life" (v. 24).

The careful reader will note that the regenerate is guaranteed that he will not come into condemnation or judgment. Therefore the resurrection unto judgment of those who practiced evil cannot apply only to the saved otherwise we have a direct contradiction. Moreover, ALL that are in the graves must be universal, and therefore unbelievers must be included. The word krisis translated 'damnation' (A.V.) or 'judgment' (R.V.) occurs five times in John v., namely verses 22, 24, 27, 29 and 30, and these should be studied carefully.

Mr. Welch continues:

This, however, is not all. There is but one occurrence of krisis written in John's Gospel before this fifth chapter and that is John iii. 19, "This is the condemnation", and it is of the utmost importance because it contains not only the word krisis, but the only other occurrence in the four Gospels of the words translated "done evil". These words are in the original hoi ta phaula praxantes (John v. 29), and pas ho phaula prasson (John iii. 19), the one reading, "those that evil things having practiced", the other reading "every one who practices evil things". Nowhere else does John use the verb prasso (practice) throughout his writings than in John iii. 20 and John v. 29. Nowhere else does John use phaulos (evil) than in these self-same passages. The conclusion is irresistible. John v. is a continuation and expansion of John iii., and if John iii. deals with two classes, the saved and the lost, John v. deals with them also. If John iii. deals with one class, the saved, which are divided into two companies, then John v. will teach the same. Let us, therefore, turn to John iii., and examine this passage afresh.

The section commences with verse 14 and ends with verse 21. Two classes and two classes only are envisaged in the passage where Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness. Those who lived, and those who perished, and these alternatives are clearly stated in verse 16. At the close of the chapter, the testimony of John iii. 14-21 is summed up:

> "He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life: and he that believeth not the Son shall not see life; but the wrath of God abideth on him" (36).

They that have done good—the resurrection of LIFE.

They that have practiced evil—the resurrection of judgment, condemnation and wrath.

"This is the condemnation." Such hate the light and will not come to it, lest their evil deeds be exposed. Those who enter the resurrection of life are said to have done 'truth', and that their deeds are 'wrought in God'. John iii. 36 contains the only reference in this Gospel to the wrath of God. His other references, namely Rev. vi. 16, 17; xi. 18; xiv. 10; xvi. 19 and xix. 15, cannot possibly speak of the redeemed.

Whatever future judgment the saved person may have for the quality of his service (I Cor. iii. 11-15), he certainly will not experience God's wrath. Rom. v. 9 expressly declares that ". . . . . being justified by His blood, we shall be saved from wrath through Him", and further such is assured that he will not come into condemnation (Rom. viii. 1). However, the solemn occurrences of wrath in the book of Revelation show that this is directed primarily against the LIE and Babylonianism. Wrath is never associated with Adam's sin. Though the heart of God must have been intensely grieved at the sin of Adam, we do not once read of wrath in Gen. iii. We have heard it that when the unsaved die they are experiencing the wrath of God. But this is putting Divine wrath in a wrong context. Many an unregenerate man has died peacefully in his bed, and if this is experiencing God's wrath we do not wonder if some think the awfulness of this has been greatly exaggerated. The day of wrath, as the Book of the Revelation teaches, is yet future, and it is a most solemn and terrible experience to undergo as the seven vial judgments testify, for in them "is completed the wrath of God" (Rev. xv. 1, 7).

The Apostle Paul told the pagan philosophers at Athens, that God "will judge the world in righteousness by that Man Whom He hath ordained" (Acts xvii. 30, 31). These philosophers were certainly not saved, so Paul is not addressing saved people who were walking carnally, and in order for the message to have had a very practical bearing, it must have included them when they were informed of this future day of judgment, in which case they will be raised from the dead. Later on in Acts xxiv. 15, Paul declares before Felix, that there will be a "resurrection of the dead, both of the just and the unjust", and Felix trembled when he heard of "judgment to come" (xxiv. 25). Can "unjust" ever describe a saved person? Adikos 'unjust' occurs eleven times, and we give the references (Matt. v. 45; Luke xvi. 10, 11; xviii. 11; Acts xxiv. 15; Rom. iii. 5 (??); I Cor. vi. 1, 9; Heb. vi. 10; I Pet. iii. 18; II Pet. ii. 9). The reader should consult each verse and note the context. There is only one reference that might be construed as referring to the saved, and that is the unjust steward of Luke xvi. But if the way the Holy Spirit has used a word is a guide to its meaning, then it must normally refer to the unsaved. "The unrighteous shall not inherit the kingdom of God" (I Cor. vi. 9), and it is certain that Paul never uses the word "unjust" of a saved person. Peter, in his first epistle, refers to Christ bearing the sins of His people, "the Just for the unjust" (I Pet. iii. 18), and later on in the second epistle states that the "Lord knoweth how to deliver the godly out of temptations, and to reserve the unjust unto the day of judgment to be punished" (II Pet. ii. 9). In the third chapter he declares "the heavens and the earth which are now . . . . . are reserved unto fire against the day of judgment and perdition of ungodly men" (iii. 7). These contexts cannot possibly relate to the saved. Peter is using the word 'ungodly' in exactly the same way that Jude does (see Jude 4, 15, 18).

(Matt. v. 45): That ye may be the children of your Father which is in heaven: for he maketh his sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust.

(Luke xvi. 10): He that is faithful in that which is least is faithful also in much: and he that is unjust in the least is unjust also in much.

(Luke xvi. 11): If therefore ye have not been faithful in the unrighteous[94] mammon, who will commit to your trust the true riches?

(Luke xviii. 11): The Pharisee stood and prayed thus with himself, God, I thank thee, that I am not as other men are, extortioners, unjust, adulterers, or even as this publican.

(Acts xxiv. 15): And have hope toward God, which they themselves also allow, that there shall be a resurrection of the dead, both of the just and unjust.

(I Cor. vi. 1): Dare any of you, having a matter against another, go to law before the unjust, and not before the saints?

(I Cor. vi. 9): Know ye not that the unrighteous shall not inherit the kingdom of God? Be not deceived: neither fornicators, nor idolaters, nor adulterers, nor effeminate, nor abusers of themselves with mankind,

(Heb. vi. 10): For God is not unrighteous to forget your work and labour of love, which ye have shewed toward his name, in that ye have ministered to the saints, and do minister.

(I Pet. iii. 18): For Christ also hath once suffered for sins, the just for the unjust, that he might bring us to God, being put to death in the flesh, but quickened by the Spirit:

(II Pet. ii. 9): The Lord knoweth how to deliver the godly out of temptations, and to reserve the unjust unto the day of judgment to be punished:

We may well ask, who are those who are cast into the lake of fire in Rev. xx. 15? Are they the saved or the lost? In verse 12, John states that he saw the "dead, small and great, stand before God". They were raised from the dead, for verse 13 says:

> "And the sea gave up the dead which were in it; and death and hell (marg., the grave) delivered up the dead which were in them . . . . ."

If the unregenerate are never to be raised from the grave, then these referred to in this context must all be saved people. This is the only occasion in Scripture which refers to a resurrection from the sea of those who have been drowned. Are we going to assert that only saved people have ever been drowned? Surely we must include the unsaved here!

In Matt. xi. the Lord begins to upbraid the cities in which most of His mighty works were done. Regarding Chorazin and Bethsaida He said:

> "But I say unto you, It shall be more tolerable for Tyre and Sidon at the day of judgment, than for you" (Matt. xi. 21), and of Capernaum (verses 23, 24):

> ". . . . . for if the mighty works, which have been done in thee, had been done in Sodom, it would have remained until this day. But I say unto you, that it shall be more tolerable for the land of Sodom in the day of judgment than for thee."

There is surely no need to stress the character of the men of Sodom. They were certainly not the Lord's children, yet He assures us there is a future reckoning for them and also for the inhabitants of Tyre and Sidon who rejected Him after so much miraculous proof of His Messiahship. In the next chapter the Lord declares to the opposing Pharisees and Scribes that the men of Nineveh and the queen of the South would rise in the judgment with "this generation" and condemn it. The word translated 'rise' is anistemi the normal word for physical resurrection, and is used some 38 times in this sense. The queen of the South was not of the chosen race of Israel, nor were the men of Nineveh. God had instructed Jonah to go to Nineveh, the capital of Assyria, and warn them His judgment for their evil ways and God withheld the threatened judgment, for they had not filled their cup of iniquity. Assyria was well known for its violence and cruelty. The king of Nineveh sent out a decree that they should amend their ways and turn from "the violence that is in their hands" (Jonah iii. 8). "And God saw their works that they turned from their evil way and God repented of the evil that He had said that He would do unto them; and He did it not" (Jonah iii. 10).

However, the judgment did fall on Assyria later. It should be clear that the repentance of the Ninevites to which Christ refers in Matt. xii. was a cessation from their abounding sin that called for judgment. In no sense can we say that it turned the Ninevites into the people of God as Israel were. Yet they are to rise in resurrection and condemn the favoured generation to which the Lord came in the flesh!

Coming to the O.T. and Isa. xxvi. 14:

> "They are dead, they shall not live; they are the deceased, they shall not rise, therefore hast thou visited and destroyed them, and made all their memory to perish."

The 'deceased' does not refer to ordinary human beings but to the Rephaim, having their origin in the days of Satan, corrupted all flesh on the earth except Noah and his family. The word is used in the singular and plural, and we see no valid reason for making any difference in the meaning of singular and plural for the simple reason that neither rahphah (singular) or rephaim (plural) are the normal words for death or the dead. These are muth translated to die some 420 times and maveth death 128 times. The Rephaim, as monsters, are to have no resurrection, "they shall not rise". If the reader has The Companion Bible he should read appendices 23 and 25 which deal with this subject including the Rephaim very fully, also The Berean Expositor Volume XX, p.193 in the article "Who are the Deceased?" The Companion Bible notes each of the eight occurrences of the plural Rephaim, including Prov. xxi. 16, "The man that wandereth out of the way of understanding shall remain in the congregation of the dead (rephaim)". (See also ii. 18 and The Companion Bible note). Prov. xxi. 16 clearly teaches that the sinner will end up in destruction like the Rephaim. The word remain 'nuach', does not mean "to permanently stay in" but "to rest". Young's Literal Version read "in an assembly of Rephaim resteth", or Moffatt, "will find his rest among the dead below". The assembly of the Rephaim is not a description of dead human beings as such. If it were, then the usual word muth would have been used and not rephaim. As The Companion Bible points out, there is no reason why this word, either singular or plural, should not be treated as a proper name, "Rephaim", in all its occurrences and not just ten times as it is in the A.V. It would then be apparent that it does not refer to the normal dead, but to the monsters and their descendants of Gen. vi., and so cannot be used to support the idea that there is no resurrection for the unsaved.

As for Psa. i. 5 "Therefore the ungodly shall not stand in the judgment", the Hebrew qum (stand) is of frequent occurrence in the O.T. "Arise", "rise", "rise up" translates 354 of its occurrences. Its basic meaning is "to stand" or "stand firm", and there is no need to render it in any other way in Psa. i. Moffatt's version is "When judgments come, the ungodly shall not stand, nor shall the sinful last in the community of the just". No indeed, they are likened to the chaff which is swept away by the wind (verse 4) which clearly shows what the phrase "the ungodly shall not stand" means. Psa. i. 5 surely gives no secure basis for teaching that the unregenerate have no resurrection from the dead.

We might further consider the implication of the challenging question put by the Apostle Paul in Rom. iii. 5, 6, "For then how shall God judge the world?" or of Heb. ix. 27, "And as it is appointed unto men once to die, but after this the judgment", but we feel there is no need to pursue this matter any further. If only one verse of the Scriptures clearly teaches the raising to life of the unsaved, then we cannot assert with truth that they will be left in the grave for ever.

Does it really matter whether we believe this or not? Eph. vi. brings before us the armour that God has provided so that the child of God can be safe from the malignity of his great enemies, Satan and the world-rulers of this present darkness (vi. 12). Truth is part of this protective shield (verse 14). We dare not let error of any kind come in, otherwise there is a hole in the shield through which the fiery darts of the evil one will surely penetrate. Any departure from Truth simply gives place to the Devil, the arch-deceiver.

The N.T. clearly shows that resurrection is so basic and important that we cannot afford to be wrong about it in any detail. Hymenaeus and Philetus did not deny the truth of resurrection; they merely mis-dated it, yet this brought upon them the severe condemnation of the Apostle Paul, who asserted that such teaching had an evil effect on others and overthrew their faith, and in doing so militated against the progress of the Truth of God (II Tim. i. 17, 18). Men are not helpless machines. They are moral creatures with a responsibility to their Creator. To what degree this is so, only He knows and we do not pretend to judge. To those who have never had the witness of the Person and redeeming work of the Lord Jesus Christ, there is conscience, the law in miniature, speaking to their minds (Rom. ii. 14-16). God is not only the righteous Judge of all His people, but the Judge of all the earth, the moral Governor of the Universe. "Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?" (Gen. xviii. 25). We leave the future of the unbeliever in His hands at the Day of Judgment.

Sanctification in the Epistles of the Mystery.

pp. 197 - 200

Sanctification falls under 3 headings: (a) Elective. (b) Redemptive. (c) Progressive and practical. These three aspects of sanctification for the members of the church of the One body are set forth in three passages hat are contained in Ephesians and Colossians.

1. Elective. "According as He hath chosen us in Him, before the foundation of the world, that we should be holy and without blame before Him in love" (Eph. i. 4).
2. Redemptive. "In the body of His flesh through death, to present you holy and unblameable and unreproveable in His sight" (Col. i. 22).
3. Progressive. "That He might sanctify and cleanse it with the washing of water by the Word, that He might present it to Himself a glorious church, not having spot, or wrinkle, or any such thing, but that it should be holy and without blemish" (Eph. v. 26, 27).

Two words are repeated in these three references. One is evident to the English reader. The word "Holy" is in each passage hagios in the Greek. The second word amomos is translated "without blame" (Eph. i. 4); "without blemish" (Eph. v. 27); and "unblameable" (Col. i. 22). Sanctification and Holiness therefore can be considered as (1) A state in which there is "no blemish". (2) A state in which there is "no blame". These two states are further expanded and explained by the context and by the terms with which they are associated. These associations are (1) near, (2) remote. The near association are such as "before Him", "In His sight", and such words as "cleanse", "wash", "spot", "wrinkle". The remote associations are the use of the word translated "without blemish", in the typical offerings of the Levitical law. The other word "unreproveable" is connected with the court of law, and so reveals that holiness includes justification and righteousness. This is a mighty theme, and demands our most prayerful attention, for the subject itself is one that has been "bought with a price!"

"Without blame", "without blemish", "unblameable" are three translations of the one word amomos.

This Greek word has two associations which necessarily colour its meaning (1) The use of the term in classical Greek. (2) The employment of the term by the LXX translation of the Hebrew O.T. The use of the term in the LXX is by far the most important so far as our understanding of the doctrine is concerned, but its use by the Greeks themselves is suggestive.

"A" in the word amomos is a negative, momos means "blame, ridicule, or disgrace". Momus was the name given to the son of night, who is called "The critic of God"—the fault finder. The word was used by the Greeks in connection with their sacrifice. A momoskopos was one who looked for blemishes in the sacrificial animals, while a momates was a mocker, a scoffer.

The use of the term momos to refer to blemishes in the sacrificial victim is the one adopted by the translators of the LXX, and upon consulting the original Hebrew we discover that the Greek word momos occurs 17 times in the LXX and translates but one Hebrew word mum, meaning blemish, blot or spot. (Some concordances list m'um separately.) This Hebrew word is translated "blemish" 16 times, "blot" twice, and "spot" three times, one reference, namely Deut. xxxii. 5, being translated mometos, which leaves but three occurrences which are translated by some other Greek word.

There are two passages in Job which are translated from the LXX into English as follows:

> "For thus shall thy countenance shine again, as pure water" (Job xi. 15).
> "If too I have touched gifts with my hands" (Job xxxi. 7).

In the first passage Zophar the Naamathite is urging Job to put away wickedness, which he supposed was the cause of Job's affliction. In the second passage Job maintains his integrity and brings his defence to a close. The value of these two passages is that the "blemishlessness" of the Levitical sacrifice employs a word that originally pertained to the realm of morals, "blame" being predicated only of moral intelligent creatures, "blemishlessness" being its equivalent in non-moral types. This moral meaning reappears in the book of Proverbs, as we might have anticipated, where it occurs in Prov. ix. 7, and which the LXX is translated by the English "shall disgrace himself".

A somewhat problematic passage is that found in Deut. xxxii. 5 where the A.V. reads "They have corrupted themselves, their spot is not the spot of His children: they are a perverse and crooked generation".

This the R.V. retranslates as follows:

> "They have dealt corruptly with Him, they are not His children, it is their blemish: they are a perverse and crooked generation."

Coming now to the employment of the term in the Levitical law, we find that it is used of the physical condition of both priest and offering:

> "Speak unto Aaron, saying, Whosoever he be of thy seed in their generations that hath any blemish, let him not approach to offer the bread of his God" (Lev. xxi. 17).

A list follows that includes being blind, lame, flat-nosed, anything superfluous, scurvy or scabbed.

Concerning the offering, it is written:

> "Ye shall offer at your own will a male without blemish . . . . . but whatsoever hath a blemish, that shall ye not offer: for it shall not be acceptable for you . . . . . it shall be perfect to be accepted" (Lev. xxii. 19-21).

The fact that the word "blemish" originally had a moral significance shows that the Levitical sacrifices were no dead formalism, which the prophets repudiated, demanding in their stead a moral and just manner of life (Micah vi. 6-8). It was because Israel failed to relate the physical blemishlessness of the sacrifice with the moral requirement of the law that the Prophets used such scathing language as they did.

When therefore we read in Eph. i. 4 that the church was chosen that it should be "without blame"; when we read in Col. i. 22 that those who were aliens by wicked works had not only been reconciled, but presented "unblameable"; and when Eph. v. 27 uses the words "without blemish" of the Church, we realize that by electing grace, by redeeming love, and by the continuous washing of the water of the Word, the spiritual equivalent of both priest and sacrifice in Israel's Tabernacle service becomes a reality in the dispensation of grace.

Col. i. 22 adds to this condition yet another—"unreproveable". Anegkletos occurs but five times in the Greek N.T. and in the passages other than that of Col. i. it is translated "blameless" (I Cor. i. 8; I Tim. iii. 10; Titus i. 6, 7).

Egkaleo from which this word is derived is a law-court term, and occurs 7 times in the Greek N.T. Six of these occurrences are found in the Acts (xix. 38, 40; xxiii. 28, 29; xxvi. 2, 7), where the word is translated in the A.V. "implead", "be called in question", or "accuse". The seventh occurrence is in that glorious chapter, the eighth chapter of Romans, where the challenge rings out "Who shall lay anything to the charge of God's elect?" The accuser's place in the court of law was at the right hand. "Satan standing at his right hand" (Zech. iii. 1), "let Satan stand at his right hand" (Psa. cix. 6). When however the Apostle contemplates the challenge in the High Court of God, He sees Christ "Who is even at the right hand of God" (Rom. viii. 34). The holiness of the believer therefore is set forth in terms both of Tabernacle and Law Court. Associated with these terms are subsidiary, but important ones, that should not be passed over without remark. This state of blemishlessness is said to be "before Him" (Eph. i. 4) and "in His sight" (Col. i. 22). There is no difference however in the original, the word in both passages being katenopion. The root op, whether written with a long or short "o", while originally separate, have become merged in the process of time, and refer to the "eye", and optano means "to see". The reader will recognize the origin of the English words "optics" and "optician". Enopion in the simpler form is of frequent occurrence, and is found in the phrases "in the sight of God" (II Cor. iv. 2) and "before God" (Acts vii. 46). Katenopion the intensive form occurs but five times, as follows:

> "In the sight of God speak we in Christ" (2 Cor. 2:17).
> "We speak before God in Christ" (2 Cor. 12:19).
> "That we should be holy and without blame before Him" (Eph. 1:4).
> "Holy and unblameable and unreproveable in His sight" (Col. 1:22).
> "To present you faultless before the presence of His glory" (Jude 24).

That searching Eye that the Apostle acknowledged, looked into his heart and discerned his motives (II Cor. ii. 17; xii. 19) from which the unredeemed must shrink in fear, that searching Eye, looking upon the sinner saved by grace, pronounces over him the words of the O.T. "Thou art all fair my love, there is no spot in thee" (Cant.4:7). These three passages, presenting as they do three aspects of sanctification, are of supreme interest to every member of the One body. We will not go into the great question of the doctrine of election, neither can we discuss the true translation of the word katabole, translated in Eph. i. 4 "foundation" for the present purpose. It amounts to much the same thing whether we read that this intention on the part of God, that the Church should be "holy and without blemish" dates from before the 'foundation' of the world, or from its 'overthrow' as recorded in Gen. i. 2. In either case, the choice took place long ages before man was created, consequently human merit plays no part in it. Here we are on the ground of sheer grace.

In Colossians, the subject shifts forward into time, and deals with the object of sanctification as one who had become an 'alien' and an 'enemy' by wicked works. Here election is unmentioned, it is redemption that is the only ground upon which we stand.

"In the body of His flesh through death" places sanctification squarely upon the basis of the One offering, where by the very nature of things, all human merit or co-operation is impossible.

In the third phase, sanctification is likened to "washing", and the washing is brought about by "the Word" which is likened to "water". While the passage ends, as do the others with the words "holy and without blemish", this condition is here interpreted as being without "spot, or wrinkle, or any such thing". This is the practical, the progressive, the day-to-day sanctification, the growth in grace that arises from and is entirely dependent on the elective and redemptive phases already considered. Finally, in two places, the word "present" is used.

> "In the body of His flesh through death to present you" (Col. i. 22).
> "That He might present it to Himself a glorious church" (Eph. v. 27).

It will be remembered that in Jude also we read "to present you faultless", but it must be noted, that while Jude 24 uses the word histemi, "to set, place or station", Ephesians and Colossians use paristemi, "to set, place or station ALONGSIDE", so near, so high, so wonderful is the high calling of God made known in the dispensation of the Mystery. This word occurs 12 times in the Gospels, 13 times in the Acts and 14 times in Paul's epistles, and the fourteen passages in Paul's epistles contain enough teaching to justify a separate study. This we commend to the reader who would be fully apprized of the wonder of His calling in grace.

Dear Fellow-Members,

It hardly seems possible that two years have gone by, thus completing yet another volume of The Berean Expositor. Much has happened during this time, but one thing has remained constant, namely the exceeding grace of God which has supplied all our needs.

To all who have assisted in any way, both here and abroad, we tender our grateful thanks. It is only by practical fellowship in so many ways that makes the production of this Scriptural magazine possible. The days darken around us, making the need for such a witness the more urgent. The only light that can pierce this darkness is the light of the Word of God "rightly divided".

Once again we ask all who value the Truth to join with us in the circulation of this magazine, seeking to extend it if possible, and may we by lip and life "shine as lights in the world, holding forth the Word of life" (Phil. ii. 15, 16).

WHAT GOD CANNOT DO 11

God is the strength of my heart, and my portion for ever (Psa. lxxiii. 26).

p. 20

What strength one has, if this be true! God is the strength of my heart, not merely of my hands or my brain, but at the very seat of all, my heart, but let it be observed that the one who makes this boast in God, also realizes his own weakness and failure. "My flesh and my heart FAILETH BUT"—the verse before shows how the lessons of adversity and trouble had led away from human aid; none in heaven or earth to be desired like unto Him, and He, the portion for ever. It is easy to write; it is easy to speak beautiful words on these things, but it requires great grace to take the position of "when I am weak, then am I strong—most gladly therefore will I rather glory in my infirmities" (II Cor. xii. 10). Such was the experience of Paul and of numbers of the saints of differing dispensations. May we know this Divine strength in our weakness.

The "Amen" of Prayer

p. 60

What does a believer mean when he says "amen" at the end of a prayer (perhaps especially when the prayer has been spoken by someone else)? The answer generally given to this question is, "so be it", that is to say, "I agree with the prayer and also desire the performance of the things asked". But should the response, "amen", convey only this?

The word "amen" derives from the Hebrew aman, as does the general word used for faith (or faithfulness) in the O.T. (emunah). Underlying these words are at least three basic, inter-connected ideas, which ought to be taken into consideration in the usage of the response "amen":

(1) Stability. In Exod. xvii. 2 Moses' hands "were steady (emunah) until the going down of the sun". As Joshua fought with Amalek, so Moses (with Aaron and Hur staying up his hands) sat on the top of the hill with the rod of God. This is surely a picture of unwavering prayer before God—the "steady" hands of Moses.

(2) Truth. Deut. xxxii. 4 refers to God as "The Rock", emphasizing the reliance Israel may place upon Him because of His stability. He is also called "A God of truth (emunah)" in the same verse.

(3) Faith or Faithfulness. In the same chapter the Lord's complaint against Israel is concerned with their forsaking of "The Rock" that bare them, and He calls them a perverse generation, "children in whom is no faith (emun)" (verses 18, 20).

In the N.T. amen is mostly translated "verily" (an emphatic assertion of truth) as in the Lord's "Verily, verily, I say unto you" (John i. 51, etc.). Paul emphasized the truth of his words by the negative "I lie not", and perhaps also, "This is a faithful (true) saying" (Rom. ix. 1; I Tim. i. 15; iii. 1).

Applying these thoughts to the "amen" of prayer it may be said that in responding so, the believer ought to be assured: (a) That the prayer expresses truth (otherwise no 'amen' should be said) for it is possible to 'ask amiss' (James iv. 3). In fact, the response "amen" at the end of a prayer is an assertion that the believer agrees that the prayer is truth. (b) That the prayer, since it is truth, will be heard by the God on Whom one can rely, in Who one can trust (faith).

Hence prayer is seen as an aspect of resting in the Lord, and "amen" the expression of that trust which submits all its desires to the furtherance of the truth (Thy will be done). All prayer should be asked in Christ's name, and it is not without point that He is called, "The Amen, the faithful and true witness" (Rev. iii. 14).

He Shall Glorify Me

p. 80

One of the most unhealthy aspects of present-day evangelical movements is their over-emphasis of the Spirit and spiritual gifts (especially "tongues"). We say over-emphasis, because it is right and proper that a place should be found in our theology for the Person and Work of the Holy Spirit, providing it is the right place. Unfortunately, the continuing failure to recognize the change of dispensation at Acts xxviii. 28 is leading more and more Christians into a position where the spiritual gifts of the Acts period (I Cor. xii.) are fast taking the place of Christ, and if He is mentioned at all it is only in an emotional whisper or a rowdy chorus, and then usually as "Jesus".

Over against this the Scriptural position stands in strong contrast:

> "He shall glorify Me: for He shall receive of Mine, and shall show it unto you" (John xvi. 14).

The Spirit's ministry is to glorify Christ, by announcing the things which belong to Him. This "Comforter" is also called "The Spirit of Truth"; the Father's word, given through the Son, being truth (xvii. 8, 14, 17). By comparing Eph. v. 18 with Col. iii. 16 (in context) it is seen that the present ministry of the Spirit is to fill the believer with the word of Christ; the believer's responsibility being to let that word dwell in him richly in all wisdom. (See further The Berean Expositor, Volume XLV, p.218).

That it was right to desire spiritual gifts during the Acts period is evident from I Cor. xii. 31, and yet even then Paul spoke of "a more excellent way" ("love", I Cor. xiii.). The gift of tongues in particular seems to have appealed to the 'carnal' Corinthians, but its proper place, as given to Gentiles, is seen in I Cor. xiv. 21, 22, a 'sign' to "this people" (the Jew, the sign people—I Cor. i. 22). What relevance has it then today?

Things ordained of God are right in their proper dispensation, but take them out of that setting and they become no more than "the tradition of men" (see Col. ii.). The present "tongues-movement" seems to be part of the old cry that goes up from time to time under such phrases as, "Back to Pentecost . . . the Primitive Church . . . the words of Jesus . . .", but it is perhaps more dangerous. One cannot help remembering the words of Paul in II Thess. ii. 9 ("power and signs and lying wonders"), reflecting upon whether the present situation is perhaps a precursor to that day of delusion which accompanies the presence of the Lawless One himself.

The only safe way for the true believer is to apply the acid test of all ministry—"does it glorify Christ?" If it does then it is truly of the Holy Spirit; otherwise it should be avoided at all costs as the deception of the Evil One.

BRIAN E. SHERRING

Herein is Love

p. 100

The origin of true love lies beyond humanity. Sinful man is incapable in himself of producing such love, for it springs from a source outside of himself—"God is love". But thanks be to Him this love has been lavished upon man in the Person and work of the Lord Jesus Christ, and man may now, through the acceptance of Him, responded to and give back, something of that same love "shed abroad in our hearts".

Love, as a response, can only ever be that which is produced in man, "We love, because He first loved us" (I John iv. 19 R.V.). It requires His initiative to trigger off any spark of true love in ourselves, and this is surely the right order in an understanding of its real meaning; He initiates, we respond. True love in us is the fire kindled by the love of God. C. S. Lewis wrote:

> "Our role must always be that of patient to agent, female to male, mirror to light, echo to voice. Our highest victory must be response, not initiative. To experience the love of God in a true, and not an illusory form, is therefore to experience it as our surrender to His demand, our conformity to His desire" (The Problem of Pain).

But for all this it must never be imagined that our love is to be negative or passive, for we are called upon to "Walk in love" (positive action), and the example of Christ before us (Eph. v. 1, 2). God may have given His Son (John iii. 16), even sent His Son (I John iv. 10), but in the final analysis, "Christ loved . . . . . and gave up Himself for us; this being the evidence not only of His obedience (Phil. ii. 8) but of His oneness with the Father (John x. 11, 30).

In a very much smaller measure our response to the love of God should partake of the same nature; not response from a feeling of duty (although we most certainly owe Him all), but that which is drawn from us as a result of our appreciation of His love, and our unity with Him.

The true nature of the love of God may be seen pictured in the beautiful story of Abraham and Isaac:

> "Abraham took the wood of the burnt offering, and laid it upon Isaac his son; and he took the fire in his hand, and a knife; and they went both of them together" (Gen. xxii. 6).

The love manifested here involved tremendous cost to both father and son; any love we seek to manifest (whilst it can never hope to approach that shown in the Father and Son) must reflect the same image. If it cost God much, will it not also involve the same in us?

Like Passions As We

pp. 119, 120

One of the evidences for the "inspiration" of Scripture is surely seen in that the Bible does not whitewash its heroes, nor present them in a light untrue to the realities of life as we know it. The men and women who are presented to us as examples of the life of faith are not superhuman beings exempted from the stresses, strains and failures of which we ordinary mortals know so much, but were (as Elijah) "subject to like passions" (Greek homoiopathees, from homoios like and pathos being affected, suffer).

Abraham, set forth for our consideration in the gallery of faith, was by no means without blame in the light of his earthly life revealed in more detail in the O.T. For all the fact that he went out, not knowing whither he went . . . . . sojourned in the land of promise as in a strange country . . . . . offered up Isaac with the conviction that God would raise him from the dead (Heb. xi. 8-10, 17-19), he nevertheless was a man who on two occasions falsely represented the relationship he had with Sarah, thereby placing her in danger of corruption (Gen. xii. 11-20; xx. 2-18).

Moses was disobedient before the rock in Horeb, when he struck it twice and thereby forfeited the position of leading Israel into Canaan (Numb. xx. 8, 11, 12), and he another example of Heb. xi. So likewise David, who descended to the very depths of sin when he committed both adultery and murder in the affair with Bathsheba and Uriah (IISam.xi.) and yet for all that he was nevertheless, a man after God's own heart to the One Who knows what is in man.

In the N.T., the leader and spokesman of the Twelve Apostles, Peter, a man who was eventually to lay down his life for Christ (John xxi. 18, 19), denied His Lord thrice (John xviii. 17, 25, 27) and was later (even after the Resurrection and Pentecost) "to be blamed" in the matter of his actions at Antioch (Gal. ii. 11, 12).

Paul and Barnabas were in sharp contention over the ministry of John Mark, so much so that they "departed asunder one from the other" (Acts xv. 36-39). The same apostle Paul made no claim to being any different from other men in this respect, recognizing himself as being subject to the same pressures common to all:

> ". . . We also are men of like passions (homoiopathees) with you . . ." (Acts xiv. 15).
> "Temptation . . . . . such as is common to man" (I Cor. x. 13).
> "The sin which doth so easily beset us" (Heb. xii. 1).

In the light of these things, we may perhaps draw a measure of comfort from the fact that God does not await our perfection before He can use us; "He knoweth our frame; He remembereth that we are dust" (Psa. ciii. 14). He could well do all His work without us, but chooses not to do so. He is prepared to work through frail, imperfect humans such as we all know ourselves basically to be, a fact that becomes evident from the number of times we have to pick ourselves up from the dust, having failed Him again in some way or other. What a God of grace we have our dealings with!

As a corrective to what has so far been said, it must not be imagined that failure can be in any way condoned, or sin treated lightly. "Easily-surrounding sin" and temptation may be part of the experience of man, whether believer or otherwise, but for the former there exists a power to overcome even under the most extreme pressure:

> "There hath no temptation (or trial) taken you but such as is common to man: but God is faithful, Who will not suffer you to be tempted above that ye are able; but will with the temptation (trial) also make the issue, for you to be able to bear it" (I Cor. x. 13).

A realization of what is involved in the believer's position "in Christ" is the answer to all temptation and trial; the truth of Rom. xi. must become experimentally true for the believer, if victory is to be his experience.

As with all subjects, balance must characterize our understanding of ourselves before God. Our old man was crucified with Christ that the body of sin might be made ineffective, but to claim (as some alas do) that sinless perfection has been thereby achieved, is to contradict experience in the Christian life. The lives of God's saints, in both Old Testament and New give the lie to it, and an honest stocktaking of our own life will leave us in no doubt.

But on the other hand we can rejoice in this, that He can still use us, and indeed wants to use us, for all the fact that we fail him in thought, word and deed. May we be imbued with the same desire, confident of this fact, that the God Who looks upon the heart knows our inmost motives. Fail Him, we most certainly will, but never let us ever lose the endeavour to serve Him to the end. The great men of Scripture did just this, and they were men "of like passions as we".

What God Cannot Do

pp. 179, 180

It has often been maintained that "God can do anything". No doubt such a statement has been based on Luke i. 37 ("with God nothing shall be impossible") or Matt. xix. 26 ("with God all things are possible"), but it has been made without regard to the nearer and remoter contexts of these passages, and without a thought of the implications involved. The plain fact of the matter is that Scripture clearly declares that,

"God cannot lie" (Titus i. 2).

If this were not so; if in fact God could do literally anything, then we who have believed would have no security in salvation, nor confidence in any of the promises made by God with respect to our calling and hope. But here (in the context of the promise of eternal life) we are told that He cannot lie.

Similarly in II Tim. ii. 13 we read of Christ that "He remains faithful; He is not able to deny Himself", or as Moffatt puts it,

"He cannot be untrue to Himself", and this quite independently of the behaviour of the believer, who may be faith*ful* or faith*less* ("If we believe not" A.V., "If we are faithless" Moffatt). Faith*less*ness in a believer, an unwillingness to endure (A.V. 'suffer') for the Lord, will cost him the reward of reigning with Christ—this he will be denied (12)—but his "life" is secure, being linked in identification with Christ (11), which the Lord cannot undo.

The God with Whom we have to do, revealed to us in Christ, not only acts in a true manner, but is Himself the embodiment of truth ("I am . . . . . the truth" John xiv. 6). He cannot in any way be untrue to Himself, nor be associated with anything other than truth. Further it follows that He cannot produce any situation that is a lie or a contradiction, so that the argument (so often heard on the lips of disbelievers) "If God is . . . . . why doesn't He . . . . ."?, falls down in that it demands that He produces something contradictory to what He is. He is already working out His purpose in creation in harmony with His own nature and Being, in harmony with truth; to demand that He act differently is to deny this, and to accuse Him of association with the lie.

"The lie" is the child of the devil; it did not originate in God, Who is truth:

> "The devil . . . . . he has no place in the truth because there is no truth in him: when he tells a lie, he is expressing his own nature, for he is a liar and the father of lies" (John viii. 44, Moffatt).

The conception of "father" here may be taken in the same sense as in Gen. iv. 20, 21, where "Jabal . . . . . was the father of such as dwell in tents" and "Jubal . . . . . was the father of all such as handle the harp and organ", i.e. originator, inventor, author, the first to introduce. The lie was sired by the devil; he first introduced it. With that system God Himself has nothing in common, for He cannot lie.

How important it is then not to make unthinking statements concerning what God can do, plausible though they may seem before examination. To do so is to play straight into the hands of the critics of truth, who so often accuse our God for "allowing" this or that, for not "stepping in" to stop violence, suffering, etc. If we believe in a God of truth, we believe also that He has, is, and will act only according to truth, however difficult it may be for us to appreciate it at the time. The devil's "lies" may seem attractive, seem to offer so much (they did to Eve, Gen. iii.), but they will only bring unhappiness, failure and death, and they will all come eventually to nought.

It may at first seem a strange thing for the believer to rejoice that God cannot do something, but it is only the expression of joy in the security and confidence that we can have in a God of truth, Who is unable to act in any other way than in harmony with what He is.

> "Steadfast—He rules aright, His methods all in order due, a God trusty and wholly true, upright and honest" (Deut. xxxii. 4, Moffatt).

My cup runneth over
Salvation to the uttermost (Heb. vii. 25).
p. 192

Salvation is the immediate result of believing the gospel of grace:

> "The gospel of Christ . . . . . the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth" (Rom. i. 16).
> "Behold now is the day of salvation" (II Cor. vi. 2).

Nevertheless, salvation is also spoken of as a future blessing:

> "For now is our salvation nearer than when we believed" (Rom. xiii. 11).
> "For an helmet the hope of salvation" (I Thess. v. 8).
> "For we are saved by hope: but hope that is seen is not hope: for what a man seeth, why doth he yet hope for" (Rom. viii. 24).

There is not only a salvation "from", but a salvation "to". The children of Israel were not only delivered out of the land of Egypt, but were preserved during the forty years wandering of their elders, and shown the salvation of the Lord, when they entered into the land of promise" (Ps. xci. 16).

The cup of salvation truly runneth over. Faith looks back to the cross and sees salvation accomplished. Hope looks forward to the future glory and sees salvation realized. The salvation which is by His "life" is a salvation "to" a goal, whereas the salvation which is by His death is that which is "from" a condition of bondage of death.

The Hebrews were taught this glorious truth, for in Heb. vii. the Apostle wrote:

> "Wherefore He is able to save them to the uttermost that come unto God by Him, seeing He ever liveth to make intercession for them" (Heb. vii. 25).

This cannot be the initial salvation which is consequent upon believing the gospel. The sinner is not saved because Christ "ever liveth", he is first of all saved because "Christ died for the ungodly". The sinner who believes is saved from sin and its consequences, but the believer is saved all along the way until he enters glory, because the Savour Who once died now lives to die no more. Surely those who know a peace that passes knowledge, joy that is unspeakable, and a salvation that covers past, present and future, surely these can take the cup of their salvation, and as they call on the name of the Lord can confess with full hearts,

"My cup runneth over".

The Church of Matt. xvi.

No.6. Does the singular "church" of Matt. xvi. 18 rule out the idea of distinct churches?

pp. 199, 200

We have taught, and we believe it to be true, that the church of the epistle to the Ephesians belongs to a completely different calling and dispensation from the church of the early Acts period. However, although both rest on the all-sufficiency of the one Offering of Christ on the cross, there are some readers who feel that if this be so, then we should expect the Saviour to have said in Matt. xvi. 18 "My churches" rather than "My church".

The word church, as we know, is the Anglicized form of kuriakon "belonging to the Lord", which also gives the northern "Kirk". The Greek word translated "church" in the N.T. is ekklesia, a word made up of ek "out" and kaleo "to call". In secular usage it referred to an assembly of the people called out by a civil magistrate (Acts xix. 39), or even an assembly of people not lawfully called out (Acts xix. 32, 40).

The assembly of the redeemed in any particular place is called "The Church at Jerusalem" (Acts viii. 1), and in this local sense it is used in the plural:

> "Then had the churches rest" (Acts ix. 31).
> "The churches of Galatia, of Asia, of Macedonia" (I Cor. xvi. 1, 19; II Cor. viii. 1).

In the LXX the word ekklesia is almost constantly employed to translate the Hebrew qahal, which is rendered in the O.T. "assembly" and "congregation". Now qahal occurs in the Hebrew O.T. as a noun 123 times, and of this number 69 are translated ekklesia by the LXX.

It is abundantly clear therefore that the word ekklesia, was of frequent use among the Jews long before Christ and would have a very definite meaning when used by them or used in speech to them. In like manner, Stephen called the assembled and redeemed nation of Israel "The church in the wilderness" (Acts vii. 38).

> "This is he, that was in the church in the wilderness with the angel which spake to him in Mount Sinai, and with our fathers: who received the lively oracles to give unto us."

The reference is to the man Moses, and the place Sinai and the giving of the law.

> "Moses truly said unto the fathers. A prophet shall the Lord your God raise up unto you of your brethren, like unto me; him shall ye hear in all things whatsoever He shall say unto you" (Acts iii. 22).

Uppermost in the hearts and minds of the disciples both before and after Pentecost was the restoration of the kingdom of Israel (Acts i. 6; iii. 19-26), and this earthly kingdom the gospel according to Matthew makes its central theme.

Matthew's gospel is divided into two main sections by the two "time notes" of iv. 17 and xvi. 21:

> "From that time Jesus began to preach, and to say, Repent: for the kingdom of heaven is at hand."
>
> "From that time forth began Jesus to show unto His disciples, how He must go unto Jerusalem, and suffer many things of the elders and chief priests and scribes, and be killed, and be raised again the third day. Then Peter took Him and began to rebuke Him."

Two facts of great importance emerge here:

(1) The pronouncement of the Lord concerning His church falls at the close of the section devoted to the kingdom of heaven, and before He revealed that He must suffer, die and be raised again.

(2) Peter's attitude makes it clear that he had no conception of the crucifixion and death of Christ as fundamental to the standing of the Church, consequently we are compelled to acknowledge that the church of Matt. xvi. 18 could have had no reference to the church of the epistles, for there, the death and resurrection of Christ is of fundamental importance.

Further, immediately following the statement concerning the Church in Matt. xvi. 18, the Lord tells Peter that He will give to him "the keys of the kingdom of heaven", establishing the relationship of this church with the earthly kingdom purposes of God. The Church in which there is neither Jew nor Greek, the church which is the Body of Christ, was not made known during the earthly ministry of the Lord, and it would have been confusing the issues before them to have introduced that which came into being consequent upon Israel's failure to acknowledge the Messiahship of the Saviour at the end of the Acts.

We are sure that with these facts before the mind, the very idea of "churches" in the place of "church" in Matt. xvi. 18 becomes impossible.

Keys to the Understanding of Scripture

pp. 219, 220

The interpretation of Scripture is difficult enough, but it is made more difficult when we ignore the keys given to us by the Holy Spirit which help to unlock the truth. Very often those keys hang at the door of each book, and properly heeded provide an understanding of Scripture which would otherwise not be ours. Consider some examples.

The book of the Revelation has provided commentators with enough enigmas to bring forth a variety of interpretations, some of them very fanciful. But at the head of that book hangs a key to its correct interpretation:

> "I (John) was in the spirit on the Lord's day . . . . ." (i. 10).

This key has been neglected by those who will insist that the expression, "the Lord's day" refers to Sunday, the "Christian Sabbath", and fail to see that, interpreted in the light of other Scripture, it must rather refer to "the day of the Lord", that great prophetic period referred to in Joel ii. 31 and etc. The Revelation was written concerning "things which must shortly come to pass" (i. 1), and the situation during the Acts period, when Peter quoted the prophecy of Joel referred to above (Acts ii. 16-21), was ripe for the coming of "the day of the Lord" and the "things which must shortly come to pass".

Consider the epistle of James as a further example. In the A.V. we have the heading, "The General Epistle of James", and yet when we heed the actual heading given to us by James himself we note that, far from being a "general" epistle it is rather a specific epistle:

> "James . . . . . to the twelve tribes which are scattered abroad . . . . ." (i. 1).

To a "church" which reckoned itself to be "spiritual Israel", the twelve tribes may well have been interpreted as referring to that catholic, universal church, but to those who wish to allow Scripture to mean what it says, the twelve tribes can only refer to a literal Israel, such as Paul had in mind in Acts xxvi. 7. (It is granted that "the twelve tribes" referred to in James i. 1 may be limited to believers amongst Israel on the basis of James ii. 1.)

Consider the so called "Sermon on the Mount", thought by many to set forth the code of practice for believers today. However it may legitimately in part be applied today, it must first be interpreted in its context, using the keys provided. We note:

> "He went up into a mountain . . . . . His disciples came unto Him: And He taught them" (Matt. v. 1, 2).

Not to the multitude here, but to an inner company, who were to pass through a time of persecution (v. 10-12) and whose forgiveness depended upon their forgiveness of others (vi. 12, 14, 15). Seen in its proper setting this 'sermon' belongs to the period with the bread which comes down upon them ("daily bread" vi. 11 reminiscent of the O.T. manna). Compare the conditional forgiveness with Paul's later statement relevant to the Body of Christ in Eph. iv. 32.

Such then are some of the keys which help our understanding of truth. Many of them are provided in the title of a book, as for example, "The vision of Isaiah . . . . . which he saw concerning Judah and Jerusalem . . . . ." (i. 1). Other keys appear in the body of a work. The Lord once complained about some in Israel that they had "taken away the key of knowledge". Let us see that we neglect not those keys given us to unlock the understanding of God's Word.

All the fullness of God

pp. 233 - 236

The church of the One Body is the great outstanding anticipation of the goal of the ages. It is associated with Him under Whose feet are all things; it is associated with a dispensation of the fullness of the seasons when all things are to be summed up in Him, and it is itself called,

> "The fullness of Him that filleth all in all" (Eph. i. 23).

How are we to understand this statement? It falls into line with the last occurrence of pleroma in Colossians, and for that matter in the N.T.

> "For in Him dwelleth all the fullness of the Godhead bodily" (Col. ii. 9).

The first occurrence of pleroma in Ephesians stands by itself (Eph. i. 10); the remainder form a group that expand the theme thus:

A | "The church which is His body,
the fullness of Him that filleth all in all" (Eph. i. 22, 23).
B | "The whole family in heaven and earth . . .
that Christ may dwell in your hearts by faith . . .
filled unto all the fullness of God" (Eph. iii. 14-19).
C | "He ascended up far above all heavens, that He might fill all things . . .
Unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ" (Eph. iv. 8-13).
B | "For in Him were all things created . . .
all things were created by Him, and for Him . . .
He is the Head of the Body, the church . . .
for it pleased the Father that in Him should all fullness dwell . . .
to reconcile all things . . . in earth and things in heaven" (Col. i. 16-20).
A | "For in Him dwelleth all the fullness of the Godhead bodily;
and ye are filled to the full in Him,
Which is the Head of all principality and power" (Col. ii. 9, 10).

Here is a very complete conspectus of this mighty theme, point answering point with such precision, that no approach to one corresponding member can be undertaken without due consideration of the other. This the reader will perceive is fraught with immediate consequences. It forces a comparison between Eph. i. 22, 23 and Col. ii. 9, 10. The church of the one Body is "the fullness of Him that filleth all in all" and the second prayer of Eph. iii. is that the believer may be "filled with all the fullness of God". Identical language Pan to pleroma "all the fullness", is found in Eph. iii. 19, Col. i. 19 and ii. 9, and these passages cannot be separated and interpreted independently of each other. The "fullness" of Christ dwells "bodily" in the church, even as the "fullness" of the Godhead dwells "bodily" in Him.

There are moreover many contextual links that bind these references together as one whole. In Eph. i. 21-23, the stress is upon the headship of Christ as the risen and ascended One, with all things under His feet, the church which is His body, being the fullness of Him, Who in His turn filleth all in all. In Col. i. 15-20 the two creations are brought together, with Christ as "Firstborn" in each (Col. i. 15, 18), and as pre-eminent in both (Col. i. 17, 18). Things in heaven and earth were His creation (Col. i. 16) and they are the objects of reconciliation (Col. i. 20). When we come to Col. ii. 4-23, we have left the positive revelation of truth, and have entered into the sphere of conflict with error. For our present purpose we will give the opening and closing members of this great correspondence.

R | a | 4-8-. Plausible speech. Philosophy (s*ophos*).
b | -8-. Traditions of men.
c | -8-. Rudiments of the world.
CORRECTIVE. | -8. Not after Christ. Fullness pleroma
9, 10. Ye are filled full in Him. pleroo

* * * * * * *

R | c | 20-22. Rudiments of the world.
b | 22. Teaching of men.
a | 23-. Wordy show of wisdom (sophos).
CORRECTIVE. | -23-. Not in any honour.
-23. Filling of the flesh. plesmone

Whatever is intended by Col. ii. 9 "all the fullness of the Godhead bodily" is closely and intentionally carried forward into verse 10, for the word translated "complete" is pepleromenoi, even as conversely, the title of the church as "the fullness" is carried upward to Christ as the One Who is filling (pleroumeno) "the all things in all". Col. iv. 4-23 combats the invasion of a vain and deceitful philosophy, supplied by tradition and the rudiments of the world and "not after Christ", and later in the same argument, not only intruding philosophies and traditions, but even divinely appointed "new moons and sabbath days" are alike as "shadows of things to come" because "the body is of Christ". The whole Fullness toward which every age and dispensation has pointed since the overthrow of the world, is at last seen to be Christ Himself. All types and shadows that once filled the gap caused by sin, are now seen to be transient, and of value only as they point the way to Him, and then disappear. He is Head, He is Preeminent, He is Creator and Redeemer, He is the Firstborn of all creation, and the Firstborn from the dead. He is the beginning of the creation of God (Revelation iii. 14; Col. i. 18), the Alpha and Omega, The First and the Last. In deed and in fact "Christ is all and in all" (Col. iii. 11) in the church of the one Body now, as He will yet be in the whole redeemed universe in the future.

No more glorious position for the redeemed is conceivable than that revealed in Ephesians i. 23. To be one of a kingdom of priests on the earth is a dignity so great, that O.T. prophets have piled imagery upon imagery in setting it forth. Yet when we come to the Bride of the Lamb, and the description of the heavenly Jerusalem, we realize how much more glorious is that calling as compared with the highest calling on earth. What shall be said then of that company of the redeemed, blessed neither on earth nor in the New Jerusalem, blessed neither as a kingdom nor as a Bride, but blessed "in Christ" where He now sits "far above all", blessed not only as the members of His Body which is dignity indeed, but actually destined to be "the fullness of Him" in Whom dwells all the fullness of the Godhead bodily.

It is evident from what we have discovered in the Word, that the term "fullness" is vital to the accomplishment of the Divine purpose and there is one point more that must be considered before we close. Head and members, or Head and Body, are relative terms. The one cannot exert or function without the other. This we all recognize must be true of the members, but is it not also necessarily true of the Head? Christ AS HEAD needs the complement of His Body, just as surely as the church. His Body, needs the complement of the Head. In the words "the fullness of Him that filleth all in all" the words thus translated to pleroma tou "The fullness of Him" are cast in the form known as "The genitive of relation". Words ending in ma often have a passive significance. Chrysostom, in his commentary says:

> "The fullness of the head is the body, and the fullness of the body is the head . . . . . that is just as the head is filled (or fulfilled) by the body."

Beza says something very similar:

> "However complete He is in Himself, yet as Head He is not complete without His Body."

Pleromenou "That filleth" is not passive but middle voice . . . . . "To fill up or complete for Himself".

The very fact that God has a goal, and is moving toward the goal, implies that this relationship of the redeemed with the Redeemer is essential to the glorious achievement of the ages. God is moving from the status of God Who is Creator, to God Who is Father, and the title Father is itself relative, it necessitates a family. While therefore the redeemed are nothing in themselves, they are precious by reason of His gracious purpose.

CHARLES H. WELCH

A Case for Right Division

A Distinctive Purpose of the Gospels according to Matthew and Luke demonstrated.

pp. 239, 240

The words used by Luke and Paul have been tabulated and it has been found that "every second word in the Gospel of Luke is also used by Paul" and so close is the language of the Acts of the Apostles to the diction of Paul's epistles, that there is actually a volume of considerable interest published, entitled "Paul, the author of the Acts" (H. Heber Evans). The human authorship of the Epistle to the Hebrews is problematic, and there are those who maintain that its amanuensis was Luke. This may have been so, but we have every confidence that Hebrews is one of Paul's fourteen epistles—yet the closeness of language between Paul and Luke is emphasized by this suggestion.

The message which was given to the Apostle Paul for the Gentiles, and the ministry of the reconciliation committed to him, arose out of the failure of Israel (speaking after the manner of men) to repent and believe the good news of the kingdom. The great teaching of the Apostle, which included the Gentile within the sphere of the promise of Abraham (Romans and Galatians), is scarcely suggested by Matthew's Gospel. Matthew's Gospel is divided into two parts, each part being connected with the relationship and covenants indicated in Matt. i. 1. The first part, covering Matt. iv. 7 - xvi. 20, is associated with the kingly title "Son of David"; the second portion, commencing with the announcement of suffering, death and resurrection (xvi. 21), is the fulfilling of the title "Son of Abraham". The second phase of the Lord's ministry could not be made a matter of public proclamation until the great transaction of Calvary had removed the curse, and made it possible for the blessing of Abraham to flow out to the Gentiles (Gal. iii. 13, 14).

The Acts opens with a renewed witness concerning the kingdom of Israel and David's throne, but also links with it the wider covenant made with Abraham. Luke, who wrote the "Acts", had already written a "former treatise of all that Jesus began to do and teach" and in that treatise he laid a foundation for Paul's Gospel of the reconciliation. He does not stay at Abraham when he gives the genealogy of the Lord, but goes back to Adam.

The unfolding of the divine purpose is closely connected with the revelation of Christ Himself. It will be found that the circle of truth widens and deepens as the time arrives for some richer title of Christ to come forth. The inner circle, latest in time of revelation, and first to be fulfilled and exhausted is associated with David. To this the first portion of Matthew is devoted (i.-xvi.). The next circle, which goes back in history, and looks forward beyond the confines of the rule of David, is connected with Abraham. The second portion of Matthew (xvii.-xxviii.) and the Acts belong to this section of the purpose. Luke's gospel goes back beyond both Abraham and David, and traces the genealogy of the Saviour back to Adam. This forms the basis for Paul's message to the Gentiles; and indeed it is Paul alone of all the New Testament writers who makes known the wondrous and far-reaching connection that is established in the purpose of God between Adam, mankind (including Jew and Gentile) and Christ.

CHARLES H. WELCH

Add to your faith . . . . . knowledge

No.1. Showing how II Peter adds "knowledge" to the "faith" of I Peter.

pp. 117 - 119

Sometimes we meet with good Christian folk who seem to have a real horror of knowledge, looking upon it as a work of the flesh, and antagonistic to faith. There is, of course, a specious form of knowledge that puffeth up (I Cor. viii. 1), but there is also an empty faith that cannot save (James ii. 17). While we give no place to the "oppositions of science falsely so called", it is mischievous to assert that true science can ever be antagonistic to true faith. We are, however, not contemplating the adjustment of physical science to the faith, but considering the many passages in which knowledge is associated with faith as a second step.

We have borrowed the title for this study from II Peter, and we observe that the epistle which opens with the exhortation "add to your faith . . . knowledge" (II Pet. i. 5), concludes with the exhortation to "grow in grace and in knowledge" (II Pet. iii. 18). Peter, indeed, says much more in his opening exhortation, than that knowledge should be added to faith; in full his words are,

> "And beside this, giving all diligence, add to your faith virtue; and to virtue knowledge; and to knowledge temperance; and to temperance patience; and to patience godliness; and to godliness brotherly kindness; and to brotherly kindness charity" (IIPet.i.5-7).

These added graces are all to be looked upon as so much "fruit", for the Apostle says that if these things be present, and abound, they make us that we be neither "barren nor unfruitful" in the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ.

To examine every item in this great addition would take us too far afield so, while remembering that the exhortation would be incomplete without them, we will devote this study to the association of faith and knowledge.

If we examine Peter's two epistles we shall discover that the first stresses "faith", while the second stresses "knowledge".

Here are the references to faith in the first epistle:

> "Kept . . . . . through faith unto salvation" (i. 5).
> "The trial of your faith" (i. 7).
> "Though now ye see Him not, yet believing, ye rejoice" (i. 8).
> "Receiving the end of your faith" (i. 9).
> "Who by Him do believe in God, that raised Him up from the dead, and gave Him glory; that your faith and hope might be in God" (i. 21).
> "Behold, I lay in Sion a chief corner stone, elect, precious: and he that believeth on Him shall not be confounded. Unto you therefore which believe He is precious" (ii. 6, 7).

"Le them that suffer according to the will of God commit the keeping of their souls to Him in well doing, as unto a faithful Creator" (iv. 19).

"The devil . . . seeketh whom he may devour: whom resist stedfast in the faith" (v. 8, 9).

"A faithful brother" (v. 12).

The only references to faith in the second epistle are in i. 1 and 5.

The second epistle stresses knowledge:

"To them that have obtained like precious faith with us through the righteousness of God and our Saviour Jesus Christ: grace and peace be multiplied unto you through the knowledge of God, and of Jesus our Lord. According as his divine power hath given unto us all things that pertain unto life and godliness, through the knowledge of him that hath called us to glory and virtue" (II Pet. i. 1-3).

Salvation is by faith, but things that pertain to life and godliness are here associated with the knowledge of the Lord. After all, we shall discover that faith and knowledge are but two sides of one great subject. If I believe a rumour, I cannot really say "I know", but if I believe a statement made by one who is infallibly and indubitably true, can I hesitate to say "I know"? If I do, I deny the reality of my faith. Such knowledge is experimental faith.

"And beside this, giving all diligence, add to your faith virtue, and to virtue knowledge" (II Pet. i. 5).

Pareisphero, translated "giving" and meaning literally "to bring in beside" (from para beside, and phero to bring), is used here by the Apostle as though he would say "Besides those precious promises on God's part, bring in, by grace, your co-operation, by using all diligence to furnish virtue", etc.

"Add" Epichoregeo, literally means to supply the cost of leading the chorus or theatrical entertainment. The person who thus defrayed the cost was usually a public-spirited person of means, and was called the choregos. Visitors to the British Museum may remember "the Choragic monument", a beautiful specimen of the Corinthian order of architecture, in the Greek gallery.

En. Where our versions reads "add to your faith virtue", etc. the original uses the preposition en, and Alford and others give it its full value, in each case translating,

"Furnish in your faith virtue, in your virtue knowledge, etc."

It will be seen therefore that no mere mechanical addition is to be attempted. Faith must be virtuous; virtue must be informed with knowledge; knowledge must be held in temperance, and temperance must be accompanied by patience, and so on.

"If these things be in you, and abound, they make you that ye shall neither be barren nor unfruitful in the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ" (II Pet. i. 8).

Fruit is an evidence of life, and these things "make our calling and election sure" (IIPet.i.10).

Mere knowledge, unaccompanied by such evidences of grace, is no evidence of election. The Apostle speaks in I Pet. ii. of those who had escaped the pollution of the world through the knowledge of the Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, but had afterwards become entangled and overcome, and, said the Apostle, it would have been better for them not to have known the way of righteousness than that, after they had known it, they should turn from the holy commandment. He likens such to dogs or to swine who "return" to their uncleanness, a contrast with the "sheep" of I Pet. ii. 25, who "return" to the Shepherd and Bishop of their souls. These were evidently "barren and unfruitful" in their knowledge. However, the main theme of this second epistle is not reached until chapter iii., when Peter deals with the postponement of the Second Coming of Christ, the attitude of the scoffers and the reason for the apparent "slackness".

> "Ye therefore, beloved, seeing ye know these things before, beware lest ye also, being led away with the error of the wicked, fall from your own stedfastness, but grow in grace, and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ" (II Pet. iii. 17, 18).

This article is but introductory and written with a view to help us to realize the important place this "added knowledge" has in the great scheme of revelation. We believe a collection of passages where this addition is a part of inspired teaching will be helpful to all our readers, and in the succeeding articles such passages will therefore form the basis of our meditation.

No.2. Some examples culled from the Epistle to the Romans.
pp. 133 - 135

Let us turn to the Epistle to the Romans, and see how "knowledge" is added to faith. Most of our readers are aware of the fact that this epistle presents its teaching from two points of view. There is the teaching which deals with Jew and Gentile; that appeals to the Law and the Prophets; that traces the theme of the epistle back to Abraham; and that uses the word pistis, "faith", twenty-seven times in Rom. i.-v. 11, and thirteen times in Rom. ix.-xvi. There is also the teaching that deals with man, which makes no reference to Jew and Gentile as such, but traces its theme back to Adam, and makes scarcely any quotation from the Law and the Prophets. In this section (Rom. v. 12-viii.) the word pistis, "faith", is not found. Pisteuo, "to believe", occurs in the outside sections (Rom.i.-v.11, and Rom.ix.-xvi.), twenty times, but is found only once in the inner section (Rom. v. 12-viii.). This one reference reads:

> "Now if we be dead with Christ, we believe that we shall also live with Him" (Rom. vi. 8).

Apart from this one statement, "faith" and "believe" are limited to the outer portion of the epistle. Before we turn to the inner portion, and before we can "add" knowledge to faith, we must have some idea of how faith is used, and in what associations, for we cannot be said to "add" to anything which we do not already possess.

Rom. i. 16 is the first recorded act of believing, and is intimately associated with the Gospel and with salvation.

> "The Gospel of Christ . . . . . the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth" (Rom. i. 16).

This is the simple issue. The next reference is Rom. iii. 22, where the subject is the righteousness of God:

> "The righteousness of God which is by faith of Jesus Christ unto all and upon all them that believe" (Rom. iii. 22).

Here we have advanced a great step. Between Rom. i. 16 and iii. 22 is a marvelous unfolding of the depth of human need, and the fullness of Divine provision. To appreciate this we must go back to the first chapter and look at the reference to "faith" in verse 17. The Gospel of Christ is the power of God unto salvation to everyone that believeth.

> "For therein is the righteousness of God revealed from faith to faith: as it is written, The just shall live by faith" (Rom. i. 17).

Rom. iii. 22 tells us that this righteousness of God is "by faith of Jesus Christ", and the conclusion come to is that,

> "A man is justified by faith without the deeds of the law" (Rom. iii. 28).

In some of the passages, law and its works are set aside, and in Rom. iii. 24, 25 we have the fundamental reference to "faith in His blood". Without redemption and without propitiation (atonement) justification by faith is impossible.

Coming to chapter iv., we discover Who, or what it is that is believed:

> "Abraham believed God, and it was counted unto him for righteousness" (Rom. iv. 3).

God is the object of faith, and particularly God as the One that quickeneth the dead (Rom. iv. 5, 17, 24). This faith is "counted for righteousness" (Rom. iv. 5, 9, 11, 13, 16). We are therefore prepared for the summing up of Rom. v. 1, 2:

> "Therefore being justified by faith, we have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ: by Whom also we have access by faith into this grace wherein we stand, and rejoice in hope of the glory of God" (Rom. v. 1, 2).

Rom. v. leads us up to the double fruit of faith, Justification and Access. What more can be provided or enjoyed? Nothing, for a righteous standing before God which results in peace with God, access into grace that is all sufficient for salvation, preservation and presentation, covers all our need, past, present and future. Yet, if we would experimentally enter into this grace; if we would have no lurking distrust; if we are not, at times, to be overwhelmed with the evil of the flesh; if we are not, sometimes, to despair of sanctification, we must KNOW something. We must add to our faith KNOWLEDGE.

> "Knowing this, that our old man was (and is, Aorist passive) crucified with Him, that the body of sin might be rendered inoperative, that henceforth we should not serve sin" (Rom. vi. 6).
>
> "Knowing that Christ being raised from the dead dieth no more; death hath no more dominion over Him" (Rom. vi. 9).

The former we "know" (ginosko), the latter we "perceive" (eideo). Unless we both "know" and "perceive" this glorious truth, our own unsanctified, unregenerate, unaltered old nature will continue to cause us alarm, anxiety, and possibly lead us either to despair or to attempt some means of improving, chaining, or eradicating the old man, all of which is impossible and wrong. We must "know" that in our flesh, even though we are justified and at peace, there dwelleth no good thing:

> "For I know that in me (that is, in my flesh), dwelleth no good thing" (Rom. vii. 18).

We must "know" that the flesh cannot render satisfactory obedience to the law of God:

> "For we know that the law is spiritual: but I am carnal, sold under sin" (Rom. vii. 14).

Further, we should add to our faith the knowledge that, even though we are saved, justified and accepted, this does not exempt us from sharing the groans of a suffering creation. Salvation from sin does not mean exemption from the troubles of this life and unless we "know" this we may entertain doubts regarding the validity of our salvation.

> "For we know that the whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain together until now. And not only they, but ourselves also, which have the firstfruits of the Spirit, even we ourselves groan within ourselves, waiting for the adoption, to wit, the redemption of our body" (Rom. viii. 22, 23).

This knowledge is most essential to our peace.

Again, even though we "have access by faith into this grace wherein we stand" (Rom.v.2), it does not follow that we shall always have such an understanding of the Lord's will, or of the hundred events that go to make up our daily experiences, that we shall be able at all times, to be sure what to ask in prayer. This "knowledge" is vital, for we shall either, in our mute anguish, blame ourselves for lack of spirituality, which may be untrue, or we may force ourselves to a fluency in prayer which, if heard with the ear of an angel, would sound perilously near blasphemy. For our peace of mind we should realize that sometimes, this uncertainty, is our sanity.

> "For we know not what we should pray for as we ought: but the Spirit itself maketh intercession for us with groanings which cannot be uttered and He . . . . . knoweth what is the mind (or bent) of the Spirit" (Rom. viii. 26, 27).

Though saved, we are yet subject to "infirmities" (Rom. viii. 26), and it is an unspeakable comfort "to know" that, though words fail us, the "bent" of our spirits is understood. The Holy Spirit fulfils His blessed office as the "other Advocate", and to know this is to enter into peace.

Again, and in conclusion, the Apostle directs the mind of the believer away from the flesh, in which will be found no good thing; away from this creation, with its groan and travail; away from our own ability to pray, through lack of knowledge; away to the Lord Himself, Who does know, and Who will perform.

> "And we know that all things work together for good to them that love God, to them who are the called according to His purpose" (Rom. viii. 28).

Here, then, in the epistle to the Romans, is a glorious example of the blessed results of adding to faith knowledge, and so of reaching the "persuasion" with which this inner section of Romans finishes (Rom. viii. 38, 39).

No.3. "Added knowledge" associated with the Prize (Philippians).

pp. 193, 194

Let us give our attention for a while to the bearing of the teaching of the Epistle to the Philippians on this subject. There we find Paul speaking of faith not only doctrinally, but also in a practical sense. Had he been free to think only of himself, he confesses that he would have been glad to depart and to be with Christ, but realizing that the churches still needed his ministry, for a time at least, he was willing to abide in the flesh for their sakes:

> "And having this confidence, I know that I shall abide and continue with you all for your furtherance and joy of faith" (Phil. i. 25).

This 'furtherance and joy of faith' however is an active expression and not merely a passive reception. The Philippians were exhorted to:

> "Stand fast in one spirit, with one mind striving together for the faith of the gospel" (Phil. i. 27).

"For", continued the Apostle,

> "unto you it is given in the behalf of Christ, not only to believe on Him, but also to suffer for His sake" (Phil. i. 29).

But Paul was not the man to enjoin endurance upon others, while he himself went free. Throughout his ministry he was able to appeal to his 'manner of life' as a living example of the doctrine he taught and professed, so that we are not surprised to find that the next reference to faith alludes once more to his endurance for the gospel:

> "Yea, and if I be offered upon the sacrifice and service of your faith, I joy, and rejoice with you all" (Phil. ii. 17).

The only other occurrences of 'faith' in Philippians are in that wonderful summary of the doctrine of justification by faith, which is found in Phil. iii. 9. After the Apostle had enumerate all the advantages which he had as an Israelite under law, and how he had counted them all as refuse for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus, he continued:

> "and be found in Him, not having mine own righteousness, which is of the law, but that which is through the faith of Christ, the righteousness which is of God by faith" (iii. 9).

On either side of this verse, he speaks of knowledge:

> "Yea doubtless, and I count all things but loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus my Lord . . . . . That I may know Him, and the power of His resurrection, and the fellowship of His sufferings, being made conformable unto His death; if by any means I might attain unto the out-resurrection, out from among the dead" (Phil. iii. 8-11).

Here is something beyond salvation for sin and the gift of life; here is something toward which the Apostle pressed as for a prize (Phil. iii. 14).

In Rom. vi. 6, there is a conformity to the death of Christ that has been accomplished by grace, without our effort, a conformity which lies at the root of our acceptance. In Phil. iii. 10, however, there is a voluntary association with that death, consequent upon a fuller knowledge of the Lord, and the power of His resurrection. By using the same word in Phil. iii. 10 and 21, translated in A.V. "conform" and "fashion", Paul links the out-resurrection, the prize and its "conformity" with the body of His glory, with the "conformity" of the believer here and now in the body of this humiliation, and with the rejection for which the Cross of Christ stands in the experience of the believer.

As an extension of this added knowledge, the Apostle says in the closing chapter:

> "I know both how to be abased, and I know how to abound: everywhere and in all things I am instructed both to be full and to be hungry, both to abound and to suffer need. I can do all things through Christ which strengtheneth me" (Phil. iv. 12, 13).

So Paul adds to faith, knowledge, and knowledge of a very precious and searching sort. An experience not to be lightly sought, and one that is fraught with many trials. He had a goal in view, and moreover found strength in Christ for all things, and so his faith IN Christ, led to fuller knowledge OF Christ, and, while retaining to the full his glorious acceptance in the Beloved, he pressed on to "win Christ" and to attain unto that for which he had been apprehended (Phil. iii. 12).

The Background to the New Testament.

No.9. The Synagogue.
pp. 12 - 16

The Greek sunagoge, "synagogue", derives from the verb sunago, "to gather together", and there are many occurrences of the word both in the LXX and N.T. In the LXX the word is mostly translated by the words "congregation", "assembly" and "company", but apart from Acts xiii. 43 ("congregation") and James ii. 2 ("assembly"), the N.T. renders consistently "synagogue". The A.V. translation of the word in James is most unfortunate, as it obscures the close connection of the early believers with the synagogue, which is an important consideration for a correct understanding of things at this time.

It is possible to use the word "synagogue" in much the same way as "church" is used today, i.e. of the company met together, or the building in which they meet. Rev. ii. 9 is an example of the former usage, when it refers to "a synagogue of Satan". Here it is not a building which is in view, but a company of people who promote the cause of Satan.

Origin of the Synagogue.

Although the synagogue as a building did not appear until late on in the history of Israel, the custom of resorting to the "men of God" on the sabbath for the reading and exposition of the Law, was of great antiquity. This is suggested in Acts xv. 21:

> "For Moses from generations of old, in every city, has those proclaiming him in the synagogues, being read every sabbath" (lit.).

Dr. John Lightfoot identified the "high places", mentioned in the O.T. in a good sense, with the synagogue.

> "And Samuel answered Saul, and said, I am the seer: go up before me unto the high place . . . . ." (I Sam. ix. 19).
>
> "Thou shalt come to the hill of God . . . . . thou shalt meet a company of prophets coming down from the high place . . . . . and they shall prophesy: And the Spirit of the Lord will come upon thee . . . . ." (I Sam. x. 5, 6).

These "high places" must not be confused with others used for idolatrous purposes (e.g. I Kings xi. 7).

The gathering together in companies of the people of Israel came about gradually over a period of time. With the division of the land amongst the twelve tribes, and the choice of Jerusalem as the accepted centre of worship, the people found themselves at varying distances from the place where the Lord had put His name. It was only natural that those at a distance from this centre, and required to present themselves there three times a year, should desire to meet together for prayer, reading and edification at other times. So was born the synagogue; first simply a company of people meeting in the open, but later (after the return from Babylon), in a building erected for this purpose.

The object of the synagogue was not to supplant the Temple, which was the House of Prayer, but to provide houses of prayer for those at a distance from the Temple, who were not able to attend as often as they would like to have done. Eventually, as the synagogue came to play a bigger and bigger part in the life of Israel, and with the rise of Rabbinism, synagogues were built in Jerusalem itself, until at the time of Christ, a great number existed there. Prayer was still offered with due recognition of the Temple as the dwelling place of God, the worshipper turning towards Jerusalem to pray.

> "Daniel . . . . . his windows being open in his chamber toward Jerusalem, he kneeled upon his knees three times a day, and prayed, and gave thanks before his God" (Dan. vi. 10).

It is probable that the Lord's prayer (Matt. vi. 9-13) when first given, was prayed with the same attitude.

Synagogues were very often built beside running water, no doubt to provide for the "divers washings", and in towns where no synagogue existed, it was customary to gather by the side of a river if possible. The N.T. Philippi seems not to have possessed a synagogue, although many of the towns of the dispersion did, so Luke testifies:

> "On the sabbath we went out of the city by a river side, where prayer was wont to be made" (Acts xvi. 13).

The interested reader may also like to compare Ezra viii. 15, 21 and Psa. cxxxvii. 1.

When the N.T. period opened, a great number of synagogues existed both in Israel, and many towns of the dispersion. It is claimed by one authority that there were 480 in Jerusalem alone, and although this is no doubt an exaggeration (or may even be a symbolic number), a great number almost certainly did exist in Jerusalem. This factor led, as would be expected, to many differences of doctrine, and this is suggested by Acts vi. 9:

> "Then there arose certain of the synagogue of the Libertines, and Cyrenians, and Alexandrians, and of them of Cilicia and of Asia, disputing with Stephen."

When the Acts church arose, it was looked upon as simply another sect or synagogue of the Jews:

> "As concerning this sect, we know that everywhere it is spoken against" (Acts xxviii. 22).

Constitution of the Synagogue.

The basic division of the N.T. synagogue was into three parts, dealing with worship, education and government. There were the ordinary services of worship, which included prayer, the reading of the Law and Prophets, and the word of exhortation. Then followed the Rabbinic school concerned with the exposition of the word, although some Rabbis had their own schools of divinity, unattached to the synagogue. The teaching of children was also undertaken in the synagogues. Thirdly, the 'council' of elders sat in judgment over the affairs of the community.

The synagogue service provided for the "word of exhortation" from one of the congregation or a stranger, and an invitation to some to take part in the service by reading the Scriptures, possibly with comments. This accounts for the invitations given to the Lord at Nazareth, and Paul in Pisidian Antioch:

> "And He came to Nazareth . . . . . and, as His custom was, He went into the synagogue on the sabbath day, and stood up for to read. And there was delivered unto Him the book of the prophet Esaias" (Luke iv. 16, 17).
>
> "They came to Antioch . . . . . and went into the synagogue on the sabbath day, and sat down. And after the reading of the law and the prophets, the rulers of the synagogue sent unto them, saying, Ye men and brethren, if ye have any word of exhortation for the people, say on" (Acts xiii. 14, 15).

Officials of the Synagogue.

The officials of the synagogue were the elders or "rulers" (archontes), whose chief was the archisunagogos ("chief ruler"), the "minister" (huperetes), whose duty it was to keep the sacred books, and possibly a number of clerks (akin to the N.T. "deacons"), who took charge of alms, etc.

Besides these regular officials were those who participated in the service itself. The Sheliach Tsibbor, or angel of the congregation was chosen by the chief ruler to conduct the devotions, as were also those who read in the Law and Prophets or gave a word of exhortation. There was also the Interpreter, who translated or paraphrased the reading of the Law and Prophets into Aramaic, for the Hebrew was little understood.

The rulers were elected by the congregation, but they must satisfy certain requirements of knowledge, and possess special qualifications, of which humility and gentleness were two. These rulers, elders or shepherds, formed the local "council" or tribunal, already referred to in the previous article, and acted in a judicial capacity.

Upon the chief ruler divulged the whole responsibility of the synagogue, and he would see that all was done "decently and in order", as well as making sure that nothing improper took place. The attitude of the archisunagogos ("ruler of the synagogue") in Luke xiii. 14 is in line with this duty:

> "And the ruler of the synagogue answered with indignation, because that Jesus had healed on the sabbath day."

In the eyes of this "ruler", the Lord may teach, but not heal in the synagogue on the sabbath. This was an "improper" act.

Arrangement in the Synagogue.

Synagogues were built so that the worshippers would face the right direction during prayers. This was, as has been seen, toward Jerusalem. The Temple, however, was so built that the worshippers faced west, with the rising sun at their backs (see Ezek.viii.16), and it seems that some synagogues were patterned on this.

Inside the synagogue, and generally in the middle, was the bema (probably "Moses seat" in Matt. xxiii. 2), an elevated platform from which was read the Law in a standing position, whilst the address was delivered seated (Luke iv. 16, 20).

Also in the synagogue was the "Ark", a moveable box containing the Scriptures, and in front of this the "chief seats" on which sat the elders and notables facing the congregation. These seats were coveted by the "hypocrites" of Matt. xxiii. 6.

The veiled women were separated from the men, being accommodated in a gallery, although some authorities claim that the men and women sat in opposite aisles, separated by a low wall or lattice.

The alms chests, in which were made collections for the relief of the poor of the district, were probably near the entrance, and it was into these that the "hypocrites" cast their gifts with great ostentation (Matt. vi. 2).

Ten persons were required to form "a congregation" and so constitute an assembly recognized by God, and at a later date in some larger cities, ten persons were paid so as to be free from secular employment and always ready to form a congregation. Thus was the "presence of God" assured. In contrast to this the reader might note the word of the Lord to His disciples that "where two or three are gathered together (sunago) in My name, there am I in the midst of them".

Discipline in the Synagogue.

It seems strange to modern church-goers that a place of worship was used to deal with certain offences, and that the council of elders could discipline their flock in the synagogue, and yet it was so. The Lord warned His disciples that scourgings in the synagogues awaited them (Matt. x. 17), and the Apostle Paul, before his conversion, beat believers in the synagogues where he found them (Acts xxii. 19), as well as later suffering the same himself at the hands of his own people (II Cor. xi. 24). Forty stripes were allowed (Deut. xxv. 3), but the Jews, always careful not to exceed this, reduced it to thirty nine.

There were also degrees of excommunication which might be inflicted according to the nature of the offence. These ranged from the lightest, which forbad intercourse with others during a period of thirty days, after which, upon the repentance of the guilty person, restoration was made, to the most serious, which cut the person off from all the privileges of being an Israelite, and in effect handed them over to the judgment of God.

These two extremes have a parallel in the affairs of the Christian communities during the Acts period:

> "Now we command you, brethren, in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, that ye withdraw yourselves from every brother that walketh disorderly, and not after the tradition which he received of us" (II Thess. iii. 6).
>
> "I have written unto you not to keep company, if any man that is called a brother be a fornicator, or covetous, or an idolater, or a railer, or an extortioner; with such an one no not to eat" (I Cor. v. 11).

The object of this break of fellowship with disorderly believers, was that they might be "ashamed" and come to repentance, but they were not to be counted as "enemies" (II Thess. iii. 14, 15).

The more serious offences, dealt with only by the Apostles themselves led to "the destruction of the flesh" (I Cor. v. 5), and were probably the "sin unto death" of I John v. 16, seen in the experience of Ananias and Sapphira (Acts v.), and suggested in I Cor. xi. 29-31.

Excommunication from the synagogue was the experience of the blind man (John ix. 34). It was a constant deterrent to confessing faith in Christ (John xii. 42), and was to be the lot of the disciples of the Lord before His return to the earth (John xvi. 2).

No.10. Relationship of Christ's Coming and the Acts Church to Judaism.

pp. 29 - 33

The Lord Jesus Christ came unto His own. He came not to overthrow, but to fulfil. His ministry assumed a continuance of the Jewish institutions of the day, but reformed to His standard of righteousness. The Law was given a new, deeper, inner meaning, which touched not simply the outward man (Thou shalt do no murder), but the inner also (Thou shalt not hate). His formula was, "Ye have heard . . . . . but I say unto you".

The disciples of Christ, who formed the Acts church, were not the first-fruits of some new, predominately Gentile church, whose sway was to be largely exercised in Europe and the Americas, but a nucleus, centred in Jerusalem, from whence the good news of the "kingdom of the heavens" was to be carried into all the earth. And so, at the return of Christ (looked upon then as being imminent), would the earth be governed from Jerusalem through the redeemed nation of Israel, who would stand to the other nations as priests of God, and carry "the knowledge of the Lord" to the ends of the earth. The great hope before these disciples was the restoration of the kingdom to Israel (Acts i. 6), with all that implied.

The failure of Orthodoxy to appreciate the true position.

Nearly 2,000 years of so-called 'Orthodoxy' (and 'Heresy'), have obscured the truth of the above, by the failure to distinguish things that are different, and hence have confused together two aspects of the plan of God, the earthly and the heavenly.

The emphasis placed on the Gospels, with the implication (sometimes an assertion) that their teaching is superior to that of the Epistles, since they record the "actual words of Christ Himself", has demonstrated this confusion, and the cries which have gone up from time to time, "Back to the primitive church", "Back to Pentecost", have shown that the peculiar dispensation committed to the Apostle Paul has not been appreciated. It has not been perceived that He Who once spoke on earth, has since spoken from heaven.

Hence the words of the Gospels and Acts have been torn out of their true setting and forced to fit a Gentile environment, which has nothing to do with the institutions of Israel, or the promises made unto the fathers.

It is the purpose of this article to try and show how the earthly ministry of Christ, and the Acts church, were a continuation and a completion of the true O.T. Judaism, and could, had Israel responded, have led to this "people of God" at last being God's channel of blessing in the earth, under their King-Messiah, the Lord Jesus Christ. That they failed to become so is a matter of history, but the assurance of prophecy is that this is yet to be. Israel have indeed a glorious future.

Christ came to fulfil.

> "Think not that I came to abolish the law or the prophets: I came not to abolish, but to fulfil" (Matt. v. 17 English-Greek translation).

The O.T. Law has been likened to the initial, rough sketch of the painter, which disappears from view as it is filled out with colour. The silhouette is not rubbed out, but "filled out". Such was the relationship of Christ's teaching to the Law; it did not do away with that law, but so filled it out, that the original sketch was lost to view in the glory of its fullness. An inner, deeper meaning was given to the law; a higher standard of righteousness, which exceeded (lit. "abounded above") that of the scribes and Pharisees, and which was necessary for entry into the "kingdom of the heavens" (verse 20). This righteousness was described by the Lord:

> "Ye have heard that it was said to the ancients, Thou shalt not commit murder; but whoever shall commit murder, shall be liable to the judgment. But I say unto you, That everyone who is angry with his brother lightly, shall be liable to the judgment; but whoever shall say to his brother, Raca, shall be liable to the Sanhedrin; but whoever shall say, Fool, shall be liable to the Gehenna of fire" (verses 21, 22 English-Greek translation).

As has already been stated, the ministry of the Lord "assumed a continuance of the Jewish institutions", and this is seen here when the Lord refers to "the Judgment" and "the Sanhedrin". It surely makes more sense to allow that he was referring to the literal institutions familiar to the Jews, than to spiritualize them away as some do. The synagogue with its council of judgment, and the Temple and Sanhedrin, were not to be done away with but reformed, and in keeping with this, the Acts church continued to frequent both Temple and synagogue, and did not try to overthrow them as something contrary to the teachings of the Lord.

By the Lord's standard of righteousness, a man was to be liable to the Judgment not simply for murder, but also for anger without due cause. The more severe offence of saying to one's brother, "Raca" (i.e. "empty head", a term of contempt probably from the Chaldee reqa', Hebrew req, 'empty'—Gen. xxxvii. 24, etc.), would lead to appearance before the Sanhedrin at Jerusalem, and to further attribute to one's brother wickedness by calling him "Fool" (cp. Psa. xiv. 1 where the 'fool' is not a simpleton, but a wicked man), would render the offender liable to be denied a proper burial after death, his corpse being cast into the valley of Hinnom (Gehenna) where it would be destroyed by worms or fire.

If it be objected that this standard of righteousness does not leave one with the feeling of a "fullness", it should be remembered that the Lord's words here represent only the negative side of one aspect of the great law which He propounded, and under which all laws are included:

> "Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself" (Matt. xix. 19).

The outline of God's great law contained basically in ten commandments (lit. 'words', Deut. x. 4 A.V. margin) is filled out by this one word, as the Apostle Paul indicated in Rom. xiii. 8, 9:

> "For this, Thou shalt not commit adultery, Thou shalt not kill, Thou shalt not steal, Thou shalt not bear false witness, Thou shalt not covet; and if there be any other commandment, it is briefly comprehended [summed up] in this saying [lit. 'word'], namely, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself."

They who kept this "word", would be barely conscious of the original outline, for the Law, insofar as it may be considered in negative terms, "Thou shalt not", is not laid down for the righteous but for the lawless (I Tim. i. 9). So these actions referred to in Matt. v. 22, which sprang not from love (unjustified anger, contempt and slander), were to be duly dealt with by the judicial system of Israel, the "Judgment" and the "Sanhedrin".

Jerusalem --- centre of authority.

Judaism was centred around Jerusalem. There at the first was the Temple built where the Lord put His name (I Kings ix. 3). It was around this centre that the life of Israel revolved.

When the Acts church came into being it began at Jerusalem, and the authority of the Apostles was exercised from this centre. It was not until persecution broke out after the death of Stephen, that (according to Scripture) the Gospel was proclaimed outside of Jerusalem, and even then the Apostles remained within the city (Acts viii. 1). This was strictly in accordance with the Divine order, Jerusalem, Judaea, Samaria and then the uttermost parts of the earth (Acts i. 8), and was a fulfillment of prophecy:

> "Thus it is written, that the Christ should suffer, and rise again from the dead the third day; And that repentance and remission of sins should be preached in His name unto all nations, beginning from Jerusalem" (Luke xxiv. 46, 47 R.V.).

It is not difficult to find O.T. allusions to the death and resurrection of Christ, but what passage did the Lord have in mind in His reference to Jerusalem? Possibly Isa. ii. 3:

> "And many people shall go and say, Come ye, and let us go up to the mountain of the Lord . . . . . and He will teach us of His ways, and we will walk in His paths: for out of Zion shall go forth the law, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem."

Jerusalem was to be the centre of authority, and it was in harmony with this, and the Lord's command, that the Apostles concentrated their attentions there. The original Twelve (including Matthias), who expected to sit on "twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel" (Matt. xix. 28), even when for some reason they traveled outside of Jerusalem, seem always, at this period, to have returned to the city (cp. Acts viii. 14-25; x. 19 - xi. 2). The primary concern was to prepare Israel for their role in world blessing, and the Apostles therefore concentrated attention on this people, beginning at Jerusalem. The editor of the third edition of Dr. Weymouth's New Testament makes the following observation (on Acts i. 8):

> "There does not appear to be any positive historical evidence that any Apostle, except Paul, ever preached outside Palestine. Indeed Matt. 10:23 seems to preclude the possibility of their having done so."

Granting that the expression "any Apostle" is to be limited here to the Twelve (for Barnabas, Silas and others were apostles who undoubtedly did preach outside the land), this comment is in harmony with the aim before the Apostles, and is most probably true of the whole of the Acts period at least. That John spent his last days in Asia Minor is strongly attested by tradition, but this was after the period when the "hope of Israel" was no longer a possibility. All the time however, that this "hope" was before the minds of the Apostles, their concern was the people of Israel, with Jerusalem as the acknowledged centre. When the Gentiles were, through the ministry of Paul, evangelized during the Acts period, this was looked upon even by him as "contrary to nature" (Rom. xi. 24), and intended to "provoke them [the Jews] to jealousy" (Rom. xi. 11).

It may therefore be realized why the destruction of Jerusalem in 70A.D. caused so much confusion amongst those believers who had not understood, or would not accept, the teaching of the Apostle Paul on the subject, when he pronounced judgment upon Israel and indicated a turn to the Gentiles (Acts xxviii. 28).

James, the bishop of Jerusalem.

James, the Lord's brother, who was apparently an unbeliever until after the resurrection of Christ (John vii. 5; I Cor. xv. 7), was a leading member of the church at Jerusalem, and seems to have performed the function of bishop (overseer) there. This much appears from Acts xii. 17 and xv. 13, 19:

> "Go show these things unto James, and to the brethren."
> "And after they had held their peace, James answered . . . . . my sentence is . . . . ."

See also Gal. ii. 9, 12, and note that James is still established in a position of authority at Jerusalem as late as Acts xxi. 17, 18.

James presided over the body of Apostles and elders at Jerusalem when the question of the circumcision of the Gentiles was considered. Having listened to the experiences of Peter, Barnabas and Paul with the Gentiles, he gave his judgment on the matter, which was then put into effect. The "decrees" that were formulated as a result of this judgment, were acceptable, not only to "the Apostles and elders", but also to "the Holy Spirit" (Acts xv. 28), and they were apparently binding upon the churches to which they were carried, which included Gentiles as far from Jerusalem as South Galatia (Derbe, Lystra, Iconium, etc.). The effect of these 'decrees' was to establish these churches "in the faith" (Acts xvi. 1-5). The judgment of James on this occasion was still recognized by him as binding as late as Acts xxi. 25, nearly thirty years after Pentecost.

Some time after the dispersion of Acts viii. 1, James wrote the Epistle which bears his name to the dispersed who had "the faith of our Lord Jesus Christ", instructing them how to behave in the synagogue:

> "If there come into your synagogue a man . . . . . in fine clothing . . . . . also a poor man in vile clothing; and ye have regard to him that weareth the fine clothing . . . . . do ye not make distinctions among yourselves?" (James ii. 1-4 R.V. margin).

These words presume that some at least of the readers had a say in the affairs of certain synagogues, being in a position to delegate seats. An epistle from James at Jerusalem would carry authority and correct the tendency of some to favour the rich in the synagogues. The Epistle also was to encourage the "Dispersion" through the "manifold trials" of the time then present (i. 2), as well as to give instruction in other matters.

Both the position of James and the acknowledgment of Jerusalem as centre at this time, give a setting to the Acts period which cannot properly be understood unless connected intimately with the background and hopes of the O.T. To imagine that at this time God had cast away His people Israel, is to have failed to appreciate the environment of the Acts, and to accuse the Apostles of deception or ignorance. "Restoration" is the key word at the beginning of the Acts period, "rejection" belongs to the end.

No.11. The Apostles.
pp. 45 - 49

The relationship of the twelve apostles of the circumcision to Israel, was much the same as that of the O.T. prophets. They were the "sent ones", and they proclaimed a message of restoration upon the grounds of repentance; a message intended to prepare the people to fulfil their calling of God. The parallel is further extended in the treatment that each received at the hands of their countrymen:

> "Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees . . . . . ye say, if we had been in the days of our fathers, we would not have been partakers with them in the blood of the prophets . . . . . Fill ye up the measure of your fathers . . . . . behold, I send unto you prophets, and wise men, and scribes: and some of them ye shall kill and crucify; and some . . . . . scourge in your synagogues, and persecute from city to city" (Matt. xxiii. 29-34).

The message of hope which the Apostles carried, was borne witness to by signs and wonders. The miracles of healing they performed were a foretaste of the coming age of restoration (Heb. vi. 5), and the judgment they effected on such as Ananias and Sapphira (Acts v.), a reminder of that future day when "every one shall die for his own iniquity" (Jer. xxxi. 29 30).

Authority to "forgive sins".

Something of the authority given to the Apostles may be seen from John xx. 21-23:

> "Jesus . . . . . said to them again, Peace be unto you: as the Father hath sent Me, even so send I you. And when He had said this, He breathed on them, and saith unto them, Receive ye holy spirit (margin): Whose soever sins ye forgive, they are forgiven unto them; whose soever sins ye retain, they are retained" (R.V.).

This authority, which was never transferred by any so called "Apostolic succession", must not be minimized because it may present difficulties. The 'as' and 'so' of verse 21 relate the Apostles' ministry directly to that of the Lord. He demonstrated His authority to forgive sins from His ability to heal (Luke v. 24), and it seems reasonable to suppose that the Apostles exercised something of that same authority, for they also could heal.

But the connection between forgiveness of sins and healing at this time, was not apparently limited to the sphere of action of the Apostles.

> "Is any sick among you? let him call for the elders of the church; and let them pray over him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord: and the prayer of faith shall save the sick, and the Lord shall raise him up; and if he have committed sins, they shall be forgiven him" (James v. 14, 15).

Such a connection was also prophesied of the inhabitants of Jerusalem:

> "And the inhabitant shall not say, I am sick: the people that dwell therein shall be forgiven their iniquity" (Isa. xxxiii. 24).

For a people with an earthly hope and earthly blessings, such an association is natural. The effects of salvation must include a cancellation of sin and its accompaniments (disease, pain, sorrow and death). The miracles of the Acts period were a foretaste of the coming age when sin and judgment will be directly related, and when righteousness will have a direct reward. This subject will be referred to again when the N.T. miracles are considered. At the moment the question to be answered is, in what way could the Apostles "forgive" sins? Also, how did their authority differ from that of other believers at this time who could also heal?

In the absolute sense of "forgiveness", God alone can act; none can forgive but Him. This much was recognized by the scribes and Pharisees when the Lord healed and forgave the man sick of the palsy (Luke v. 21). In what way then are the words of John xx. 21-23 to be taken?

The writer does not pretend to have the complete answer to this question, but the recognition that the Apostles stood to Israel in much the same way as did the O.T. prophets, is a step towards a solution. The prophets of old spoke for the Lord, promising blessing, promising judgment. They were the Lord's mouthpiece to the people of Israel, and He filled their mouths with words (Jer. i. 6-9).

The N.T. Apostles could forgive sins only in this respect, insofar as they spoke for the Lord. They pronounced forgiveness, but He forgave. This authority was conferred by the gift of holy spirit (John xx. 22), which they in turn could convey to others, by prayer and laying on of hands:

> "Now when the apostles which were at Jerusalem heard that Samaria had received the word of God, they sent unto them Peter and John: who, when they were come down, prayed for them, that they might receive holy spirit (lit.): (for as yet it was fallen upon none of them: only they were baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus). Then laid they their hands on them, and they received holy spirit" (Acts viii. 14-17).

The "gift of holy spirit" at this time was a confirmation that the "belief" and "baptism" of converts was genuine, and the outward evidence of the gift having been given was "speaking in tongues", etc., according to the word of the Lord:

> "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved . . . . . and these signs shall follow them that believe; In My name shall they cast out demons . . . . . speak with new tongues . . . . ." (Mark xvi. 16-18).

In this way the "forgiveness of sins" could be confirmed or otherwise by the Apostles, by the laying on of their hands, but note how prayer (the seeking of God's will) preceded this action (Acts viii. 15).

Although the Apostles had the God-given authority to confer the gift of holy spirit (with its "signs" following) upon others, there is no evidence that they could transfer the authority itself. Otherwise why was it necessary for the journey of Peter and John to the Samaritan believers, for Philip, who had first evangelized them (Acts viii. 5-8), and was himself "full of spirit and wisdom" (Acts vi. 3-6), could have conveyed the gift to them?

The Apostle Paul was also able to confer the gift of holy spirit through the laying on of hands (Acts xix. 5, 6), for he was "not a whit behind the very chiefest apostles" (II Cor. xi. 5).

The receiving of holy spirit without the laying on of hands, recorded in Acts x. 44 of the Gentiles, must be looked upon in the light of being confirmation of the Lord to Peter and the circumcision, that the Gentiles were now being called out. A reading of the whole of the events which led up to this passage, will demonstrate that the inclusion of the Gentiles at this time was quite contrary to the expectations of Peter and the Jewish believers, and was a step which the Lord found necessary to take in order to "stir up" Israel. [See Rom. xi. 11-14 and note the expression used by Paul of the Gentile inclusion, "contrary to nature" (verse 24) and his description of himself as "one born out of due time" (lit. "an abortion") I Cor. xv. 8. The latter expression may suggest that Paul was called to apostleship previous to what had been intended, owing to the attitude of the Jews to the gospel.]

Authority to "bind" and "loose".

> "Thou art Peter . . . . . And I will give to thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven: and whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth shall be bound in heaven: and whatsoever thou shalt loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven" (Matt. xvi. 18, 19).
>
> "Verily I say unto you (plural, so the 'disciples' of verse 1), Whatsoever ye shall bind on earth shall be bound in heaven: and whatsoever ye shall loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven" (Matt. xviii. 18).

To Peter were committed the "keys of the kingdom of the heavens"; to all the Apostles the authority to "bind" and "loose". What did this authority represent?

The word 'key' (kleis) is used in only one other place in the Gospels, but significantly:

> "Woe unto you, lawyers! for ye have taken away the key of knowledge: ye entered not in yourselves, and them that were entering in ye hindered" (Luke xi. 52).

To what the "entering in" here refers, may be gathered from a similar passage where the verbal form of kleis (key) is used:

> "Woe unto you scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye shut up (kleio) the kingdom of heaven against men: for ye neither go in yourselves, neither suffer ye them that are entering to go in" (Matt. xxiii. 13).

The kingdom of the heavens may be looked upon as a house of which Peter (as leader of the Apostles) was given the "keys". He was as it were, the door-keeper or house steward of that house which was built upon the rock; the confession which Peter himself had just voiced:

> "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God" (Matt. xvi. 16).

Peter was empowered to determine who were to belong to, and who to be excluded from, the house of His Master, Who had entrusted him with the "keys". In close association with this, all the Apostles were given authority to "bind" and "loose", the explanation of which appears to be, "to forbid and to allow" (H. A. Meyer following Lightfoot). That is to say, the Apostles were authorized to declare what was, or was not lawful, with respect to the kingdom of the heavens.

Those in authority at the time of Christ, the "rulers" or "shepherds" of Israel (largely the scribes and Pharisees) had failed. Instead of preparing the people for their Messiah, they hindered them. When His kingdom was "in the midst of" them (Luke xvii. 21 R.V. margin), they neither entered themselves, nor suffered others to do so. They completely failed in their stewardship, and the people were left "as sheep having no shepherd" (Matt. ix. 36).

The Apostles, with Peter at their head, were sent to this people having all the authority of the Lord upon them. They commanded repentance (Acts ii. 38; iii. 19) and pronounced forgiveness of sins. So came into being the Acts "church" (a called out company from the people, compare Acts ii. 40), who awaited the early return of the Lord and the establishment of "the kingdom of the heavens" upon earth. The Apostles were to have an authoritative and responsible position in that kingdom, under the Lordship of Christ:

> "In the regeneration when the Son of man shall sit in the throne of His glory, ye also shall sit upon twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel" (Matt. xix. 28).

This "judgment" was somewhat to be anticipated during the Acts period in the authority invested in the Apostles to "bind" and "loose".

Bishops and deacons.

When the "number of the disciples multiplied", and the "churches" were formed in various places, it became necessary to place over these assemblies men who could "shepherd the sheep". So were appointed the "bishops" (overseers).

There is no record of the inauguration of this office in the N.T., and it is probable that it was simply a continuation of the office of "chief ruler" in the synagogue. (The close connection of the early believers with the synagogue has already been noted.) The appointment of James as overseer to the Jerusalem assembly was early required, and the authority he exercised has already been considered.

The office carried with it the responsibility of the affairs of the assembly, rather in the same way as did the position of "chief ruler" to a synagogue. Those who served seem also to have been called "elders" and "shepherds" or "pastors". This much appears from a literal rendering of I Pet. v. 1, 2:

> "The elders among you I exhort . . . . . shepherd the flock of God among you, exercising oversight . . . . . willingly."

It is possible that the office was variously referred to according as it was viewed with respect to authority ("bishop") or ministry ("shepherd"); the appellation "elder" being applied in recognition of age or maturity.

A bishop must be able to teach (I Tim. iii. 1, 2) and this accounts for the connection "pastors and teachers" in Eph. iv. 11. That there was just as much need for this office after Acts xxviii. 28 cannot surely be doubted.

A "deacon" (Greek diakonos) was simply a servant, who was concerned with the less spectacular, but equally essential duties in the assembly, that the "clerks" had dealt with in the synagogue. The deacons of Acts vi. were a special company who apparently existed only for a time, but the duties divulging upon them give some idea of the work these men were intended to do.

When the "hope of Israel" was succeeded by the hope of the Body of Christ, there was still the need for organization within the assemblies, and so the offices of bishop and deacon continued. But with the turning away from the teaching of Paul, and hence the truth (II Tim. i. 15; iv. 4), a confused darkness settled over the assemblies, and out of it eventually arose the Catholic church. Pretending to the authority of the Apostles, it exalted the office of bishop (and to a less extent that of deacon) above all that was ever intended by the Lord, until at the present time that office bears no resemblance to the N.T. ideal.

No.12. Miracles.
pp. 66 - 71

When the true setting of the Acts period is perceived, it may be understood why miracles continued throughout that time, but ceased abruptly after Acts xxviii. 28. Apart from their prophetic import as the credentials of the Messiah (Luke vii. 19-23; Isaiah xxxv. 4-6), miracles are intimately bound up with the earthly purpose of God. They were a foretaste of restoration of earthly blessing, when the effects of sin are removed. They do not belong to a heavenly calling with "spiritual blessings".

A useful comment on the true meaning of a miracle, which may help to show why they were found in connection with the earthly, but not heavenly purpose of God, is given in The Unrealized Logic f Religion by W. H. Fitchett:

> "The old crude, not to say false, definition of a miracle described it as 'a suspension, or violation, of the ordinary laws of nature'. Most of the objections against miracles hold only against this false conception of them. In the sense of a 'violation of the natural order', sin is the true miracle. It is essentially a breach of the divine order of the universe, and Christ's acts of supernatural healing are the restoration of law to its kingdom; the arrest of that disorder in man's physical nature which sin produces. His miracles are not a breach of the divine order, but its reassertion. They are prophetic hints, in physical terms, of the great ends of His redemption."

Salvation, for a people with an earthly hope, includes complete restoration in the physical realm, and most of the miracles of Scripture can be clearly seen to be a foretaste of that age of restoration to come. The Hebrew believers were said to have,

> "tasted the good word of God and the miracles (dunameis) of the age to come" (vi. 5 lit.).

The close association between salvation and healing is seen in a number of N.T. passages. The woman with the issue of blood expressed an assurance in the Lord when she said:

> "If I may touch but His clothes, I shall be whole" (Mark v. 28).

But the verb translated here "I shall be whole" is the Greek sozo, "to be saved". When the Lord had perceived who it was that had touched Him, He said to her, "Daughter, thy faith hath made thee whole" (sozo, 'hath saved thee'). This very same verb was used by the Apostle Paul, when he wrote to a company with a calling "in heavenly places",

> "for be grace are ye saved through faith" (Eph. ii. 8), yet there is no suggestion here that physical salvation is involved.

It is a matter of distinguishing things that differ. The miracles of healing recorded in the N.T. are explicable when seen as a foretaste of coming good things: they do not belong to a company whose blessings are all spiritual. Hence such miracles ended abruptly with the change of dispensation at Acts xxviii. 28.

There is however one miracle which did not belong solely to the earthly purpose of God, and which continues its influence today:

> "The gospel of Christ . . . . . it is the power (dunamis, 'miracle') of God unto salvation to every one that believeth" (Rom. i. 16).

Nothing short of a miracle is necessary to change the heart of man, who has turned his back upon God, and corrupted His ways.

This miracle of God, which is effected through the gospel of Christ, is also to be looked upon as a foretaste of restoration. Already it gives to the believer "the spirit of a sound mind" (II Tim. i. 7). He is enabled to see things as they really are, and not through the eyes of the world. By the renewing of the mind the believer is being "transfigured" (Rom. xii. 2), and the goal is associated with the "image" of God, the Creator of the "new man" (Col. iii. 10). All that was lost in Adam is more than "restored" in Christ.

Effect of the destruction of the Temple on believers living at the time.

It has been shown that the Acts believers, who had an earthly hope and expected the early return of the Lord to the earth, looked towards Jerusalem as their centre. This was not simply that the city was convenient in this respect, but because it was to become the centre of God's administration on the earth, from which the Word of the Lord would go forth. Already, during the Acts period, and in anticipation of that future day, the Apostles of the circumcision exercised their authority from here, and their word was considered binding.

Miracles of healing and judgment were commonplace at this time, and were a "taste" of the miracles of the coming age of restoration. The gift of "holy spirit", which conferred the ability to speak in tongues, to heal, etc., was expected to follow belief and baptism, and was a continuation of true conversion.

The position of the Gentile at this time was as of a "wild olive branch" grafted into the stock of Israel, "contrary to nature", and intended to provoke the people of God into bringing forth fruit, to fulfil their calling of God.

It can therefore be appreciated why the destruction of the Temple and the overthrow of Jerusalem in 70A.D., together with those other factors which must already have been thrusting themselves upon the attention (viz. the lack of miracles and the increase of Gentile converts over the Jewish), caused so much confusion amongst believers at the time. To those who had not understood, or would not accepted the change of dispensation announced by the Apostle Paul (Acts xxviii. 28; Eph. iii.), the position was inexplicable.

> "With the overthrow of Jerusalem the visible centre of the Church was removed. The keystone of the fabric was withdrawn, and the whole edifice threatened with ruin" (The Christian Ministry by J. B. Lightfoot).

The Gospel of John.

From the nature of the system which eventually emerged from the darkness, it is quite evident that the later ministry of Paul was little understood. He lived long enough himself to see the beginnings of a turning from his teaching, and consequently a loss of the truth:

> "All they which are in Asia be turned away from me" (II Tim. i. 15).

The Apostle John, who lived to a great age, almost certainly spent his latter days at Ephesus, the centre of this area that "turned away" from Paul.

> "Nothing is better attested in early Church history than the residence and work of St. John at Ephesus" (The Gospel of John by B. F. Westcott).

This being so, it was probably here that the Apostle wrote the Gospel which is generally attributed to him.

There are at least three aspects of that Gospel which bear upon the subject being considered, and which suggest a secondary object in its writing. (The primary object is plainly stated in xx. 31).

(1) The position of Jerusalem with respect to worship (iv. 19-24).
(2) The relationship of John's "tarrying" to the Second Coming (xxi. 20-23).
(3) The presentation of the Holy Spirit's ministry (xiv. and xvi.).

Further to the second point may be observed the remarks of the Lord (not recorded by the other Evangelists) on His "coming to them" (chapter xiv.).

(1) The position of Jerusalem with respect to worship.

> "The hour cometh, when ye shall neither in this mountain, nor yet at Jerusalem, worship the Father . . . . . the hour cometh, and now is, when the true worshippers shall worship the Father in spirit and truth" (iv. 21, 23).

When was this hour to be? All the expectations of the Acts period were centred in Jerusalem. During the coming age all nations were to flow there to worship:

> "And it shall come to pass, that every one that is left of all the nations which came up against Jerusalem shall even go up from year to year to worship the King, the Lord of hosts . . . . . unto Jerusalem" (Zech. xiv. 16, 17).

The reader is urged to read the whole of Zech. xiv., when it will be seen that this "worship" at Jerusalem is presented after the Second Coming to the Mount of Olives (verse 4).

To what period then does the prophecy in John iv. refer? The Apostle clarifies the position by the insertion of the words "and now is" (verse 23), i.e. "at the time of writing (post Acts xxviii.)". In recording this prophecy of the Lord (no other Gospel writer does), John indicates that a time had now arrived when Jerusalem was no longer to be looked upon as a centre of worship; the "hope of Israel" had been succeeded by another hope, the prior position of the Jew had gone. Without actually intruding into the exclusive ministry of Paul, John seeks to explain that the overthrow of Jerusalem was a consequence of the rejection by Israel of their Messiah ("His own received Him not"—i. 11), an event suggested by the Lord in His conversation with the Samaritan woman, and an evidence that a new dispensation now obtained in which the 'true' replaced the typical (iv. 23, 24). This dispensation concerned the 'world' irrespective of the Jew; the 'children of God' were 'as many as' received the "True Light" (i. 9-12).

(2) The relationship of John's "tarrying" to the Second Coming.

The Lord had suggested the possibility that John might remain alive unto His coming again. This had led to the false assumption that this was necessarily so. There was however an "if" attached to the Lord's words.

> "Jesus saith unto him, If I will that he tarry till I come" (xxi. 22).

Any who have appreciated the position during the Acts period will realize that an "if" conditioned the Lord's return at that time, the "if" of repentance on the part of Israel (see Acts iii. 19, 20). The "coming" was imminent and expected throughout the Acts, as an examination of the epistles written at that time will reveal. When after constant rejection of the truth Israel were laid aside in unbelief (Acts xxviii.), the coming (parousia) of the Lord faded as a near possibility.

John, conscious of the change of dispensation, and writing his Gospel partly to explain that change, would find it necessary to clarify the position with regard to his demise, which was now certain to his mind. So he wrote:

> "Yet Jesus said not unto him (Peter), he (John) shall not die; but if I will that he tarry till I come, what is that to thee?" (xxi. 23).

The destruction of the Temple and overthrow of Jerusalem (the Temple is standing at the Lord's return—Matt. xxiv. 15-30) was the evidence that the Second Coming had been put off indefinitely, and hence there was now no "if" attached to John's death.

Further to the "coming" of the Lord, the reader should note how John, in his Gospel, although he makes reference to the literal coming (xiv. 3), records how the Lord promised His presence in another way:

> "I will not leave you comfortless: I will come to you . . . . . If a man love Me . . . . . My Father will love him, and We will come unto him, and make Our abode with him" (xiv. 18, 23).

Add to the above promise the words of verse 16, and it will be seen that the presence of Father, Son and Holy Spirit are here promised. Here is an aspect of the "coming" of the Lord which the other Evangelists barely touch (but compare Matt. xxviii. 20 and Mark xvi. 20), but which John seems to emphasize because of the postponement of the parousia.

(3) The presentation of the Holy Spirit's ministry.

The ministry of the Holy Spirit during the Acts period was intimately connected with "spiritual gifts" (tongues, healing, etc.). The "promise of the Father" was to be "endued with power from on high" (Luke xxiv. 49; Acts i. 8).

The aspect of the Holy Spirit's ministry which John emphasizes in his Gospel is different, and is in keeping with a dispensation during which "spiritual gifts", such as are observed in Acts, do not obtain:

> "The Comforter, which is the Holy Spirit, Whom the Father will send in My name, He shall teach you all things, and bring all things to your remembrance, whatsoever I have said unto you" (xiv. 26).
>
> "When He, the Spirit of truth, is come, He will guide you into all truth . . . . . He shall receive of mine, and shall show it unto you" (xvi. 13, 14).

To sum up the emphasis of John on the 'coming' of the Lord and the Holy Spirit's ministry, the words of B. F. Westcott on the last discourses of the Lord (recorded only by John in chapters xiv.-xvi. of his Gospel) are to the point:

> "At first they (the last discourses) could not have been intelligible in their full bearing. The fall of Jerusalem at length placed them in their proper light, and then they were recorded" (Gospel of John).

Confusion, darkness and the emergence of Catholicism.

With the destruction of Jerusalem, "the overthrow of the visible centre", a period which J. B. Lightfoot describes as "shrouded in darkness" (with respect to Church government) ensued. It was not until early in the second century that the episcopal office became established, and the first signs of Catholicism arose. But that it was very different from anything which the Apostle Paul envisaged, is manifest from a reading of the writings of "The Fathers". Even Lightfoot has to admit:

> "The magnitude of the change effected during this period may be measured by the difference in the constitution and conception of the Christian Church as presented in the Pastoral Epistles of St. Paul and the letters of St. Ignatius respectively" (The Christian Ministry).

So began the long years of confusion and darkness when the truth became buried under an accumulating mass of tradition and error. This however goes beyond the present subject and the interested reader is referred to the articles on The Early Centuries and the Truth by S. Allen (The Berean Expositor, Vols. XLIV. and XLV.).

With this concluding article in the series The Background to the New Testament, is sent forth the prayer that it may have helped some to catch the environment of the Acts period, and so appreciate better the situation at that time with its hopes and failures, and the hope of the present calling outlined first by the Apostle Paul, the "prisoner of Christ Jesus for you Gentiles" (Eph. iii. 1).

The First Epistle to the Corinthians.

No.13. pp. 6 - 10

In our exposition we have reached one of the problem verses of the N.T.:

> "For this cause ought the woman to have a sign of authority on her head, because of the angels" (I Cor. xi. 10 R.V.).

We must remember that social customs are bound to play a part and affect Christian witness, and unless they are definitely contrary to Biblical doctrine, they cannot be ignored by the believer in his daily life. The social customs at Corinth during N.T. times are, of course, different from ours, but the factors involved, specially in public worship, are the same, namely modesty, propriety and orderliness. Among the Greeks, only prostitutes, so numerous in Corinth, went about unveiled in public. If Christian women discarded the veil in the assembly, they automatically placed themselves on this level, thus losing their reputation, and bringing the whole assembly into disgrace.

The Greeks wore no head covering in private prayer, whereas the Jewish men wore the tallith, "a four-cornered shawl having fringes consisting of eight threads, each knotted five times" (Vincent) to show reverence to God and their unworthiness to look on Him. However, Maimonides (Mishna) excepts cases where (as in Greece) the custom of the place was different. But the Apostle has more than custom to consider in his regulation of conduct in the Corinthian assembly. His first regard was for truth and the right relationship between God, man, and then woman. Hence the argument of verses 3-16.

As we have seen, the relationship between Christian men and women is not one of superiority or otherwise, but of God-given position, and this, the Apostle argues, should be evident in dress and deportment. A man ought not to have his head veiled inasmuch as he is a representation of the image and glory of God. If the tallith was customary at this particular time for Jewish men in worship (we are not absolutely sure about this) then this was revolutionary teaching so far as they were concerned. But not so with the woman, as we have seen. It would have been revolutionary for her not to wear a veil in public, and as man was constituted by God to be her "head" (verse 3), the wearing of a veil, showing this symbolically, made it even more right and proper.

This is what Paul means when he says she should have "a sign of authority on her head", where "authority" is put by metonymy for "the veil" or head-covering. The Apostle does not stop here, but adds "because of the angels" (verse 10). The explanations of this clause have been legion. Here are some of them:

(1) The angels are "presidents" or leaders of the assembly, just as some interpret the "angels of the seven churches" in Rev. i. 20.

(2) They are good angels who are present at worship and would be offended by indecorous conduct of women.

(3) They are good angels who might be ensnared as the "sons of God" were in Gen. vi., when they contemplated unveiled women.
(4) They are the fallen angels of Gen. vi. who worked such havoc with humanity which finally resulted in the Flood.

No.1 we can reject outright. When the Lord Jesus interprets the symbol of "stars" as "angels" in Rev. i. 20, we have no right to re-interpret his interpretation and make them human leaders. This is opening the door to error and not light and understanding.

No.2 is popular with many evangelical expositors, but when we take it to the test of Scripture, what do we find? Just where do we have any command in the Old or New Testament to avoid offending angels? And even if angels were offended by the behaviour of some of the Corinthian believers, what practical effect would this have had on this church? To avoid offending God is of supreme importance, but we have no divine commands concerning the effect of human conduct upon angels.

View No.3 may be possible, but again, we have no clear teaching of Scripture as to the attitude of angels towards humanity, and therefore we cannot accept this idea.

We are left therefore with view No.4, and lest any should think that this is one of the cranky ideas of modern dispensationalists, we would point out that it was put forward as early as Tertullian (160-222A.D.). The Apostle has already used Gen. i.-iii. in his arguments concerning the relationship of the sexes. What more natural that his thoughts should travel on to chapter vi. of the same book where, in the Septuagint, angeloi, angels are used of the "sons of God"? These "kept not their first estate" (Jude 6) and co-habited with women, which resulted in the evil Satanic seed who were physical monstrosities (giants Gen. vi. 4), and finally produced the conditions which necessitated the Flood.

If this is what Paul is referring to, it will fit in with his arguments and the context we are now considering. It should be clear that neither men or women are safe in the spiritual conflict that surrounds us unless they abide in the position that God has placed them in, the one to the other. If a woman steps out of her God-appointed relationship with the man, then she puts herself in danger. Refusal to wear the veil would have been tantamount to doing this, and such a woman would then have been open to the powers of darkness who would not have been slow to take advantage. There is plenty of evidence in the Acts of active demonism, and the time was not without its dangers, just as it will be at the end of this age (II Tim. iii. 1).

Paul goes on to state the right relationship of the sexes (verses 11 and 12) and to point out that all these things (ta panta) have their origin in God. Even naturally and bodily, the man has been made different to the woman. Relating to the hair of the head, women grow considerably longer hair than men, so nature (or the God of nature) teaches us that woman has been given a natural covering which men lack (15). Nothing is clearer than the fact that, whatever similarities men and women may have, they also have definite differences which distinguish them and this is according to God's will.

Many modern tendencies and fashions in the way the hair is treated and in dress, obliterate these distinctions between the sexes and are definitely bad. Believers should take care with such modern fashions, and see to it that they are not being enslaved by these things and so becoming conformed to this age (Rom. xii. 1, 2).

Having made the relationship between men and women clear (even appealing to nature and custom of the Greek world at the time of writing), he now asks:

> "Judge ye in yourselves: is it seemly that a woman pray unto God unveiled? . . . . . but if any man seemeth to be contentious, we have no such custom, neither the churches of God" (I Cor. 13-16 R.V.).

The Apostle does not say that it was unseemly for any woman to engage in prayer, but to do so unveiled would be unseemly and even dangerous, because of the evil spirit world. In addition there was no other church doing these things in this way, so the Corinthians who were doing this, could not appeal to such action elsewhere in support of their own.

Paul, all through this section, is regulating the conduct of the Corinthian assembly. The Holy Spirit had distributed his evidential gifts to both men and women (xii. 4-6). The Apostle had written to the Thessalonian church that these gifts must not be quenched (I Thess. v. 19). There is no possibility of man quenching God here. "Spirit" is put for His gift which could be neglected. However, the way these gifts were used in the meetings together, must be regulated so that all was done decently and in order. Later on in this epistle Paul returns to the use of these gifts, with special reference to tongues and prophecy.

A new section commences with verse 17, where, instead of commending as in verse 2, the Apostle is compelled to censure them for their bad conduct in connection with the Lord's Supper:

> "But in giving you this charge, I praise you not, that ye come together not for the better but for the worse. For first of all, when ye come together in the church, I hear that divisions exist among you, and I partly believe it" (xi. 17, 18 R.V.).

The situation was so bad that Paul tells them that their coming together in assembly, instead of being a help, had become a hindrance by reason of their behaviour. We need not assume that the divisions here were the same as those mentioned in iii. 3. They seem to have arisen in the context of chapter xi. out of pure selfishness and greed. It is essential to remember that the Supper itself was preceded by the communal meal, the agape, which has its origin in Acts ii. 42-47. This we have dealt with in a previously study to which the reader is referred. The abuses obviously commenced with this love-feast, which, instead of being a practical expression of love and sharing, became an opportunity to indulge in gluttony and disgraceful conduct. Paul said that he had heard of all this (doubtless from Chloe's house, i. 11; or from Stephanas and his friends, xvi. 17), and he partly believed it. Most people believe more than they hear. The gracious Apostle believes less than has been reported to him. On the surface, it seemed impossible that such scandalous behaviour could occur among Christians, but Paul knew to what depths such could sink when the old sinful nature is indulged.

He uses two words for divisions, schisma and hairesis, which, while having different shades of meaning, can only refer to the same thing here. Divisions resulted in separate parties being formed, evidently antagonistic to each other. The only good thing about this sorry state of affairs was "there must be also heresies among you, that they which are approved (dokimoi) may be made manifest among you" (verse 19). In other words, people's true characters are exposed in such a situation; those walking worthy and therefore approved by the Lord, being manifestly distinct from the backsliders. The Lord Jesus, in His lifetime, had hinted that such divisions would occur, but that those responsible would come under judgment (Matt. xviii. 7). Alas, the history of the professing church right through the centuries, has been strewn with such happenings.

The Corinthian communal meal was certainly a meal of sorts, but it was not the Lord's Super in the way the believers at Corinth were treating it. The word Lord's is the adjective kuriakon, "relating to the Lord", and here is emphatic. Instead of the Lord being in control, the sinful flesh as dominating, and this meal, which could have beautifully set forth their practical oneness in Christ, was being used for gluttony and selfishness. No wonder Paul was so indignant. The chief offenders appeared to be the rich, who were in a position to set an example in generosity and thoughtfulness for the poorer brethren. Instead of this, they were grossly over-eating and drinking, even to the point of getting drunk, with the result that the poor were left without food and went hungry (verses 20 & 21).

> "What? Have ye not houses to eat and to drink in? or despise ye the Church of God, and put them to shame that have not? What shall I say to you? shall I praise you in this? I praise you not" (I Cor. xi. 22 R.V.).

This disgraceful behaviour was bringing Christianity into contempt and Paul charged them to remedy this at once.

No.14. pp. 26 - 29

The Apostle Paul has been severely reprimanding the Corinthian believers for their gross abuses of the Church's common meal, the agape, and the Lord's Supper that followed it. This behaviour was even worse in view of the fact that the love feast was so closely connected with the New Covenant feast, which was a memorial of the Lord's atoning death for them; and to link such conduct with such rich and solemn symbols was intolerable.

The Apostle now elaborates this:

> "For I received of the Lord that which also I delivered unto you, how that the Lord Jesus in the night in which He was betrayed took bread; and when He had given thanks, He brake it, and said, This is My body, which is for you: this do in remembrance of Me" (I Cor. xi. 23, 24 R.V.).

That the actual words of the Lord Jesus at this Passover supper were handed down from the apostles to their disciples and then to others there is no doubt, and it is possible that they could have reached Paul in this way. But in view of Gal. i. 12, with its great stress on the Lord's revelation to Paul independently of any human source, it is better to take the words "I received of the Lord" as meaning that the Apostle received this record directly from Christ.

There should be no need to stress that this meal was directly connected with the Passover, as all the four evangelists make perfectly clear. Likewise its connection with the New Covenant of Jer. xxxi. is plain, and that covenant is specially related to Israel and Judah (Jer. xxxi. 31). It is tradition that wrenches this feast away from its divinely Israelitish setting, so much so that many Christians have never realized that, in its inception, it was connected with the Passover at all!

The Lord gives the symbolical meaning to the broken bread and the wine by the figure Metaphor, in which the verb "to be" means "represents" (see Figures of Speech used in the Bible by E. W. Bullinger, D.D., p.738). "This (broken bread) represents My body, which is for you". The ghastly failure of the Roman Church to recognize this fact has resulted in the blasphemy and bondage of the Mass that has enslaved and deceived thousands down the centuries.

The twelve apostles were exhorted to keep this feast as a "memorial"—"do this as My memorial" (I Cor. xi. 25 literally). Now both the Passover and this feast were memorials, the one reminding Israel of their miraculous deliverance from the bondage of Egypt (Exod. xiii. 9), and the other of a greater deliverance at Calvary from the bondage of sin and death. In both cases blood was shed stressing death, the former a type of the great reality, the precious life of Christ, voluntarily laid down in bearing the penalty of the sins of His people. This figure Metaphor would have been readily understood by these twelve Jews, to whom the eating of the literal flesh and blood of the Lord would have been revolting and utterly contrary to the Law.

These symbols not only looked back by faith into the past. They looked forward too, to the completion of the saving work which they represented, at the expected early coming of Christ, when the goal of salvation would be attained.

> "For as often as ye eat this bread, and drink the cup, ye proclaim the Lord's death till He come" (xi. 26 R.V.).

It should hardly be necessary to say, in view of our past studies, that the second advent of Christ, as yet future to us, could not have been in their minds. During the Acts, the coming of the Lord was imminent as practically all the early epistles clearly teach (cp. Acts iii. 19-26). Paul, together with the Christian groups of believers, expected to see and participate in this great event. Therefore this supper was a proclamation of the nearness and reality of the second Advent. This sacrificial meal then linked both the comings together, and had real point at this time.

Moreover, this typical meal was not one-sided. If it spoke of basic truths which conferred eternal blessings, it also brought great responsibility upon those who partook of it and it was this that Paul wanted to bring home to those in the Corinthian assembly who were so grossly abusing their great privileges. One of the big mistakes that evangelists have made is to teach that the age of grace commenced at Calvary. God certainly acted in grace and longsuffering to Israel during the Acts period in giving them yet another opportunity to repent and turn back to Him. The gospel Paul preached was one based upon grace, but as a dispensation, grace did not operate in all its fullness until after the laying aside in unbelief of the chosen nation, and as such it was then made known in the first letter written after this event which occurred at Acts xxviii., namely Ephesians (Eph. iii. 2).

During the Acts, divine judgment was as much manifest as it had been in O.T. days. James, stressing the imminent return of Christ, had declared that His coming drew near, and as Judge, He was then standing before the door (v. 7-9). It is quite wrong to regard the second Advent as one of blessing only. Many Scriptures reveal the fact that it is also a time of judgment for sin. During the time we are considering (the period covered by the Acts), the Lord was already judging among His people. His severe dealings with Ananias and Sapphira were typical. We remember this resulted from their telling lies, not the worst of sins in the estimation of many people, and one wonders what would happen amongst Christians today if we were still living in the same dispensation! And yet this would be happening if the present dispensation had commenced at the Cross.

The Apostle is now going to warn the sinning Christians that their abuses of the supper of the Lord would certainly come under His direct judgment, and had already done so in a solemn way on some of them.

> "Wherefore whosoever shall eat the bread or drink the cup of the Lord unworthily, shall be guilty of the body and the blood of the Lord. But let a man prove himself, and so let him eat of the bread, and drink of the cup. For he that eateth and drinketh, eateth and > drinketh judgment unto himself, if he discern not the body. For this cause many among you are weak and sickly, and not a few sleep" (xi. 27-30 R.V.).

Those in the Corinthian assembly who were so grossly indulging the sinful old nature by gluttony and drunkenness were playing with fire. The Lord could not be indifferent to such conduct, and as a result, a great number of them were ill, and some had actually been visited with death.

This was the Lord's judgment indeed beginning at the house of God (I Pet. iv. 17), and was an earnest of the Kingdom age when, not only will there be world-wide blessing, but divine judgment and discipline too so that sin may be restrained, and without this, such a Kingdom and blessing would be impossible of realization.

Again we would point out that this direct judgment for sin is not typical of this present age of grace. When one considers the errors in connection with the Roman Mass participated in by many thousands; the many unbelievers who regularly have taken communion over the centuries, "not discerning the Lord's body", one wonders again just what would have happened in Christendom down the centuries had the Lord been dealing with His people in the same way as the time we are here considering. As one has said, undertakers could not have coped with the work! Yet Paul warned the Corinthians that he who did not discern the spiritual teaching underlying the meal relating to the Lord's body "eats and drinks judgment unto himself", and this judgment was not one in the far future at the last day, but was taking place at that very time in a drastic way.

This fact, together with other features, should make it clear to the discerning believer, that the Acts is a separate dispensation, even though we have the fundamental gospel of grace, true for all time dealing with sin and death, preached throughout the period. The solemn conclusion of all this is stated in verse 31:

> "But if we discerned ourselves, we should not be judged. But when we are judged, we are chastened of the Lord, that we may not be condemned with the world. Wherefore, my brethren, when ye come together to eat, wait one for another. If any man is hungry, let him eat at home; that your coming together be not unto judgment. And the rest will I set in order whensoever I come" (xi. 31-34 R.V.).

If the believers at Corinth would only turn the searchlight of judgment upon themselves instead of on others, they would have disciplined themselves and avoided the Lord having to discipline them, although this discipline, even if severe, was better than being condemned with the unsaved world around them.

It is still true today, believers should never judge or harshly condemn one another. It is easier and more pleasant to judge someone else than to rigorously judge and discipline ourselves, but this is the only condemnation that God allows us! How much more pleasant the history of the professing Church would have been if only this had been carried out consistently! In this blatant age, when self-discipline is so little known, it behoves the believer to give a witness that his faith in Christ has taught him to control himself, remembering that this is one of the fruits of the Spirit (Gal. v. 23, where 'temperance' should read 'self-control'), which should be on the 'tree' of our lives, bringing glory to the Lord.

A new section dealing with spiritual gifts commences with the next chapter, and to this we will address ourselves in our next study.

No.15. pp. 50 - 52

After reprimanding the Corinthian assembly for their abuses of the agape, the shared love-feast, the Apostle Paul adds to the solemnity of his warning by recalling the words and acts of the Lord Jesus when He instituted the New Covenant Supper under the shadow of Calvary. This occupies xi. 23-30. There is no need to debate whether the Apostle received the facts in unbroken tradition from the Twelve, or whether he received it from the Lord without any mediation. In view of his strong language in Gal. i., where he discounts any human origin in his knowledge of the Gospel, having received it directly from the risen Lord Himself, we see no good reason why it is not so in this particular case.

The facts of the ritual are in accordance with the Gospel records. We have already seen its direct link with the Passover, both being memorial feasts, one looking forward to the real deliverance at the Cross by the real Passover Lamb ("Christ our Passover is sacrificed for us", v. 7), and the other looking back in faith to the same great act. Paul reinforces his warning by impressing on them that to partake of this ritual feast unworthily, that is with the moral failings of selfishness and gluttony rampant among them, was to eat and drink God's judgment to themselves rather than to receive His blessings (verses 27-29).

This judgment was already evident in their midst:

> "For this cause many among you are weak and sickly, and not a few sleep" (xi. 30 R.V.).

We have already pointed out that this Divine discipline was typical of the Acts period, where the possibility of the earthly kingdom was still in view. It is not typical of this age of grace where grace is reigning and direct judgment is held back. While this is a fact, we would point out that the normal consequences of sowing to the flesh or the spirit remain unchanged (Gal. vi. 7-9).

This section of the epistle ends with the Apostle exhorting the believers at Corinth to wait for one another (33). It is obvious that there was no spiritual hierarchy in the Corinthian set-up who could have forced obedience of the rank and file. They were not told to wait for their leaders to arrive, but each to wait for the other, thus bringing responsibility to all. Any undue hunger should be first satisfied at home (34), so that their conduct might be worthy, and the painful experience of the Lord's judgment avoided.

Paul now commences an important section dealing with spiritual gifts. It is clear that the Corinthian church had an abundance of these gifts, and this in spite of their carnal state. To teach that the possession of these gifts today is a mark of spirituality, or of some special filling of the Spirit, is quite contrary to Scriptural facts, as we shall see. It is possible that the believers at Corinth had raised the matter concerning gifts in their communication with him. As this matter was directly connected with their public worship, the Apostle now deals with it.

> "Now concerning spiritual gifts, brethren, I would not have you ignorant. Ye know that when ye were Gentiles, ye were led away unto those dumb idols, howsoever ye might be led. Wherefore I give you to understand, that no man speaking in the Spirit of God saith, Jesus is anathema; and no man can say, Jesus is Lord, but in the Holy Spirit" (xii. 1-3 R.V.).

The word 'gifts' is not in the original; it could be rendered "spiritual matters", but as the context makes clear that it is special gifts of the Holy Spirit which are being discussed, it is better to supply the word "gifts". There was evidently a large Gentile section in the Corinthian assembly, for the Apostle refers to their pre-conversion days as idolaters under the domination of the evil Satanic spirits that were behind the dumb idols they worshipped.

While redemption had delivered them from this bondage, it was a mistake to suppose that there was no danger now from Satanic activity. In one sense these gifts constituted a danger, for Paul makes it clear in this epistles and the one that was to follow, that Satan, as an angel of light, can travesty these gifts and so deceive the unwary. It is quite wrong to imagine that the great enemy of God and His children, gave believers a holiday, as it were, till the second century with its developed Gnosticism. The battle between light and darkness never ceases, and the error that the Apostle combated at Colossae, the warnings contained in the Pastoral epistles and the command of the Apostle John to "test the spirits whether they are of God, because many false prophets are gone out into the world (I John iv. 1) and that the spirit of antichrist was already present (ii. 18), show quite clearly that this was so, and therefore the danger existed of being led astray.

We wish that those today who are anxious to bring back some of these gifts, in particular tongue speaking, would bear in mind the danger of what they are seeking to do.

In N.T. times ecstatic heathen worship was a fact, as it is still today in dark centres of heathendom. Paul either knew that this had already entered the Corinthian church, or there was the possibility of it doing so.

Thus he states categorically that no one under the influence of God's Spirit can say that Jesus is accursed, nor would anyone under Satanic domination own His lordship, for this is the very thing that Satan covets for himself, and he certainly would not allow any of his dupes to advertise the supremacy of Christ!

It seems clear that the Apostle had the worship of the assembly in mind in this long section dealing with spiritual gifts, which occupies this chapter and also chapters xiii. & xiv. In consequence, he is not referring to every day speech (although what he said would cover this) but speech in the assembly, which would be either under the guidance of God, or under the Satanic influence. Anyone of course at any time could pronounce the words "Lord Jesus", whether saved or unsaved, but no one in the assembly's worship could use this phrase in teaching or witness and be under the control of the evil one.

Having made this clear, Paul now goes on to discuss the spiritual gifts themselves:

> "There are distributions of gifts, but the same Spirit; there are distributions of services, and the same Lord; and these are distributions of operations, but the same God who operates all things in all men. To each one is given his own manifestation of the Spirit, with a view to mutual profit. For to one there is given, through the Spirit, a word of wisdom; to another, in accordance with the same Spirit, a word of Knowledge; to another faith, in the same Spirit; to another gifts of healing, in the one Spirit; to another the working of miracles, to another prophecy, to another the power to distinguish between spirits, to another various kinds of tongues, to another the interpretation of tongues. All these things the same one Spirit puts into operation, distributing individually to each one as He wills" (I Cor. xii. 4-11, C. K. Barrett).

There is no difficulty with the main theme of this section. Note that Spirit, Lord and God are used interchangeably. However varied the gifts may be, they have one source, the Holy Spirit of God. They were not distributed to give any feeling of superiority, but for the mutual profit of the whole church (7). Just as there was no uniformity of experience, neither was there of gifts. Nor were these gifts the privilege of the few who had had some special spiritual experience. To each one of the assembly is given his own manifestation of the Spirit (7) and the Spirit divided these gifts exactly "as He willed". No believer was responsible for the kind of gift he received, but he was certainly responsible for the way he used it, which primarily was meant for the Lord's glory and the common good. In view of the attempts to revive tongues speaking today apart from the gifts as a whole, it is significant that Paul puts speaking in tongues at the bottom of the list. It was probably coveted by some because of its outward showiness, but the Apostle commences with one that is infinitely more important, but without any external attraction, that of wisdom. Why? Because wisdom is fundamental in the practical outworking of any gift or service for the Lord. Who is going to give away anything of real value to foolish people who will only misuse it?

It is noteworthy that, in his prayer for the Ephesian believers, Paul again puts wisdom first (Eph. i. 17). "If any man lack wisdom (and we all do to some extent) let him ask of God, that giveth to all men liberally . . . . ." (James i. 5), so there is no excuse for any believer to remain foolish, or to think or act foolishly. This only hinders the Truth, and lets the Lord down before an unbelieving world.

No.16. pp. 77 - 80

In the section of the epistle now before us, the Apostle Paul is dealing with the various gifts of the Holy Spirit, among believers of the Acts period, distributed according to His will. We have seen the all-important gift of wisdom comes first, whereas the more showy gift of tongues is put at the bottom of the list. The idea of some who have a leaning towards tongue-speaking, that this is a mark of spirituality or of a special baptism or filling of the Spirit, is shown up as false when one remembers that, of all the churches Paul dealt with, the Corinthian assembly was the most carnal! We shall have more to say about speaking in tongues later on.

The next evidential gift of the Spirit in chapter xii. is knowledge. That this was given without human mediation is clear by the context, where the gifts come directly from the Spirit of God. I John ii. 20 refers to this by saying, "But ye have an unction (anointing) from the Holy One (i.e. The Holy Spirit) and ye know all things". And again in ii. 27, "But the anointing which ye have received of Him abideth in you, and ye need not that any man teach you".

One of the gifts of the ascended Christ for His Body is 'teachers' (Eph. iv. 11), but there is no mention in this epistle of any supernatural gift of knowledge without human effort, such as existed in the church at Corinth. We may wish there was such today, but now we find we have to search the Scriptures patiently, comparing spiritual things with spiritual; we need to pray for enlightenment too before such Divine knowledge becomes our personal possession. While there were teachers in the churches during the period covered by the Acts, it is evident that some who had the special gift of knowledge were independent of them, though not in a schismatic sense, for the will of God was for all to work together as members of a body, in united witness.

Faith is the next special gift, and it is obvious this cannot be the initiatory faith of the sinner believing in Christ as Saviour, for such a faith could not be possessed by some believers but not others. It would be rather the faith of the pioneer, willing to undertake new and possibly difficult work for Christ, not only in the assembly, but outside. We have a modern example of this in George Muller and his work for destitute children.

Now follows gifts of healing, and the Act is full of concrete examples of this. (Acts iii. 7, 8; iv. 16, 30; v. 15, 16; viii. 6, 7; ix. 33, 34; xiv. 8-10; xix. 11, 12; xxviii. 8, 9). Note that the healing was instantaneous and complete, and we may be sure that there was no relapse! When modern healing campaigns are compared to this, their pitiful inadequacy is only too obvious. And yet they claim to be fulfilling the same ministry as obtained in the Acts! How folk can be so duped as to believe this only goes to show the utter ignorance of the N.T. that abounds today.

The healing ministry we are dealing with has its roots in the O.T. in God's promises to Israel:

". . . . If thou wilt diligently hearken to the voice of the Lord thy God . . . . . I will put none of these diseases upon thee, which I have brought upon the Egyptians . . . . ." (Exod. xv. 26).

"And ye shall serve the Lord thy God, and He shall bless thy bread, and thy water; and I will take sickness away from the midst of thee" (Exod. xxiii. 25).

"Thou shalt be blessed above all people . . . . . and the Lord will take away from thee all sickness . . . . ." (Deut. vii. 14, 15).

There is no doubt that definite Divine healing was promised to this earthly people of God. This was repeated in the Lord's commission of the Twelve to Israel:

"And as ye go, preach, saying, the Kingdom of heaven is at hand. Heal the sick, cleanse the lepers, raise the dead, cast out demons . . . . ." (Matt. x. 5-8).

This very healing ministry was also performed by the Lord day by day, as the Gospel records clearly show, and the same ministry continues without a break till Israel is laid aside at the end of the Acts. After this, Paul's healing ministry, so effective before (see Acts xix. 11, 12), no longer obtains (Phil. ii. 25-27; I Tim. v. 23; II Tim. iv. 20).

This divine healing was one of the foretastes of the coming earthly kingdom, where there will not only be abundant spiritual blessing but physical health and blessing as well. If we are aiming for truth and not wishful thinking, we shall keep this ministry where the Bible places it—with Israel and God's earthly kingdom purposes. To wrench it from this setting as so many have done is to get difficulty, and disillusionment, as well as confusion in our understanding of the Divine plan of the ages.

The next of the Spirit's evidential gifts is the working of miracles, and again there is no need to argue as to what today can be regarded as miraculous. The Acts of the Apostles is full of what the Holy Spirit means by the working of miracles and the following Scriptures should be carefully verified as they are too long to quote in full here. (Acts ii. 22, 43; iv. 29, 30; v. 12; vi. 8; viii. 5-7, 39; ix. 37-41; xii. 7; xiii. 10, 11; xiv. 3; xvi. 16-18, 25, 26; xx. 9-11; xxviii. 3-9).

There can be no doubt that we do not live in such an age today. The power to work such miracles was another earthly kingdom evidence, and to some at Corinth this divine gift was given by the Holy Spirit. There is another reference to this gift in Paul's early letter to Galatians:

"He therefore that ministereth to you the Spirit, and worketh miracles among you, doeth he it by the works of the law, or by the hearing of faith?" (Gal. iii. 5).

It is important to note that these miracles were not just displays of great power which overwhelmed or stupefied those who saw them. They were signs, that is they signified and gave a special message; hence their evidential value to Israel who had the countersign, the O.T. Scriptures.

The reader who has carefully perused the above list of references, cannot fail to note the number of times the word 'sign' is connected with the word 'miracle'.

The Apostle follows this gift with that of prophecy, and it is important to remember that a Bible prophet was a forth-teller as well as being a foreteller. Prophets in the N.T. were linked with apostles as a foundation ministry by the risen Christ (Eph. iv. 11), and this was essential for the delivery of truth to God's people until the great foundation of inspired Scripture was complete, through which God could speak to men and meet every need by the Holy Spirit's enlightenment. No further additions to God's complete Word are necessary or can be allowed. Our task is the proclamation of this completed revelation, and we no longer need the ministry either of the apostle or prophet, the sure foundation now being the Word of God and the Christ of the Word.

The ministry of the prophet during the Acts ranked high in the Apostle Paul's estimation (I Cor. xiv. 3-5) in importance above the gift of tongues.

In view of the satanic spirit of deception concerning which Christ so clearly warned (Matt. xxiv. 4, 5, 11, 24 and see II Thess. ii. 7-10), a divine gift of discrimination was needed at this time to distinguish the true from the false; thus discerning of spirits was an important gift and we have already seen the Apostle John's command to test the spirits in view of false prophets (I John iv. 1-3). Thus those who claimed to give a word of wisdom, or knowledge, or prophecy could be infallibly sorted out as to whether their utterances were actuated by the Spirit of God or by some satanic and demonic power.

The last on Paul's list is tongues and their interpretation. We shall have more to say about this gift when we read chapter xiv. where the Apostle deals with tongue speaking and its proper place in the assembly, so that everything could be done "decently and in order".

The Apostle now stresses the source of all gifts—the Holy Spirit Himself who is sovereign in his distribution of them:

> "But all these worketh the one and the same Spirit, dividing to each one severally even as He will" (xii. 11 R.V.).

He alone chooses what gift each believer should have, so that none should have ground either for boasting or for being inferior. Nor were they given just to the "spiritual". All were necessary at this time for the great Kingdom testimony. This naturally leads to the thought of the Pentecostal church as a whole and what the working of every part could achieve for the Lord. What better illustration could be given than a human body, with its various members working together harmoniously for the body and the person as a whole? This the following verses elaborate.

No.17. pp. 86 - 89

Having described the various sign gifts distributed sovereignally by the Holy Spirit to believers in the Acts period, the Apostle Paul now deals with their functioning with regard to the churches as a whole, and for a concrete example, what better illustration can he use than a human body, which is a unity in diversity? This illustration was by no means unique. It was frequently employed in the ancient world and we find allusions to it in Socrates, Seneca, Marcus Aurelius, and Marcus Antoninus. The Apostle writes:

> "For as the body is one, and hath many members, and all the members of the body, being many, are one body; so also is the Christ" (I Cor. xii. 12).

The A.V. and R.V. omit the expressed definite article before "Christ". Many expositors can see that "the Christ" cannot refer just to Christ personally, for how can He be likened to a human body which has uncomely as well as comely parts? (23). "Christ" (Christos) means anointed, and "the Christ" can be used as the title of a church which has been specially anointed. The believers to whom the Apostle John wrote were told "Ye have an anointing" (chrisma) (I John ii. 20, 27), and this gave them the supernatural gift of knowledge which we have already seen is contained in the list detailed in verses 8-10 of the chapter with which we are dealing. In his second letter to the Corinthian church the Apostle wrote:

> "Now He that confirmeth us with you in Christ, and hath anointed us (chrio), is God" (II Cor. i. 21).

This 'anointing' is very much to the point in I Cor. xii. 12. Moreover, the above reference acquaints us with the fact that these supernatural gifts were confirmatory in character as well as being signs. The teaching then in I Cor. xii. 12 is clear. Just as a human body has many members, and each member has a particular part to play, not independently, but for the well-being of the body as a whole, so should the Corinthian assembly have functioned. The cliques which had come into being at Corinth and the misusing of some of the spiritual gifts were rendering this unity null and void in practice, and it is this unity which was so important and which Paul has stressed from various angles.

> "For by one Spirit are we all baptized into one body, whether we be Jews or Gentiles, whether we be bond or free; and have been all made to drink into one Spirit" (xii. 13).

To be baptized into a special company was no new truth. We have already had the baptism of all Israel unto Moses in I Cor. x., and this baptism was a spiritual baptism without water, which united them with Moses and all for which He stood, and had its origin in God's action, not in anything that Israel did. So it is here. The words 'baptized' and 'made to drink' are in the aorist tense denoting that the action is past (not something future to be sought) and was true of all believers at that time irrespective of their condition. It was an action never to be repeated, being the work of the Holy Spirit.

It cannot refer to water baptism, for Paul had already told the Corinthians that water baptism did not form part of His Christ-directed ministry (I Cor. i. 17), and no kind of water baptism would ever effect this spiritual unity of the believer with God. Nothing less than the Holy Spirit's work could do this. Such a unity certainly did not depend upon the work of man in carrying out any external ritual.

In proceeding with the illustration of a human body, Paul stresses the inter-dependence of the various members. We have seen that this usage of the word 'body' was not confined to the Scriptures. In spite of a superficial likeness, the Apostle is not describing the Body of Christ, yet to be revealed in all its fullness after the Acts in Ephesians and Colossians. At this time it was still a secret, hid in God from all past ages and generations of people (Eph. iii. 9 R.V., Col. i. 26 R.V.) and there is not a hint in these Corinthian epistles, or for that matter in any epistle written during the Acts, that such a secret of God is being unfolded. If we carefully note the language of I Cor. xii. and Rom. xii., we shall note differences from Ephesians. One which should be obvious is that the one Body of Ephesians is distinguished from Christ as the Head. The likeness of the Corinthian church to a human body and its members, speaks of eyes, ears and nose, all members of the human head and illustrative of those in the Corinthian church (17-24). Every member of the Body of Christ in Ephesians is "accepted in the Beloved", but the body of I Cor. xii. has "uncomely" parts which certainly is not true of the former. If Paul is teaching here Ephesian truth, then he is using the figure of a human body in a very careless way and we cannot accept this for a moment.

Moreover, he asserts in Ephesians that the Church related to the Mystery is a "joint-Body" (sussoma), a unique word (iii. 6). No such body, where every member is equal in size and importance had ever existed before, either naturally or spiritually. It never occurs in any Acts epistle, and in fact could not be used while the position at this time symbolized by the olive tree (Israel) and the wild grafts (Gentiles), was true (Rom. xi. 16, and note verses 18 and 22). We should also realize that the gifts set by God in the Corinthian assembly are different from those of Eph. iv. 11, insomuch that gifts of healing, helps, governments and diversities of tongues are omitted in the Ephesian list, healings and tongues being specially linked, as we have seen again and again, with the earthly kingdom ministry of which Israel is the centre and form no part of the heavenly calling of Ephesians. Apostles, prophets, and teachers are repeated after Acts xxviii. which shows clearly that there is a definite selection by the Holy Spirit, repeating what was continuous, and leaving out that which was transitory, for so many of these Acts gifts were such, and never intended to be permanent (I Cor. xiii. 8).

The whole point of Paul's argument concerning these gifts is that no one is responsible for the kind of gift he has, and even if some are more important, all are necessary for the proper functioning of the assembly in Christian witness. None should feel any sense of superiority or inferiority whatever gift he possesses, and all should lead, above all, to unity. After showing the diversity in unity of the human body, he says:

"Now you are Christ's body, and, individually members" (xii. 27, C. K. Barrett).

Both the A.V. and R.V. translate "Now ye are the body of Christ", but there is no definite article in the Greek. We cannot translate it baldly "you are a body of Christ", for this does not give the sense. The only way is, as Dr. C. K. Barrett renders it, "you are Christ's body".

At first sight this seems to upset the distinction between the Pentecostal church and the Body of Christ after the Acts period, but we should ask ourselves, how could one of the many assemblies existing at this time be The Body of Christ? What of the rest? Paul uses the phrase "one body" again in Romans, and this helps us to understand the usage of the word "body" in the Acts as applied to believers. "So we, being many, are one body IN Christ, and every one members one of another" (Rom. xii. 5). Note he did NOT say "we are the one Body OF Christ", but "one body (of believers) IN Christ", which is a very different thing and shows the standing by grace of the Roman church in Christ. So with the Corinthian assembly. They were a company (body) of believers belonging to Christ (Christ's body); like all the other churches; they were not part of the sussoma, the joint-Body of which Christ is the Head. Nothing is said about the Headship of Christ in these Acts epistles. If we are absolutely accurate in our reading and note just what the Apostle wrote under inspiration, not adding in our minds what was to be revealed later, we shall have no difficulty with this context, or try to identify what God has made to differ.

The God-given human gifts of ministry commence with the foundation work of apostles and prophets. As we have seen, these were necessary to lay the foundation of truth until the written Word of God was complete and then the completed inspired Word took over. The gifts that follow are secondary and fall in line with the super-natural gifts already detailed. "Helps" antilempseis is a common word in the papyri, but only used here in the N.T. It probably referred to the work of the deacons, assisting the poor and the sick. "Governments" (kuberneseis), speak of ruling or leading, and Paul doubtless has in mind the overseers (bishops), the outstanding leaders of the local assembly.

The questions asked by the Apostle refer back to verse 14 and its argument that the human body is not one member, but many and all essential. In each question me in the Greek demands the answer "no". It is significant that 'tongues' comes at the bottom of the list and the answer "no" deals a death-blow to the modern Pentecostal argument that tongue speaking is a sign of the fullness or special baptism of the Spirit for spiritual Christians. "Eagerly desire the greater gifts" said the Apostle (verse 31) and there can be no doubt that Paul unhesitatingly ranks some spiritual gifts above others and tongue speaking certainly is not one, as this context and chapter xiv. clearly reveal. But there is something even better. "I show you a supremely excellent way" a way par excellence which exceeds all that has been given before. It is the way of Divine love, and those who have the mind of the Spirit will always put the emphasis on this first and foremost. Just what this involves is made clear in the poetic hymn to love which follows.

No.18. pp. 113 - 116

The Apostle Paul has been dealing with the supernatural sign-gifts of the Holy Spirit which were characteristic of the period covered by the Acts of the Apostles. We have seen that the Corinthian church, on Paul's own declaration, was mostly carnal, yet it abounded with these gifts, which clearly shows that they were not a mark of spirituality or of some special "filling of the Spirit", as Pentecostalists today so often assert.

What is definitely more important in God's eyes is the practical "fruit of the Spirit" of Gal. v. 22, 23. It is fruit that the Lord wants upon the tree of our lives, and without this our heavenly Father cannot be glorified by us (John xv. 1-8). The first in the list of fruit is love, and to the church at Corinth, Paul is now going to show that "supremely excellent way", which was better even than the evidential gifts they possessed.

This "way" is now set out in the wonderful hymn to love of chapter xiii. In this poem, a contrast is first made with the gifts and one great and essential difference is stressed, namely, that the gifts including that of tongues, were temporal and passing, whereas love abides and is eternal:

> "If I speak with the tongues of men and of angels, but have not love, I am become sounding brass, or a clanging cymbal" (xiii. 1 R.V.).

It is clear from chapters xii.-xiv. that the Apostle did not rate the gift of tongues highly. Even if the believers at Corinth were able to understand the speech of angels, and all other languages, this would be meaningless and valueless without practicing love. It would be no better than the paganism that surrounded them, just an empty noise. Let this be made clear from the start. We must empty our minds of all human conceptions of love if we wish to understand I Cor. xiii. If ever a word has been misunderstood and grossly debased and misrepresented it is the word "love". Today it has sunk so low as to mean little more than the physical.

The character of divine love is clearly stated in the Scripture. It is pure unselfishness which gives to the limit for others. "A studied denial of self in the interests of others." "God so loved . . . . . that He gave His only begotten Son" (John iii. 16). "Walk in love, as Christ also hath loved us, and hath given Himself for us . . . . ." (Eph. v. 2). Real love does not merely give of one's possession; it gives no less than one's self for others. The Lord Jesus not only gave out of His inexhaustible fullness, but even more, He gave no less than Himself for us.

It is this conception of love that obtains in I Cor. xiii. Anything less is a mockery, and this was what so lacking in the Corinthian assembly. Plenty of gifts, plenty of show, but so little real fruit of the Spirit evidenced in the practical out-working of Divine love. Speaking in tongues without such love was just a jangling noise that accomplished nothing.

> "And if I have the gift of prophecy, and know all mysteries (secrets) and all knowledge; and if I have all faith, so as to remove mountains, but have not love, I am nothing" (xiii. 2 R.V.).

The Apostle ranked prophecy much higher than the gift of tongues (xiv. 1-4), but even prophecy or such faith that could accomplish what was seemingly impossible ('remove mountains'), was useless without love, and rendered such a person as nothing, an absolute zero.

One could give away all one's goods to the poor and needy, and even be willing to suffer a martyr's death (whether by being burned or by self-immolation is not clear), and it would profit nothing. There is an alternative reading "that I may glory", as the reason for acts of charity, which would nullify its virtue by the wrong motive of self-aggrandizement (note the R.V. margin).

There is no record of martyrdom by fire before the persecutions under Nero, but in spite of this it is quite likely that the Byzantine text of the A.V. is right and that Paul is taking his instruction to a climax in saying in effect, "Even if I give myself up to the most painful of deaths in some great cause, but have no divine love, it would do me no good." This is startling but true, and it means to say that all of us should be honest with ourselves and make sure of our motives for Christian service. Is it being done to please ourselves in some way, because it appeals to us? Are we doing it in order to please others? Do we want to give an impression before others of being a splendid charitable character? All these motives are wrong, and in the Lord's assessment for service, will profit NOTHING. There is only ONE motive that the Lord will accept, and that is real love for Him. It is the "love of Christ" that "constraineth us", said the Apostle (II Cor. v. 14) and this is the only reason for service that counts with our Master.

Paul now proceeds to describe such a love in action. It is easier to say what love will or will not do, rather than to state what it is.

> "Love suffereth long, and is kind; love envieth not; love vaunteth not itself, is not puffed up, doth not behave itself unseemly, seeketh not its own, is not provoked, taketh not account of evil; rejoiceth not in unrighteousness, but rejoiceth with the truth" (xiii. 4-6 R.V.).

This love does not lose patience with others, however provoking they may be ("long-suffering"). It is always kind (chrestos from chraomai, to use), meaning gracious, useful. Love is not envious or jealous, a bad sin that can creep insidiously into the heart of a believer and blight his thinking and Christian activities.

Love does not brag ("vaunteth not itself"), is not arrogant and full of self-importance ("puffed up"). It does not behave in an unseemly or indecent way, nor is it selfish, seeking its own interests. Love does not get irritable ("provoked"), or put evil down to any one's account. It does not rejoice at unrighteousness, taking pleasure at being censorious, or having a sense of superiority, but rather rejoices in what is opposite, namely, the truth.

The Apostle now treats with the extent to which love operates and uses panta, all things, four times. This is a word that always needs great care in the N.T. All sorts of false conclusions can be adduced from this word unless the nearer and remoter context is carefully considered. "All things" is not equivalent to "everything universally". Here we are told "love believeth all things" (verse 7). Does divine love believe everything? If so, it must believe the false as well as the true! Is it just credulous, or does it carefully select what it believes? Surely it should be obvious that "all things" here is limited to everything that is in accord with truth, and nothing outside of it.

Divine love covers, protects, supports all things that relate to truth ("beareth all things"). It never ceases to hope ("hopeth all things"); it endures all things. No hardship or rebuff affects it. In other words, love never fails (verse 8). It survives everything, and like God Himself (I John iv. 8), it is eternal: in contrast to the evidential gifts which were only temporary and destined to pass away:

> "Whether there be prophecies, they shall be done away: whether there be tongues, they shall cease; whether there be knowledge, it shall be done away. For we know in part, and we prophesy in part: but when that which is perfect is come, that which is in part shall be done away" (xiii. 8-10 R.V.).

The modern revivers of tongue-speaking and those who mistakenly wish to emulate them, should consider these statements seriously. Tongues shall cease. The verb is the future middle indicative and means they shall make themselves cease, or cease automatically and we know from the testimony of the Acts and the Pauline epistles written afterwards that this is what actually did occur. There may have been a few sporadic outbursts late on but these were confined to heretical groups like the Montanists. As we have seen, there was no more need of prophecy when the N.T. and the whole of the Scriptures were completed, neither was there for tongues when the earthly kingdom testimony ceases. This was when Israel finally failed and was temporarily set aside by God at Acts xxviii.

The Corinthian believers who were putting a false value on tongues and possibly the gifts as a whole, were reminded again that this was a mark of spiritual babyhood (see iii. 1-3). "That which is perfect", to teleion, refers to maturity, full-growth, not merely to a future period of time when the Lord returns—as some teach, but a present personal possibility (compare ii. 6 and xiv. 20 margin). This is reinforced by Paul's personal experience which he now gives, contrasting his thinking and speaking as a child to his present adulthood. He can now put away the things that once were necessary to him when he was an infant. This was also true spiritually. He is now well on the way to full growth (Phil. iii. 12-14). He can walk by faith and not by sight or sense. He can indeed come into the category of blessing which the risen Lord indicated, when He said to Thomas, so limited by his sense experience: "Because thou hast seen me, thou hast believed: blessed are they that have not seen, and yet have believed" (John xx. 29).

No.19. pp. 123 - 125

We have been considering the "more excellent way" of Divine love that the Apostle Paul had set forth to the Corinthian believers, being far superior to all the evidential gifts of the Spirit, including the gift of tongues, which apparently this assembly was rating far too highly. This gift, with the others, was transient and passing, but the love which comes from God is eternal and abiding.

Moreover, these gifts were not necessary to spiritual maturity. When one grows up, one can put away the things of childhood (I Cor. xiii. 9-11). This maturity is a reflection of the complete perfection of the glorified state in resurrection.

> "For now we see in a mirror, darkly (lit. in an enigma); but then face to face: now I know in part; but then I shall know even as also I have been known" (xiii. 12 R.V.).

This verse gives facts that must ever be borne in mind. However much we know of God's truth it is partial, not complete, and will not be so until our hope is realized and we are with the Lord with bodies fashioned like the body of His glory (Phil. iii.), and the present limitations of comprehension gone for ever. It is this very human limitation that causes so many of our present problems, specially in regard to our understanding of the Scriptures. What we are seeing now is likened to a reflection in a mirror and often puzzling at that ("in an enigma" literally).

This should stop us from acting and talking as though we have all knowledge now and can solve every problem that comes our way, specially those concerning God's person and His being! In this present life, God has been stooping in condescension in His revelation of Himself and His ways, having respect to our great limitations of comprehension. We can only know a small part now. What is beyond us can be covered by faith in Him, for we know that He has the answer to all problems, and in the next life He will justify all His dealings with mankind which are incomprehensible now.

Meanwhile we can thank Him for the abiding gifts of faith (in Him and His word), hope (the certain fulfillment of all His promises) and love, the supreme expression of the Lord and His gracious purposes which is now shed abroad in our hearts. This must ever be the fruit of all fruits, dominating our lives and witness for Him.

In chapter xiv., the Apostle returns to the evidential gifts, specially that of tongues. First of all we shall note his assessment of this gift, and the way it should be controlled in the Corinthian assembly. In view of the fact that Pentecostalism and tongue speaking in particular seems on the increase today, we shall give this too a Scriptural consideration as to whether it is a bad thing, or a good thing to be sought after.

Actually the Apostle never counsels the Corinthians to seek for the gift of tongues separately as though it was the highest and best of the gifts (as most Pentecostalists assert). What he does do is to emphasize once more the importance of love.

> "Pursue love as you aim. Strive for spiritual gifts, and specially that you may prophesy" (xiv. 1, C. K. Barrett).

Love must be sought for with the eagerness of pursuit. No half-hearted regard will do. This comes first always in importance where Christian witness and service is concerned. It is quite obvious from what follows, that Paul is down-grading the gift of tongues; not that it had no value, but it was not the most important gift, and the Corinthian believers were over-rating it.

We must first of all point out there is no justification for the word "unknown" in the A.V. throughout this chapter. The word is not in the original and should be omitted as in the R.V. and modern translations for it is misleading. How are we to understand the word "tongue"? There are two divergent views on this. One is that it refers to languages. Another is that the reference is to ecstatic speech. The best way to decide this is to go back to the inception of tongues at Pentecost, and here there is no doubt whatsoever that languages or dialects are meant. The opening verses declare that there were Jews gathered at Jerusalem for the feast of Pentecost from "every nation under heaven" (Acts ii. 5). Luke goes on to tell us that they were confounded because "every man heard them speak in his own dialect (language)". They ask, "how hear we every man in our own dialect (language), wherein we were born?" (verses 8 and 11).

The Lord had told the eleven disciples that they were to be witnesses for Him "in Jerusalem, and in all Judaea, and in Samaria, and unto the uttermost part of the earth" (i. 8).

In order that this should be rapidly accomplished, God removed the speech barrier to the spread of the Gospel and the Kingdom message. This was a reversal of the confusion of tongues at Babel. Seen in this light, the gift of tongues makes sense and was one of the miraculous signs that accompanied the earthly Kingdom ministry in the Acts, first to Israel and later on to the Gentiles who were admitted as wild olive grafts into the true olive tree, Israel, in order to "provoke them to jealousy" and stir them up to obey the Divine command to repent and turn to God (Acts iii. 19-26) so that, through their mediation, the restoration of the earthly Kingdom to them might become a fact and then be realized all over the earth, with the Lord's Second Advent an accomplished fact.

Some insist that the gift of tongues at Pentecost was recognized languages, but at Corinth it was different, being akin to ecstatic speech. But this is by no means proved; Corinth was a port and would have a mixed flow of races passing through it. That strangers visited the assembly is clear from I Cor. xiv. 23, where the Apostle refers to "unlearned and unbelieving" coming in. These would certainly need a message in their own language if of foreign extraction, and a believer with the gift of tongues could minister this, followed by another with the gift of interpretation so that the whole assembly could benefit. It is interesting to note that hermeneuo can mean "translate" as well as "interpret" (see Arntd and Gingrich). The New Bible Dictionary states that the Greek words for "interpret" always mean "translate" except Luke xxiv. 27 (p.1287). It is a good principle of interpretation that the unknown should be interpreted by the known, in which case I Corinthians should be interpreted by the Acts of the Apostles, which is the historical book dealing with this church from its beginning.

Paul's and Luke's terminology agree, for both use the word glossa, "tongue", and Luke further defines it as being a dialektos (Acts i. 19; ii. 6, 8; xxi. 40; xxii. 2; xxvi. 14), which in every case refers to a language of a nation or region, and it is most unlikely that the experience of tongue speaking, described by the two writers in identical terms, would be dissimilar.

Moreover, the Divine intention was that this gift should be a sign to Israel (I Cor. xiv. 21, 22) as prophesied in Isa. xxviii. 11, and took its place with the other Kingdom signs of the Acts period. In what way could unintelligible ecstatic speech be such a sign? Such speech occurred in the excitable worship in the pagan temples around and therefore would not speak with Divine conviction to any Jew.

When one sees glossalia, or speaking in tongues in its Scriptural setting, it makes sense and falls in line with the evidential miracles of the Acts period, when Israel was being tested after the Lord's earthly ministry to them, giving them a further opportunity of repenting and becoming useable, in order that they might take the knowledge of the Lord as Saviour and King to the ends of the earth. To take the gift of tongues out of the place that God put it originally is misleading and dangerous, and this is just what Pentecostals and non-Pentecostals have done. We shall look at some of their arguments in the next article in this series.

No.20. pp. 147 - 151

We have been dealing with the Divine setting of the gift of tongues in our exposition of the fourteenth chapter of I Corinthians. We found that it was one of the evidential sign gifts of the Acts period accrediting the earthly Kingdom message, and speaking in a special way to the unbelieving among Israel. Today, however, we see it being revived without the other gifts which accompanied it, and at a time when the nation of Israel, the centre of the earthly Kingdom, is spiritually blinded and hardened and declared by God to be Lo-Ammi, not my people.

Not only does speaking in tongues occupy an important place in the present day Pentecostal movement, we see it now occurring in other denominations and certain evangelicals are doing their best to promote it in every Christian quarter.

Pentecostals, for the most part, teach that one may be saved apart from the baptism of the Spirit, but without this experience which they claim is subsequent to salvation, one does not have full consecration or power for service, so that one's Christian life is incomplete and one's ministry hampered. If this is true, one has a right to ask why such spiritual giants as Luther, Calvin and many others accomplished so much for the Lord without the gift of tongues? Pentecostals should honestly face up to this. They are often exhorted to "tarry before the Lord" in order to receive this special baptism of the Spirit, the outward evidence of which, they teach, is speaking in tongues.

Luke xxiv. 49 is adduced as Scriptural ground for this, but this is a misuse of this verse. The eleven were not kept waiting to prove them or to encourage them to ask for the gift of the Holy Spirit accompanied by tongues. They had to wait because the feast of Pentecost was Divinely dated, being 50 days after Passover (Calvary, Lev. xxiii. 15, 16).

What Scriptural backing has the Pentecostal view that the baptism of the Spirit should follow salvation? Some turn to Eph. i. 13:

> ". . . . . Christ, in Who ye also trusted, after that ye heard the word of Truth, the gospel of your salvation: in Whom also after that ye believed, ye were sealed with that holy Spirit of promise."

On the surface, this looks as though there is some ground for such teaching but the A.V. is not accurate. Here we have a verb in the aorist tense (esphragisthete), preceded by an aorist participle (pisteusantes). Professor F. F. Bruce writes:

> "The words 'having also believed' mean when you Gentiles believed in your turn, as we Jewish Christians had already done. The participle 'having believed' is identical with that occurring in Paul's question to the disciples at Ephesus in Acts 19:2 'Did ye receive the Holy Ghost when ye believed?' it is called by grammarians the coincident aorist participle because it denotes an action coincident in time with that of the main verb" (The Epistle to the Ephesians, p.36).

In other words the believing and the sealing occurred at the same time, not at some future date. This is made clear by the R.V. and many modern versions. If Pentecostalists would carefully read Acts x. 46 they would see that the bestowal of the Spirit's gift of tongues was simultaneous with the coming to faith both of Cornelius and his group. It was an extension of Pentecost, as was the experience of the disciples at Ephesus in chapter xix., who had only heard of John the Baptist's ministry.

There is no clear Scriptural teaching for the idea that the Spirit's baptism, evidenced by tongues, is something to be sought for after salvation. Nor in the Scriptural record do we find glossalia always following the work or filling of the Holy Spirit. If the reader will consult the following passages in the Acts which refer to the filling of the Holy Spirit, he will not find one occurrence that is accompanied by tongues—Acts iv. 8, 31; vi. 3, 5; vii. 55; ix. 17; xi. 24; xiii. 9, 52, and he certainly will not find any occurrence in Scripture of tongue speaking after the Acts period.

It should be quite clear for every unbiased student of the Word that the Holy Spirit, far from aiming to give the gift of tongues to all believers as a special experience after salvation, did not intend all the saved to have this gift. As we have seen, the seven questions of the Apostle in I Cor. xii. 29, 30 demand, in the Greek, a negative answer. "Do all speak with tongues?" The answer is "no", and God never intended that all should do so, but distributed tongues with other gifts, some more important, like prophecy, "severally as He willed" (I Cor. xii. 11).

Nor was the ability to speak in tongues a necessary requirement for leaders and teachers in the N.T., nor do we find one instance of any believer specially seeking this gift. In I Tim. iii., there is a list of "musts" for the office of a bishop or overseer, but tongues are not mentioned. Some Pentecostalists link their conception of the baptism of the Holy Spirit with sinless perfection, what they call "entire sanctification", and so one error leads to another.

We are amazed that any true believer who loves the Word of God and bases his all upon it, could ever accept what is so patently unscriptural and also false to experience. If what these people say is really true then they have advanced far beyond the great characters of the Bible and the great saints that followed.

A fine upright character as the prophet Isaiah saw a vision of the Lord in glory, and we take it that his character was up to the standard of any modern believer, and the result was to make him confess "Woe is me! for I am undone; because I am a man of unclean lips . . . . . for mine eyes have seen the King, the Lord of Hosts" (Isa. vi. 1-5). The Apostle Paul declared that "in me (that is, in my flesh), dwelleth (present tense) no good thing" (Rom. vii. 18). The Apostle John wrote "if we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us" (I John i. 8). Pentecostalists who claim sinless perfection have obviously advanced in experience beyond these outstanding children of God.

The trouble with these so-called sinless Pentecostalists is that, unlike Isaiah, they have never really seen the Lord Jesus in the blaze of His glory and holiness (see I Tim. vi. 15, 16). Had they done so, they would have nothing but shame for what that searching light would inevitably reveal. They can have little conception of the burning holiness of God. Sinlessness and incorruption is put on at resurrection (I Cor. xv. 53, 54) and not before, and it is self-deception to think otherwise. If tongues and holiness go together, then the Corinthian church should have been the holiest, but in reality they were the most carnal and immature (I Cor. iii. 1-3), which gives the lie to such Pentecostal pretensions.

One danger that results from the teaching that tongue speaking is an outward evidence of a special baptism of the spirit, subsequent to salvation, and that believers are sadly lacking without this, is the psychological and spiritual tensions which this teaching creates. When a believer does not receive this "baptism", he tries a little harder to get it. When, after several attempts he still does not receive it, he begins to feel frustrated and depressed and many have become physically and mentally ill because they failed to "receive".

One hears too of such people being accused of some hidden sin or failure which accounts for this, all of which is deplorable and unnecessary, and is in itself the sin of judgment which we are warned against. Another danger is the emphasis this kind of teaching gives to "feeling" and emotional experiences at the expense of faith. "We walk by faith and not by sight", said the Apostle, but this doctrine leads to the opposite. One can see very little difference between the unsaved doing things for "thrills" and the believer who hankers after the special spiritual thrill of the separate "baptism of the Spirit". When one grows spiritually, feelings give way to absolute trust in what the Lord is in Himself and this is changeless.

We should know too, that glossalia can be psychologically induced and therefore is no proof whatsoever of the Holy Spirit's work. A Christian psychiatrist writes:

> "The product of our analysis is the demonstration of the very natural mechanisms which produced glossalia. As a psychological phenomenon, glossalia is easy to produce and readily understandable."
>
> (E. Mansell Pattison, "Speaking in Tongues and about Tongues").

The Encyclopaedia Britannica has this to say:

> "The gift of tongues and their interpretation was not peculiar to the Christian Church, but was a repetition in it of a phase common in ancient religions. The very phrase glosais lalein, 'to speak with tongues', was not invented by the New Testament writers, but borrowed from ordinary speech. Virgil (Acn. vi. 46,97) draws a life-like picture of the ancient prophetess 'speaking with tongues' . . . . . the same morbid and abnormal trance utterances occur in Christian revivals of every age, e.g. among the mendicant friars of the 13th century, among the Jansenites, the early Quakers, the converts of Wesley and Whitefield, the persecuted Protestants of the Cevennes, the Irvingites and the revivalists of Wales and America. Oracular possession of the kind above described is also common among savages and people of lower culture . . . . ." (pp. 288, 289, 1963 edition).

No wonder then Satan can use tongue speaking in order to deceive! With regard to the Irvingite movement which was the beginning of modern Pentecostalism, Sir Robert Anderson gives a detailed account in his Spirit Manifestations and the Gift of Tongues.

Edward Irving (1792-1834), a pastor of a London church, founded the Catholic Apostolic Church and began to introduce tongue speaking into his ministry. Sir Robert Anderson shows the excesses to which this finally led. Richard Baxter, a lawyer, first took an active part in the movement, but when prophecies made failed to be fulfilled, his eyes were opened and he broke away after telling Irving "we had all been speaking by a lying spirit and not by the Spirit of the Lord". Scores of people were deceived by this 'angel of light' teaching.

Irving relates that the power of the Holy Spirit came upon him irresistibly, so much so that he was compelled to put his handkerchief into his mouth to stop the sound so that he should not alarm others. This in itself should have been a warning to him for "the spirits of the prophets are subject to the prophets" (I Cor. xiv. 32); in other words the power is controllable by the prophet. The Holy Spirit does not force people or lead to such excesses that have occurred from time to time in Pentecostal meetings.

One of the great dangers of such Pentecostal teaching is that it exalts the Holy Spirit at the expense of Christ, so that the Lord Jesus in effect is subordinated to the Holy Spirit. The Saviour said:

> "He shall not speak of Himself . . . . . He shall glorify me: for He shall receive of mine: and shall show it unto you" (John xvi. 13, 14).

The main object of the Holy Spirit then is to glorify and exalt the Lord Jesus, so that in all things He might have the preeminence (Col. i. 18), and whenever He is put in His rightful place of ALL (Col. iii. 11) and "First and Last", the Holy Spirit is certainly there. Where the Spirit is unduly stressed and the Lordship of Christ unknown we have not truth, but error which comes from the father of lies.

If modern tongue speaking is really of God, where are those who undeniably have the gift of interpretation (without which tongues are useless) and also the discerning of spirits, that is the divine ability to sift the true from the false? (I Cor. xii. 10). This was God's check against the work of Satan during the Acts when tongues were valid. Without this, the whole thing can be highly dangerous, for as we know so well, Satan can travesty and copy the work of God. Not even miracles, by themselves, are a proof of divine origin:

> "Many will say to Me in that day, Lord, Lord, have we not prophesied in Thy name? and in Thy Name have cast out devils? and in Thy Name done many wonderful works? And then will I profess unto them, I never knew you; depart from Me . . . . ." (Matt. vii. 22, 23).

The Apostles Paul and John warn us of the deceptive miracles of Satan at the end time of this age so that, even in the Acts period, tongue speaking was not without its dangers (II Thess. ii. 8-10; Rev. xiii. 11-14) and the Lord Jesus Himself likewise forewarned of the terrible deception of this most dangerous time (Matt. xxiv. 4, 5, 11, 24), and many believers feel, as they look around on world conditions, that we are fast approaching such a period.

But some will say, many Pentecostalists testify to the blessing they have received from speaking in tongues. The answer to this is simple and clear. If we want nothing but Truth and to avoid such deception, we must base our beliefs solely on the Word of God which is Truth, and not on human experience. We may not begin with a certain type of religious experience and then proceed to build a doctrine on it. We dare not build on any experience primarily, but on the teaching of Holy Scripture which is true and changeless.

If the importance of a doctrine in the N.T. is shown by the Divine emphasis upon it (and this is surely true) then we must face the fact that tongue speaking is only mentioned in one of the 21 epistles and even then it is not held up as a mark of spiritual growth, or something to be sought after.

Those believers who go on to know and enjoy the exceeding riches of grace and glory revealed in the prison epistles of Paul will certainly not be attracted by speaking in tongues. When one has tasted the best, one does not want the second-best! In the high and holy calling revealed therein Christ is ALL and each believer FILLED TO THE FULL in Him (Col. ii. 10; iii. 10, 11) to which nothing can be added, for there is nothing higher or possible beyond this revealed in the whole length and breadth of God's Word. In our long Christian experience we have never known anyone grounded in this glorious truth and in conscious enjoyment of it, ever to desire or turn to tongue speaking.

While we are forced to be critical of the Pentecostal doctrine of Spirit baptism and glossalia, we readily acknowledge that many Pentecostalists are keen to proclaim the gospel and bring others to a saving knowledge of the Lord. If only they would put more emphasis on the fruit of the Spirit (Gal. v. 22, 23) rather than isolated gifts of the Spirit which belonged to the Acts period!

The gift of tongues was temporal and was to cease (I Cor. xiii. 8). It was put at the bottom of the list in importance by the Apostle Paul. Prophecy was certainly of more value (I Cor. xiv. 4). Taken out of its Divine setting tongues can be highly dangerous and those attracted to it should ponder over the words of the Apostle:

> "Yet in the church I had rather speak five words with my understanding . . . . . than ten thousand words in an unknown tongue" (I Cor. xiv. 19).

No.21. pp. 165 - 170

Having considered the N.T. teaching concerning the gift of tongues and seen the false importance the Corinthian church were placing on this gift, we next note that the Apostle Paul makes perfectly clear that prophecy was preferable if only for the fact that it edified others as well as the speaker. Tongue speaking by itself at the best only brought benefit to the one who uttered it:

> "For he that speaketh in a tongue speaketh not unto men, but unto God; for no man understandeth; but in the spirit he speaketh mysteries. But he that prophesieth speaketh unto men edification, and comfort, and consolation. He that speaketh in a tongue edifieth himself; but he that prophesieth edifieth the church" (I Cor. xiv. 2-4 R.V.).

From this it is perfectly clear that that the gift of tongues without interpretation was of no benefit to the church as a whole, whereas prophecy gave a message of comfort and edification to all who heard it. When explained by the Divine gift of interpretation so that all could benefit, it was acceptable; otherwise it remained true that he who prophesied was greater than any who spoke in tongues (5). As this was so why is it that Pentecostalists do not put more value on prophets rather than tongue-speakers? The Apostle reinforces this point by saying that even if he himself gave them a message in another tongue, what good would it do them unless it was accompanied by revelation, knowledge, prophecy or teaching? (6). This is stressed still further by the illustration of a musical instrument, which can either produce distinguishable notes or just a noise. Furthermore each instrument has its own "tone colour". If this was not so, it would be impossible to distinguish between them (verses 6-12). Tongue speaking, unless understood by others, was merely "speaking into the air" (9) and made the one who uttered it as a foreigner (barbarian), someone who could not be understood by others. The real value of all the evidential gifts of the Acts period was their witness to other people and the building up of the church as a whole.

> "So also ye, since ye are zealous of Spiritual gifts, seek that ye may abound unto the edifying of the church" (xiv. 12 R.V.).

This was the crucial test, not what each individual got out of the experience for himself.

Tongue-speaking in connection with prayer.

The Apostle now deals with tongue speaking as it affected prayer. He wrote:

> "For if I pray in a tongue, my spirit prayeth, but my understanding (or mind) is unfruitful" (xiv. 14).

Paul seems to be using here the word "spirit" for the new nature. In this case the mind was unfruitful or inactive, that is, it contributed nothing to the process. Now the mind is extremely important to the believer as a study of the word nous as used by Paul will make clear. When writing to the Roman church, he insisted that the believer should be "transformed by the renewing of the mind" (Rom. xii. 2) and it is only by this mind that one can prove what is "that good, and acceptable, and perfect, will of God"; and thus render service and witness that is well-pleasing to Him.

Intercession for others is one of the highest expressions of the prayer life of the believer, and how can one engage in this effectively without the renewed mind being consciously employed? The Apostle puts his finger on a danger point when a tongue was employed in prayer without the conscious use of the Spirit-renewed mind. This would mean that a most important part of the believer remained out of action, which would be neither good for him or for his fellow-believers and others with whom he came into contact.

> "What is to be done then? I will pray with the spirit, but I will pray with the mind too. I will sing praise with the spirit, but I will sing praise with the mind too" (I Cor. xiv. 15, C. K. Barrett).

We ask again, how can the ministry of intercession be engaged in, when, knowing the needs of others, something unintelligible goes on in the believer concerned and his mind is completely inactive?

When Paul asks for prayer for himself, he tells the assemblies of his needs in plain words, showing them what to pray for on his behalf. (Rom. xiv. 30-32; Eph. vi. 18-20; Col. iv. 2-4). There is not the slightest idea in these contexts that such prayer could be rendered automatically in an unknown tongue, with the believers concerned being unconscious of what they uttered. Furthermore, such a condition would be one of real danger. There cannot be a hiatus or blank in the human mind and its activities. It must be controlled by somebody or something. If the believer's thinking is not consciously controlled by the renewed mind produced by the Holy Spirit, then Satan and the powers of darkness have an opportunity which they will not be slow to use.

That a believer's mind and words can be activated by the evil one is clear from what the Lord said to Peter in Matt. xvi. 22, 23. One moment Peter's words expressed the revelation of the Father (17); a moment later Satan was directing his thoughts and his words! (23). This is solemn indeed. So many keen Pentecostalists seem to be very ignorant of Satan and his wiles (Eph. vi. 11, 12) and the warning that Scripture gives the believer of this great enemy and his deception, which is going to be world-wide at the time of the end, inasmuch that, if possible, the very elect will be deceived (Matt. xxiv. 4, 5, 11, 24). Hence, the importance of the Divine gift of discernment in the Acts which separated the true from the false (I Cor. xii. 10). Where is this gift today without controversy or argument?

The Apostle Paul insists, therefore, that the believer's mind must be actively engaged either in prayer or praise (I Cor. xiv. 15). He goes on to argue that if a Corinthian believer utters a blessing and someone who is a simpler listener (unlearned A.V. and R.V.) hears it, how can he respond intelligently with an Amen? for he does not understand what is being said. It is therefore perfectly clear that Paul expected the Corinthian assembly as a whole, to hear, understand, test and control all that took place in their gatherings and this would be impossible without words being spoken that could be understood by all. He continues:

> "For thou verily gives thanks well (in a tongue), but the other (man) is not edified (built up)" (xiv. 17).

The whole value of the gift was not what it did for the one who uttered it, but what benefit it conferred upon others. Even with himself Paul, who could speak in tongues more than any of them, states most definitely:

> "Nevertheless, in church I would rather speak five words with my mind, in order to instruct others, than ten thousand words in a tongue" (xiv. 19 R.S.V.).

In other words, the employment of the mind was essential for fruitful witness and was infinitely of more importance than the act of speaking in a tongue.

We cannot help but note the insistence of this context that the renewed mind must be employed with the spirit. "I will pray with the spirit, but I will pray with the mind too. I will sing praise with the spirit, but I will sing praise with the mind too" (I Cor. xiv. 15, C. K. Barret), and also verse 19 "I had rather speak five words with my mind than ten thousand words in a tongue". Keeping this in the forefront we are amazed to read in a booklet entitled Speaking in Tongues by Larry Christenson, a pastor of a Californian Lutheran church:

> ". . . . . what possible value can speaking in tongues have, if a person has no idea what he is saying? According to the Bible even though one does not understand what he is saying, his spirit is in a state of prayer (I Cor. 14:14). In other words, for the person himself, speaking in tongues is praying not with the mind, but with the spirit" (page 4 italics ours).
> "One speaks with tongues, for the most part in his private devotions. This is by far its most important use and value . . . . . Although one does not know what he is saying as he prays in tongues, he does have a clear sense that he is praying to God" (page 8).

Much of this is obviously a direct negation of the teaching of Scripture above. Yet it is "according to the Bible" we are told! Moreover how the mind can be completely inactive and words used which are not understood by the speaker yet "he has a clear sense he is praying to God", is past comprehending.

On page 9 the writer continues:

> "In order to speak in tongues, you have to quit praying in English . . . . . you simply lapse into silence and resolve to speak not a syllable of any language you have ever learned. Your thoughts are focused on Christ . . . . . you take no thought of what you are saying. As far as you are concerned it is just a series of sounds . . . . ." (italics ours).

Again we ask, how can the thoughts be focused on Christ, and yet the mind be bypassed or remain inactive? There is surely confusion here and we can say with certainty that the N.T. knows nothing of such methods of prayer. There is not a single command to the believer in the N.T. to connect tongue-speaking with prayer. Did the disciples on the day of Pentecost have to prepare themselves and practice in this way in order to receive the gift of tongues? Was not this rather the sovereign act of the Holy Spirit, distributing this gift "as He willed" (I Cor. xii. 11), this being the N.T. way this gift was always received? There is not the slightest indication that there had to be practice and effort in order to obtain this gift as the booklet suggests.

We do not believe that anywhere in the Bible can God's truth and blessing be received apart from faith and understanding. "With all thy getting, get understanding" (Prov. iv. 7) and note carefully the following passages:

> "Jesus saith unto them, Have ye understood all these things? They say unto Him, Yea, Lord" (Matt. xiii. 51).
>
> "Then opened He their understanding, that they might understand the scriptures" (Luke xxiv. 45).
>
> ". . . . . the eyes of your understanding being enlightened; that ye may know . . . . ." (Eph. i. 18).
>
> "Whereby, when ye read, ye may understand my knowledge in the mystery of Christ" (Eph. iii. 4).
>
> "Wherefore be ye not unwise, but understanding what the will of the Lord is" (Eph. v. 17).
>
> "that ye might be filled with the knowledge of His will in all wisdom and spiritual understanding" (Col. i. 9).
>
> "Being knit together in love, and unto all riches of the full assurance of understanding" (Col. ii. 2).
>
> ". . . . . the Lord give thee understanding in all things" (II Tim. ii. 7).

These verses and contexts make it quite clear that a measure of understanding is absolutely vital both to the reception of truth and its practice. This being so, if the Lord wills to teach anyone, He will do so in the language that person uses and can understand and receive His truth, otherwise it would be meaningless. This was surely the object of the original gift of tongues at Pentecost, for the hearers said, "how hear we every man in our own tongues, wherein we were born?" (Acts ii. 8) not "what are all these unintelligible sounds we hear?"

Moreover those at Corinth who placed so much value on tongues were still in the infant stage spiritually. In iii. 1-3 he had severely reprimanded them for their immaturity and carnality, and the over emphasis they were placing on a showy gift, like tongue speaking, was only another evidence of this.

> "Brothers, do not be children in intelligence. In wickedness be mere infants, but in intelligence be mature" (xiv. 20, C. K. Barrett).

Teleios, mature ('men', A.V. and R.V.) is one of an important group of words, signifying adulthood or maturity as opposed to babyhood. The N.T. has some very stringent things to say about believers who do not grow up spiritually (see Heb. v. 12-14). The things of the nursery can be very delightful for infants, but for grown-ups they are entirely out of place and unbecoming. Moreover, what can babies achieve in Christian witness? The need for constant growth in grace and knowledge of the truth should be a continual challenge to us all.

Paul does not hesitate to back up his argument by an appeal to the O.T.:

> "In the law it is written, by men of strange tongues and by the lips of strangers will I speak unto this people; and not even thus will they hear Me, saith the Lord" (xiv. 21 R.V.).

Here the 'law' is a term for the whole O.T. rather than the Pentateuch, as it is also in John x. 34, where a citation from the Psalms is termed the 'law' (see also xii. 34, xv. 25 and Rom. iii. 19). The Apostle quotes freely from the LXX of Isa. xxviii. 11. Possibly he was using another version known also to the later O.T. translator Aquila. In Isaiah's day, God is saying that Israel would not listen to Him in obedience, even though He spoke in a tongue that was familiar to them. He will therefore speak to them in an unfamiliar tongue, that of their enemies, the Assyrians, but even then they would not hear. It is very important to notice that God is speaking to Israel in warning and judgment, not to Gentiles and so it was in the Acts period. The gift of tongues was primarily for unbelievers among Israel.

> "Wherefore tongues are for a sign, not to them that believe, but to the unbelieving" (xiv. 22 R.V.).

To the Jew, who had the counter-sign, the O.T., tongues should have spoken as a sign and a warning to unbelief. It is clear that known languages, such as were used at Pentecost, would be the only forceful sign to hard-hearted Israelites. Ecstatic language admits of too many natural explanations, as we have seen, not the least being the historical fact that the pagans were acquainted with such speech in their temples. The divine reason for the gift of tongues is clearly given in the chapter we are studying, "wherefore tongues are for a sign, not to them that believe, but to the unbelieving" (22).

Tongue-speaking in the N.T. takes its place among the signs of Mark xvi. that confirmed the earthly kingdom purpose throughout the Acts. Modern Pentecostalism takes it out of its Divine setting and message to the unbeliever, and to a large extent, reverses the teaching of Scripture, making it an evidence of spirituality, and "entire sanctification" of the believer. This is dangerous, indeed and will be avoided by all who seek to base their doctrine and practice on a rightly-divided Word alone. The gift of tongues, by itself, would have been highly inadequate, for even the striking exhibition of tongues on the day of Pentecost, was put down to drunkenness on the part of some (Acts ii. 12, 13).

As a warning to the unbelieving Jew and a means of the rapid spread of the gospel and the Kingdom message (Acts iii. 19-26), this gift had its place, but taken out of its Divine context, it can be dangerous. When Satan, at the end time of this age, produces his deceiving miracles and signs (II Thess. ii. 7-12) who can say that he will not use tongue-speaking to seek to deceive the very elect? He has already used tongue speaking in the past in the worship of the pagan temples of old. And if he does so in the future, what can the Pentecostalists offer in the way of Scriptural refutation, and protection of those who are exposed to such terrible deception?

To sum up—not all the miraculous evidential gifts of the Acts period were of equal importance: Prophecy was greater than speaking in tongues (I Cor. xiv. 5). Some of them, like tongues, were to "cease" (xiii. 8); others were "to abide", the three principal ones being "faith, hope and love", with love as the crown of them all (xiii. 13).

This gift of love, said the Apostle Paul must be sought after with the eagerness of pursuit (xiv. 1). What a difference we might see today in the Christian world if this was put into practice! It is surely a question of getting our priorities right.

No.22. pp. 184 - 187

Having clearly taught that the gifts of prophecy and tongues were directed to the unbelieving, specially among Israel during the Acts (I Cor. xiv. 22), the Apostle Paul now gives explicit directions to the Corinthian church as to how these gifts were to be used when they assembled together.

They had to consider not only the effect on themselves, but also on any outsiders who might come in.

> "If therefore the whole church be assembled together, and all speak with tongues, and there come in men unlearned or unbelieving, will they not say that ye are mad?" (I Cor. xiv. 23 R.V.).

Those who were "unlearned or unbelieving", probably refer to one group, namely "unbelieving outsiders". That such found their way into the Christian assemblies, there is no doubt. If more than one believer spoke at once, there could be nothing but confusion, and such new fold would be disgusted and deem them to be insane. That this happened is evident from the context. We must not suppose that the church's meetings always took place indoors. Some Jewish communities had no building to meet in.

Whether out-of-doors or inside a building, there was every likelihood that unbelievers might arrive or be brought in by other Christians. In these circumstances the gift of tongues, properly controlled, could be a help. If they were foreigners they would possibly hear a message delivered in their own language and the rest of the group would share in it when it was interpreted by someone with this Divine gift. But this could only happen with profit when these gifts were controlled by those who possessed them . . . . . No one was forced to use them against their will (verse 32), so that anything that approached confusion because more than one was speaking at a time, was inexcusable.

If the gift of prophecy alone was being used when any stranger entered, then conviction would surely follow, with the result that such would own the fact that God was truly with them (24, 25).

Paul now sums up his instructions concerning the exercise of tongues and prophecy in the assembly:

> "What is to be done, then, brothers? When you assemble, each one of you has a hymn, a piece of teaching, a revelation, a tongue, an interpretation. Let all these be exercised for the building up of the community" (xiv 26, C. K. Barrett).

As we have before seen, the exercise of these gifts was principally for the benefit of the church as a whole, not for the individual. Any shifting of this emphasis was dangerous and still is, and is not according to truth. It has been said that in verses 26, 27 we have a small glimpse of the simplicity of early church meetings.

It is noteworthy that there was no one in charge like the modern clergyman and when one considers the ornate modes of service and ritual that we see all around us in modern Christendom, we can judge how far this has gone astray from the Divine set-up at the beginning.

However, we must not fall into the error of assuming that this gives in every detail the example for assemblies today, for, despite Pentecostal claims, we have not the confirmatory gifts of the earthly Kingdom that were prominent during the Acts. When these lapsed after Israel's failure at Acts xxviii., no doubt the order of service and worship was modified and God-given leaders, humble men drawn from the ranks, took their place in ministering the truth of the Word of God. We can be perfectly sure that all conformed to the administration of the Truth of the Mystery and that nothing was added or detracted from this climax truth and the gospel of God's grace upon which it is based.

Coming back to the Apostle's instructions to the Corinthian church, tongue speaking was limited to two or at the most three speakers on each occasion, and then only one at a time, to be followed by another member interpreting (verse 27). If no interpreter was present, the tongue speaker was commanded to keep quiet. Regarding prophets, they were also limited to two or three and then the important injunction is "let the others test what they say" (verse 29, C. K. Barrett). Here was God's check against the deceiving work of Satan. In no case were the early Christians expected to swallow uncritically everything they heard (I Thess. v. 21; I John iv. 1). This Divine check is conspicuously absent today, specially among those who profess to have these kingdom gifts. No wonder we read of excesses from time to time. Satan can have a "field-day" when Christian gatherings are not directly controlled by a rightly-divided Word, and the result is deception, confusion and division.

The Corinthian were further told that prophecy must be controlled as with tongues, and while it was possible that all could prophesy, if the Spirit willed, yet it did not mean that all would necessarily take part in this activity (verses 30 and 31). And then follows the important statement:

> "The spirits by which prophets speak are under the control of the prophets, for God's is not a God of disorder but of peace, as in all the churches of the saints" (I Cor. xiv. 32, 33, C. K. Barrett).

No one could plead that he was compelled to speak by the Holy Spirit. When one sometimes reads that a Pentecostal leader or speaker was dominated by the Holy Spirit and was not able to keep silent (e.g. Edward Irving, one of the founders of the modern Pentecostal movement), one can be assured that such experiences do not come from God but from the old deceiver of mankind.

Paul now reverts to the attitude of women in the assembly and we must be careful that we do not interpret the verses to conflict with what has already been said in chapter xi. 5. Apart from inspiration, one would not expect a logically-minded man as Paul to contradict himself. In the eleventh chapter it is not the gift that women are using which is the point at issue, but how they are dressed for the occasion. Acts xxi. 9 shows that women prophets existed, though possibly rarely.

What Paul is now going to say is that, apart from the teaching given in chapter xi., women should be silent in Christian gatherings, in just the same way as the male tongue speaker or prophet was enjoined to be silent, all being in the interests of peace and good order. If this was not so, then uncontrolled discussion and argument would take place which would become heated and give the enemy an opportunity of taking control and spoiling the witness. Such discussion should take place at home and not in the assembly.

Whether discussion should ever be allowed in a public meeting is indeed a difficult one to settle. We have seen meetings ruined by this. On the other hand if love and self-controlled prevails, then such discussion can prove helpful. No rigid rule today can be laid down on this point, but we may be assured of one thing, that no Christian woman who is versed in God's truth will ever want to push herself into a position that is not according to his will. The relationship of the sexes in God's sight has already been dealt with, and this should be the dominating factor in any problems that is related to a public assembly.

Paul now reminds the believers at Corinth that they should consider Christian practice generally. They had no monopoly of the gospel, Divine gifts, or truth as a whole.

> "What? was it from you that the word of God went forth? or came it unto you alone" (xiv. 36 R.V.).

They should therefore consider how other assemblies were behaving and not suppose that they were right and every one else wrong. The Apostle, who had before stressed the need of testing and checking all they heard, now gives another important test:

> "If anyone thinks himself to be a prophet or a spiritual person, he should recognize that what I am writing to you comes from the Lord" or, as some MSS "is the Lord's command" (xiv. 37, C. K. Barrett).

This does not mean that Paul is quoting from the words Christ uttered on earth, but that all was in accordance with the truth deposited with him by revelation from the risen Lord (cp. Gal. i. 11, 12). If this is not inspiration in the fullest sense, what is it? This verse and the statement in I Thess. ii. 13 makes it perfectly clear that there is no such thing as Pauline doctrine, that is, doctrine founded on Paul's ideas. There are indeed distinctive truths given by God through Paul the channel, but in no sense are we dealing with Paul's opinions or conceptions. It is God's truth, and neither we nor the early churches follow a man pure and simple.

If Paul exhorts us to follow him, he immediately adds "even as I follow Christ". We have one Lord, who only has the right to teach and control us and we cannot acknowledge anyone else as such. But no one at Corinth could claim to have reached this position who denied the Apostle Paul's ministry and authority. There are those today who think they can by-pass Paul and as long as they adhere to the "teaching of Jesus" in the Gospels, they imagine they are receiving the Truth in all its fullness. Such deceive themselves and others whom they seek to influence.

The mark of spirituality which the Apostle gives in the context we are studying, is still true. The majority of Christendom today have little place for, still less an understanding of the truth given through the Apostle. Is it any wonder that we see it divided, powerless, with no divine answer to the enormous problems that face us?
